"Yes," said Edna. It was the first time she had admitted it, and a glow overspread her face, blotching it with red spots.

"Why?" asked her companion. "Why do you love him when you ought not to?"

Edna, with a motion or two, dragged herself on her knees before Mademoiselle Reisz, who took the glowing face between her two hands.

"Why? Because his hair is brown and grows away from his temples; because he opens and shuts his eyes, and his nose is a little out of drawing; because he has two lips and a square chin, and a little finger which he can't straighten from having played baseball too energetically in his youth. Because—"

"Because you do, in short," laughed Mademoiselle. "What will you do when he comes back?" she asked.

"Do? Nothing, except feel glad and happy to be alive."

She was already glad and happy to be alive at the mere thought of his return. The murky, lowering sky, which had depressed her a few hours before, seemed bracing and invigorating as she splashed through the streets on her way home.

She stopped at a confectioner's and ordered a huge box of bonbons for the children in Iberville. She slipped a card in the box, on which she scribbled a tender message and sent an abundance of kisses.

Before dinner in the evening Edna wrote a charming letter to her husband, telling him of her intention to move for a while into the little house around the block, and to give a farewell dinner before leaving, regretting that he was not there to share it, to help her out with the menu and assist her in entertaining the guests. Her letter was brilliant and brimming with cheerfulness.

"What is the matter with you?" asked Arobin that evening. "I never found you in such a happy mood." Edna was tired by that time, and was reclining on the lounge before the fire.

"Don't you know the weather prophet has told us we shall see the sun pretty soon?"

"Well, that ought to be reason enough," he acquiesced. "You wouldn't give me another if I sat here all night imploring you." He sat close to her on a low tabouret, and as he spoke his fingers lightly touched the hair that fell a little over her forehead. She liked the touch of his fingers through her hair, and closed her eyes sensitively.

"One of these days," she said, "I'm going to pull myself together for a while and think—try to determine what character of a woman I am; for, candidly, I don't know. By all the codes which I am acquainted with, I am a devilishly wicked specimen of the sex. But some way I can't convince myself that I am. I must think about it."

"Don't. What's the use? Why should you bother thinking about it when I can tell you what manner of woman you are." His fingers strayed occasionally down to her warm, smooth cheeks and firm chin, which was growing a little full and double.

"Oh, yes! You will tell me that I am adorable; everything that is captivating. Spare yourself the effort."

"No; I shan't tell you anything of the sort, though I shouldn't be lying if I did."

"Do you know Mademoiselle Reisz?" she asked irrelevantly.

"The pianist? I know her by sight. I've heard her play."

"She says queer things sometimes in a bantering way that you don't notice at the time and you find yourself thinking about afterward."

"For instance?"

"Well, for instance, when I left her to-day, she put her arms around me and felt my shoulder blades, to see if my wings were strong, she said. 'The bird that would soar above the level plain of tradition and prejudice must have strong wings. It is a sad spectacle to see the weaklings bruised, exhausted, fluttering back to earth.'"

"Whither would you soar?"

"I'm not thinking of any extraordinary flights. I only half comprehend her."

"I've heard she's partially demented," said Arobin.

"She seems to me wonderfully sane," Edna replied.

"I'm told she's extremely disagreeable and unpleasant. Why have you introduced her at a moment when I desired to talk of you?"

"Oh! talk of me if you like," cried Edna, clasping her hands beneath her head; "but let me think of something else while you do."

"I'm jealous of your thoughts to-night. They're making you a little kinder than usual; but some way I feel as if they were wandering, as if they were not here with me." She only looked at him and smiled. His eyes were very near. He leaned upon the lounge with an arm extended across her, while the other hand still rested upon her hair. They continued silently to look into each other's eyes. When he leaned forward and kissed her, she clasped his head, holding his lips to hers.

It was the first kiss of her life to which her nature had really responded. It was a flaming torch that kindled desire.

XXVIII

which had assailed her. There was with her an overwhelming feeling of irresponsibility. There was the shock of the unexpected and the unaccustomed. There was her husband's reproach looking at her from the external things around her which he had provided for her external existence. There was Robert's reproach making itself felt by a quicker, fiercer, more overpowering love, which had awakened within her toward him. Above all, there was understanding. She felt as if a mist had been lifted from her eyes, enabling her to look upon and comprehend the significance of life, that monster made up of beauty and brutality. But among the conflicting sensations which assailed her, there was neither shame nor remorse. There was a dull pang of regret because it was not the kiss of love which had inflamed her, because it was not love which had held this cup of life to her lips.

XXIX

Without even waiting for an answer from her husband regarding his opinion or wishes in the matter, Edna hastened her preparations for quitting her home on Esplanade Street and moving into the little house around the block. A feverish anxiety attended her every action in that direction. There was no moment of deliberation, no interval of repose between the thought and its fulfillment. Early upon the morning following those hours passed in Arobin's society, Edna set about securing her new abode and hurrying her arrangements for occupying it. Within the precincts of her home she felt like one who has entered and lingered within the portals of some forbidden temple in which a thousand muffled voices bade her begone.

735 Whatever was her own in the house, everything she had acquired aside from her husband's bounty, she caused to be transported to the other house, supplying simple and meager deficiencies from her own resources.

Arobin found her with rolled sleeves, working in company with the house-maid when he looked in during the afternoon. She was splendid and robust, and had never appeared handsomer than in the old blue gown, with a red silk handkerchief knotted at random around her head to protect her hair from the dust. She was mounted upon a high step-ladder, unhooking a picture from the wall when he entered. He had found the front door open, and had followed his ring by walking in unceremoniously.

"Come down!" he said. "Do you want to kill yourself?" She greeted him with affected carelessness, and appeared absorbed in her occupation.

If he had expected to find her languishing, reproachful, or indulging in sentimental tears, he must have been greatly surprised.

He was no doubt prepared for any emergency, ready for any one of the foregoing attitudes, just as he bent himself easily and naturally to the situation which confronted him.

"Please come down," he insisted, holding the ladder and looking up at her.

"No," she answered; "Ellen is afraid to mount the ladder. Joe is working over at the 'pigeon house'—that's the name Ellen gives it, because it's so small and looks like a pigeon house—and some one has to do this."

Arobin pulled off his coat, and expressed himself ready and willing to tempt fate in her place. Ellen brought him one of her dust-caps, and went into contortions of mirth, which she found it impossible to control, when she saw him put it on before the mirror as grotesquely as he could. Edna herself could not refrain from smiling when she fastened it at his request. So it was he who in turn mounted the ladder, unhooking pictures and curtains, and dislodging ornaments as Edna directed. When he had finished he took off his dust-cap and went out to wash his hands.

Edna was sitting on the tabouret, idly brushing the tips of a feather duster along the carpet when he came in again.

"Is there anything more you will let me do?" he asked.

"That is all," she answered. "Ellen can manage the rest." She kept the young woman occupied in the drawing-room, unwilling to be left alone with Arobin.

"What about the dinner?" he asked; "the grand event, the coup d'état?"

"It will be day after to-morrow. Why do you call it the 'coup d'état?' Oh! it will be very fine; all my best of everything—crystal, silver and gold, Sèvres, flowers, music, and champagne to swim in. I'll let Léonce pay the bills. I wonder what he'll say when he sees the bills."

"And you ask me why I call it a coup d'état?" Arobin put on his coat, and he stood before her and asked if his cravat was plumb. She told him it was, looking no higher than the tip of his collar.

"When do you go to the 'pigeon house?'—with all due acknowledgement to Ellen."

"Day after to-morrow, after the dinner. I shall sleep there."

"Ellen, will you very kindly get me a glass of water?" asked Arobin. "The dust in the curtains, if you will pardon me for hinting such a thing, has parched my throat to a crisp."

"While Ellen gets the water," said Edna, rising, "I will say good-by and let you go. I must get rid of this grime, and I have a million things to do and think of."

"When shall I see you?" asked Arobin, seeking to detain her, the maid having left the room.

"At the dinner, of course. You are invited."

"Not before?—not to-night or to-morrow morning or to-morrow noon or night? or the day after morning or noon? Can't you see yourself, without my telling you, what an eternity it is?"

He had followed her into the hall and to the foot of the stairway, looking up at her as she mounted with her face half turned to him.

"Not an instant sooner," she said. But she laughed and looked at him with eyes that at once gave him courage to wait and made it torture to wait.

XXX

Though Edna had spoken of the dinner as a grand affair, it was in truth a very small affair and very select, in so much as the guests invited were few and were selected with discrimination. She had counted upon an even dozen seating themselves at her round mahogany board, forgetting for the moment that Madame Ratignolle was to the last degree *souffrante*67 and unpresentable, and not foreseeing that Madame Lebrun would send a thousand regrets at the last moment. So there were only ten, after all, which made a cozy, comfortable number.

There were Mr. and Mrs. Merriman, a pretty, vivacious little woman in the thirties; her husband, a jovial fellow, something of a shallow-pate, who laughed a good deal at other people's witticisms, and had thereby made himself extremely popular. Mrs. Highcamp had accompanied them. Of course, there was Alcée Arobin; and Mademoiselle Reisz had consented to come. Edna had sent her a fresh bunch of violets with black lace trimmings for her hair. Monsieur Ratignolle brought himself and his wife's excuses. Victor Lebrun, who happened to be in the city, bent upon relaxation, had accepted with alacrity. There was a Miss Mayblunt, no longer in her teens, who looked at the world through lorgnettes and with the keenest interest. It was thought and said that she was intellectual; it was suspected of her that she wrote under a nom de guerre.68 She had come with a gentleman by the name of Gouvernail, connected with one of the daily papers, of whom nothing special could be said, except that he was observant and seemed quiet and inoffensive. Edna herself made the tenth, and at half-past eight they seated themselves at table, Arobin and Monsieur Ratignolle on either side of their hostess.

Mrs. Highcamp sat between Arobin and Victor Lebrun. Then came Mrs. Merriman, Mr. Gouvernail, Miss Mayblunt, Mr. Merriman, and Mademoiselle Reisz next to Monsieur Ratignolle.

There was something extremely gorgeous about the appearance of the table, an effect of splendor conveyed by a cover of pale yellow satin under strips of lacework. There were wax candles in massive brass candelabra, burning softly under yellow silk shades; full, fragrant roses, yellow and red, abounded. There were silver and gold, as she had said there would be, and crystal which glittered like the gems which the women wore.

The ordinary stiff dining chairs had been discarded for the occasion and replaced by the most commodious and luxurious which could be collected throughout the house. Mademoiselle Reisz, being exceedingly diminutive, was elevated upon cushions, as small children are sometimes hoisted at table upon bulky volumes.

“Something new, Edna?” exclaimed Miss Mayblunt, with lorgnette directed toward a magnificent cluster of diamonds that sparkled, that almost sputtered, in Edna’s hair, just over the center of her forehead.

“Quite new; ‘brand’ new, in fact; a present from my husband. It arrived this morning from New York. I may as well admit that this is my birthday, and that I am twenty-nine. In good time I expect you to drink my health. Meanwhile, I shall ask you to begin with this cocktail, composed—would you say ‘composed?’” with an appeal to Miss Mayblunt—“composed by my father in honor of Sister Janet’s wedding.”

Before each guest stood a tiny glass that looked and sparkled like a garnet gem.

“Then, all things considered,” spoke Arobin, “it might not be amiss to start out by drinking the Colonel’s health in the cocktail which he composed, on the birthday of the most charming of women—the daughter whom he invented.”

Mr. Merriman’s laugh at this sally was such a genuine outburst and so contagious that it started the dinner with an agreeable swing that never slackened.

Miss Mayblunt begged to be allowed to keep her cocktail untouched before her, just to look at.

The color was marvelous! She could compare it to nothing she had ever seen, and the garnet lights which it emitted were unspeakably rare. She pronounced the Colonel an artist, and stuck to it.

Monsieur Ratignolle was prepared to take things seriously: the mets, the entremets,69 the service, the decorations, even the people. He looked up from his pompano70 and inquired of Arobin if he were related to the gentleman of that name who formed one of the firm of Laitner and Arobin, lawyers. The young man admitted that Laitner was a warm personal friend, who permitted Arobin's name to decorate the firm's letterheads and to appear upon a shingle that graced Perdido Street.

770 "There are so many inquisitive people and institutions abounding," said Arobin, "that one is really forced as a matter of convenience these days to assume the virtue of an occupation if he has it not."

Monsieur Ratignolle stared a little, and turned to ask Mademoiselle Reisz if she considered the symphony concerts up to the standard which had been set the previous winter. Mademoiselle Reisz answered Monsieur Ratignolle in French, which Edna thought a little rude, under the circumstances, but characteristic. Mademoiselle had only disagreeable things to say of the symphony concerts, and insulting remarks to make of all the musicians of New Orleans, singly and collectively. All her interest seemed to be centered upon the delicacies placed before her.

Mr. Merriman said that Mr. Arobin's remark about inquisitive people reminded him of a man from Waco the other day at the St. Charles Hotel—but as Mr. Merriman's stories were always lame and lacking point, his wife seldom permitted him to complete them. She interrupted him to ask if he remembered the name of the author whose book she had bought the week before to send to a friend in Geneva. She was talking "books" with Mr. Gouvernail and trying to draw from him his opinion upon current literary topics. Her husband told the story of the Waco man privately to Miss Mayblunt, who pretended to be greatly amused and to think it extremely clever.

Mrs. Highcamp hung with languid but unaffected interest upon the warm and impetuous volubility of her left-hand neighbor, Victor Lebrun. Her attention was never for a moment withdrawn from him after seating herself at table; and when he turned to Mrs. Merriman, who was prettier and more vivacious than Mrs. Highcamp, she waited with easy indifference for an opportunity to reclaim his attention. There was the occasional sound of music, of mandolins, sufficiently removed to be an agreeable accompaniment rather than an interruption to the conversation. Outside the soft, monotonous splash of a fountain could be heard; the sound penetrated into the room with the heavy odor of jessamine that came through the open windows.

The golden shimmer of Edna's satin gown spread in rich folds on either side of her. There was a soft fall of lace encircling her shoulders. It was the color of her skin, without the glow, the myriad living tints that one may sometimes discover in vibrant flesh. There was something in her attitude, in her whole appearance when she leaned her head against the high-backed chair and spread her arms, which suggested the regal woman, the one who rules, who looks on, who stands alone.

But as she sat there amid her guests, she felt the old ennui overtaking her; the hopelessness which so often assailed her, which came upon her like an obsession, like something extraneous, independent of volition. It was something which announced itself; a chill breath that seemed to issue from some vast cavern wherein discords wailed. There came over her the acute longing which always summoned into her spiritual vision the presence of the beloved one, overpowering her at once with a sense of the unattainable.

The moments glided on, while a feeling of good fellowship passed around the circle like a mystic cord, holding and binding these people together with jest and laughter. Monsieur Ratignolle was the first to break the pleasant charm. At ten o'clock he excused himself. Madame Ratignolle was waiting for him at home. She was *bien souffrante,*71 and she was filled with vague dread, which only her husband's presence could allay.

Mademoiselle Reisz arose with Monsieur Ratignolle, who offered to escort her to the car. She had eaten well; she had tasted the good, rich wines, and they must have turned her head, for she bowed pleasantly to all as she withdrew from table. She kissed Edna upon the shoulder, and whispered: *"Bonne nuit, ma reine; soyez sage."*72 She had been a little bewildered upon rising, or rather, descending from her cushions, and Monsieur Ratignolle gallantly took her arm and led her away.

Mrs. Highcamp was weaving a garland of roses, yellow and red. When she had finished the garland, she laid it lightly upon Victor's black curls. He was reclining far back in the luxurious chair, holding a glass of champagne to the light.

As if a magician's wand had touched him, the garland of roses transformed him into a vision of Oriental beauty. His cheeks were the color of crushed grapes, and his dusky eyes glowed with a languishing fire.

780 "Sapristi!" exclaimed Arobin.

But Mrs. Highcamp had one more touch to add to the picture. She took from the back of her chair a white silken scarf, with which she had covered her shoulders in the early part of the evening. She draped it across the boy in graceful folds, and in a way to conceal his black, conventional evening dress. He did not seem to mind what she did to him, only smiled showing a faint gleam of white teeth, while he continued to gaze with narrowing eyes at the light through his glass of champagne.

"Oh! to be able to paint in color rather than in words!" exclaimed Miss Mayblunt, losing herself in a rhapsodic dream as she looked at him.

"'There was a graven image of Desire Painted with red blood on a ground of gold.'"73

murmured Gouvernail, under his breath.

The effect of the wine upon Victor was to change his accustomed volubility into silence. He seemed to have abandoned himself to a reverie, and to be seeing pleasing visions in the amber bead.

"Sing," entreated Mrs. Highcamp. "Won't you sing to us?"

785 "Let him alone," said Arobin.

"He's posing," offered Mr. Merriman; "let him have it out."

"I believe he's paralyzed," laughed Mrs. Merriman. And leaning over the youth's chair, she took the glass from his hand and held it to his lips. He sipped the wine slowly, and when he had drained the glass she laid it upon the table and wiped his lips with her little filmy handkerchief.

"Yes, I'll sing for you," he said, turning in his chair toward Mrs. Highcamp. He clasped his hands behind his head, and looking up at the ceiling began to hum a little, trying his voice like a musician tuning an instrument. Then, looking at Edna, he began to sing:

"Ah! si tu savais!"

"Stop!" she cried, "don't sing that. I don't want you to sing it," and she laid her glass so impetuously and blindly upon the table as to shatter it against a carafe. The wine spilled over Arobin's legs and some of it trickled down upon Mrs. Highcamp's black gauze gown. Victor had lost all idea of courtesy, or else he thought his hostess was not in earnest, for he laughed and went on:

"Ah! si tu savais

Ce que tes yeux me disent"—74

"Oh! you mustn't! you mustn't," exclaimed Edna, and pushing back her chair she got up, and going behind him placed her hand over his mouth. He kissed the soft palm that pressed upon his lips.

"No, no, I won't, Mrs. Pontellier. I didn't know you meant it," looking up at her with caressing eyes. The touch of his lips was like a pleasing sting to her hand. She lifted the garland of roses from his head and flung it across the room.

"Come, Victor; you've posed long enough. Give Mrs. Highcamp her scarf."

Mrs. Highcamp undraped her scarf from about him with her own hands. Miss Mayblunt and Mr. Gouvernail suddenly conceived the notion that it was time to say good night. And Mr. and Mrs. Merriman wondered how it could be so late.

Before parting from Victor, Mrs. Highcamp invited him to call upon her daughter, who she knew would be charmed to meet him and talk French and sing French songs with him. Victor expressed his desire and intention to call upon Miss Highcamp at the first opportunity which presented itself. He asked if Arobin were going his way. Arobin was not.

The mandolin players had long since stolen away. A profound stillness had fallen upon the broad, beautiful street. The voices of Edna's disbanding guests jarred like a discordant note upon the quiet harmony of the night.

XXXI

"Well?" questioned Arobin, who had remained with Edna after the others had departed.

"Well," she reiterated, and stood up, stretching her arms, and feeling the need to relax her muscles after having been so long seated.

"What next?" he asked.

"The servants are all gone. They left when the musicians did. I have dismissed them. The house has to be closed and locked, and I shall trot around to the pigeon house, and shall send Celestine over in the morning to straighten things up."

He looked around, and began to turn out some of the lights.

"What about upstairs?" he inquired.

"I think it is all right; but there may be a window or two unlatched. We had better look; you might take a candle and see. And bring me my wrap and hat on the foot of the bed in the middle room."

He went up with the light, and Edna began closing doors and windows. She hated to shut in the smoke and the fumes of the wine. Arobin found her cape and hat, which he brought down and helped her to put on.

When everything was secured and the lights put out, they left through the front door, Arobin locking it and taking the key, which he carried for Edna. He helped her down the steps.

"Will you have a spray of jessamine?" he asked, breaking off a few blossoms as he passed.

"No; I don't want anything."

She seemed disheartened, and had nothing to say. She took his arm, which he offered her, holding up the weight of her satin gown with the other hand. She looked down, noticing the black line of his leg moving in and out so close to her against the yellow shimmer of her gown. There was the whistle of a railway train somewhere in the distance, and the midnight bells were ringing. They met no one in their short walk.

The "pigeon-house" stood behind a locked gate, and a shallow *parterre*75 that had been somewhat neglected. There was a small front porch, upon which a long window and the front door opened. The door opened directly into the parlor; there was no side entry. Back in the yard was a room for servants, in which old Celestine had been ensconced.

Edna had left a lamp burning low upon the table. She had succeeded in making the room look habitable and homelike. There were some books on the table and a lounge near at hand. On the floor was a fresh matting, covered with a rug or two; and on the walls hung a few tasteful pictures. But the room was filled with flowers. These were a surprise to her. Arobin had sent them, and had had Celestine distribute them during Edna's absence. Her bedroom was adjoining, and across a small passage were the dining-room and kitchen.

Edna seated herself with every appearance of discomfort.

"Are you tired?" he asked.

"Yes, and chilled, and miserable. I feel as if I had been wound up to a certain pitch—too tight—and something inside of me had snapped."

She had rested her head against the table upon her bare arm.

"You want to rest," he said, "and to be quiet. I'll go; I'll leave you and let you rest."

"Yes," she replied.

He stood up beside her and smoothed her hair with his soft, magnetic hand. His touch conveyed to her a certain physical comfort. She could have fallen quietly asleep there if he had continued to pass his hand over her hair. He brushed the hair upward from the nape of her neck.

"I hope you will feel better and happier in the morning," he said. "You have tried to do too much in the past few days. The dinner was the last straw; you might have dispensed with it."

"Yes," she admitted; "it was stupid."

"No, it was delightful; but it has worn you out." His hand strayed to her beautiful shoulders, and he could feel the response of her flesh to his touch. He seated himself beside her and kissed her lightly on the shoulder.

"I thought you were going away," she said, in an uneven voice.

"I am, after I have said good night."

"Good night," she murmured.

He did not answer, except to continue to caress her. He did not say good night until she had become supple to his gentle, seductive entreaties.

XXXII

When Mr. Pontellier learned of his wife's intention to abandon her home and take up her residence elsewhere he immediately wrote her a letter of unqualified disapproval and remonstrance. She had given reasons which he was unwilling to acknowledge as adequate. He hoped she had not acted upon her rash impulse; and he begged her to consider first, foremost, and above all else, what people would say. He was not dreaming of scandal when he uttered this warning; that was a thing which would never have entered into his mind to consider in connection with his wife's name or his own. He was simply thinking of his financial integrity. It might get noised about that the Pontelliers had met with reverses, and were forced to conduct their *ménage*76 on a humbler scale than heretofore. It might do incalculable mischief to his business prospects.

But remembering Edna's whimsical turn of mind of late, and foreseeing that she had immediately acted upon her impetuous determination, he grasped the situation with his usual promptness and handled it with his well-known business tact and cleverness.

The same mail which brought to Edna his letter of disapproval carried instructions—the most minute instructions—to a well-known architect concerning the remodeling of his home, changes which he had long contemplated, and which he desired carried forward during his temporary absence.

Expert and reliable packers and movers were engaged to convey the furniture, carpets, pictures—everything movable, in short—to places of security. And in an incredibly short time the Pontellier house was turned over to the artisans. There was to be an addition—a small snuggery; there was to be frescoing, and hardwood flooring was to be put into such rooms as had not yet been subjected to this improvement.

Furthermore, in one of the daily papers appeared a brief notice to the effect that Mr. and Mrs. Pontellier were contemplating a summer sojourn abroad, and that their handsome residence on Esplanade Street was undergoing sumptuous alterations, and would not be ready for occupancy until their return. Mr. Pontellier had saved appearances!

Edna admired the skill of his maneuver, and avoided any occasion to balk his intentions. When the situation as set forth by Mr. Pontellier was accepted and taken for granted, she was apparently satisfied that it should be so.

The pigeon-house pleased her. It at once assumed the intimate character of a home, while she herself invested it with a charm which it reflected like a warm glow. There was with her a feeling of having descended in the social scale, with a corresponding sense of having risen in the spiritual. Every step which she took toward relieving herself from obligations added to her strength and expansion as an individual. She began to look with her own eyes; to see and to apprehend the deeper undercurrents of life. No longer was she content to “feed upon opinion” when her own soul had invited her.

After a little while, a few days, in fact, Edna went up and spent a week with her children in Iberville. They were delicious February days, with all the summer’s promise hovering in the air.

How glad she was to see the children! She wept for very pleasure when she felt their little arms clasping her; their hard, ruddy cheeks pressed against her own glowing cheeks. She looked into their faces with hungry eyes that could not be satisfied with looking. And what stories they had to tell their mother! About the pigs, the cows, the mules! About riding to the mill behind Gluglu; fishing back in the lake with their Uncle Jasper; picking pecans with Lidie's little black brood, and hauling chips in their little express wagon. It was a thousand times more fun to haul real chips for old lame Susie's real fire than to drag painted blocks along the banquette on Esplanade Street!

She went with them herself to see the pigs and the cows, to look at the darkies laying the cane, to thrash the pecan trees, and catch fish in the back lake. She lived with them a whole week long, giving them all of herself, and gathering and filling herself with their young existence. They listened, breathless, when she told them the house in Esplanade Street was crowded with workmen, hammering, nailing, sawing, and filling the place with clatter. They wanted to know where their bed was; what had been done with their rocking-horse; and where did Joe sleep, and where had Ellen gone, and the cook? But, above all, they were fired with a desire to see the little house around the block. Was there any place to play? Were there any boys next door? Raoul, with pessimistic foreboding, was convinced that there were only girls next door. Where would they sleep, and where would papa sleep? She told them the fairies would fix it all right.

The old Madame was charmed with Edna's visit, and showered all manner of delicate attentions upon her. She was delighted to know that the Esplanade Street house was in a dismantled condition. It gave her the promise and pretext to keep the children indefinitely.

It was with a wrench and a pang that Edna left her children. She carried away with her the sound of their voices and the touch of their cheeks. All along the journey homeward their presence lingered with her like the memory of a delicious song. But by the time she had regained the city the song no longer echoed in her soul. She was again alone.

XXXIII

It happened sometimes when Edna went to see Mademoiselle Reisz that the little musician was absent, giving a lesson or making some small necessary household purchase. The key was always left in a secret hiding-place in the entry, which Edna knew. If Mademoiselle happened to be away, Edna would usually enter and wait for her return.

When she knocked at Mademoiselle Reisz's door one afternoon there was no response; so unlocking the door, as usual, she entered and found the apartment deserted, as she had expected. Her day had been quite filled up, and it was for a rest, for a refuge, and to talk about Robert, that she sought out her friend.

She had worked at her canvas—a young Italian character study—all the morning, completing the work without the model; but there had been many interruptions, some incident to her modest housekeeping, and others of a social nature.

Madame Ratignolle had dragged herself over, avoiding the too public thoroughfares, she said. She complained that Edna had neglected her much of late. Besides, she was consumed with curiosity to see the little house and the manner in which it was conducted. She wanted to hear all about the dinner party; Monsieur Ratignolle had left so early. What had happened after he left? The champagne and grapes which Edna sent over were too delicious. She had so little appetite; they had refreshed and toned her stomach. Where on earth was she going to put Mr. Pontellier in that little house, and the boys? And then she made Edna promise to go to her when her hour of trial overtook her.

"At any time—any time of the day or night, dear," Edna assured her.

Before leaving Madame Ratignolle said:

"In some way you seem to me like a child, Edna. You seem to act without a certain amount of reflection which is necessary in this life. That is the reason I want to say you mustn't mind if I advise you to be a little careful while you are living here alone. Why don't you have some one come and stay with you? Wouldn't Mademoiselle Reisz come?"

"No; she wouldn't wish to come, and I shouldn't want her always with me."

"Well, the reason—you know how evil-minded the world is—some one was talking of Alcée Arobin visiting you. Of course, it wouldn't matter if Mr. Arobin had not such a dreadful reputation. Monsieur Ratignolle was telling me that his attentions alone are considered enough to ruin a woman's name."

"Does he boast of his successes?" asked Edna, indifferently, squinting at her picture.

"No, I think not. I believe he is a decent fellow as far as that goes. But his character is so well known among the men. I shan't be able to come back and see you; it was very, very imprudent to-day."

"Mind the step!" cried Edna.

"Don't neglect me," entreated Madame Ratignolle; "and don't mind what I said about Arobin, or having some one to stay with you."

"Of course not," Edna laughed. "You may say anything you like to me." They kissed each other good-by. Madame Ratignolle had not far to go, and Edna stood on the porch a while watching her walk down the street.

Then in the afternoon Mrs. Merriman and Mrs. Highcamp had made their "party call." Edna felt that they might have dispensed with the formality. They had also come to invite her to play *vingt-et-un*77 one evening at Mrs. Merriman's. She was asked to go early, to dinner, and Mr. Merriman or Mr. Arobin would take her home. Edna accepted in a half-hearted way. She sometimes felt very tired of Mrs. Highcamp and Mrs. Merriman.

Late in the afternoon she sought refuge with Mademoiselle Reisz, and stayed there alone, waiting for her, feeling a kind of repose invade her with the very atmosphere of the shabby, unpretentious little room.

Edna sat at the window, which looked out over the house-tops and across the river. The window frame was filled with pots of flowers, and she sat and picked the dry leaves from a rose geranium. The day was warm, and the breeze which blew from the river was very pleasant. She removed her hat and laid it on the piano. She went on picking the leaves and digging around the plants with her hat pin. Once she thought she heard Mademoiselle Reisz approaching. But it was a young black girl, who came in, bringing a small bundle of laundry, which she deposited in the adjoining room, and went away.

Edna seated herself at the piano, and softly picked out with one hand the bars of a piece of music which lay open before her. A half-hour went by. There was the occasional sound of people going and coming in the lower hall. She was growing interested in her occupation of picking out the aria, when there was a second rap at the door. She vaguely wondered what these people did when they found Mademoiselle's door locked.

"Come in," she called, turning her face toward the door. And this time it was Robert Lebrun who presented himself. She attempted to rise; she could not have done so without betraying the agitation which mastered her at sight of him, so she fell back upon the stool, only exclaiming, "Why, Robert!"

He came and clasped her hand, seemingly without knowing what he was saying or doing.

“Mrs. Pontellier! How do you happen—oh! how well you look! Is Mademoiselle Reisz not here? I never expected to see you.”

“When did you come back?” asked Edna in an unsteady voice, wiping her face with her handkerchief. She seemed ill at ease on the piano stool, and he begged her to take the chair by the window. She did so, mechanically, while he seated himself on the stool.

“I returned day before yesterday,” he answered, while he leaned his arm on the keys, bringing forth a crash of discordant sound.

“Day before yesterday!” she repeated, aloud; and went on thinking to herself, “day before yesterday,” in a sort of an uncomprehending way. She had pictured him seeking her at the very first hour, and he had lived under the same sky since day before yesterday; while only by accident had he stumbled upon her. Mademoiselle must have lied when she said, “Poor fool, he loves you.”

860 “Day before yesterday,” she repeated, breaking off a spray of Mademoiselle’s geranium; “then if you had not met me here to-day you wouldn’t—when—that is, didn’t you mean to come and see me?”

“Of course, I should have gone to see you. There have been so many things—” he turned the leaves of Mademoiselle’s music nervously. “I started in at once yesterday with the old firm. After all there is as much chance for me here as there was there—that is, I might find it profitable some day. The Mexicans were not very congenial.”

So he had come back because the Mexicans were not congenial; because business was as profitable here as there; because of reason, and not because he cared to be near her. She remembered the day she sat on the floor, turning the pages of his letter, seeking the reason which was left untold.

She had not noticed how he looked—only feeling his presence; but she turned deliberately and observed him. After all, he had been absent but a few months, and was not changed. His hair—the color of hers—waved back from his temples in the same way as before. His skin was not more burned than it had been at Grand Isle. She found in his eyes, when he looked at her for one silent moment, the same tender caress, with an added warmth and entreaty which had not been there before—the same glance which had penetrated to the sleeping places of her soul and awakened them.

A hundred times Edna had pictured Robert’s return, and imagined their first meeting. It was usually at her home, whither he had sought her out at once. She always fancied him expressing or betraying in some way his love for her. And here, the reality was that they sat ten feet apart, she at the window, crushing geranium leaves in her hand and smelling them, he twirling around on the piano stool, saying:

"I was very much surprised to hear of Mr. Pontellier's absence; it's a wonder Mademoiselle Reisz did not tell me; and your moving—mother told me yesterday. I should think you would have gone to New York with him, or to Iberville with the children, rather than be bothered here with housekeeping. And you are going abroad, too, I hear. We shan't have you at Grand Isle next summer; it won't seem—do you see much of Mademoiselle Reisz? She often spoke of you in the few letters she wrote."

"Do you remember that you promised to write to me when you went away?" A flush overspread his whole face.

"I couldn't believe that my letters would be of any interest to you."

"That is an excuse; it isn't the truth." Edna reached for her hat on the piano. She adjusted it, sticking the hat pin through the heavy coil of hair with some deliberation.

"Are you not going to wait for Mademoiselle Reisz?" asked Robert.

"No; I have found when she is absent this long, she is liable not to come back till late." She drew on her gloves, and Robert picked up his hat.

"Won't you wait for her?" asked Edna.

"Not if you think she will not be back till late," adding, as if suddenly aware of some discourtesy in his speech, "and I should miss the pleasure of walking home with you." Edna locked the door and put the key back in its hiding-place.

They went together, picking their way across muddy streets and side-walks encumbered with the cheap display of small tradesmen. Part of the distance they rode in the car, and after disembarking, passed the Pontellier mansion, which looked broken and half torn asunder. Robert had never known the house, and looked at it with interest.

"I never knew you in your home," he remarked.

"I am glad you did not."

"Why?" She did not answer. They went on around the corner, and it seemed as if her dreams were coming true after all, when he followed her into the little house.

"You must stay and dine with me, Robert. You see I am all alone, and it is so long since I have seen you. There is so much I want to ask you."

She took off her hat and gloves. He stood irresolute, making some excuse about his mother who expected him; he even muttered something about an engagement. She struck a match and lit the lamp in the table; it was growing dusk. When he saw her face in the lamp-light, looking pained, with all the soft lines gone out of it, he threw his hat aside and seated himself.

"Oh! you know I want to stay if you will let me!" he exclaimed. All the softness came back. She laughed, and went and put her hand on his shoulder.

"This is the first moment you have seemed like the old Robert. I'll go tell Celestine." She hurried away to tell Celestine to set an extra place. She even sent her off in search of some added delicacy which she had not thought of for herself. And she recommended great care in dripping the coffee and having the omelet done to a proper turn.

When she reentered, Robert was turning over magazines, sketches and things that lay upon the table in great disorder. He picked up a photograph, and exclaimed:

"Alcée Arobin! What on earth is his picture doing here?"

"I tried to make a sketch of his head one day," answered Edna, "and he thought the photograph might help me. It was at the other house. I thought it had been left there. I must have picked it up with my drawing materials."

"I should think you would give it back to him if you have finished with it."

"Oh! I have a great many such photographs. I never think of returning them. They don't amount to anything." Robert kept on looking at the picture.

"It seems to me—do you think his head worth drawing? Is he a friend of Mr. Pontellier's? You never said you knew him."

"He isn't a friend of Mr. Pontellier's; he's a friend of mine. I always knew him—that is, it is only of late that I know him pretty well. But I'd rather talk about you, and know what you have been seeing and doing and feeling out there in Mexico." Robert threw aside the picture.

"I've been seeing the waves and the white beach of Grand Isle; the quiet, grassy street of the Chênière Caminada; the old fort at Grande Terre. I've been working like a machine, and feeling like a lost soul. There was nothing interesting."

She leaned her head upon her hand to shade her eyes from the light.

"And what have you been seeing and doing and feeling all these days?" he asked.

"I've been seeing the waves and the white beach of Grand Isle; the quiet, grassy street of the Chênière; the old sunny fort at Grande Terre. I've been working with a little more comprehension than a machine, and still feeling like a lost soul. There was nothing interesting."

"Mrs. Pontellier, you are cruel," he said, with feeling, closing his eyes and resting his head back in his chair. They remained in silence till old Celestine announced dinner.

XXXIV

The dining-room was very small. Edna's round mahogany would have almost filled it. As it was there was but a step or two from the little table to the kitchen, to the mantel, the small buffet, and the side door that opened out on the narrow brick-paved yard.

A certain degree of ceremony settled upon them with the announcement of dinner. There was no return to personalities. Robert related incidents of his sojourn in Mexico, and Edna talked of events likely to interest him, which had occurred during his absence. The dinner was of ordinary quality, except for the few delicacies which she had sent out to purchase. Old Celestine, with a bandana *tignon*78 twisted about her head, hobbled in and out, taking a personal interest in everything; and she lingered occasionally to talk patois79 with Robert, whom she had known as a boy.

He went out to a neighboring cigar stand to purchase cigarette papers, and when he came back he found that Celestine had served the black coffee in the parlor.

"Perhaps I shouldn't have come back," he said. "When you are tired of me, tell me to go."

"You never tire me. You must have forgotten the hours and hours at Grand Isle in which we grew accustomed to each other and used to being together."

"I have forgotten nothing at Grand Isle," he said, not looking at her, but rolling a cigarette. His tobacco pouch, which he laid upon the table, was a fantastic embroidered silk affair, evidently the handiwork of a woman.

"You used to carry your tobacco in a rubber pouch," said Edna, picking up the pouch and examining the needlework.

"Yes; it was lost."

"Where did you buy this one? In Mexico?"

"It was given to me by a Vera Cruz girl; they are very generous," he replied, striking a match and lighting his cigarette.

"They are very handsome, I suppose, those Mexican women; very picturesque, with their black eyes and their lace scarfs."

"Some are; others are hideous. Just as you find women everywhere."

"What was she like—the one who gave you the pouch? You must have known her very well."

"She was very ordinary. She wasn't of the slightest importance. I knew her well enough."

"Did you visit at her house? Was it interesting? I should like to know and hear about the people you met, and the impressions they made on you."

"There are some people who leave impressions not so lasting as the imprint of an oar upon the water."

"Was she such a one?"

"It would be ungenerous for me to admit that she was of that order and kind." He thrust the pouch back in his pocket, as if to put away the subject with the trifle which had brought it up.

Arobin dropped in with a message from Mrs. Merriman, to say that the card party was postponed on account of the illness of one of her children.

"How do you do, Arobin?" said Robert, rising from the obscurity.

"Oh! Lebrun. To be sure! I heard yesterday you were back. How did they treat you down in Mexique?"

"Fairly well."

"But not well enough to keep you there. Stunning girls, though, in Mexico. I thought I should never get away from Vera Cruz when I was down there a couple of years ago."

"Did they embroider slippers and tobacco pouches and hat-bands and things for you?" asked Edna.

"Oh! my! no! I didn't get so deep in their regard. I fear they made more impression on me than I made on them."

"You were less fortunate than Robert, then."

"I am always less fortunate than Robert. Has he been imparting tender confidences?"

"I've been imposing myself long enough," said Robert, rising, and shaking hands with Edna. "Please convey my regards to Mr. Pontellier when you write."

He shook hands with Arobin and went away.

"Fine fellow, that Lebrun," said Arobin when Robert had gone. "I never heard you speak of him."

"I knew him last summer at Grand Isle," she replied. "Here is that photograph of yours. Don't you want it?"

"What do I want with it? Throw it away." She threw it back on the table.

"I'm not going to Mrs. Merriman's," she said. "If you see her, tell her so. But perhaps I had better write. I think I shall write now, and say that I am sorry her child is sick, and tell her not to count on me."

"It would be a good scheme," acquiesced Arobin. "I don't blame you; stupid lot!"

Edna opened the blotter, and having procured paper and pen, began to write the note. Arobin lit a cigar and read the evening paper, which he had in his pocket.

"What is the date?" she asked. He told her.

"Will you mail this for me when you go out?"

"Certainly." He read to her little bits out of the newspaper, while she straightened things on the table.

"What do you want to do?" he asked, throwing aside the paper. "Do you want to go out for a walk or a drive or anything? It would be a fine night to drive."

"No; I don't want to do anything but just be quiet. You go away and amuse yourself. Don't stay."

"I'll go away if I must; but I shan't amuse myself. You know that I only live when I am near you."

He stood up to bid her good night.

"Is that one of the things you always say to women?"

"I have said it before, but I don't think I ever came so near meaning it," he answered with a smile. There were no warm lights in her eyes; only a dreamy, absent look.

"Good night. I adore you. Sleep well," he said, and he kissed her hand and went away.

She stayed alone in a kind of reverie—a sort of stupor. Step by step she lived over every instant of the time she had been with Robert after he had entered Mademoiselle Reisz's door. She recalled his words, his looks. How few and meager they had been for her hungry heart! A vision—a transcendently seductive vision of a Mexican girl arose before her. She writhed with a jealous pang. She wondered when he would come back. He had not said he would come back. She had been with him, had heard his voice and touched his hand. But some way he had seemed nearer to her off there in Mexico.

XXXV

The morning was full of sunlight and hope. Edna could see before her no denial—only the promise of excessive joy. She lay in bed awake, with bright eyes full of speculation. "He loves you, poor fool." If she could but get that conviction firmly fixed in her mind, what mattered about the rest? She felt she had been childish and unwise the night before in giving herself over to despondency. She recapitulated the motives which no doubt explained Robert's reserve. They were not insurmountable; they would not hold if he really loved her; they could not hold against her own passion, which he must come to realize in time. She pictured him going to his business that morning. She even saw how he was dressed; how he walked down one street, and turned the corner of another; saw him bending over his desk, talking to people who entered the office, going to his lunch, and perhaps watching for her on the street. He would come to her in the afternoon or evening, sit and roll his cigarette, talk a little, and go away as he had done the night before. But how delicious it would be to have him there with her! She would have no regrets, nor seek to penetrate his reserve if he still chose to wear it.

940 Edna ate her breakfast only half dressed. The maid brought her a delicious printed scrawl from Raoul, expressing his love, asking her to send him some bonbons, and telling her they had found that morning ten tiny white pigs all lying in a row beside Lidie's big white pig.

A letter also came from her husband, saying he hoped to be back early in March, and then they would get ready for that journey abroad which he had promised her so long, which he felt now fully able to afford; he felt able to travel as people should, without any thought of small economies—thanks to his recent speculations in Wall Street.

Much to her surprise she received a note from Arobin, written at midnight from the club. It was to say good morning to her, to hope she had slept well, to assure her of his devotion, which he trusted she in some faintest manner returned.

All these letters were pleasing to her. She answered the children in a cheerful frame of mind, promising them bonbons, and congratulating them upon their happy find of the little pigs.

She answered her husband with friendly evasiveness,—not with any fixed design to mislead him, only because all sense of reality had gone out of her life; she had abandoned herself to Fate, and awaited the consequences with indifference.

To Arobin's note she made no reply. She put it under Celestine's stove-lid.

Edna worked several hours with much spirit. She saw no one but a picture dealer, who asked her if it were true that she was going abroad to study in Paris.

She said possibly she might, and he negotiated with her for some Parisian studies to reach him in time for the holiday trade in December.

Robert did not come that day. She was keenly disappointed. He did not come the following day, nor the next. Each morning she awoke with hope, and each night she was a prey to despondency. She was tempted to seek him out. But far from yielding to the impulse, she avoided any occasion which might throw her in his way. She did not go to Mademoiselle Reisz's nor pass by Madame Lebrun's, as she might have done if he had still been in Mexico.

When Arobin, one night, urged her to drive with him, she went—out to the lake, on the Shell Road. His horses were full of mettle, and even a little unmanageable. She liked the rapid gait at which they spun along, and the quick, sharp sound of the horses' hoofs on the hard road. They did not stop anywhere to eat or to drink. Arobin was not needlessly imprudent. But they ate and they drank when they regained Edna's little dining-room—which was comparatively early in the evening.

It was late when he left her. It was getting to be more than a passing whim with Arobin to see her and be with her. He had detected the latent sensuality, which unfolded under his delicate sense of her nature's requirements like a torpid, torrid, sensitive blossom.

There was no despondency when she fell asleep that night; nor was there hope when she awoke in the morning.

XXXVI

There was a garden out in the suburbs; a small, leafy corner, with a few green tables under the orange trees. An old cat slept all day on the stone step in the sun, and an old *mulatresse*80 slept her idle hours away in her chair at the open window, till some one happened to knock on one of the green tables. She had milk and cream cheese to sell, and bread and butter. There was no one who could make such excellent coffee or fry a chicken so golden brown as she.

The place was too modest to attract the attention of people of fashion, and so quiet as to have escaped the notice of those in search of pleasure and dissipation. Edna had discovered it accidentally one day when the high-board gate stood ajar. She caught sight of a little green table, blotched with the checkered sunlight that filtered through the quivering leaves overhead. Within she had found the slumbering mulatresse, the drowsy cat, and a glass of milk which reminded her of the milk she had tasted in Iberville.

She often stopped there during her perambulations; sometimes taking a book with her, and sitting an hour or two under the trees when she found the place deserted. Once or twice she took a quiet dinner there alone, having instructed Celestine beforehand to prepare no dinner at home. It was the last place in the city where she would have expected to meet any one she knew.

Still she was not astonished when, as she was partaking of a modest dinner late in the afternoon, looking into an open book, stroking the cat, which had made friends with her—she was not greatly astonished to see Robert come in at the tall garden gate.

"I am destined to see you only by accident," she said, shoving the cat off the chair beside her. He was surprised, ill at ease, almost embarrassed at meeting her thus so unexpectedly.

"Do you come here often?" he asked.

"I almost live here," she said.

"I used to drop in very often for a cup of Catiche's good coffee. This is the first time since I came back."

"She'll bring you a plate, and you will share my dinner. There's always enough for two—even three." Edna had intended to be indifferent and as reserved as he when she met him; she had reached the determination by a laborious train of reasoning, incident to one of her despondent moods. But her resolve melted when she saw him before her, seated there beside her in the little garden, as if a designing Providence had led him into her path.

“Why are you so personal, Mrs. Pontellier? Why do you force me to idiotic subterfuges?” he exclaimed with sudden warmth. “I suppose there’s no use telling you I’ve been very busy, or that I’ve been sick, or that I’ve been to see you and not found you at home. Please let me off with any of these excuses.”

“You are the embodiment of selfishness,” she said. “You save yourself something—I don’t know what—but there is some selfish motive, and in sparing yourself you never consider for a moment what I think, or how I feel your neglect and indifference. I suppose this is what you would call unwomanly; but I have got into a habit of expressing myself. It doesn’t matter to me, and you may think me unwomanly if you like.”

“No; I only think you cruel, as I said the other day. Maybe not intentionally cruel; but you seem to be forcing me into disclosures which can result in nothing; as if you would have me bare a wound for the pleasure of looking at it, without the intention or power of healing it.”

965 “I’m spoiling your dinner, Robert; never mind what I say. You haven’t eaten a morsel.”

“I only came in for a cup of coffee.” His sensitive face was all disfigured with excitement.

“Isn’t this a delightful place?” she remarked. “I am so glad it has never actually been discovered. It is so quiet, so sweet, here. Do you notice there is scarcely a sound to be heard? It’s so out of the way; and a good walk from the car. However, I don’t mind walking. I always feel so sorry for women who don’t like to walk; they miss so much—so many rare little glimpses of life; and we women learn so little of life on the whole.

“Catiche’s coffee is always hot. I don’t know how she manages it, here in open air. Celestine’s coffee gets cold bringing it from the kitchen to the dining-room. Three lumps! How can you drink it so sweet? Take some of the cress with your chop; it’s so biting and crisp. Then there’s the advantage of being able to smoke with your coffee out here. Now, in the city—aren’t you going to smoke?”

“After a while,” he said, laying a cigar on the table.

970 “Who gave it to you?” she laughed.

“I bought it. I suppose I’m getting reckless; I bought a whole box.” She was determined not to be personal again and make him uncomfortable.

The cat made friends with him, and climbed into his lap when he smoked his cigar. He stroked her silky fur, and talked a little about her. He looked at Edna's book, which he had read; and he told her the end, to save her the trouble of wading through it, he said.

Again he accompanied her back to her home; and it was after dusk when they reached the little "pigeon-house." She did not ask him to remain, which he was grateful for, as it permitted him to stay without the discomfort of blundering through an excuse which he had no intention of considering. He helped her to light the lamp; then she went into her room to take off her hat and to bathe her face and hands.

When she came back Robert was not examining the pictures and magazines as before; he sat off in the shadow, leaning his head back on the chair as if in a reverie. Edna lingered a moment beside the table, arranging the books there. Then she went across the room to where he sat. She bent over the arm of his chair and called his name.

"Robert," she said, "are you asleep?"

"No," he answered, looking up at her.

She leaned over and kissed him—a soft, cool, delicate kiss, whose voluptuous sting penetrated his whole being—then she moved away from him. He followed, and took her in his arms, just holding her close to him. She put her hand up to his face and pressed his cheek against her own. The action was full of love and tenderness. He sought her lips again. Then he drew her down upon the sofa beside him and held her hand in both of his.

"Now you know," he said, "now you know what I have been fighting against since last summer at Grand Isle; what drove me away and drove me back again."

"Why have you been fighting against it?" she asked. Her face glowed with soft lights.

"Why? Because you were not free; you were Léonce Pontellier's wife. I couldn't help loving you if you were ten times his wife; but so long as I went away from you and kept away I could help telling you so." She put her free hand up to his shoulder, and then against his cheek, rubbing it softly. He kissed her again. His face was warm and flushed.

"There in Mexico I was thinking of you all the time, and longing for you."

"But not writing to me," she interrupted.

"Something put into my head that you cared for me; and I lost my senses. I forgot everything but a wild dream of your some way becoming my wife."

"Your wife!"

"Religion, loyalty, everything would give way if only you cared."

"Then you must have forgotten that I was Léonce Pontellier's wife."

"Oh! I was demented, dreaming of wild, impossible things, recalling men who had set their wives free, we have heard of such things."

"Yes, we have heard of such things."

"I came back full of vague, mad intentions. And when I got here—"

"When you got here you never came near me!" She was still caressing his cheek.

"I realized what a cur I was to dream of such a thing, even if you had been willing."

She took his face between her hands and looked into it as if she would never withdraw her eyes more. She kissed him on the forehead, the eyes, the cheeks, and the lips.

"You have been a very, very foolish boy, wasting your time dreaming of impossible things when you speak of Mr. Pontellier setting me free! I am no longer one of Mr. Pontellier's possessions to dispose of or not. I give myself where I choose. If he were to say, 'Here, Robert, take her and be happy; she is yours,' I should laugh at you both."

His face grew a little white. "What do you mean?" he asked.

There was a knock at the door. Old Celestine came in to say that Madame Ratignolle's servant had come around the back way with a message that Madame had been taken sick and begged Mrs. Pontellier to go to her immediately.

"Yes, yes," said Edna, rising; "I promised. Tell her yes—to wait for me. I'll go back with her."

"Let me walk over with you," offered Robert.

"No," she said; "I will go with the servant." She went into her room to put on her hat, and when she came in again she sat once more upon the sofa beside him. He had not stirred. She put her arms about his neck.

"Good-by, my sweet Robert. Tell me good-by." He kissed her with a degree of passion which had not before entered into his caress, and strained her to him.

"I love you," she whispered, "only you; no one but you. It was you who woke me last summer out of a life-long, stupid dream. Oh! you have made me so unhappy with your indifference. Oh! I have suffered, suffered! Now you are here we shall love each other, my Robert. We shall be everything to each other. Nothing else in the world is of any consequence. I must go to my friend; but you will wait for me? No matter how late; you will wait for me, Robert?"

"Don't go; don't go! Oh! Edna, stay with me," he pleaded. "Why should you go? Stay with me, stay with me."

"I shall come back as soon as I can; I shall find you here." She buried her face in his neck, and said good-by again. Her seductive voice, together with his great love for her, had enthralled his senses, had deprived him of every impulse but the longing to hold her and keep her.

Edna looked in at the drug store. Monsieur Ratignolle was putting up a mixture himself, very carefully, dropping a red liquid into a tiny glass. He was grateful to Edna for having come; her presence would be a comfort to his wife. Madame Ratignolle's sister, who had always been with her at such trying times, had not been able to come up from the plantation, and Adèle had been inconsolable until Mrs. Pontellier so kindly promised to come to her. The nurse had been with them at night for the past week, as she lived a great distance away. And Dr. Mandelet had been coming and going all the afternoon. They were then looking for him any moment.

Edna hastened upstairs by a private stairway that led from the rear of the store to the apartment above. The children were all sleeping in a back room. Madame Ratignolle was in the salon, whither she had strayed in her suffering impatience. She sat on the sofa, clad in an ample white peignoir, holding a handkerchief tight in her hand with a nervous clutch. Her face was drawn and pinched, her sweet blue eyes haggard and unnatural. All her beautiful hair had been drawn back and plaited. It lay in a long braid on the sofa pillow, coiled like a golden serpent. The nurse, a comfortable looking *Griffe*81 woman in white apron and cap, was urging her to return to her bedroom.

"There is no use, there is no use," she said at once to Edna. "We must get rid of Mandelet; he is getting too old and careless. He said he would be here at half-past seven; now it must be eight. See what time it is, Joséphine."

The woman was possessed of a cheerful nature, and refused to take any situation too seriously, especially a situation with which she was so familiar. She urged Madame to have courage and patience. But Madame only set her teeth hard into her under lip, and Edna saw the sweat gather in beads on her white forehead. After a moment or two she uttered a profound sigh and wiped her face with the handkerchief rolled in a ball. She appeared exhausted. The nurse gave her a fresh handkerchief, sprinkled with cologne water.

"This is too much!" she cried. "Mandelet ought to be killed! Where is Alphonse? Is it possible I am to be abandoned like this—neglected by every one?"

"Neglected, indeed!" exclaimed the nurse. Wasn't she there? And here was Mrs. Pontellier leaving, no doubt, a pleasant evening at home to devote to her? And wasn't Monsieur Ratignolle coming that very instant through the hall? And Joséphine was quite sure she had heard Doctor Mandelet's coupé.82 Yes, there it was, down at the door.

Adèle consented to go back to her room. She sat on the edge of a little low couch next to her bed.

1010 Doctor Mandelet paid no attention to Madame Ratignolle's upbraidings. He was accustomed to them at such times, and was too well convinced of her loyalty to doubt it.

He was glad to see Edna, and wanted her to go with him into the salon and entertain him. But Madame Ratignolle would not consent that Edna should leave her for an instant. Between agonizing moments, she chatted a little, and said it took her mind off her sufferings.

Edna began to feel uneasy. She was seized with a vague dread. Her own like experiences seemed far away, unreal, and only half remembered. She recalled faintly an ecstasy of pain, the heavy odor of chloroform, a stupor which had deadened sensation, and an awakening to find a little new life to which she had given being, added to the great unnumbered multitude of souls that come and go.

She began to wish she had not come; her presence was not necessary. She might have invented a pretext for staying away; she might even invent a pretext now for going. But Edna did not go. With an inward agony, with a flaming, outspoken revolt against the ways of Nature, she witnessed the scene of torture.

She was still stunned and speechless with emotion when later she leaned over her friend to kiss her and softly say good-by. Adèle, pressing her cheek, whispered in an exhausted voice: “Think of the children, Edna. Oh, think of the children! Remember them!”

XXXVIII

Edna still felt dazed when she got outside in the open air. The Doctor’s coupé had returned for him and stood before the porte cochère. She did not wish to enter the coupé, and told Doctor Mandelet she would walk; she was not afraid, and would go alone. He directed his carriage to meet him at Mrs. Pontellier’s, and he started to walk home with her.

Up—away up, over the narrow street between the tall houses, the stars were blazing. The air was mild and caressing, but cool with the breath of spring and the night. They walked slowly, the Doctor with a heavy, measured tread and his hands behind him; Edna, in an absent-minded way, as she had walked one night at Grand Isle, as if her thoughts had gone ahead of her and she was striving to overtake them.

“You shouldn’t have been there, Mrs. Pontellier,” he said. “That was no place for you. Adèle is full of whims at such times. There were a dozen women she might have had with her, unimpressionable women. I felt that it was cruel, cruel. You shouldn’t have gone.”

“Oh, well!” she answered, indifferently. “I don’t know that it matters after all. One has to think of the children some time or other; the sooner the better.”

“When is Léonce coming back?”

“Perhaps—no, I am not going. I’m not going to be forced into doing things. I don’t want to go abroad. I want to be let alone. Nobody has any right—except children, perhaps—and even then, it seems to me—or it did seem—” She felt that her speech was voicing the incoherency of her thoughts, and stopped abruptly.

“The trouble is,” sighed the Doctor, grasping her meaning intuitively, “that youth is given up to illusions. It seems to be a provision of Nature; a decoy to secure mothers for the race. And Nature takes no account of moral consequences, or arbitrary conditions which we create, and which we feel obliged to maintain at any cost.”

"Yes," she said. "The years that are gone seem like dreams—if one might go on sleeping and dreaming—but to wake up and find—oh! well! perhaps it is better to wake up after all, even to suffer, rather than to remain a dupe to illusions all one's life."

"It seems to me, my dear child," said the Doctor at parting, holding her hand, "you seem to me to be in trouble. I am not going to ask for your confidence. I will only say that if ever you feel moved to give it to me, perhaps I might help you. I know I would understand, and I tell you there are not many who would—not many, my dear."

"Some way I don't feel moved to speak of things that trouble me. Don't think I am ungrateful or that I don't appreciate your sympathy. There are periods of despondency and suffering which take possession of me. But I don't want anything but my own way. That is wanting a good deal, of course, when you have to trample upon the lives, the hearts, the prejudices of others—but no matter—still, I shouldn't want to trample upon the little lives. Oh! I don't know what I'm saying, Doctor. Good night. Don't blame me for anything."

"Yes, I will blame you if you don't come and see me soon. We will talk of things you never have dreamt of talking about before. It will do us both good. I don't want you to blame yourself, whatever comes. Good night, my child."

She let herself in at the gate, but instead of entering she sat upon the step of the porch. The night was quiet and soothing. All the tearing emotion of the last few hours seemed to fall away from her like a somber, uncomfortable garment, which she had but to loosen to be rid of. She went back to that hour before Adèle had sent for her; and her senses kindled afresh in thinking of Robert's words, the pressure of his arms, and the feeling of his lips upon her own. She could picture at that moment no greater bliss on earth than possession of the beloved one. His expression of love had already given him to her in part. When she thought that he was there at hand, waiting for her, she grew numb with the intoxication of expectancy. It was so late; he would be asleep perhaps. She would awaken him with a kiss. She hoped he would be asleep that she might arouse him with her caresses.

Still, she remembered Adèle's voice whispering, "Think of the children; think of them." She meant to think of them; that determination had driven into her soul like a death wound—but not to-night. To-morrow would be time to think of everything.

Robert was not waiting for her in the little parlor. He was nowhere at hand. The house was empty. But he had scrawled on a piece of paper that lay in the lamplight:

"I love you. Good-by—because I love you."

Edna grew faint when she read the words. She went and sat on the sofa. Then she stretched herself out there, never uttering a sound. She did not sleep. She did not go to bed. The lamp sputtered and went out. She was still awake in the morning, when Celestine unlocked the kitchen door and came in to light the fire.

XXXIX

Victor, with hammer and nails and scraps of scantling, was patching a corner of one of the galleries. Mariequita sat near by, dangling her legs, watching him work, and handing him nails from the tool-box. The sun was beating down upon them. The girl covered her head with her apron folded into a square pad. They had been talking for an hour or more. She was never tired of hearing Victor describe the dinner at Mrs. Pontellier's. He exaggerated every detail, making it appear a veritable Lucullean feast.83 The flowers were in tubs, he said. The champagne was quaffed from huge golden goblets. Venus rising from the foam84 could have presented no more entrancing a spectacle than Mrs. Pontellier, blazing with beauty and diamonds at the head of the board, while the other women were all of them youthful houris,85 possessed of incomparable charms.

She got it into her head that Victor was in love with Mrs. Pontellier, and he gave her evasive answers, framed so as to confirm her belief. She grew sullen and cried a little, threatening to go off and leave him to his fine ladies. There were a dozen men crazy about her at the Chênière; and since it was the fashion to be in love with married people, why, she could run away any time she liked to New Orleans with Célina's husband.

Célina's husband was a fool, a coward, and a pig, and to prove it to her, Victor intended to hammer his head into a jelly the next time he encountered him. This assurance was very consoling to Mariequita. She dried her eyes, and grew cheerful at the prospect.

They were still talking of the dinner and the allurements of city life when Mrs. Pontellier herself slipped around the corner of the house. The two youngsters stayed dumb with amazement before what they considered to be an apparition. But it was really she in flesh and blood, looking tired and a little travel-strained.

"I walked up from the wharf," she said, "and heard the hammering. I supposed it was you, mending the porch. It's a good thing. I was always tripping over those loose planks last summer. How dreary and deserted everything looks!"

It took Victor some time to comprehend that she had come in Beaudelet's lugger,86 that she had come alone, and for no purpose but to rest.

"There's nothing fixed up yet, you see. I'll give you my room; it's the only place."

"Any corner will do," she assured him.

"And if you can stand Philomel's cooking," he went on, "though I might try to get her mother while you are here. Do you think she would come?" turning to Mariequita.

Mariequita thought that perhaps Philomel's mother might come for a few days, and money enough.

Beholding Mrs. Pontellier make her appearance, the girl had at once suspected a lovers' rendezvous. But Victor's astonishment was so genuine, and Mrs. Pontellier's indifference so apparent, that the disturbing notion did not lodge long in her brain. She contemplated with the greatest interest this woman who gave the most sumptuous dinners in America, and who had all the men in New Orleans at her feet.

"What time will you have dinner?" asked Edna. "I'm very hungry; but don't get anything extra."

"I'll have it ready in little or no time," he said, bustling and packing away his tools. "You may go to my room to brush up and rest yourself. Mariequita will show you."

"Thank you," said Edna. "But, do you know, I have a notion to go down to the beach and take a good wash and even a little swim, before dinner?"

"The water is too cold!" they both exclaimed. "Don't think of it."

"Well, I might go down and try—dip my toes in. Why, it seems to me the sun is hot enough to have warmed the very depths of the ocean. Could you get me a couple of towels? I'd better go right away, so as to be back in time. It would be a little too chilly if I waited till this afternoon."

Mariequita ran over to Victor's room, and returned with some towels, which she gave to Edna.

"I hope you have fish for dinner," said Edna, as she started to walk away; "but don't do anything extra if you haven't."

"Run and find Philomel's mother," Victor instructed the girl. "I'll go to the kitchen and see what I can do. By Gimminy! Women have no consideration! She might have sent me word."

Edna walked on down to the beach rather mechanically, not noticing anything special except that the sun was hot. She was not dwelling upon any particular train of thought. She had done all the thinking which was necessary after Robert went away, when she lay awake upon the sofa till morning.

She had said over and over to herself: "To-day it is Arobin; to-morrow it will be some one else. It makes no difference to me, it doesn't matter about Léonce Pontellier—but Raoul and Etienne!" She understood now clearly what she had meant long ago when she said to Adèle Ratignolle that she would give up the unessential, but she would never sacrifice herself for her children.

Despondency had come upon her there in the wakeful night, and had never lifted. There was no one thing in the world that she desired. There was no human being whom she wanted near her except Robert; and she even realized that the day would come when he, too, and the thought of him would melt out of her existence, leaving her alone. The children appeared before her like antagonists who had overcome her; who had overpowered and sought to drag her into the soul's slavery for the rest of her days. But she knew a way to elude them. She was not thinking of these things when she walked down to the beach.

The water of the Gulf stretched out before her, gleaming with the million lights of the sun. The voice of the sea is seductive, never ceasing, whispering, clamoring, murmuring, inviting the soul to wander in abysses of solitude. All along the white beach, up and down, there was no living thing in sight. A bird with a broken wing was beating the air above, reeling, fluttering, circling disabled down, down to the water.

Edna had found her old bathing suit still hanging, faded, upon its accustomed peg.

She put it on, leaving her clothing in the bath-house. But when she was there beside the sea, absolutely alone, she cast the unpleasant, pricking garments from her, and for the first time in her life she stood naked in the open air, at the mercy of the sun, the breeze that beat upon her, and the waves that invited her.

How strange and awful it seemed to stand naked under the sky! how delicious! She felt like some new-born creature, opening its eyes in a familiar world that it had never known.

The foamy wavelets curled up to her white feet, and coiled like serpents above her ankles. She walked out. The water was chill, but she walked on. The water was deep, but she lifted her white body and reached out for a long, sweeping stroke. The touch of the sea is sensuous, enfolding the body in its soft, close embrace.

She went on and on. She remembered the night she swam far out, and recalled the terror that seized her at the fear of being unable to regain the shore. She did not look back now, but went on and on, thinking of the blue-grass meadow that she had traversed when a little child, believing that it had no beginning and no end.

Her arms and legs were growing tired.

She thought of Léonce and the children. They were a part of her life. But they need not have thought that they could possess her, body and soul. How Mademoiselle Reisz would have laughed, perhaps sneered, if she knew! “And you call yourself an artist! What pretensions, Madame! The artist must possess the courageous soul that dares and defies.”

Exhaustion was pressing upon and overpowering her.

“Good-by—because I love you.” He did not know; he did not understand. He would never understand. Perhaps Doctor Mandelet would have understood if she had seen him—but it was too late; the shore was far behind her, and her strength was gone.

She looked into the distance, and the old terror flamed up for an instant, then sank again. Edna heard her father’s voice and her sister Margaret’s. She heard the barking of an old dog that was chained to the sycamore tree. The spurs of the cavalry officer clanged as he walked across the porch. There was the hum of bees, and the musky odor of pinks filled the air.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Although the story was published with the title The Awakening, Chopin originally called it “A Solitary Soul.” Which title do you prefer? Why?

2. -Compare Edna, Mademoiselle Reisz, and Adèle. In what significant ways, if any, does Edna resemble each and in what significant ways does she differ? To what does each of her friends awaken Edna?

3. -Edna says to Dr. Mandelet (page 656, paragraph 1026), “I don’t want anything but my own way. That is wanting a good deal, of course, when you have to trample upon the lives, the hearts, the prejudices of others—but no matter. . . .” Does this statement reveal the essential Edna? If not, why not?

4. -Characterize Léonce. Do you see him as Edna presumably does, or do you see him somewhat more sympathetically? Why?

5. -Readers have often debated the ending of the novel: Is it triumphant, tragic, or both? Examine the final chapter carefully, and set forth your understanding of what leads Edna to her fateful decision.

6. -Like many novels, The Awakening explores and comments on the society that it describes. Focus in particular on Chopin’s treatment of marriage, motherhood, and the family. What is her attitude toward these institutions?

7. -Discuss the settings that Chopin presents. How does she convey to the reader a strong sense of a specific time and place?

8. -When we read and talk about novels, one key source of interest is asking, What makes this writer special, different from this or that other one? Consider this question in relation to the style of The Awakening, to Chopin’s choice of words, tone of voice, narrative point of view.

PART

Approaching Poetry: Responding in Writing

The title of this chapter is a bit misleading, since we have already spent a few pages discussing two poems in Chapter 1, “Reading and Responding to Literature.” But here we will begin again, taking a different approach.

First, some brief advice.

1. -Read the poem aloud; or, if you can’t bring yourself to read aloud, at least sound the poem in your mind’s ear. Try to catch the speaker’s tone of voice.
2. -Pay attention not only to the black marks on the white paper but also to the white spaces between groups of lines. If a space follows some lines, pause briefly, and take the preceding lines as a unit of thought.
3. -Read the poem a second and a third time. Now that you know how it ends, you’ll be able to see the connections between the beginning and what follows.

Langston Hughes

The following short poem is by Langston Hughes (1902–1967), an African-American writer born in Joplin, Missouri. Hughes lived part of his youth in Mexico, spent a year at Columbia University, served as a merchant seaman, and worked in a Paris nightclub. There, he showed some of his poems to Dr. Alain Locke, a strong advocate of African-American literature. Encouraged by Locke, when Hughes returned to the United States he continued to write, publishing fiction, plays, essays, and biographies; he also founded theaters, gave public readings, and was, in short, a highly visible presence. The poem that we reprint, "Harlem" (1951), provided Lorraine Hansberry with the title of her well-known play, A Raisin in the Sun (1958). For a generous selection of poems by Langston Hughes, see Chapter 26.

Harlem [1951]

What happens to a dream deferred?

Does it dry up like a raisin in the sun?

Or fester like a sore—

And then run?

Does it stink like rotten meat?

Or crust and sugar over—like a syrupy sweet?

Maybe it just sags

like a heavy load.

Or does it explode?

Read the poem at least twice, and then think about its effect on you.

1. -Do you find the poem interesting? Why or why not?
2. -Do some things in it interest you more than others? If so, why?
3. -Does anything in it puzzle you? If so, what?

Before reading any further, you might jot down your responses to some of these questions. And, whatever your responses, can you point to features of the poem to account for them?

Of course, different readers will respond at least somewhat differently to any work. On the other hand, since writers want to communicate, they try to control their readers' responses, and they count on their readers to understand the meanings of words as the writers understand them. Thus, Hughes assumed his readers knew that Harlem was the site of a large African-American community in New York City.

Let’s assume that the reader understands Hughes is talking about Harlem, New York, and, further, that the reader understands the “dream deferred” to refer to the unfulfilled hopes of African-Americans who live in a society dominated by whites. But Hughes does not say “hopes,” he says “dream,” and he does not say “unfulfilled,” he says “deferred.” You might ask yourself exactly what differences there are between these words. Next, when you have read the poem several times, you might think about which expression is better in the context, “unfulfilled hopes” or “dream deferred,” and why.

Thinking about “Harlem”

Let’s turn to an analysis of the poem, an examination of how the parts fit. As you look at the poem, think about the parts, and jot down whatever notes come to mind. After you have written your own notes, consider the annotations of one student.

These annotations chiefly get at the structure of the poem, the relationship of the parts. The student notices that the poem begins with a line set off by itself and ends with a line set off by itself, and he also notices that each of these lines is a question. Further, he indicates that each of these two lines is emphasized in other ways. The first begins further to the left than any of the other lines—as though the other lines are subheadings or are in some way subordinate—and the last is italicized. In short, he comments on the structure of the poem.

Some Journal Entries

The student who made these annotations later wrote an entry in his journal:

> Feb. 18. Since the title is "Harlem," it's obvious that the "dream" is by African-American people. Also, obvious that Hughes thinks that if the "dream" doesn't become real there may be riots ("explode"). I like "raisin in the sun" (maybe because I like the play), and I like the business about "a syrupy sweet"--much more pleasant than the festering sore and the rotten meat. But if the dream becomes "sweet," what's wrong with that? Why should something "sweet" explode?
> Feb. 21. Prof. McCabe said to think of structure or form of a poem as a sort of architecture, a building with a foundation, floors, etc. topped by a roof--but since we read a poem from top to bottom, it's like a building upside down. Title or first line is foundation (even though it's at top); last line is roof, capping the whole. As you read, you add layers. Foundation of "Harlem" is a question (first line). Then, set back a bit from foundation, or built on it by white space, a tall room (7 lines high, with 4 questions); then, on top of this room, another room (two lines, one statement, not a question). Funny; I thought that in poems all stanzas are the same number of lines. Then--more white space, so another unit--the roof. Man, this roof is going to fall in--"explode." Not just the roof, maybe the whole house.

Feb. 21, pm. I get it; one line at start, one line at end; both are questions, but the last sort of says (because it is in italics) that it is the most likely answer to the question of the first line. The last line is also a question, but it's still an answer. The big stanza (7 lines) has 4 questions: 2 lines, 2 lines, 1 line, 2 lines. Maybe the switch to 1 line is to give some variety, so as not to be dull? It's exactly in the middle of the poem. I get the progress from raisin in the sun (dried, but not so terrible), to festering sore and to stinking meat, but I still don't see what's so bad about "a syrupy sweet." Is Hughes saying that after things are very bad they will get better? But why, then, the explosion at the end?

Feb. 23. "Heavy load" and "sags" in next-to-last stanza seems to me to suggest slaves with bales of cotton, or maybe poor cotton pickers dragging big sacks of cotton. Or maybe people doing heavy labor in Harlem. Anyway, very tired. Different from running sore and stinking meat earlier; not disgusting, but pressing down, deadening. Maybe worse than a sore or rotten meat--a hard, hopeless life. And then the last line. Just one line, no fancy (and disgusting) simile. Boom! Not just pressed down and tired, like maybe some racist whites think (hope?) blacks will be? Bang! Will there be survivors?

Drawing chiefly on these notes, the student jotted down some key ideas to guide him through a draft of an analysis of the poem. (The organization of the draft posed no problem; the student simply followed the organization of the poem.)

Langston Hughes's "Harlem"

"Harlem" is a poem that is only eleven lines long, but it is charged with power. It explodes. Hughes sets the stage, so to speak, by telling us in the title that he is talking about Harlem, and then he begins by asking, "What happens to a dream deferred?" The rest of the poem is set off by being indented, as though it is the answer to his question. This answer is in three parts (three stanzas, of different lengths).

In a way, it's wrong to speak of the answer, since the rest of the poem consists of questions, but I think Hughes means that each question (for instance, does a "deferred" hope "dry up / like a raisin in the sun?") really is Locke 2 an answer, something that really has happened and that will happen again. The first question, "Does it dry up / like a raisin in the sun?," is a famous line. To compare hope to a raisin dried in the sun is to suggest a terrible shrinking. The next two comparisons are to a "sore" and to "rotten meat." These comparisons are less clever, but they are very effective because they are disgusting. Then, maybe because of the disgusting comparisons, he gives a comparison that is not at all disgusting. In this comparison he says that maybe the "dream deferred" will "crust and sugar over-- / like a syrupy sweet."

The seven lines with four comparisons are followed by a stanza of two lines with just one comparison:

Maybe it just sags

like a heavy load.

So if we thought that this postponed dream might finally turn into something "sweet," we were kidding ourselves. Hughes comes down to earth, in a short stanza, with an image of a heavy load, which probably also calls to mind images of people bent under heavy loads, maybe of cotton, or maybe just any sort of heavy load carried by African-Americans in Harlem and elsewhere.

The opening question ("What happens to a dream deferred?") was followed by four questions in seven lines, but now, with "Maybe it just sags / like a heavy load," we get a statement, as though the poet at last has found an answer. But at the end we get one more question, set off by itself and in italics: "Or does it explode?" This line itself is explosive for three reasons:

it is short, it is italicized, and it is a stanza in itself. It's also interesting that this line, unlike the earlier lines, does not use a simile. It's almost as though Hughes is saying, "OK, we've had enough fancy ways of talking about this terrible situation; here it is, straight."

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -The student’s analysis suggests that the comparison with “a syrupy sweet” is a deliberately misleading happy ending that serves to make the real ending even more powerful. In class another student suggested that Hughes may be referring to African-Americans who play the Uncle Tom, people who adopt a smiling manner in order to cope with an oppressive society. Which explanation do you prefer, and why? What do you think of combining the two? Or can you offer a different explanation?

2. -Do you suppose that virtually all African-Americans respond to this poem in a way that is substantially different from the way virtually all Caucasians or Asian-Americans respond? Explain your position.

3. -When Hughes reprinted this poem in 1959, he retitled it “Dream Deferred.” Your response?

Let’s now look at another poem, and at the responses of another student. Here is a seventeenth-century poem—actually a song—that makes use of the idea that the eyes of the beloved woman can dart fire, and that she can kill (or at least severely wound) the sighing, helpless male lover. The male speaker describes the appearance of Cupid, the tyrannic god of love, who (he claims) is equipped with darts and death-dealing fire taken from the eyes of the proud, cruel woman whom the speaker loves.

APHRA BEHN

Aphra Behn (1640–1689) is regarded as the first English woman to have made a living by writing. Not much is known of her life, but she seems to have married a London merchant of Dutch descent, and after his death to have served as a spy in the Dutch Wars (1665–1667). After her return to England she took up playwriting, and she gained fame with The Rover (1677). Behn also wrote novels, the most important of which is Oroonoko, or The Royal Slave (1688), which is among the first works in English to express pity for enslaved Africans.

Song: Love Armed [1676]

Love in fantastic triumph sate,
Whilst bleeding hearts around him flowed,
For whom fresh pains he did create,
And strange tyrannic power he showed:
From thy bright eyes he took his fire,
Which round about in sport he hurled;
But ’twas from mine he took desire,
Enough to undo the amorous world.
From me he took his sighs and tears:
From thee, his pride and cruelty;
From me, his languishments and fears;

And every killing dart from thee.

Thus thou and I the god have armed

And set him up a deity;

But my poor heart alone is harmed,

Whilst thine the victor is, and free.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -The speaker talks of the suffering he is undergoing. Can we nevertheless feel that he enjoys his plight? Why, by the way, do we (as readers, singers, or listeners) often enjoy songs of unhappy love?

2. -The woman (“thee”) is said to exhibit “pride and cruelty” (line 10). Is the poem sexist? Is it therefore offensive?

3. -Do you suppose that men can enjoy the poem more than women? Explain.

Journal Entries

The subject is Aphra Behn’s “Song.” We begin with two entries in a journal, kept by a first-year student, Geoffrey Sullivan, and we follow these entries with Sullivan’s completed essay.

October 10. The title "Love Armed" puzzled me at first; funny, I somehow was thinking of the expression "strong-armed" and at first I didn't understand that "Love" in this poem is a human--no, not a human, but the god Cupid, who has a human form--and that he is shown as armed, with darts and so forth.

October 13. This god of "Love" is Cupid, and so he is something like what is on a valentine card--Cupid with his bow and arrow. But valentine cards just show cute little Cupids, and in this poem Cupid is a real menace. He causes lots of pain ("bleeding hearts," "tears," "killing dart," etc.). So what is Aphra Behn telling us about the god of love, or love? That love hurts? And she is singing about it! But we do sing songs about how hard life is. But do we sing them when we are really hurting, or only when we are pretty well off and just thinking about being hurt?

When you love someone and they don't return your love, it hurts, but even when love isn't returned it still gives some intense pleasure. Strange, but I think true. I wouldn't say that love always has this two-sided nature, but I do see the idea that love can have two sides, pleasure and pain. And love takes two kinds of people, male and female. Well, for most people, anyway. Maybe there's also something to the idea that "opposites attract." Anyway, Aphra Behn seems to be talking about men vs. women, pain vs. pleasure, power vs. weakness, etc. Pairs, opposites. And in two stanzas (a pair of stanzas?).

A Sample Essay by a Student: “The Double Nature of Love”

The final essay makes use of some, but not all, of the preliminary jottings. It includes much that Sullivan did not think of until he reread his jottings, reread the poem, and began drafting the essay.

The Double Nature of Love

Aphra Behn's "Love Armed" is in two stanzas, and it is about two people, "me" and "thee"--that is, you and I, the lover and the woman he loves. I think the speaker is a man, since according to the usual code men are supposed to Sullivan 2 be the active lovers and women are the (relatively) passive people who are loved. In this poem, the beloved--the woman, I think--has "bright eyes" (line 5) that provide the god of Love with fire, and she also provides the god with "pride and cruelty" (10). This of course is the way the man sees it if a woman doesn't respond to him; if she doesn't love him in return, she is (he thinks) arrogant and cruel. What does the man give to Love? He provides "desire" (7), "sighs and tears" (9), "languishments and fears" (11). None of this sounds very manly, but the joke is that the god of love--which means love--can turn a strong man into a crybaby when a woman does not respond to him.

Although both stanzas are clever descriptions of the god of love, the poem is not just a description. Of course there is not a plot in the way that a short story has a plot, but there is a sort of a switch at the end, giving the story something of a plot. The poem is, say, ninety percent expression of feeling and description of love, but during the course of expressing feelings and describing love something happens, so there is a tiny story. The first stanza sets the scene ("Love in fantastic triumph sate" [1]) and tells of some of the things that the speaker and the woman contributed to the god of Love. The woman's eyes provided Love with fire, and the man's feelings provided Love with "desire" (7). The second stanza goes on to mention other things that Love got from the speaker ("sighs and tears," etc. [9]), and other things that Love got from the beloved ("pride and cruelty," etc. [10]), and in Sullivan 3 line 13 the poet says, "Thus thou and I the god have armed," so the two humans share something. They have both given Love his weapons. But--and this is the story I spoke of--the poem ends by emphasizing their difference: Only the man is "harmed," and the woman is the "victor" because her heart is not captured, as the man's heart is. In the battle that Love presides over, the woman is the winner; the man's heart has fallen for the woman, but, according to the last line, the woman's heart remains "free."

We have all seen the god of Love on valentine cards, a cute little Cupid armed with a bow and arrow. But despite the bow and arrow that the Valentine's Day Cupid carries, I think that until I read Aphra Behn's "Love Armed" I had never really thought about Cupid as powerful and as capable of causing real pain. On valentine cards, he is just cute, but when I think about it, I realize the truth of Aphra Behn's concept of love. Love is (or can be) two-sided, whereas the valentine cards show only the sweet side.

I think it is interesting to notice that although the poem is about the destructive power of love, it is fun to read. I am not bothered by the fact that the lover is miserable. Why? I think I enjoy the poem, rather than am bothered by it, because he is enjoying his misery. After all, he is singing about it, sort of singing in the rain, telling anyone who will listen about how miserable he is, and he is having a very good time doing it.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What do you think of the essay's title? Is it sufficiently interesting and focused?
2. -What are the writer's chief points? Are they clear, and are they adequately developed?
3. -Do you think the writer is too concerned with himself, and that he loses sight of the poem? Or do you find it interesting that he connects the poem with life?
4. -Focus on the writer's use of quotations. Does he effectively introduce and examine quoted lines and phrases?
5. -What grade would you give the essay? Why?

Robert Frost (1874–1963) enjoyed representing himself as a New England farmer—and he really did farm for a while—but in fact he was very much a professional writer, and an immensely successful one, esteemed not only by other writers but also by a vast public. For him, writing was certainly not an escape from life—"Poetry is a way of taking life by the throat," he said—but a way of coping with life. "Take what is given," he said, "and make it over your way." In one of his poems, "Two Tramps in Mud Time," the farmer-poet explains why, when he was splitting some wood, he preferred to continue at the task rather than to let the tramp (for money) take over:

But yield who will to their separation,
My object in living is to unite
My avocation and my vocation
As my two eyes make one in sight.

When John Kennedy was inaugurated President in 1961, Frost, the preeminent American writer—a man who had combined pleasure with business—read a poem. He was already known to everyone in his audience, but this was the first time that an American poet, or indeed any writer in America, achieved such quasi-official recognition.

Narrative Poetry

POPULAR BALLADS AND OTHER NARRATIVE POEMS

Most of us are so used to reading stories—whether factual in history books or fictional in novels—that we normally associate storytelling with prose, not with poetry. But in fact some of the world's great stories have been told in poetry—for instance, the Greek epics the Iliad (about the Trojan War) and the Odyssey (about Odysseus' ten years of wandering), and medieval tales of King Arthur. Non-Western (i.e., non-European) cultures, too, have their great narrative poems, notably the Sanskrit epic The Mahabharata (about a war in ancient India) and African and Native-American tales of the creation of the world and of the sublime deeds of heroes. And, to descend to the ridiculous, countless narratives are still being told in the form of the limerick:

There was a young fellow of Riga,
Who smiled as he rode on a tiger.
They returned from the ride,
With the fellow inside,
And the smile on the face of the tiger.

In short, although we are accustomed to thinking of a story as prose in a book, until a few hundred years ago stories were commonly poetry that was sung or recited. In nonliterate societies people got their stories from storytellers who relied on memory rather than on the written word; the memorized stories were often poems, partly because (in the words of Shakespeare's early contemporary, Sir Philip Sidney), "Verse far exceedeth prose in the knitting up of the memory." Even in literate societies, few people could read or write until the invention of the printing press in the middle of the fifteenth century. Although the printing press did not immediately destroy oral verse narratives, as the centuries passed, an increasingly large reading public developed that preferred prose narratives.

Among the great verse narratives are the English and Scottish popular ballads, some of the best of which are attributed to the fifteenth century, though they were not recorded until much later. These anonymous stories in song acquired their distinctive flavor by being passed down orally from generation to generation, each singer consciously or unconsciously modifying his or her inheritance. It is not known who made up the popular ballads; often they were made up partly out of earlier ballads by singers as bold as Kipling's cockney:

When 'Omer smote 'is blooming lyre,
He'd 'eard men sing by land an' sea;
An' what he thought 'e might require,
'E went an' took—the same as me!

Most ballad singers probably were composers only by accident; they intended to transmit what they had heard, but their memories were sometimes faulty and their imaginations active. The modifications effected by oral transmission generally give a ballad three noticeable qualities:

- -First, it is impersonal; even if there is an "I" who sings the tale, he or she is usually characterless.
- -Second, the ballad—like other oral literature such as the nursery rhyme and the counting-out rhyme ("one potato, two potato")—is filled with repetition, sometimes of lines, sometimes of words. Consider, for example, "Go saddle me the black, the black, / Go saddle me the brown," or "O wha is this has done this deid, / This ill deid don to me?" Sometimes in fact, the story is told by repeating lines with only a few significant variations. This incremental repetition (repetition with slight variations advancing the narrative) is the heart of "Edward" (page 972). Furthermore, stock epithets are repeated from ballad to ballad: "true love," "milk-white steed," "golden hair." Oddly, these clichés do not bore us but by their impersonality often lend a simplicity that effectively contrasts with the frequent violence of the tales.
- -Third, because the ballads are transmitted orally, residing in the memory rather than on the printed page, weak stanzas have often been dropped, leaving a series of sharp scenes, frequently with dialogue:

The king sits in Dumferling toune,
Drinking the blude-reid wine:
"O whar will I get guid sailor,
To sail this schip of mine?"

Because ballads were sung rather than printed, and because singers made alterations, no one version of a ballad is the "correct" one. The versions printed here have become such favorites that they are almost regarded as definitive, but the reader should consult a collection of ballads to get some idea of the wide variety.*

Popular ballads have been much imitated by professional poets, especially since the late eighteenth century. Two such literary ballads are Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (page 682) and Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner." In a literary ballad the story is often infused with multiple meanings, with the insistent symbolic implications. Ambiguity is often found in the popular ballad also, but it is of a rather different sort. Perhaps because stanzas are lost, or perhaps because the singer was unconcerned with some elements of the story, the ambiguity of the popular ballad commonly lies in the story itself (who did what?) rather than in the significance of the story (what does it all add up to, what does it mean?).

Finally, a word about some of the most popular professional folksingers today. They have aptly been called "folksongers" because unlike illiterate or scarcely literate folksingers—who intend only to sing the traditional songs in the traditional way for themselves or their neighbors—these professionals are vocal artists who make commercial and political use (not bad things in themselves) of traditional folk songs, deliberately adapting old songs and inventing new songs that only loosely resemble the old ones. These contemporary ballads tend to be more personal than traditional ballads and they tend to have a social consciousness that is alien to traditional balladry. Many of the songs of Pete Seeger and Bob Dylan, for instance, are conspicuous examples of art in the service of morality; they call attention to injustice and they seek to move the hearers to action. That traditional ballads have assisted in this task is not the least of their value; the influence of a work of art is never finished, and the old ballads can rightly claim to share in the lives of their modern descendants.

We print two popular traditional English ballads here ("Sir Patrick Spence" and "The Demon Lover"), followed by two poems that are indebted to traditional ballads (John Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci" and A.E. Housman's "Bredon Hill"). Next we print an African-American ballad, "De Titanic," followed by seven short narrative poems—poems that tell a story—that are not in the ballad tradition. (For additional ballads, see "The Three Ravens," "The Twa Corbies," "Edward," and "John Henry" in "A Collection of Poems," Chapter 28, and for a literary ballad by an African-American author, see Langston Hughes's "Ballad of the Landlord," page 946.)

ANONYMOUS BRITISH BALLAD

Sir Patrick Spence

The king sits in Dumferling toune,
Drinking the blude-reid wine:
"O whar will I get guid sailor,
To sail this schip of mine?"
Up and spak an eldern knicht,
Sat at the kings richt kne:
"Sir Patrick Spence is the best sailor,
That sails upon the se."
The king has written a braid[o] Letter,
And signed it wi' his hand,
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spence,
Was walking on the sand.
The first line that Sir Patrick red,
A loud lauch[o] lauched he;
The next line that Sir Patrick red,
The tier blinded his ee.
"O wha is this has done this deid,
This ill deid don to me,
To send me out this time o' the yeir,

To sail upon the se?

"Mak hast, mak hast, my mirry men all,
Our guid schip sails the morne":
"O say na sae, my master deir,
For I feir a deadlie storme."
"Late late yestreen I saw the new moone,
Wi' the auld moone in hir arme,
And I feir, I feir, my deir master,
That we will cum to harme."
O our Scots nobles wer richt laith[o]
To weet their cork-heild schoone;[o]
Bot lang owre[o] a' the play wer playd,
Thair hats they swam aboone,[o]
O lang, lang may their ladies sit,
Wi' thair fans into their hand,
Or eir[o] they se Sir Patrick Spence
Cum sailing to the land.
O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi' thair gold kems in their hair,
Waiting for their ain deir lords,
For they'll se thame na mair.
Have owre[o] to Aberdour,
It's fiftie fadon deip,
And thair lies guid Sir Patrick Spence,
Wi' the Scots lords at his feit.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -The shipwreck occurs between lines 29 and 32, but it is not described. Does the omission stimulate the reader to imagine the details of the wreck? Or does the omission suggest that the poem is not so much about a shipwreck as it is about kinds of behavior? Explain. What do lines 33–40 contribute?

2. -Might lines 17–18 warrant the inference that the "eldern knicht" (line 5) is Sir Patrick's enemy?

3. Explain lines 13–16.

4. -In place of lines 37–40, another version of this ballad has the following stanza:

The ladies crack't their fingers white,
The maidens tore their hair,
A' for the sake o' their true loves,
For them they ne'er saw mair.

Why is one more effective than the other?

5. -In the other version, the stanza that is here the final one (lines 41–44) precedes the stanzas about the ladies (lines 33–40). Which stanza makes a better conclusion? Why?

6. -Is Sir Patrick heroic? Please explain.

7. -Is Sir Patrick's decision to obey the king's command right or wrong? Is he responsible for the deaths of his "mirry men"?

8. -What do you imagine was the response of the first readers to this poem, many centuries ago? What is your own response to it? How do you explain the continuities, or the differences, between these past and present responses?

The Demon Lover

"O where have you been, my long, long love,
This long seven years and mair?"
"O I'm come to seek my former vows Ye granted me before." 4
"O hold your tongue of your former vows,
For they will breed sad strife;

O hold your tongue of your former vows,
For I am become a wife."
He turned him right and round about,
And the tear blinded his ee:
"I wad never hae trodden on Irish ground,
If it had not been for thee.
"I might hae had a king's daughter,
Far, far beyond the sea;
I might have had a king's daughter,
Had it not been for love o thee."
"If ye might have had a king's daughter,
Yer sel ye had to blame;
Ye might have taken the king's daughter,
For ye kend° that I was nane.
"If I was to leave my husband dear,
And my two babes also,
O what have you to take me to,
If with you I should go?"
"I hae seven ships upon the sea—
The eighth brought me to land—
With four-and-twenty bold mariners,
And music on every hand."
She has taken up her two little babes,
Kissed them baith cheek and chin:
"O fair ye weel, my ain two babes,
For I'll never see you again."
She set her foot upon the ship,
No mariners could she behold;

But the sails were o the taffetie,°

And, the masts o the beaten gold.

They had not sailed a league, a league,

A league but barely three,

With dismal grew his countenance,

And drumlie° grew his ee.

They had not sailed a league, a league,

A league but barely three,

Until she espied his cloven foot,

And she wept right bitterlie.

"O hold your tongue of your weeping," says he,

"Of your weeping now let me be;

I will show you how the lilies grow

On the banks of Italy."

"O what hills are yon, yon pleasant hills,

That the sun shines sweetly on?"

"O yon are the hills of heaven," he said.

"Where you will never win."°

"O whaten mountain is yon," she said,

"All so dreary wi frost and snow?"

"O yon is the mountain of hell," he cried,

"Where will you and I will go."

He strack the tap-mast wi his hand,

The fore-mast wi his knee,

And he brake that gallant ship in twain,

And sank her in the sea.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. What takes place between lines 28 and 29? Between 48 and 49?

2. What is the first hint that supernatural forces are at work?

3. -What does the “cloven foot” (line 43) signify? Is the spirit motivated by malice? By love? By both?

4. -The older usages, words, and phrases of “The Demon Lover” could be updated, “translated,” into contemporary English. Do you think that such an updating should be done, or is it better to leave the poem the way it was originally composed?

5. -Did this poem hold your attention from beginning to end? If it did, please state how the author achieves this effect. If it did not, clarify why the poem failed to work for you and explain what could be done to make it more successful.

JOHN KEATS

John Keats (1795–1821), son of a London stable keeper, was taken out of school at age fifteen and apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary. In 1816 he was licensed to practice as an apothecary-surgeon, but he almost immediately abandoned medicine and decided to make a career as a poet. His progress was amazing; he published books of poems—to mixed reviews—in 1817, 1818, and 1820, before dying of tuberculosis at the age of twenty-five. Today he is esteemed as one of England’s greatest poets.

We give additional poems by Keats on pages 714, 747, and 985.

*La Belle Dame sans Merci [1819]

O what can ail thee, knight-at-arms,
Alone and palely loitering?
The sedge has withered from the lake,
And no birds sing.
O what can ail thee, knight-at-arms,
So haggard and so woe-begone?
The squirrel’s granary is full,
And the harvest’s done.
I see a lily on thy brow,

With anguish moist and fever dew,

And on thy cheeks a fading rose

Fast withereth too.

“I met a lady in the meads,

Full beautiful—a faery’s child,

Her hair was long, her foot was light,

And her eyes were wild.

“I made a garland for her head,

And bracelets too, and fragrant zone;°

She looked at me as she did love,

And made sweet moan.

“I set her on my pacing steed,

And nothing else saw all day long,

For sidelong would she bend and sing

A faery’s song.

“She found me roots of relish sweet,

And honey wild, and manna dew,

And sure in language strange she said

‘I love thee true.’

“She took me to her elfin grot,

And there she wept and signed full sore,

And there I shut her wild wild eyes

With kisses four.

“And there she lulled me asleep,

And there I dreamed—Ah! woe betide!

The latest dream I ever dreamed

On the cold hill side.

“I saw pale kings and princes too,

Pale warriors, death-pale were they all;
They cried, ‘La Belle Dame sans Merci
Hath thee in thrall!’
“I saw their starved lips in the gloam
With horrid warning gaped wide,
And I awoke, and found me here,
On the cold hill’s side.
“And this is why I sojourn here,
Alone and palely loitering,
Though the sedge has withered from the lake,
And no birds sing.”

1. -In the first three stanzas the speaker describes the knight as pale, haggard, and so forth. In the rest of the poem the knight recounts his experience. In a few sentences summarize the knight’s experience, and indicate why it has caused him to appear as he now does.

2. -The femme fatale—the dangerously seductive woman—appears often in literature. If you are familiar with one such work, compare it with Keats’s poem.

3. -What characteristics of the popular ballad (see page 676) do you find in this poem? What characteristic does it not share with popular ballads? Set forth your response in an essay of 500 words.

4. -Is this poem about love, or death, or both? Please explain, making references to details in the text.

5. -What is your response to this poem? Do you feel a connection to the characters? What kind of connection?

6. -Keats said that “La Belle Dame sans Merci” was not one of his best or most serious poems, yet later generations of readers have valued it highly. How do you explain this discrepancy? Are poets reliable judges of the merits of their own poems?

A. E. HOUSMAN

Alfred Edward Housman (1859–1936) was a professor of Latin at University College, London, and later at Cambridge. We print a poem from his most famous book, A Shropshire Lad (1896).

Bredon Hill [1896]

In summertime on Bredon
The bells they sound so clear;
Round both the shires they ring them
In steeples far and near,
A happy noise to hear.
Here of a Sunday morning,
My love and I would lie,
And see the coloured counties,
And hear the larks so high
About us in the sky.
The bells would ring to call her
In valleys miles away:
‘Come all to church, good people;
Good people, come and pray.’
But here my love would stay.
And I would turn and answer
Among the springing thyme, ‘Oh, peal upon our wedding,
And we will hear the chime,
And come to church in time.’
But when the snows at Christmas
On Bredon top were strown,
My love rose up so early
And stole out unbeknown

And went to church alone.

They tolled the one bell only,

Groom there was none to see,

The mourners followed after,

And so to church went she,

And would not wait for me.

The bells they sound on Bredon,

And still the steeples hum.

'Come all to church, good people,'—

Oh, noisy bells, be dumb;

I hear you, I will come.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Who is the storyteller (the narrator)? How would you briefly summarize the story that he tells? (In your response, take into account the next question.)

2. -What do you take the last line of the poem to mean?

3. -In what ways does this poem resemble a traditional ballad? In what ways does it not?

4. -At least one reader has said that line 28 ("the mourners followed after") is a flaw in the poem because it explicitly and unnecessarily tells the reader that someone has died. The line might, for instance, have run, "The day was dark and silent." Do you agree that the poem might be better if Housman had not spoken of mourners? Why, or why not?

ANONYMOUS AFRICAN-AMERICAN BALLAD

On the night of April 14–15 the British ocean-liner Titanic, thought to be unsinkable, crashed into an iceberg and sank on its maiden voyage, with the loss of some 1,500 of the 2,000 persons aboard. Why does the loss of this ship continue to hold the minds of succeeding generations? Perhaps it is because the ship was the largest, most luxurious, swiftest ship of its day; it carried many immensely rich people; and it was destroyed on its maiden journey.

African-American singers especially created literature out of the story of the Titanic, partly by adapting earlier songs about shipwrecks.

Consider the following lines, said to be a "Negro" song from Mississippi, which were published in the Journal of American Folk-lore in 1909, three years before the Titanic sank. (The verse form is often found in blues.)

O where were you when the steamer went down, Captain?

O where were you when the steamer went down, Captain?

O where were you when the steamer went down, Captain?

I was with my honey in the heart of town.

On the Mississippi, exploding boilers, not icebergs, did the steamers in. Presumably the captain should have been with his ship, staying on board until the last passenger had gotten to safety. The song doesn't say that the captain was cowardly, only that he wasn't where he should have been at the moment he was needed. In four lines—really in two lines—we get the juxtaposition of disaster and joy, death and life, separated but connected by the captain.

What the ship was, and who the captain was, are unknown, but the ship could have been any of several steamers that sank on the Mississippi. In any case, after the wreck of the Titanic an anonymous black singer transformed this song into:

Where wus you when the big Titanic went down?

Where wus you when the big Titanic went down?

Where wus you when the big Titanic went down?

Standin' on the deck, singin' "Alabama Boun."

And yet another version (there are several more):

O, what were you singing when the Titanic went down?

O, what were you singing when the Titanic went down?

O, what were you singing when the Titanic went down?

Sitting on a mule's back, singing "Alabama Bound."

One doesn't want to make too big a fuss, but surely these two anonymous lyrics about the Titanic lodge themselves in the mind, the first with its suggestion of an ocean voyager standing on the deck and singing about going home to Alabama, the second with its evocative contrast of the great ship sinking and the

The following song was sung during World War I by African-American soldiers on troop ships crossing the Atlantic to fight in France. (The armed services practiced segregation until after World War II.) We print it in the form it was published, with an attempt to render the pronunciation of the singers.

De Titanic

De rich folks 'cided to take a trip
On de fines' ship dat was ever built.
De cap'n presuaded dese peoples to think Dis Titanic too safe to sink.

Chorus:

Out on dat ocean,
De great wide ocean,
De Titanic, out on de ocean,
Sinkin' down!

De ship lef' de harbor at a rapid speed,
'Twuz carryin' everythin' dat de peeples need.
She sailed six-hundred miles away,
Met an icebug in her way.
De ship lef' de harbor, 'twuz runnin' fas'.
'Twuz her fus' trip an' her las'.
Way out on dat ocean wide
An icebug ripped her in de side.
Up come Bill from de bottom flo'
Said de water wuz runnin' in de boiler do'.
Go back, Bill, an' shut yo' mouth,
Got forty-eight pumps to keep de water out!
Jus' about den de cap'n looked aroun',
He seed de Titanic wuz a-sinkin' down.

He give orders to de mens aroun':

"Get yo' life-boats an' let 'em down!"

De mens standin' roun' like heroes brave,

Nothin' but de wimin an' de chillun to save;

De wimin an' de chillun a-wipin' dere eyes,

Kissin' dere husbands an' friends good-bye.

On de fifteenth day of May nineteen-twelve,

De ship wrecked by an icebug out in de ocean dwell.

De people wuz thinkin' o' Jesus o' Nazaree,

While de band played "Nearer my God to Thee!"

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -If the pronunciation was "corrected" (e.g., line 9, "The ship left the harbor at a rapid speed"), would the poem gain or lose anything? Why? What does the misnomer "icebug" (lines 12, 16, 30) suggest that "iceberg" lacks?
2. -Why is the character Bill introduced (line 17)? What, if anything, does his presence add to the poem's account of the disaster's meaning?
3. -Read "Sir Patrick Spence" (page 677), an older ballad. What characteristics do the poems share?
4. -In its final stanza the song refers to Jesus and to a Christian hymn. What do these references contribute to the point of view that the song expresses?
5. -What do you think was the author's intention in composing "De Titanic"? Can a poem itself reveal the author's intention, or do we have to locate evidence for it elsewhere, perhaps in a journal entry or in a letter that the poet sent to a friend or a fellow-poet?
6. -Is "De Titanic" a bitter poem? A cruel poem? Or would you characterize it in different terms? Please explain, citing details in the text.

THOMAS HARDY

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England, the son of a stonemason. Despite great obstacles he studied the classics and architecture, and in 1862 he moved to London to study and practice as an architect. Ill health forced him to return to Dorset, where he continued to work as an architect and to write. Best known for his novels, Hardy ceased writing fiction after the hostile reception of Jude the Obscure in 1896 and turned to writing lyric poetry.

For information about the Titanic, see page 685.

The Convergence of the Twain [1912]

Lines on the Loss of the Titanic

I

In a solitude of the sea
Deep from human vanity,
And the Pride of Life that planned her, stilly couches she.

II

Steel Chambers, late the pyres
Of her salamandrine fires,
Cold currents thrid,° and turn to rhythmic tidal lyres.

III

Over the mirrors meant
To glass the opulent
The sea-worm crawls—grotesque, slimed, dumb, indifferent.

IV

Jewels in joy designed
To ravish the sensuous mind
Lie lightless, all their sparkles bleared and black and blind.

V

Dim moon-eyed fishes near Gaze at the gilded gear
And query: "What does this vaingloriousness down here?"

VI

Well; while was fashioning

This creature of cleaving wing,

The Immanent Will that stirs and urges everything

VII

Prepared a sinister mate

For her—so gaily great—

A Shape of Ice, for the time far and dissociate.

VIII

And as the smart ship grew

In stature, grace, and hue,

In shadowy silent distance grew the Iceberg too.

IX

Alien they seemed to be:

No mortal eye could see

The intimate welding of their later history,

Or sign that they were bent

By paths coincident

On being anon twin halves of one august event,

XI

Till the Spinner of the Years

Said "Now!" And each one hears,

And consummation comes, and jars two hemispheres.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Does Hardy assign a cause to the disaster? What do you make of "The Immanent Will" (line 18) and "the Spinner of the Years" (line 31)?

2. -In line 19 Hardy speaks of the "sinister mate." What other words in the poem suggest that the ship and the iceberg participate in a marriage?

3. -After you have read and thought carefully about the poem, consider the title and subtitle. Why, in your view, did Hardy use the phrase “The Convergence of the Twain” as his title? Would the poem be more effective if the title and subtitle were reversed? Explain.

4. -Examine the form and structure of the poem, looking closely at the ways in which Hardy has organized his lines and stanzas. Stanza I, for example, could be rewritten with the final words coming first: “She couches stilly in a solitude of the sea.” What poetic effects does Hardy achieve through this change (and others like it) in normal or typical syntax and word order? And why does he use a series of three-line stanzas, each headed by a roman numeral? Why not simply present the poem as a single long stanza?

SIEGFRIED SASSOON

Siegfried Sassoon (1886–1967), a wealthy Englishman, served with such distinction in the First World War—in 1915 under heavy fire he helped a wounded soldier to safety—that he was awarded the Military Cross. Later, wounded by a bullet in the chest, he was sent from France back to England, where, upon reflection, he concluded that the war was not a war of defense but of aggression. Military officials shrewdly chose not to dispute him, but merely asserted that he was shell-shocked. When Sassoon recovered from the bullet wound, he was again sent into combat, and in 1919 was again wounded and hospitalized.

Sassoon expressed his views in Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man (1928) and Memoirs of an Infantry Officer (1930), as well as in several volumes of poetry.

The General [1917]

“Good-morning, good-morning!” the General said
When we met him last week on our way to the line.
Now the soldiers he smiled at are most of ’em dead,
And we’re cursing his staff for incompetent swine.
“He’s a cheery old card,” grunted Harry to Jack
As they slogged up to Arras with rifle and pack.
But he did for them both by his plan of attack.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Who is the storyteller, and what is the story he tells?

2. -Why do you suppose Sassoon put an extra space between the next-to-last line and the last line? Speaking of the last line, notice that it rhymes with the two preceding lines—i.e., the last three lines end with identical sounds, whereas in the preceding four lines, no two adjacent lines rhyme. Why do you suppose Sassoon changed the rhyme-scheme for the final lines?

3. -How would you characterize the General? How would you characterize Harry? How would you characterize the storyteller?

COUNTEE CULLEN

Countee Cullen (1903–1946) was born Countee Porter in New York City, raised by his grandmother, and then adopted by the Reverend Frederick A. Cullen, a Methodist minister in Harlem. Cullen received a bachelor's degree from New York University (Phi Beta Kappa) and a master's degree from Harvard. He earned his living as a high school teacher of French, but his literary gifts were recognized in his own day. Eric Walrond (1898–1966), to whom the poem is dedicated, was an essayist and writer of short stories.

Incident [1925]

(For Eric Walrond)

Once riding in Old Baltimore,
Heart-filled, head-filled with glee,
I saw a Baltimorean
Keep looking straight at me.
Now I was eight and very small,
And he was no whit bigger,
And so I smiled, but he poked out
His tongue, and called me, "Nigger."
I saw the whole of Baltimore
From May until December;

Of all the things that happened there

That's all that I remember. 12

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -How would you define an "incident"? A serious occurrence? A minor occurrence, or what? Think about the word, and then think about Cullen's use of it as a title for the event recorded in this poem. Test out one or two other possible titles as a way of helping yourself to see the strengths or weaknesses of Cullen's title.

2. -The dedicatee, Eric Walrond (1898–1966) was an African-American essayist and writer of fiction, who in an essay, "On Being Black," had described his experiences of racial prejudice. How does the presence of the dedication bear on our response to Cullen's account of the "incident"?

3. -What is the tone of the poem? Indifferent? Angry? Or what? What do you think is the speaker's attitude toward the "incident"? What is your attitude?

4. -Ezra Pound, poet and critic, once defined literature as "news that stays news." What do you think he meant by this? Do you think that the definition fits Cullen's poem?

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

Edward Arlington Robinson (1869–1935) grew up in Gardiner, Maine, spent two years at Harvard, and then returned to Maine, where he published his first book of poetry in 1896. Though he received encouragement from neighbors, his finances were precarious, even after President Theodore Roosevelt, having been made aware of the book, secured for him an appointment as customs inspector in New York from 1905 to 1909. Additional books won fame for Robinson, and in 1922 he was awarded the first of the three Pulitzer Prizes for poetry that he would win.

Richard Cory [1896]

Whenever Richard Cory went down town,

We people on the pavement looked at him:

He was a gentleman from sole to crown,

Clean favored, and imperially slim. 4

And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
"Good-morning," and he glittered when he walked.
And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
And admirably schooled in every grace:
In fine,° we thought that he was everything
To make us wish that we were in his place.
So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Consult the entry on irony in the glossary. Then read the pages referred to in the entry. Finally, write an essay of 500 words on irony in "Richard Cory."

2. -What do you think were Richard Cory's thoughts shortly before he "put a bullet through his head"? In 500 words, set forth his thoughts and actions (what he sees and does). If you wish, you can write in the first person, from Cory's point of view. Further, if you wish, your essay can be in the form of a suicide note.

3. -Write a sketch (250–350 words) setting forth your early impression or understanding of someone whose later actions revealed you had not understood the person.

THOMAS GRAY

Thomas Gray (1716–1771), educated in England at Eton and at Cambridge, was a bookish man—a serious student of history, botany, zoology, music, and literature—who in his middle thirties found himself famous because of his "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (published in 1751). The most famous stanza of this poem runs thus:

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,

And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,

Awaits alike th' inevitable hour.

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

As this stanza indicates, Gray's "Elegy" is a meditative poem with very little narrative content. The following poem has more narrative content and is more playful: It announces itself as an "ode"—normally a poem devoted to singing the praises of an important subject—but the rest of the title, by the very juxtaposition of "ode" and "cat," suggests playfulness.

Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fishes [1748]

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
Where China's gayest art had dyed
The azure flowers that blow;°
Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclined,
Gazed on the lake below.
Her conscious tail her joy declared;
The fair round face, the snowy beard,
The velvet of her paws,
Her coat, that with the tortoise vies,
Her ears of jet, and emerald eyes,
She saw; and purred applause.
Still had she gazed; but midst the tide
Two angel forms were seen to glide,
The Genii° of the stream:
Their scaly armor's Tyrian hue°
Through richest purple to the view Betrayed a golden gleam.
The hapless nymph with wonder saw:
A whisker first, and then a claw,

With many an ardent wish,
She stretched in vain to reach the prize.
What female heart can gold despise?
What cat's averse to fish?
Presumptuous maid! with looks intent
Again she stretched, again she bent,
Nor knew the gulf between.
(Malignant Fate sat by, and smiled.)
The slipp'ry verge her feet beguiled;
She tumbled headlong in.
Eight times emerging from the flood
She mewed to ev'ry wat'ry god,
Some speedy aid to send.
No dolphin came, no Nereid° stirred:
Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan heard.
A fav'rite has no friend!
From hence, ye beauties, undeceived,
Know, one false step is ne'er retrieved,
And be with caution bold.
Not all that tempts your wand'ring eyes
And heedless hearts is lawful prize;
Nor all that glisters, gold.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -A mock heroic poem does not mock the heroic but mocks a trivial subject by treating it in the elevated terms normally reserved for heroic subjects. Its elevated diction (e.g., "lake" in line 6, for a tub of water) produces a comic effect. What examples are shown here? What comic juxtapositions? What is the tone of the poem?

2. -Is this a satire on cats? What does the cat come to represent?

3. -Explain the paradox in line 36. Is the explicit moralizing (e.g., line 36, lines 37–42) offensive? Explain.

4. -Dr. Johnson said of this poem: "The poem On the Cat was doubtless by its author considered as a trifle, but it is not a happy trifle. . . . The sixth stanza contains a melancholy truth, that 'a favorite has no friend'; but the last ends in a pointed sentence of no relation to the purpose: "if what glistered had been gold, the cat would not have gone into the water; and if she had, would not less have been drowned." Evaluate Johnson's comment.

5. Does a good story necessarily have a moral? Please explain.

EMILY DICKINSON

Emily Dickinson (1830–1886), born into a proper New England family in Amherst, Massachusetts, was brought up as a Protestant. Much of her poetry concerns death and heaven, but it is far from being conventionally Christian.

Because I could not stop for Death

Because I could not stop for Death—
He kindly stopped for me—
The Carriage held but just Ourselves—
And Immortality.
We slowly drove—He knew no haste
And I had put away
My labor and my leisure too,
For His Civility—
We passed the School, where Children strove
At Recess—in the Ring—
We passed the Fields of Gazing Grain—
We passed the Setting Sun—
Or rather—He passed Us—

The Dews drew quivering and chill—

For only Gossamer, my Gown—

My Tippet—only Tulle—

We paused before a House that seemed

A Swelling of the Ground—

The Roof was scarcely visible—

The Cornice—in the Ground—

Since then—'tis Centuries—and yet

Feels shorter than the Day

I first surmised the Horses' Heads

Were toward Eternity—

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Characterize death as it appears in line 1–8.

2. -What is the significance of the details and their arrangement in the third stanza? Why "strove" rather than "played" (line 9)? What meaning does "Ring" (line 10) have? Is "Gazing Grain" better than "Golden Grain"?

3. -The "House" in the fifth stanza is a sort of riddle. What is the answer? Does this stanza introduce an aspect of death not present—or present only very faintly—in the rest of the poem? Explain.

4. -Evaluate this statement about the poem (from Yvor Winters's In Defense of Reason): "In so far as it concentrates on the life that is being left behind, it is wholly successful; in so far as it attempts to experience the death to come, it is fraudulent, however exquisitely."

JOHN LENNON AND PAUL McCARTNEY

John Lennon (1940–1980) and Paul McCartney (b. 1942) were original members of the Beatles.

Eleanor Rigby [1966]

Ah, look at all the lonely people!

Ah, look at all the lonely people!

Eleanor Rigby

Picks up the rice in the church where a wedding has been,

Lives in a dream.

Waits at the window

Wearing the face that she keeps in a jar by the door.

Who is it for?

All the lonely people,

Where do they all come from?

All the lonely people,

Where do they all belong?

Father McKenzie,

Writing the words of a sermon that no one will hear,

No one comes near.

Look at him working,

Darning his socks in the night when there's nobody there.

What does he care?

All the lonely people,

Where do they all come from?

All the lonely people,

Where do they all belong?

Ah, look at all the lonely people!

Ah, look at all the lonely people!

Eleanor Rigby

Died in the church and was buried along with her name,

Nobody came.

Father McKenzie,

Wiping the dirt from his hands as he walks from the grave,

No one was saved.

All the lonely people,

Where do they all come from?

All the lonely people,

Where do they all belong?

Ah, look at all the lonely people!

Ah, look at all the lonely people!

Lyric Poetry

For the ancient Greeks, a lyric was a song accompanied by a lyre. It was short, and it usually expressed a single emotion, such as joy or sorrow. The word is now used more broadly, referring to a poem that, neither narrative (telling a story) nor strictly dramatic (performed by actors), is an emotional or reflective soliloquy. Still, it is rarely very far from a singing voice. James Joyce saw the lyric as the "verbal vesture of an instant of emotion, a rhythmical cry such as ages ago cheered on the man who pulled at the oar." Such lyrics, too, were sung more recently than "ages ago." Here is a song that American slaves sang when rowing heavy loads.

Anonymous

Michael Row the Boat Ashore

Michael row the boat ashore, Hallelujah!

Michael's boat's a freedom boat, Hallelujah!

Sister, help to trim the sail, Hallelujah!

Jordan stream is wide and deep, Hallelujah!

Freedom stands on the other side, Hallelujah!

We might pause for a moment to comment on why people sing at work. There are at least three reasons: (1) work done rhythmically goes more efficiently; (2) the songs relieve the boredom of the work; and (3) the songs—whether narrative or lyrical—provide something of an outlet for the workers' frustrations.

Speaking roughly, we can say that whereas a narrative (whether in prose or poetry) is set in the past, telling what happened, a lyric is set in the present, catching a speaker in a moment of expression. But a lyric can, of course, glance backward or forward, as in this folk song, usually called "Careless Love."

ANONYMOUS

Careless Love

Love, O love, O careless love,
You see what careless love can do.
When I wore my apron low,
Couldn't keep you from my do,°
Fare you well, fare you well.
Now I wear my apron high,
Scarce see you passin' by,
Fare you well, fare you well.

Notice, too, that a lyric, like a narrative, can have a plot: "Michael" moves toward the idea of freedom, and "Careless Love" implies a story of desertion—something has happened between the time that the singer could not keep the man from her door and now, when she "scarce" sees him passing by—but, again, the emphasis is on a present state of mind.

Lyrics are sometimes differentiated among themselves. For example, if a lyric is melancholy or mournfully contemplative, especially if it laments a death, it may be called an elegy. If a lyric is rather long, elaborate, and on a lofty theme such as immortality or a hero's victory, it may be called an ode or a hymn. Distinctions among lyrics are often vague, and one person's ode may be another's elegy. Still, when writers use one of these words in their titles, they are inviting the reader to recall the tradition in which they are working. Of the poet's link to tradition T. S. Eliot said:

> No poet, no artist of any art, has his complete meaning alone. His significance, his appreciation is the appreciation of his relation to the dead poets and artists. You cannot value him alone; you must set him, for contrast and comparison, among the dead.

Although the lyric is often ostensibly addressed to someone (the "you" in "Careless Love"), the reader usually feels that the speaker is really talking to himself or herself. In “Careless Love,” the speaker need not be in the presence of her man; rather, her heart is overflowing (the reader senses) and she pretends to address him.

A comment by John Stuart Mill on poetry is especially true of the lyric:

> Eloquence is heard, poetry is *over*heard. Eloquence supposes an audience; the peculiarity of poetry appears to us to lie in the poet’s utter unconsciousness of a listener. Poetry is feeling confessing itself to itself, in moments of solitude.

This is particularly true in work songs such as “Michael Row the Boat Ashore,” where there is no audience: the singers sing for themselves, participating rather than performing. As one prisoner in Texas said: “They really be singing about the way they feel inside. Since they can’t say it to nobody, they sing a song about it.” The sense of “feeling confessing itself to itself, in moments of solitude” or of “singing about the way they feel inside” is strong and clear in this short cowboy song.

ANONYMOUS

The Colorado Trail

Eyes like the morning star,
Cheeks like a rose,
Laura was a pretty girl
God Almighty knows.
Weep all ye little rains,
Wail winds wail,
All along, along, along
The Colorado trail.

When we read a lyric poem, no matter who the speaker is, for a moment—while we recite or hear the words—we become the speaker. That is, we get into the speaker’s mind, or, perhaps more accurately, the speaker takes charge of our mind, and we undergo (comfortably seated in a chair or sprawled on a bed) the mental experience that is embodied in the words.

Next, another anonymous poem, this one written in England, probably in the early sixteenth century.

Aside from modern reprintings, it survives in only one manuscript, a song book, the relevant portion of which we reproduce here. But first, here is the poem in modern spelling.

ANONYMOUS

Western Wind

Westron wind, when will thou blow?

The small rain down can rain.

Christ, that my love were in my arms,

And I in my bed again.

The angular handwriting is in a style quite different from modern writing, but when you are told that the first three words are "Westron [i.e., western] wynde when," you can probably see some connections. And you can probably make out the last handwritten word on the second line ("And"), and all of the third line: "I yn my bed A gayne" ("I in my bed again"). Incidentally—we hope we are not boring you with trifles—some controversy surrounds the transcription of one of the words—the fifth word in the second line of writing, the word that looks like a y followed by an f (just after "Chryst" and just before "my"). The issue is this: Is the letter a y, in which case the word is "if," or is it a letter we no longer have, a letter called thorn, which was pronounced "th," as in either "thin" or "this"? If indeed it is a thorn, the next letter is a t, not an f, and the word therefore is not "if" but "that." (Incidentally, signs that say "Ye Olde Antique Shoppe" make no sense; "Ye" was never used as a definite article. What these signs are reproducing is a thorn, and the word really is "The," not "Ye.")

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In "Western Wind," what do you think is the tone of the speaker's voice in the first two lines? Angry? Impatient? Supplicating? Be as precise as possible. What is the tone in the next two lines?

2. -In England the west wind, warmed by the Gulf Stream, rises in the spring. What associations link the wind and rain of lines 1 and 2 with lines 3 and 4?

3. -Should we have been told why the lovers are separated? Explain.

Love poems are by no means all the same—to take an obvious point, some are happy and some are sad—but those that are about the loss of a beloved or about the pains of love seem to be especially popular.

JULIA WARD HOWE

Julia Ward Howe (1819–1910) was born in New York City. A social reformer, her work for the emancipation of African-Americans and the right of women to vote is notable. She was the first woman to be elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

Glory! glory! Hallelujah!
Glory! glory! Hallelujah!
His truth is marching on!

I have seen him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps;
They have builded him an altar in the evening dews and damps;
I can read his righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps;
His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel, writ in burnished rows of steel:
"As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal;
Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel, Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat;
Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer him! be jubilant, my feet!
Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,

With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me:

As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,

While God is marching on. 24

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -This poem of the Civil War, written to the tune of "John Brown's Body," draws some of its militant imagery from the Bible, especially from Isaiah 63.1–6 and Revelation 19.11–15. Do you think the lines about Christ are inappropriate here? Explain.

2. -If you know the tune to which "Battle Hymn of the Republic" is sung, think about the interplay between the music and the words. Do you think people have a different response to Howe's words when they read her text as a poem, rather than experienced it as a song?

WENDY COPE

Wendy Cope (b. 1945) was born in Kent, in the south of England. She was educated at St. Hilda's College at Oxford University, where she took a degree in History, and then at the Westminster College of Education. After working for some years as a music teacher in London, Cope became a television critic, a columnist, a freelance writer, and above all, a poet. Her books of verse include Making Cocoa for Kingsley Amis (1986) and Serious Concerns (1991), both of which were best-sellers in England, and If I Don't Know (2001).

Valentine [1991]

My heart has made its mind up

And I'm afraid it's you.

Whatever you've got lined up,

My heart has made its mind up

And if you can't be signed up 5

This year, next year will do.

My heart has made its mind up

And I’m afraid it’s you.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What are your first responses to Cope’s title? How does she work with (and perhaps against) our thoughts and feelings about Valentine’s Day?

2. -“Valentine” appears in a book titled Serious Concerns. Do you find the poem serious, or is it to you more amusing than serious? Is this a poem that you read and enjoy and no more than that, or do you find that it stays with you, maybe making a connection with experiences in your own life? Please explain.

3. -Three times Cope describes the heart making up its mind. Isn’t that perplexing—the idea of the heart having a mind? What do you think that the poet might be suggesting through this use of words?

4. -The final line repeats the second line. Do you hear and understand “afraid” differently the second time?

William Shakespeare

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) is of course best known as the writer of sonnets and of plays, but he also wrote lyrics for songs in some of the plays. The following two lyrics are sung at the end of an early musical comedy, Love’s Labor’s Lost. (No early settings are known for these songs.) Conflict is essential in drama, and in these two poems we get a sort of melodious conflict, a song in praise of spring, juxtaposed against a song in praise of winter. But notice that within each song there are elements of conflict.

Spring [c. 1595]

When daisies pied and violets blue
And lady-smocks° all silver-white
And cuckoo-buds° of yellow hue
Do paint the meadows with delight,
The cuckoo then, on every tree,
Mocks married men; for thus sings he,
“Cuckoo,

Cuckoo, cuckoo!” O word of fear,

Unpleasing to a married ear!

When shepherds pipe on oaten straws,°

And merry larks are ploughmen’s clocks,

When turtles tread,° and rooks, and daws,

And maidens bleach their summer smocks,

The cuckoo then, on every tree,

Mocks married men; for thus sings he,

“Cuckoo,

Cuckoo, cuckoo!” O word of fear,

Unpleasing to a married ear!

Winter [c. 1595]

When icicles hang by the wall,

And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,°

And Tom bears logs into the hall,

And milk comes frozen home in pail,

When blood is nipped, and ways° be foul,

Then nightly sings the staring owl,

“Tu-whit, tu-who!”

A merry note,

While greasy Joan doth keel° the pot.

When all aloud the wind doth blow,

And coughing drowns the parson’s saw,°

And birds sit brooding in the snow,

And Marian’s nose looks red and raw,

When roasted crabs° hiss in the bowl,

Then nightly sings the staring owl,

A merry note,

While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Why is the cuckoo appropriate to spring? The owl to winter?

2. -Did you expect a poem on spring to bring in infidelity? Is the poem bitter? Explain. (If in doubt, check the word "cuckold" in a dictionary.)

3. -Does "Winter" describe only the hardships of the season, or does it communicate also the joys?

W. H. AUDEN

Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) was born in York, England, and educated at Oxford. In the 1930s his left-wing poetry earned him wide acclaim as the leading poet of his generation. In 1939 Auden came to America, and in 1946 he became a citizen of the United States, though he spent his last years in England.

Stop All the Clocks, Cut Off the Telephone [1936]

Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone,

Prevent the dog from barking with a juicy bone,

Silence the pianos and with muffled drum

Bring out the coffin, let the mourners come.

Let aeroplanes circle moaning overhead

Scribbling on the sky the message He Is Dead,

Put the crepe bows round the white necks of the public doves,

Let the traffic policemen wear black cotton gloves.

He was my North, my South, my East and West,

My working week and my Sunday rest,

My noon, my midnight, my talk, my song;

I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong.

The stars are not wanted now: put out every one;

Pack up the moon and dismantle the sun;

Pour away the ocean and sweep up the wood.

For nothing now can ever come to any good. 16

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Let's assume that poems are rooted in real-life situations—that is, they take their origin from responses to experience, whether the experience is falling in love or losing a loved one, or praising God or losing one's faith, or celebrating a war (as in "Battle Hymn of the Republic") or lamenting the tragic destruction of war. But of course the poet then shapes the experience into a memorable statement and somehow makes a distinctive work on a traditional theme. Cite some phrases in Auden's poem that you would not expect to find in a poem on the death of the beloved. (For example, would you expect to find a reference to a dog eating "a juicy bone" in a poem on this theme?) Do you think these passages are effective, or do you think they are just silly? Explain.

2. -Perhaps another way of getting at the question we have just asked is this: Can you imagine reading this at the funeral of someone you love? Or would you want a lover to read it at your funeral? Why?

3. -The words of the last line of the poem are simple, almost a cliché. Yet we find them very powerful, and we wonder if you agree. What is the relationship of this line to the preceding lines of the stanza, with its images of mighty actions and cosmic gestures, and to the poem as a whole?

EMILY BRONTË

Emily Brontë (1818–1848) spent most of her short life (she died of tuberculosis) in an English village on the Yorkshire moors. The sister of Charlotte Brontë (author of Jane Eyre) and of Anne Brontë, Emily is best known for her novel Wuthering Heights (1847), but she was a considerable poet, and her first significant publication (1846) was in a volume of poems by the three sisters.

Spellbound [1837]

The night is darkening round me,

The wild winds coldly blow;

But a tyrant spell has bound me

And I cannot, cannot go. 4

The giant trees are bending

Their bare boughs weighed with snow.

And the storm is fast descending,

And yet I cannot go. 8

Clouds beyond clouds above me,

Wastes beyond wastes below;

But nothing drear can move me;

I will not, cannot go. 12

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What exactly is a “spell,” and what does it mean to be “spellbound”?
2. -What difference, if any, would it make if the first line said “has darkened” instead of “is darkening”?
3. -What difference would it make, if any, if lines 4 and 12 were switched?
4. -What does “drear” (line 11) mean? Is this word too unusual? Should the poet have used a more familiar word?
5. -Describe the speaker’s state of mind. Have you ever experienced anything like this yourself? What was the situation and how did you move beyond it?

Here is yet one more lyric dealing, as lyric usually does, with a deeply felt personal experience.

THOMAS HARDY

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England, the son of a stonemason. Best known for his novels, Hardy stopped writing fiction after the hostile reception of Jude the Obscure in 1896 and turned to writing lyric poetry.

The Self-Unseeing [1901]

Here is the ancient floor,

Footworn and hollowed and thin,

Here was the former door

Where the dead feet walked in.

She sat here in her chair,

Smiling into the fire;

He who played stood there,

Bowing it higher and higher.

Childlike, I danced in a dream;

Blessings emblazoned that day;

Everything glowed with a gleam;

Yet we were looking away!

Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -In line 8, what does “Bowing it higher and higher” mean? Putting aside the issue of rhyme, what, if anything, would be lost if lines 7–8 were omitted?
2. -What do you take the title of the poem to mean? And the last line?
3. -Hardy chose to punctuate the final line with an exclamation point. Would the tone and meaning change if he had used a period?

We have already mentioned that the lyric can range from expressions of emotion focused on personal matters to expressions of emotion focused on public matters, and the latter are sometimes characterized as odes or hymns. Among the most memorable hymns produced in the United States are the spirituals, or Sorrow Songs, created by black slaves in the United States, chiefly in the first half of the nineteenth century. The origins of the spirituals are still a matter of some dispute, but most specialists agree that the songs represent a distinctive fusion of African rhythms with European hymns.

Many of the texts derive ultimately from biblical sources: One of the chief themes, the desire for release, is sometimes presented with imagery drawn from ancient Israel. Examples include references to crossing the River Jordan (a river that runs from north of the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea), the release of the Israelites from slavery in Egypt (Exodus), Jonah’s release from the whale (Book of Jonah), and Daniel’s deliverance from a fiery furnace and from the lions’ den (Book of Daniel, chapters 3 and 6).

The texts were collected and published especially in the 1860s—for instance in Slave Songs of the United States (1867). For another spiritual, see page 697.

Evenin' Air Blues [1942]

Folks, I come up North
Cause they told me de North was fine.
I come up North
Cause they told me de North was fine.
Been up here six months—
I'm about to lose my mind.
This mornin' for breakfast
I chawed de mornin' air.
This mornin' for breakfast
Chawed de mornin' air.
But this evenin' for supper,
I got evenin' air to spare.
Believe I'll do a little dancin'
Just to drive my blues away—
A little dancin'
To drive my blues away,
Cause when I'm dancin'
De blues forgets to stay.
But if you was to ask me
How de blues they come to be,

Says if you was to ask me

How de blues they come to be—

You wouldn't need to ask me:

Just look at me and see!

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING OR WRITING

-In what ways (subject, language) does this poem resemble blues you may have heard? Does it differ in any ways? If so, how?

LI-YOUNG LEE

Li-Young Lee was born in 1957 in Jakarta, Indonesia, of Chinese parents. In 1964 his family brought him to the United States. He was educated at the University of Pittsburgh, the University of Arizona, and the State University of New York, Brockport. He now lives in Chicago.

I Ask My Mother to Sing [1986]

She begins, and my grandmother joins her.

Mother and daughter sing like young girls.

If my father were alive, he would play his accordion and sway like a boat.

I've never been in Peking, or the Summer Palace, nor stood on the great Stone Boat to watch the rain begin on Kuen Ming Lake, the picnickers running away in the grass.

But I love to hear it sung;

how the waterlilies fill with rain until they overturn, spilling water into water, then rock back, and fill with more.

Both women have begun to cry.

But neither stops her song.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Why might the speaker ask the women to sing?

2. -Why do the women cry? Why do they continue to sing?

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950) was born in Rockland, Maine. Even as a child she wrote poetry, and by the time she graduated from Vassar College (1917) she had achieved some notice as a poet. Millay settled for a while in Greenwich Village, a center of Bohemian activity in New York City, where she wrote, performed in plays, and engaged in feminist causes. In 1923, the year she married, she became the first woman to win the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry. Numerous other awards followed. Though she is best known as a lyric poet—especially as a writer of sonnets—she also wrote memorable political poetry and nature poetry as well as short stories, plays, and a libretto for an opera.

The Spring and the Fall [1923]

In the spring of the year, in the spring of the year,
I walked the road beside my dear.
The trees were black where the bark was wet.
I see them yet, in the spring of the year.
He broke me a bough of the blossoming peach
That was out of the way and hard to reach.
In the fall of the year, in the fall of the year,
I walked the road beside my dear.
The rooks went up with a raucous trill.
I hear them still, in the fall of the year.
He laughed at all I dared to praise,
And broke my heart, in little ways.
Year be springing or year be falling,
The bark will drip and the birds be calling.

There's much that's fine to see and hear 15

In the spring of a year, in the fall of a year.

'Tis not love's going hurts my days,

But that it went in little ways.

1. -The first stanza describes the generally happy beginning of a love story. Where do you find the first hint of an unhappy ending?

2. -Describe the rhyme scheme of the first stanza, including internal rhymes. Do the second and third stanzas repeat the pattern, or are there some variations? What repetition of sounds other than rhyme do you note?

3. -Put the last two lines into your own words. How do you react to them; that is, do you find the conclusion surprising, satisfying, recognizable from your own experience, anticlimactic, or what?

4. -In two or three paragraphs, explain how the imagery of the poem (drawn from the seasons of the year) contributes to its meaning.

WILFRED OWEN

Wilfred Owen (1893–1918) was born in Shropshire, in England, and studied at London University. He enlisted in the army at the outbreak of World War I and fought in the Battle of the Somme until he was hospitalized with shell shock. After his recuperation in England, he returned to the front, only to be killed in action one week before the end of the war. His collected poems were published posthumously.

Anthem for Doomed Youth [1920]

What passing-bells for these who die as cattle?

Only the monstrous anger of the guns.

Only the stuttering rifles' rapid rattle

Can patter out their hasty orisons.

No mockeries for them from prayers or bells, 5

Nor any voice of mourning save the choirs—

The shrill, demented choirs of wailing shells;

And bugles calling for them from sad shires.

What candles may be held to speed° them all?

Not in the hands of boys, but in their eyes

Shall shine the holy glimmers of good-byes.

The pallor of girls' brows shall be their pall;

Their flowers the tenderness of patient minds,

And each slow dusk a drawing-down of blinds.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -What is an anthem? What are some of the words or phrases in this poem that might be found in a traditional anthem? What are some of the words or phrases that you would not expect in an anthem?
2. -How would you characterize the speaker's state of mind? (Your response probably will require more than one word.)

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born on Long Island, the son of a farmer. The young Whitman taught school and worked as a carpenter, a printer, a newspaper editor, and, during the Civil War, as a volunteer nurse on the Union side. After the war he supported himself by doing secretarial jobs. In Whitman's own day his poetry was highly controversial because of its unusual form (formlessness, many people said) and (though not in the following poem) its abundant erotic implications.

A Noiseless Patient Spider [1862–63]

A noiseless patient spider,

I mark'd where on a little promontory it stood isolated,

Mark'd how to explore the vacant vast surrounding,

It launch'd forth filament, filament, filament, out of itself,

Ever unreeling them, ever tirelessly speeding them.

And you O my soul where you stand,

Surrounded, detached, in measureless oceans of space,

Ceaselessly musing, venturing, throwing, seeking the spheres to connect them,

Till the bridge you will need be form'd, till the ductile anchor hold,

Till the gossamer thread you fling catch somewhere, O my soul. 10

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -How are the suggestions in "launch'd" (line 4) and "unreeling" (line 5) continued in the second stanza?

2. -How are the varying lengths of lines 1, 4, and 8 relevant to their ideas?

3. -The second stanza is not a complete sentence. Why? The poem is unrhymed. What effect does the near-rhyme (hold: soul) in the last two lines have on you?

JOHN KEATS

John Keats (1795–1821), son of a London stable keeper, was taken out of school at age fifteen and apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary. In 1816 he was licensed to practice as an apothecary-surgeon, but he almost immediately abandoned medicine and decided to make a career as a poet. His progress was amazing; he published books of poems—to mixed reviews—in 1817, 1818, and 1820, before dying of tuberculosis at the age of twenty-five. Today he is esteemed as one of England's greatest poets.

Ode on a Grecian Urn [1820]

I

Thou still unravished bride of quietness,

Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,

Sylvan historian, who canst thus express

A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:

What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape 5

Of deities or mortals, or of both,

In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?

What men or gods are these? What maidens loth?
What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

II

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
Not to the sensual° ear, but, more endeared,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

III

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
And, happy melodist, unwearied,
For ever piping songs for ever new;
More happy love! more happy, happy love!
For ever warm and still to be enjoyed,
For ever panting, and for ever young;
All breathing human passion far above,
That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

IV

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?

To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands drest?
What little town by river or sea shore,
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
And, little town, thy streets for evermore
Will silent be; and not a soul to tell
Why thou art desolate can e'er return.

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede°
Of marble men and maidens overwrought,
With forest branches and the trodden weed;
Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral!
When old age shall this generation waste,
Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"—that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -If you do not know the meaning of "sylvan," check a dictionary. Why does Keats call the urn a "sylvan" historian (line 3)? As the poem continues, what evidence is there that the urn cannot "express" (line 3) a tale so sweetly as the speaker said?

2. -What do you make of lines 11–14?

3. -What do you think the urn may stand for in the first three stanzas? In the third stanza, is the speaker caught up in the urn's world or is he sharply aware of his own?

4. -Do you take “tease us out of thought” (line 44) to mean “draw us into a realm of imaginative experience superior to that of reason” or to mean “draw us into futile and frustrating questions”? Or both? Or neither? What suggestions do you find in “Cold Pastoral” (line 45)?

5. -Do lines 49–50 perhaps mean that imagination, stimulated by the urn, achieves a realm richer than the daily world? Or perhaps that art, the highest earthly wisdom, suggests there is a realm wherein earthly troubles are resolved?

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR

Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906), born in Ohio to parents who had been slaves in Kentucky, achieved fame for his dialect poetry. He published early—even while in high school—and by 1896, with the publication of Lyrics of Lowly Life, had three books to his credit. Because he often used black speech patterns and pronunciation, Dunbar’s work was sometimes thought to present demeaning racial stereotypes, but in recent years critics have seen the protest beneath the quaint surface. In the following poem, however, he works entirely within a traditional white idiom, although the subject is distinctively African-American.

Sympathy [1899]

I know what the caged bird feels, alas!
When the sun is bright on the upland slopes;
When the wind stirs soft through the spring grass,
And the river flows like a stream of glass.
When the first bird sings and the first bud opes,
And the faint perfume from its chalice steals—
I know what the caged bird feels!
I know why the caged bird beats his wing
Till its blood is red on the cruel bars;
For he must fly back to his perch and cling
When he fain would be on the bough a-swing;
And a pain still throbs in the old, old scars

And they pulse again with a keener sting—

I know why he beats his wing!

I know why the caged bird sings, ah me,

When his wing is bruised and his bosom sore,—

When he beats his bars and he would be free;

It is not a carol of joy or glee,

But a prayer that he sends from his heart's deep core,

But a plea, that upward to Heaven he flings—

I know why the caged bird sings

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Pay careful attention to Dunbar's use of language. Describe, for example, what the comparison "like a stream of glass" in the first stanza expresses about the river, and comment on the implications of the word "chalice."

2. -Some readers have felt that the second stanza is the weakest in the poem, and that the poem improves if this stanza is omitted. Why do you suppose they hold this view? Do you agree with it? Explain. Should Dunbar have dropped this stanza?

3. -After reading and rereading the poem, try to summarize its overall effect. Explain why the speaker sees such an intimate connection between himself and the "caged bird."

LINDA PASTAN

Linda Pastan was born in New York City in 1932. The author of ten books of poems, she has won numerous prizes and has received grants from the National Endowment for the Arts. In the following poem she wittily plays with repetitions and with pauses.

Jump Cabling [1984]

When our cars touched

When you lifted the hood of mine

To see the intimate workings underneath,

When we were bound together

By a pulse of pure energy, 5

When my car like the princess

In the tale woke with a start,

I thought why not ride the rest of the way together?

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Suppose someone argued that this is merely prose broken up into arbitrary units. Would you agree? Explain.

2. -As you read the poem aloud, think about the spacing that Pastan designed for it. What is the effect of the space between the first and second parts of the first seven lines? Why does she do something different for the final line?

The Speaking Tone of Voice

> Everything is as good as it is dramatic. . . . [A poem is] heard as sung or spoken by a person in a scene—in character, in a setting. By whom, where and when is the question. By the dreamer of a better world out in a storm in Autumn; by a lover under a window at night.
> —Robert Frost, Preface, A Way Out

If we fall into the habit of saying, "Julia Ward Howe says that her 'eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord,'" or "Robert Frost says that he thinks he knows 'Whose woods these are,'" we neglect the important truth in Frost's comment about poetry as drama: A poem is written by an author (Howe, Frost), but it is spoken by an invented speaker. The author counterfeits the speech of a person in a particular situation.

The anonymous author of "Western Wind" (page 699), for instance, invents the speech of an unhappy lover who longs for the spring ("Westron wind, when will thou blow?"); Julia Ward Howe invents the speech of someone who has seen God working in this world; Robert Frost, in "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" (page 936), invents a speaker who, sitting in a horse-drawn sleigh, watches the woods fill up with snow.

The speaker's voice often has the ring of the author's own voice—certainly Robert Frost did a great deal to cultivate the idea that he was a farmer-poet—but even when the resemblance seems close, we should recall that in the poem we get a particular speaker in a particular situation. That is, we get, for instance, not the whole of Frost (the father, the competitive poet, the public lecturer, and so on), but only a man in a horse-drawn sleigh watching the woods fill up with snow. It is customary, then, in writing about the voice one hears in a poem, to write not about the author but about the speaker, or voice, or mask, or persona (Latin for “mask”) that speaks the poem.

In reading a poem, the first and most important question to ask yourself is this: Who is speaking? If an audience and a setting are suggested, keep them in mind, too. Consider, for example, the following poem.

EMILY DICKINSON

Emily Dickinson (1830–1886) was born into a proper New England family in Amherst, Massachusetts. Because she never married, and because in her last twenty years she may never have left her house, she has sometimes been pitied. But as the critic Allen Tate said, “All pity for Miss Dickinson’s ‘starved life’ is misdirected. Her life was one of the richest and deepest ever lived on this continent.” Her brother was probably right in saying that, having seen something of the rest of the world, “she could not resist the feeling that it was painfully hollow. It was to her so thin and unsatisfying in the face of the Great Realities of Life.” For a more complete biographical account, and for a selection of Dickinson’s poems and letters, see Chapter 26.

I’m Nobody! Who are you? [1861?]

I’m Nobody! Who are you?
Are you—Nobody—too?
Then there’s a pair of us!
Don’t tell! they’d banish us—you know!
How dreary—to be—Somebody!
How public—like a Frog—
To tell your name—the livelong June—
To an admiring Bog!

Let’s consider the sort of person we hear in “I’m Nobody! Who are you?” (Read it aloud, to see if you agree. In fact, you should test each of our assertions by reading the poem aloud.) The voice in line 1 is rather like that of a child playing a game with a friend. In lines 2 and 3 the speaker sees the reader as a fellow spirit (“Are you—Nobody—too?”) and invites the reader to join her (“Then there’s a pair of us!”) in forming a sort of conspiracy of silence against outsiders (“Don’t tell!”). In “they’d banish us,” however, we hear a word that a child would not be likely to use, and we probably feel that the speaker is a shy but (with the right companion) playful adult, who here is speaking to an intimate friend. And since we hear this voice—we are reading the poem—we are or we become the friend. Because "banish" is a word that brings to mind images of a king's court, the speaker almost comically inflates and thereby makes fun of the "they" who are opposed to "us."

In the second stanza, or we might better say in the space between the two stanzas, the speaker puts aside the childlike manner. In "How dreary," the first words of the second stanza, we hear a sophisticated voice, one might even say a world-weary voice, or a voice with perhaps more than a touch of condescension. But since by now we are paired with the speaker in a conspiracy against outsiders, we enjoy the contrast that the speaker makes between the Nobodies and the Somebodies. Who are these Somebodies, these people who would imperiously "banish" the speaker and the friend? What are the Somebodies like?

How dreary—to be—Somebody!

How public—like a Frog—

To tell your name—the livelong June—

To an admiring Bog!

The last two lines do at least two things: They amusingly explain to the speaker's new friend (the reader) in what way a Somebody is public (it proclaims its presence all day). They also indicate the absurdity of the Somebody-Frog's behavior (the audience is "an admiring Bog"). By the end of the poem we are quite convinced that it is better to be a Nobody (like Dickinson's speaker, and the reader?) than a Somebody (a loudmouth, like a croaking frog).

Often we tend to think of reading as something we do in private, and silently. But it is important to remember that writers, especially poets, care greatly about how their words sound. Poets pay attention not only to how the poem is arranged on the page—the length of the lines, for example—but also to how the poem sounds when actually read aloud, or, at least, when heard within the reader's mind.

One of the pleasures of reading literature, in fact, is the pleasure of listening to the sound of a voice, with its special rhythms, tones, accents, and emphases. Getting to know a poem, and becoming engaged by a poet's style, is very much a matter of getting to know a voice, acquiring a feeling for its familiar intonations, yet also being surprised, puzzled, even startled by it on occasion.

If you have done a little acting, you know from this experience how crucial it is to discover the way a character's lines in a play should sound. Directors and actors spend a great deal of time reading the lines, trying them in a variety of ways to catch their truest pace and verbal shape. And so do poets. We aren't making this up; in a letter, Robert Frost talks about "the sound of sense," a sort of abstraction in which an emotion or attitude comes through, even if the words are not clearly heard. He writes:

> The best place to get the abstract sound of sense is from voices behind a door that cuts off the words. Ask yourself how these sentences would sound without the words in which they are embodied:
> You mean to tell me you can't read?
>
> I said no such thing.
>
> Well read then.
> You're not my teacher.

In another letter, continuing the discussion of the topic, after giving some additional examples (for instance, "Unless I'm greatly mistaken," "No fool like an old fool"), Frost says, "It is so and not otherwise that we get the variety that makes it fun to write and read. The ear does it. The ear is the only true writer and the only true reader." (For a group of poems by Frost, see Chapter 26.)

In reading, then, your goal is to achieve a deeper sense of character—what this voice sounds like, what kind of person speaks like this. Read aloud; imagine how the writer might have meant his or her words to sound; read aloud again; and listen carefully all the while to the echoes and resonances of the words.

Consider the dramatic situation and the voices in the following poems.

GWENDOLYN BROOKS

Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000) was born in Topeka, Kansas, but was raised in Chicago's South Side, where she spent most of her life. In 1950, when she won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, she became the first African-American writer to win a Pulitzer Prize.

We Real Cool [1960]

The Pool Players.

Seven at the Golden Shovel.

We real cool. We Left school. We

Lurk late. We

Strike straight. We

Sing sin. We 5

Thin gin. We

Jazz June. We

Die soon.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Exactly why do you identify the speaker as you do?
2. -The stanzas could have been written thus:

    We real cool.

    We left school.

    We lurk late.

    We strike straight.

    And so forth. Why do you think Brooks wrote them, or printed them, the way she did?

Here is another poem by the same poet, speaking in a different voice.

The Mother [1945]

Abortions will not let you forget.

You remember the children you got that you did not get,

The damp small pulps with a little or with no hair,

The singers and workers that never handled the air.

You will never neglect or beat 5

Them, or silence or buy with a sweet.

You will never wind up the sucking-thumb

Or scuttle off ghosts that come.

You will never leave them, controlling your luscious sigh,

Return for a snack of them, with gobbling mother-eye.

I have heard in the voices of the wind the voices of my dim killed children.

I have contracted. I have eased

My dim dears at the breasts they could never suck.

I have said, Sweets, if I sinned, if I seized

Your luck

And your lives from your unfinished reach,

If I stole your births and your names,

Your straight baby tears and your games,

Your stilted or lovely loves, your tumults, your marriages, aches, and your deaths,

If I poisoned the beginnings of your breaths,

Believe that even in my deliberateness I was not deliberate.

Though why should I whine,

Whine that the crime was other than mine?—

Since anyhow you are dead.

Or rather, or instead,

You were never made.

But that too, I am afraid,

Is faulty: oh, what shall I say, how is the truth to be said?

You were born, you had body, you died.

It is just that you never giggled or planned or cried.

Believe me, I loved you all.

Believe me, I knew you, though faintly, and I loved, I loved you

All.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Whom is being addressed?
2. -The first ten lines sound like a chant. What gives them that quality? What makes them nonetheless serious?

3. -In lines 20–23 the mother attempts to deny the “crime” but cannot. What is her reasoning here?

4. -Do you find the last lines convincing? Explain.

5. -The poem was first published in 1945. Do you think that the abundant debate about abortion in recent years has somehow made the poem seem dated, or more timely than ever? Explain.

LINDA PASTAN

Linda Pastan was born in New York City in 1932 and educated at Radcliffe College, Simmons College, and Brandeis University. The author of ten books of poems, she has won numerous prizes and has received a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Marks [1978]

My husband gives me an A for last night’s supper, an incomplete for my ironing,
a B plus in bed.
My son says I am average,
an average mother, but if I put my mind to it
I could improve.
My daughter believes in Pass/Fail and tells me
I pass. Wait ’til they learn I’m dropping out.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -In addition to the A and B that are mentioned, where else in the poem does Pastan use the language of the world of the school? The speaker of the poem receives grades, but does she also give a grade, or imply one?

2. -What would be gained or lost if Pastan's first sentence came last?

THE READER AS THE SPEAKER

We have been arguing that the speaker of the poem usually is not the author but a dramatized form of the author, and that we overhear this speaker in some situation. But with poems of the sort that we have been looking at, we can also say that the reader is the speaker. That is, as we read the poem, at least to some degree we utter the thoughts, and we experience the sensations or emotions that the writer sets forth. We feel that Dickinson has allowed us to set forth our own feelings about what it is to be Nobody in a world where others are Somebody (and she has also helped us to say that the Somebody is a noisy frog); with Brooks we hear or overhear thoughts and feelings that perhaps strike us as more relevant and more profound and more moving than most of what we hear on television or read in the newspapers about urban violence.

In the following poem you will hear at least three voices—the voice of the person who begins the poem by telling us about a dead man ("Nobody heard him, the dead man"), the voice of the dead man ("I was much further out than you thought / And not waving but drowning"), and the collective voice of the dead man's friends ("Poor chap, he always loved larking"). But see if you don't find that all of the voices together say things that you have said (or almost said).

STEVIE SMITH

Stevie Smith (1902–1971), christened Florence Margaret Smith, was born in England, in Hull. In addition to writing poems, she wrote stories, essays, and three novels. She is the subject of a film, Stevie, in which Glenda Jackson plays Smith.

Not Waving but Drowning [1957]

Nobody heard him, the dead man,

But still he lay moaning:

I was much further out than you thought

And not waving but drowning. 4

Poor chap, he always loved larking

And now he's dead

It must have been too cold for him his heart gave way,

They said.

Oh, no no no, it was too cold always

(Still the dead one lay moaning)

I was much too far out all my life

And not waving but drowning.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Identify the speaker of each line.
2. -What sort of man did the friends of the dead man think he was? What type of man do you think he was?
3. -The first line, “Nobody heard him, the dead man,” is literally true. Dead men do not speak. In what other ways is it true?

WISLAWA SZYMBORSKA

Wislawa Szymborska (pronounced “Vislawa Zimborska”), a native of Poland, was born in 1923. In 1996 she received the Nobel Prize for poetry.

The Terrorist, He Watches [1981]

Translated by Robert A. Maguire and Magnus Jan Krynski

The bomb will go off in the bar at one twenty p.m.

Now it’s only one sixteen p.m.

Some will still have time to get in,

some to get out.

The terrorist has already crossed to the other side of the street.

The distance protects him from any danger,

and what a sight for sore eyes:

A woman in a yellow jacket, she goes in.

A man in dark glasses, he comes out.

Guys in jeans, they are talking.

One seventeen and four seconds.

That shorter guy's really got it made, and gets on a scooter, and that taller one, he goes in.

One seventeen and forty seconds.

That girl there, she's got a green ribbon in her hair.

Too bad that bus just cut her off.

One eighteen p.m.

The girl's not there any more.

Was she dumb enough to go in, or wasn't she?

That we'll see when they carry them out.

One nineteen p.m.

No one seems to be going in.

Instead a fat baldy's coming out.

Like he's looking for something in his pockets and at one nineteen and fifty seconds

he goes back for those lousy gloves of his.

It's one twenty p.m.

The time, how it drags.

Should be any moment now.

Not yet.

Yes, this is it.

The bomb, it goes off.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Who speaks the poem? The terrorist? Or someone watching the terrorist? Or a sort of combination? Or what?

2. -Characterize the speaker.

JOHN UPDIKE

John Updike (b. 1932) is best known as a writer of fiction—short stories and novels—but throughout his professional career he has also written essays and poems. (For a more complete biographical note, see page 101.)

Icarus [2001]

O.K., you are sitting in an airplane and the person in the seat next to you is a sweaty, swarthy gentleman of Middle Eastern origin whose carry-on luggage consists of a bulky black brief-case he stashes,
in compliance with airline regulations,
underneath the seat ahead.
He keeps looking at his watch and closing his eyes in prayer, resting his profusely dank forehead against the seatback ahead of him just above the black briefcase, which if you listen through the droning of the engines seems to be ticking, ticking
softly, softer than your heartbeat in your ears.
Who wants to have all their careful packing—the travellers' checks,
the folded underwear—
end as floating sea-wrack five miles below, drifting in a rainbow scum of jet fuel,
and their docile hopes of a plastic-wrapped meal dashed in a concussion whiter than the sun?
I say to my companion, "Smooth flight so far."
"So far."
"That's quite a briefcase you've got there."

He shrugs and says, “It contains my life’s work.”

“And what is it, exactly, that you do?”

“You could say I am a lobbyist.”

He does not want to talk.

He wants to keep praying.

His hands, with their silky beige backs and their nails cut close like a technician’s,

tremble and jump in handling the plastic glass of Sprite when it comes with its exploding bubbles.

Ah, but one gets swept up in the airport throng, all those workaday faces, faintly pampered and spoiled in the boomer style, and those elders dressed like children for flying in hi-tech sneakers and polychrome catsuits, and those gum-chewing attendants taking tickets while keeping up a running flirtation with a uniformed bystander, a stoic blond pilot—

all so normal, who could resist

this vault into the impossible?

Your sweat has slowly dried. Your praying neighbor has fallen asleep, emitting an odor of cardamom.

His briefcase seems to have deflated.

Perhaps not this time, then.

But the possibility of impossibility will keep drawing us back to this scrape against the numbed sky, to this sleek sheathed tangle of color-coded wires, these million rivets, this wing

like a frozen lake at your elbow.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Take a moment to look up the Icarus myth in a classical dictionary or encyclopedia. Do you see connections between the myth and the story that Updike tells in this poem?

2. -Who is the "you" in the first line?

3. -What kinds of assumptions does the poem make about the "gentleman of Middle Eastern origin"? Are these assumptions challenged? Point to specific details in the language to explain your responses.

4. -What kind of conclusion does the poem reach?

5. -Does "Icarus" disturb you? If so, why?

6. -Which poem do you think is more effective; Updike's "Icarus" or Syzmborska's "The Terrorist"? What, more generally, does it mean to say that one poem is more effective than another?

THE DRAMATIC MONOLOGUE

We have said at some length that in most poems the speaker is not quite the author (say, Robert Frost) but is a dramatized version (a man sitting in a sleigh, watching the "woods fill up with snow"). We have also said that in most poems the reader can imagine himself or herself as the speaker; as we read Dickinson or even Brooks and Pastan, we say to ourselves that the poet is expressing thoughts and emotions that might be our own. But in some poems the poet creates so distinct a speaker that the character clearly is not us but is something Other. Such a poem is called a dramatic monologue. In it, a highly specific character speaks, in a clearly specified situation. The most famous example is Robert Browning's "My Last Duchess," where a Renaissance duke is addressing an emissary from a count.

ROBERT BROWNING

Born in a suburb of London into a middle-class family, Browning (1812–1889) was educated primarily at home, where he read widely. For a while he wrote for the English stage, but after marrying Elizabeth Barrett in 1846—she too was a poet—he lived with her in Italy until her death in 1861. He then returned to England and settled in London with their son. Regarded as one of the most distinguished poets of the Victorian period, he is buried in Westminster Abbey.

My Last Duchess [1844]

Ferrara*

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,

Looking as if she were alive. I call

That piece a wonder, now; Frà Pandolf's° hands

Worked busily a day, and there she stands.

Will't please you sit and look at her? I said

"Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read

Strangers like you that pictured countenance,

The depth and passion of its earnest glance,

But to myself they turned (since none puts by

The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)

And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,

How such a glance came there; so, not the first

Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not

Her husband's presence only, called that spot

Of joy into the Duchess' cheek; perhaps

Frà Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps

Over my Lady's wrist too much," or, "Paint

Must never hope to reproduce the faint

Half-flush that dies along her throat." Such stuff

Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough

For calling up that spot of joy. She had

A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,

Too easily impressed; she liked whate'er

She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast,

The dropping of the daylight in the west,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace—all and each
Would draw from her alike the approving speech, Or blush, at least. She thanked men—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
In speech—(which I have not)—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
Or there exceed the mark"—and if she let Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set
Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,
—E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose Never to stoop. Oh, Sir, she smiled, no doubt, Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below, then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go

Together down, Sir. Notice Neptune, though,

Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity, 55

Which Claus of Innsbruck° cast in bronze for me!

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What is the occasion for the meeting?

2. -What words or lines do you think especially convey the speaker's arrogance? What is your attitude toward the speaker? Loathing? Fascination? Respect? Explain.

3. -The time and place are Renaissance Italy; how do they affect your attitude toward the duke? What would be the effect if the poem were set in the late twentieth century?

4. -Years after writing this poem, Browning explained that the duke's "commands" (line 45) were "that she should be put to death, or he might have had her shut up in a convent." Do you think the poem should have been more explicit? Does Browning's later uncertainty indicate that the poem is badly thought out? Suppose we did not have Browning's comment on line 45. Do you think the line then could mean only that he commanded her to stop smiling and that she obeyed? Explain.

DICTION AND TONE

From the whole of language, one consciously or unconsciously selects certain words and grammatical constructions; this selection constitutes one's diction. It is partly by the diction that we come to know the speaker of a poem. Stevie Smith's speaker (page 723) used words such as "chap" and "larking," which are scarcely imaginable in the mouth of Browning's Renaissance duke. But of course some words are used in both poems: "I," "you," "thought," "the," and so on. The fact remains, however, that although a large part of language is shared by all speakers, certain parts of language are used only by certain speakers.

Like some words, some grammatical constructions are used only by certain kinds of speakers. Consider these two passages:

In Adam's fall

We sinned all.

—Anonymous, The New England Primer

Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit

Of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste

Brought death into the World, and all our woe,

With loss of Eden, till one greater Man

Restore us, and regain the blissful seat,

Sing, Heavenly Muse, that, on the secret top

Of Oreb, or of Sinai, didst inspire

That shepherd who first taught the chosen seed

In the beginning how the heavens and earth

Rose out of Chaos. . . .

—John Milton, Paradise Lost

There is an enormous difference in the diction of these two passages. Milton, speaking as an inspired poet, appropriately uses words and grammatical constructions somewhat removed from common life. Hence, while the anonymous author of the primer speaks directly of "Adam's fall," Milton speaks allusively of the fall, calling it "Man's first disobedience." Milton's sentence is nothing that any Englishman ever said in conversation; its genitive beginning ("Of Man's first disobedience"), its length (the sentence continues for six lines beyond the quoted passage), and its postponement of the main verb ("Sing") until the sixth line mark it as the utterance of a poet working in the tradition of Latin poetry. The primer's statement, by its choice of words as well as by its brevity, suggests a far less sophisticated speaker.

Speakers have attitudes toward themselves, their subjects, and their audiences, and (consciously or unconsciously) they choose their words, pitch, and modulation accordingly; all these add up to the tone. In written literature, tone must be detected without the aid of the ear; the reader must understand by the selection and sequence of words the way in which they are meant to be heard (that is, playfully, angrily, confidentially, sarcastically, etc.). The reader must catch what Frost calls "the speaking tone of voice somehow entangled in the words and fastened to the page of the ear of the imagination."

Finally, we should mention that although this discussion concentrates on the speaker's tone, one can also talk of the author's tone, that is, of the author's attitude toward the invented speaker. The speaker's tone might, for example, be angry, but the author's tone (as detected by the reader) might be humorous.

ROBERT HERRICK

Robert Herrick (1591–1674) was born in London, the son of a goldsmith. After taking an M.A. at Cambridge, he was ordained in the Church of England. Later, he was sent to the country parish of Dean Prior in Devonshire, where he wrote most of his poetry. A loyal supporter of the king, in 1647 he was expelled from his parish by the Puritans, though in 1662 he was restored to Dean Prior.

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time [1648]

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles today,
Tomorrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
The higher he's a-getting,
The sooner will his race be run,
And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first,
When youth and blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time;
And while ye may, go marry:
For having lost but once your prime,
You may for ever tarry.

Carpe diem (Latin: "seize the day") is the theme. But if we want to get the full force of the poem, we must understand who is talking to whom. Look, for example, at "Old Time" in line 2. Time is "old" in the sense of having been around a long while, but doesn't "old" in this context suggest also that the speaker regards Time with easy familiarity, almost affection? We visit the old school, and our friend is old George. Time is destructive, yes, and the speaker urges the young maidens to make the most of their spring. But the speaker is neither bitter nor importunate; rather, he seems to be the wise old man, the counselor, the man who has made his peace with Time and is giving advice to the young. Time moves rapidly in the poem (the rosebud of line 1 is already a flower in line 3), but the speaker is unhurried; in line 5 he has leisure to explain that the glorious lamp of heaven is the sun.

In "To the Virgins," the pauses, indicated by punctuation at the ends of the lines (except in line 11, where we tumble without stopping from "worst" to "Times"), slow the reader down. But even if there is no punctuation at the end of a line of poetry, the reader probably pauses slightly or gives the final word an additional bit of emphasis. Similarly, the space between stanzas slows a reader down, increasing the emphasis on the last word of one stanza and the first word of the next.

THOMAS HARDY

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England, the son of a stonemason. Despite great obstacles he studied the classics and architecture, and in 1862 he moved to London to study and practice as an architect. Ill health forced him to return to Dorset, where he continued to work as an architect and to write. Best known for his novels, Hardy ceased writing fiction after the hostile reception of Jude the Obscure in 1896 and turned to writing lyric poetry.

The Man He Killed [1902]

"Had he and I but met
By some old ancient inn,
We should have sat us down to wet
Right many a nipperkin!° 4

"But ranged as infantry,
And staring face to face,
I shot at him as he at me,
And killed him in his place. 8

"I shot him dead because—
Because he was my foe,
Just so: my foe of course he was;

That's clear enough; although

"He thought he'd 'list, perhaps,

Off-hand like—just as I—

Was out of work—had sold his traps°—

No other reason why.

"Yes; quaint and curious war is!

You shoot a fellow down

You'd treat if met where any bar is,

Or help to half-a-crown."

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What do we learn about the speaker's life before he enlisted in the infantry? How does his diction characterize him?
2. -What is the effect of the series of monosyllables in lines 7 and 8?
3. -Consider the punctuation of the third and fourth stanzas. Why are the heavy, frequent pauses appropriate? What question is the speaker trying to answer?
4. -In the last stanza, what attitudes toward war does the speaker express? What, from the evidence of this poem, would you infer Hardy's attitude toward war to be?

WALTER DE LA MARE

Walter de la Mare (1873–1956) was born in Kent, England. He worked for many years as an accountant for the Anglo-American Oil Company until a legacy enabled him to devote his life to writing lyric poetry and fiction.

An Epitaph [1925]

Here lies a most beautiful lady:

Light of step and heart was she;

I think she was the most beautiful lady

That ever was in the West Country.

But beauty vanishes; beauty passes;

However rare—rare it be;

And when I crumble, who will remember

This lady of the West Country? 8

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Who is the speaker of the poem?

2. -Do you think that the simple language lacks dignity? In some older poetry, especially poetry that was passed down orally, a word of two syllables at the end of the line has the stress on the second syllable, as “sailór.” In this poem, what is the effect of rhyming “country” and “she” and “be”?

3. -Do you think that the last two lines introduce a new idea, or do they deepen the implications of the earlier lines? When you read aloud the final stanza, pay special notice to the pause at the end of line 6. How does your voice register the movement from line 6 to line 7?

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844–1889) was born near London and educated at Oxford, where he studied the classics. A convert from Anglicanism to Roman Catholicism, he was ordained a Jesuit priest in 1877. After serving as a parish priest and teacher, he was appointed Professor of Greek at the Catholic University in Dublin. Hopkins published only a few poems during his lifetime, partly because he believed that the pursuit of literary fame was incompatible with his vocation as a priest, and partly because he was aware that his highly individual style might puzzle readers.

Spring and Fall: To a Young Child [1880]

Márgarét, are you gríeving

Over Goldengrove unleaving?

Léaves, líke the things of man, you

With your fresh thoughts care for, can you?

Áh! ás the heart grows older 5

It will come to such sights colder

By and by, nor spare a sigh

Though worlds of wanwood leafmeal lie;

And yet you will weep and know why.

Now no matter, child, the name:

Sórrow's spríngs áre the same.

Nor mouth had, no nor mind, expressed

What heart heard of, ghost° guessed:

It ís the blight man was born for,

It ís Margaret you mourn for.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -About how old do you think the speaker is? What is his tone? What connection can you make between the title and the speaker and Margaret? What meanings do you think may be in "Fall"?
2. -What is meant by Margaret's "fresh thoughts" (line 4)? Paraphrase (put into your own words) lines 3–4 and lines 12–13.
3. -"Wanwood" and "leafmeal" are words coined by Hopkins. What do they suggest to you?
4. -How can you explain the apparent contradiction that Margaret weeps for herself (line 15) after the speaker has said that she weeps for "Goldengrove unleaving" (line 2)?

COUNTEE CULLEN

Countee Cullen (1903–1946) was born Countee Porter in New York City, raised by his grandmother, and then adopted by the Reverend Frederick A. Cullen, a Methodist minister in Harlem. Cullen received a bachelor's degree from New York University (Phi Beta Kappa) and a master's degree from Harvard. He earned his living as a high school teacher of French, but his literary gifts were recognized in his own day. Cullen sometimes wrote about black life, but he also wrote on other topics, insisting that African-Americans need not work only in the literary tradition exemplified by such writers as Langston Hughes.

For a Lady I Know [1925]

She even thinks that up in heaven

Her class lies late and snores,

While poor black cherubs rise at seven

To do celestial chores.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -What is the gist of what Cullen is saying?
2. -How would you characterize the tone? Furious? Indifferent?

LYN LIFSHIN

Born in Burlington, Vermont, in 1944 and educated at Syracuse University and the University of Vermont, Lyn Lifshin has written many books of poetry on a range of topics, from Shaker communities of early America to Eskimo culture in the Arctic. Much of her work shows a strong feminist concern.

My Mother and the Bed [1999]

No, not that way she'd say when I was 7, pulling

the bottom sheet smooth, you've got to saying hospital corners

I wet the bed much later than I should, until just writing this I hadn't thought of the connection

My mother would never sleep on sheets someone else had I never saw any stains on hers tho her bedroom was a maze of powder hair pins black dresses

Sometimes she brings her own sheets to my house, carries toilet seat covers

Did anybody sleep

in my she always asks

Her sheets her hair

she says the rooms here

smell funny

We drive at 3 am slowly into Boston and strip what looks like

two clean beds as the sky gets light I smooth on the form

fitted flower bottom, she redoes it

She thinks of my life

as a bed only she can make right

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -What do you make of the extra spaces—for instance, the space between “to” and “saying” in line 4? In reading the poem aloud, how do you “read” the spaces?

2. -Would you agree that the poem is humorous and, on the whole, genial? Or do you think that bitterness overshadows the humor? Explain.

3. -One student made the suggestion that the final stanza, perhaps because it seems to "explain" the poem to the reader, is the least effective part of the poem. Do you agree? If you do, write a new final stanza.

THE VOICE OF THE SATIRIST

The writer of satire, in one way or another, ridicules an aspect or several aspects of human behavior, seeking to arouse in the reader some degree of amused contempt for the object. However urbane in tone, the satirist is always critical. By cleverly holding up foibles or vices for the world's derision, satire (Alexander Pope claimed) "heals with morals what it hurts with wit." The laughter of comedy is an end in itself; the laughter of satire is a weapon against the world: "The intellectual dagger," Frank O'Connor called satire, "opposing the real dagger." Jonathan Swift, of whom O'Connor is speaking, insisted that his satires were not malice but medicine:

His satire points at no defect
But what all mortals may correct. . . .
He spared a hump or crooked nose,
Whose owners set not up for beaux.

But Swift, although he claimed that satire is therapeutic, also saw its futility: "Satire is a sort of glass [i.e., mirror] wherein beholders do generally discover everybody's face but their own."

Sometimes the satirist speaks out directly as defender of public morals, abusively but wittily chopping off heads. Byron, for example, wrote:

Prepare for rhyme—I'll publish, right or wrong:
Fools are my theme, let Satire be my song.

But sometimes the satirist chooses to invent a speaker far removed from himself or herself, just as Browning chose to invent a Renaissance duke. The satirist may invent a callous brigadier general or a pompous judge who unconsciously annihilates himself. Consider this satirical poem by e. e. cummings (pen name of Edwin Estlin Cummings).

E. E. CUMMINGS

Edwin Estlin Cummings (1894–1962) grew up in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and was graduated from Harvard, where he became interested in modern literature and art, especially in the movements called cubism and futurism. His father, a conservative clergyman and a professor at Harvard, seems to have been baffled by the youth's interests, but Cummings's mother encouraged his artistic activities, including his use of unconventional punctuation as a means of expression.

Politically liberal in his youth, Cummings became more conservative after a visit to Russia in 1931, but early and late his work emphasizes individuality and freedom of expression.

next to of course god america i [1926]

"next to of course god america i love you land of the pilgrims' and so forth oh say can you see by the dawn's early my country 'tis of centuries come and go and are no more what of it we should worry in every language even deafanddumb thy sons acclaim your glorious name by gorry by jingo by gee by gosh by gum why talk of beauty what could be more beautiful than these heroic happy dead who rushed like lions to the roaring slaughter they did not stop to think they died instead then shall the voice of liberty be mute?"
He spoke. And drank rapidly a glass of water

Cummings might have written, in the voice of a solid citizen or a good poet, a direct attack on chauvinistic windbags; instead, he chose to invent a windbag whose rhetoric punctures itself. Yet the last line tells that we are really hearing someone who is recounting what the windbag said; that is, the speaker of all the lines but the last is a combination of the chauvinist and the satiric observer of the chauvinist. (When Cummings himself recited these lines, there was mockery in his voice.)

Only in the final line of the poem does the author seem to speak entirely on his own, and even here he adopts a matter-of-fact pose that is far more potent than invective (direct abuse) would be. Yet the last line is not totally free of explicit hostility. It might, for example, have run, "He spoke. And slowly poured a glass of water." Why does this version lack the punch of Cummings's? And what do you think is implied by the absence of a final period in line 14?

MARGE PIERCY

Marge Piercy, born in Detroit in 1936, was the first member of her family to attend college. After earning a bachelor's degree from the University of Michigan in 1957 and a master's degree from Northwestern University in 1958, she moved to Chicago. There she worked at odd jobs while writing novels (unpublished) and engaging in action on behalf of women and blacks and against the war in Vietnam. In 1970—the year she moved to Wellfleet, Massachusetts, where she still lives—she published her first book, a novel. Since then she has published other novels, as well as short stories, poems, and essays.

Barbie Doll [1969]

This girlchild was born as usual and presented dolls that did pee-pee and miniature GE stoves and irons and wee lipsticks the color of cherry candy.
Then in the magic of puberty, a classmate said:
You have a great big nose and fat legs.
She was healthy, tested intelligent,
possessed strong arms and back,
abundant sexual drive and manual dexterity.
She went to and fro apologizing.
Everyone saw a fat nose on thick legs.
She was advised to play coy, exhorted to come on hearty,
exercise, diet, smile and wheedle.
Her good nature wore out like a fan belt.

So she cut off her nose and her legs and offered them up.

In the casket displayed on satin she lay with the undertaker's cosmetics painted on,

a turned-up putty nose,

dressed in a pink and white nightie.

Doesn't she look pretty? everyone said.

Consummation at last.

To every woman a happy ending.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Why is the poem called "Barbie Doll"?

2. -What voice do you hear in lines 1–4? Line 6 is, we are told, the voice of "a classmate." How do these voices differ? What voice do you hear in the first three lines of the second stanza?

3. -Explain in your own words what Piercy is saying about women in this poem. Does her view seem to you fair, slightly exaggerated, or greatly exaggerated?

LOUISE ERDRICH

Louise Erdrich, born in 1954 in Little Falls, Minnesota, grew up in North Dakota, a member of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa. Her father had been born in Germany; her mother was a Chippewa; both parents taught at the Bureau of Indian Affairs School. After graduating from Dartmouth College (major in anthropology) in 1976, Erdrich returned briefly to North Dakota to teach in the Poetry in the Schools Program, and went to Johns Hopkins University, where she earned a master's degree in creative writing.

Erdrich has published two books of poems and several novels, one of which, Love Medicine (1986), won the National Book Critics Circle Award. We publish one of her short stories, "The Red Convertible," in Chapter 11.

Dear John Wayne [1984]

August and the drive-in picture is packed.
We lounge on the hood of the Pontiac surrounded by the slow-burning spirals they sell at the window, to vanquish the hordes of mosquitoes.
Nothing works. They break through the smoke screen for blood.
Always the lookout spots the Indians first,
spread north to south, barring progress.
The Sioux or some other Plains bunch in spectacular columns, ICBM missiles, feathers bristling in the meaningful sunset.
The drum breaks. There will be no parlance.
Only the arrows whining, a death-cloud of nerves swarming down on the settlers who die beautifully, tumbling like dust weeds into the history that brought us all here together: this wide screen beneath the sign of the bear.
The sky fills, acres of blue squint and eye that the crowd cheers. His face moves over us, a thick cloud of vengeance, pitted like the land that was once flesh. Each rut, each scar makes a promise: It is not over, this fight, not as long as you resist.
Everything we see belongs to us.
A few laughing Indians fall over the hood slipping in the hot spilled butter.
The eye sees a lot, John, but the heart is so blind.
Death makes us owners of nothing.
He smiles, a horizon of teeth

the credits reel over, and then the white fields again blowing in the true-to-life dark.

The dark films over everything.

We get into the car scratching our mosquito bites, speechless and small as people are when the movie is done.

We are back in our skins.

How can we help but keep hearing his voice,

the flip side of the sound track, still playing:

Come on, boys, we got them where we want them, drunk, running.

They'll give us what we want, what we need.

Even his disease was the idea of taking everything.

Those cells, burning, doubling, splitting out of their skins.

1. -Who is the speaker of most of the poem? Who speaks the italicized lines?
2. -There are curious shifts in the diction, for instance from "some other Plains bunch" (line 8) to "parlance" (line 11). Whose voice do we hear in "some . . . bunch"? Consider, too, the diction in "to vanquish the hordes of mosquitoes" (line 4). If you were talking about mosquitoes, you probably would not use the word "vanquish." What do you think Erdrich is up to?
3. -What do you make of lines 24–25, talking of Indians "slipping in the hot spilled butter"? What connection do these lines have with what presumably is going on in the film?

JONATHAN SWIFT

Jonathan Swift (1667–1745), born in Ireland of English parents, became dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, but he also had a significant career as a propagandist for the Tory party in England. He is significant today, however, neither for his ecclesiastical nor his political work. Rather, he is best known for a short satiric essay, "A Modest Proposal," and for a longer prose satire, Gulliver's Travels (1725), which, because some of its characters are giants and others are only a few inches tall, has had the curious fate of being regarded as a book for children.

Swift's poetry ranges from the tender to the scatological. We reprint one of his satiric poems, a scathing elegy celebrating the death of John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, who died in 1722.

A Satirical Elegy on the Death of a Late Famous General [1764]

His Grace!° impossible! what, dead!
Of old age too, and in his bed!
And could that Mighty Warrior fall?
And so inglorious, after all!
Well, since he's gone, no matter how,
The last loud trump must wake him now:
And, trust me, as the noise grows stronger,
He'd wish to sleep a little longer.
And could he be indeed so old
As by the newspapers we're told?
Threescore, I think, is pretty high;
'Twas time in conscience he should die.
This world he cumbered long enough;
He burnt his candle to the snuff;
And that's the reason, some folks think,
He left behind so great a s...k.
Behold his funeral appears,
Nor widow's sighs, nor orphan's tears,
Wont at such times each heart to pierce,
Attend the progress of his hearse.
But what of that, his friends may say,
He had those honors in his day.
True to his profit and his pride,

He made them weep before he died.

Come hither, all ye empty things,
Ye bubbles raised by breath of Kings;
Who float upon the tide of state,
Come hither, and behold your fate.
Let pride be taught by this rebuke,
How very mean a thing's a Duke;
From all his ill-got honors flung,
Turned to that dirt from whence he sprung.

1 His Grace Duke of Marlborough.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Ordinarily, what would be the tone of a poem written for someone who had recently died? What is Swift's tone in the first line? In the second? By the end of the eighth line ("He'd wish to sleep a little longer")? Which words, if any, in the first two lines might you expect to find in a poem about the death of an eminent public figure? Now look closely at the last line of the poem. "Turned to that dirt from whence he sprung." By substituting only one word in the last line, how can you convert the line into one that might be uttered in church in a sermon eulogizing the deceased?

2. -Lines 18–24 introduce widows and orphans, figures who might well be mentioned in an elegy. But exactly what is Swift saying here about the relationship between Marlborough and widows and orphans?

ALEXANDER POPE

Alexander Pope (1688–1744), born in London of a middle-class family, from childhood onward was plagued with ill health, notably with curvature of the spine. His schooling was private and in fact he was largely self-taught. A child prodigy, the youth was recognized by some of the leading writers of the day, and he later formed notable friends, including Jonathan Swift. Pope also made notable enemies, many of whom he immortalized—like flies in amber—in his poetry.

Pope is one of the most quotable poets. If you have ever said, "A little learning is a dangerous thing," or "To err is human, to forgive divine," or "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread," or "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?," or "Hope springs eternal in the human breast"—to quote only a handful of examples—you have quoted Alexander Pope.

We give an epigram—a short, witty observation—which Pope engraved on the collar of a puppy that he gave to Frederick, Prince of Wales in 1736. Kew, just west of London, was the site of a royal palace.

Engraved on the Collar of a Dog which I gave to His Royal Highness

I am his Highness' dog at Kew;

Pray tell me sir, whose dog are you?

Figurative Language: Simile, Metaphor, Personification, Apostrophe

HIPPOLYTA. 'Tis strange, my Theseus, that these lovers speak of.

THESEUS. More strange than true. I never may believe

These antique fables, nor these fairy toys.

Lovers and madmen have such seething brains,

Such shaping fantasies, that apprehend

More than cool reason ever comprehends.

The lunatic, the lover, and the poet,

Are of imagination all compact.

One sees more devils than vast hell can hold,

That is the madman. The lover, all as frantic,

Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt.

The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,

Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;

And as imagination bodies forth

The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen

Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing

A local habitation and a name.

—Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream, 5.1–17

Theseus was neither the first nor the last to suggest that poets, like lunatics and lovers, freely employ their imagination. Terms such as poetic license and poetic justice imply that poets are free to depict a never-never land. One has only to leaf through any anthology of poetry to encounter numerous statements that are, from a logical point of view, lunacies. Here are two quotations:

Look like th' innocent flower,

But be the serpent under 't.

—Shakespeare

Each outcry from the hunted hare

A fiber from the brain does tear.

—William Blake

The first of these is spoken by Lady Macbeth, when she urges her husband to murder King Duncan. How can a human being "Look like th' innocent flower," and how can a human being "be the serpent"? But Macbeth knows, and we know exactly what she means. We see and we feel her point, in a way that we would not if she had said, "Put on an innocent-looking face, but in fact kill the king."

And in the quotation from Blake, when we read that the hunted hare's plaintive cry serves to "tear" a "fiber" from our brain, we almost wince, even though we know that the statement is literally untrue.

On a literal level, then, such assertions are nonsense (so, too, is Theseus's notion that reason is cool). But of course they are not to be taken literally; rather, they employ figures of speech—departures from logical usage that are aimed at gaining special effects. Consider the lunacies that Robert Burns heaps up here.

ROBERT BURNS

Robert Burns (1759–1796) was born in Ayrshire in southwestern Scotland. Many of his best poems and songs were written in the Scots dialect, though he also wrote perfect English.

A Red, Red Rose [1796]

O, my luve is like a red, red rose,

That's newly sprung in June.

O, my luve is like the melodie,

That's sweetly played in tune.

As fair art thou, my bonnie lass,
So deep in luve am I,
And I will luve thee still, my dear,
Till a'° the seas gang° dry.

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
And the rocks melt wi' the sun!
And I will luve thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.

And fare thee weel, my only luve,
And fare thee weel awhile!
And I will come again, my luve,
Though it were ten thousand mile!

To the charge that these lines are lunacies or untruths, at least two replies can be made. First, it might be said that the speaker is not really making assertions about a woman; he is saying he feels a certain way. His words, it can be argued, are not assertions about external reality but expressions of his state of mind, just as a tune one whistles asserts nothing about external reality but expresses the whistler's state of mind. In this view, the nonlogical language of poetry (like a groan of pain or an exclamation of joy) is an expression of emotion; its further aim, if it has one, is to induce in the hearer an emotion.

Second, and more to the point here, it can be said that nonlogical language does indeed make assertions about external reality, and even gives the reader an insight into this reality that logical language cannot. The opening comparison in Burns's poem ("my luve is like a red, red rose") brings before our eyes the lady's beauty in a way that the reasonable assertion "She is beautiful" does not. By comparing the woman to a rose, the poet invites us to see the woman through a special sort of lens: she is fragrant; her lips (and perhaps her cheeks) are like a rose in texture and color; she will not keep her beauty long. Also, "my love is like a red, red rose" says something different from "like a red, red beet," or "a red, red cabbage."

The poet, then, has not only communicated a state of mind but also discovered, through the lens of imagination, some things (both in the beloved and in the lover's own feelings) that interest us. The discovery is not world-shaking; it is less important than the discovery of America or the discovery that the meek are blessed, but it is a discovery and it leaves the reader with the feeling, "Yes, that's right. I hadn't quite thought of it that way, but that's right."

A poem, Robert Frost said, "assumes direction with the first line laid down, . . . runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion." What is clarified? In another sentence Frost gives an answer: "For me the initial delight is in the surprise of remembering something I didn't know I knew." John Keats made a similar statement: "Poetry . . . should strike the Reader as a wording of his own highest thoughts, and appear almost a Remembrance."

Some figures of speech are, in effect, riddling ways of speech. To call fishermen "farmers of the sea"—a metaphor—is to give a sort of veiled description of fishermen, bringing out, when the term is properly understood, certain aspects of a fisherman's activities. And a riddle, after all, is a veiled description—though intentionally obscure or deceptive—calling attention to characteristics, especially similarities, not usually noticed. (Riddle, like read, is from Old English redan, "to guess," "to interpret," and thus its solution provides knowledge.) "Two sisters upstairs, often looking but never seeing each other" is (after the riddle is explained) a way of calling attention to the curious fact that the eye, the instrument of vision, never sees its mate.

SYLVIA PLATH

Sylvia Plath (1932–1963) was born in Boston, the daughter of German immigrants. While still an undergraduate at Smith College, she published in Seventeen and Mademoiselle; but her years at college, like her later years, were marked by manic-depressive periods. After graduating from college, she went to England to study at Cambridge University, where she met the English poet Ted Hughes, whom she married in 1956. The marriage was unsuccessful, and they separated. One day she committed suicide by turning on the kitchen gas.

Metaphors [1960]

I'm a riddle in nine syllables,

An elephant, a ponderous house,

A melon strolling on two tendrils.

O red fruit, ivory, fine timbers!

This loaf's big with its yeasty rising.

Money's new-minted in this fat purse.

I'm a means, a stage, a cow in calf.

I've eaten a bag of green apples,

Boarded the train there's no getting off.

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The riddling speaker says that she is, among other things, "a ponderous house" and "a cow in calf." What is she?

SIMILE

In a simile, items from different classes are explicitly compared by a connective such as like, as, or than or by a verb such as appears or seems. (If the objects compared are from the same class—for example, "New York is like Chicago"—no simile is present.)

Sometimes I feel like a motherless child.

—Anonymous

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free.

The holy time is quiet as a Nun,

Breathless with adoration.

—Wordsworth

How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is

To have a thankless child.

—Shakespeare

Seems he a dove? His feathers are but borrowed.

—Shakespeare

RICHARD WILBUR

Richard Wilbur, born in New York City in 1921, was educated at Amherst and Harvard. He served in the army during World War II and in 1947 published The Beautiful Changes, a book of poems that reflected some of his experience in Europe. This book and subsequent books of poetry established his literary reputation, but probably his most widely known works are the lyrics that he wrote for Leonard Bernstein's musical version of Candide (1956). In 1987 the Library of Congress named him U.S. Poet Laureate.

A Simile for Her Smile [1950]

Your smiling, or the hope, the thought of it,
Makes in my mind such pause and abrupt ease
As when the highway bridgegates fall,
Balking the hasty traffic, which must sit
On each side massed and staring, while Deliberately the drawbridge starts to rise:
Then horns are hushed, the oilsmoke rarifies,
Above the idling motors one can tell
The packet's smooth approach, the slip,
Slip of the silken river past the sides,
The ringing of clear bells, the dip
And slow cascading of the paddle wheel.

U Topic for Critical Thinking and Writing

-The title may lead you to think that the poet will compare the woman's smile to something. But, in fact, the comparison is not between her smile and the passing scene. What is being compared to the traffic?

METAPHOR

A metaphor asserts the identity, without a connective such as like or a verb such as appears, of terms that are literally incompatible.

She is the rose, the glory of the day.

—Spenser

O western orb sailing the heaven.

—Whitman

Notice how in the second example only one of the terms ("orb") is stated; the other ("ship") is implied in "sailing."

JOHN KEATS

John Keats (1795–1821), son of a London stable keeper, was taken out of school when he was 15 and apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary. In 1816 he was licensed to practice as an apothecary-surgeon, but he almost immediately abandoned medicine and decided to make a career as a poet. His progress was amazing; he quickly moved from routine verse to major accomplishments, publishing books of poems—to mixed reviews—in 1817, 1818, and 1820, before dying of tuberculosis at the age of 25.

*On First Looking into Chapman's Homer [1816]

Much have I traveled in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been
Which bards in fealty to Apollo° hold.
Oft of one wide expanse have I been told
That deep-browed Homer ruled as his demesne;°
Yet did I never breathe its pure serene°
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold:
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken;
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In line 1, what do you think “realms of gold” stands for? Chapman was an Elizabethan; how does this fact add relevance to the metaphor in the first line?

2. -Does line 9 introduce a totally new idea, or can you somehow connect it to the opening metaphor?

Two types of metaphor deserve special mention. In metonymy, something is named that replaces something closely related to it; “City Hall,” for example, sometimes is used to stand for municipal authority. In the following passage James Shirley names certain objects (scepter and crown; scythe and spade), using them to replace social classes (royalty; agricultural labor) to which they are related:

Scepter and crown must tumble down

And in the dust be equal made

With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

In synecdoche, the whole is replaced by the part, or the part by the whole. For example, bread in “Give us this day our daily bread” replaces the whole class of edibles. Similarly, an automobile can be “wheels,” and workers are “hands.” Robert Frost was fond of calling himself “a Synecdochist” because he believed that it is the nature of poetry to “have intimations of something more than itself. It almost always comes under the head of synecdoche, a part, a hem of the garment for the whole garment.”

PERSONIFICATION

The attribution of human feelings or characteristics to abstractions or to inanimate objects is called personification.

But Time did beckon to the flowers, and they

By noon most cunningly did steal away.

—Herbert

Herbert attributes a human gesture to Time and shrewdness to flowers. Of all figures, personification most surely gives to airy nothings a local habitation and a name:

There’s Wrath who has learnt every trick of guerrilla warfare,

The shamming dead, the night-raid, the feinted retreat.

—Auden

Hope, thou bold taster of delight.

—Crashaw

The alarm clock meddling in somebody's sleep.

—Brooks

. . .neon script leering from the shuddering asphalt.

—Dove

In the next poem, the speaker, addressing a former mistress ("come let us kiss and part"), seems to grant that their love is over—is dying—and he personifies this love, this passion, as a person on his deathbed ("Now at last gasp of Love's latest breath"). Further, he surrounds the dying Love with two mourners, Faith, who is kneeling by Love's bed, and Innocence, who is closing Love's eyes. But notice that the poem takes a sudden twist at the end where, it seems, Love may not have to die.

MICHAEL DRAYTON

Michael Drayton (1563–1631) was born in Warwickshire in England a year before Shakespeare, and like Shakespeare he wrote sonnets. Among his other works is a long poem on the geography and local lore of England.

Since There's No Help [1619]

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part;
Nay, I have done, you get no more of me,
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart
That thus so cleanly I myself can free;
Shake hands for ever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.
Now at the last gasp of Love's latest breath,
When, his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies,
When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,

And Innocence is closing up his eyes, 12

Now if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,

From death to life you mightst him yet recover.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What do you think is the tone of lines 1–8? What words especially establish this tone? What do you think is the tone of lines 9–14?

2. -Some readers find the personifications in lines 9–13 a sign that the speaker is not deeply moved, and perhaps is putting on an act. Do you agree or not? Please explain.

APOSTROPHE

Crashaw's personification, "Hope, thou bold taster of delight," quoted a moment ago, is also an example of the figure of speech called apostrophe, an address to a person or thing not literally listening. Wordsworth begins a sonnet by apostrophizing John Milton:

Milton, thou shouldst be living at this hour,

And Shelley begins an ode by apostrophizing a skylark:

Hail to thee, blithe Spirit!

The following poem is largely built on apostrophe.

EDMUND WALLER

Edmund Waller (1606–1687), born into a country family of wealth in Buckinghamshire in England, attended Eton and Cambridge before spending most of his life as a member of parliament. When the Puritans came to power, he was imprisoned and eventually banished to France, although he was soon allowed to return to England. When the monarchy was restored to the throne, he returned to parliament.

Song [1645]

Go, lovely rose,

Tell her that wastes her time and me,

That now she knows,

When I resemble her to thee,

How sweet and fair she seems to be.
Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.
Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired:
Bid her come forth,
Suffer her self to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.
Then die, that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee,
How small a part of time they share,
That are so wondrous sweet and fair.

What conclusions, then, can we draw about figurative language? First, figurative language, with its literally incompatible terms, forces the reader to attend to the connotations (suggestions, associations) rather than to the denotations (dictionary definitions) of one of the terms.

Second, although figurative language is said to differ from ordinary discourse, it is found in ordinary discourse as well as in literature. "It rained cats and dogs," "War is hell," "Don't be a pig," and other tired figures are part of our daily utterances. But through repeated use, these (and most of the figures we use) have lost whatever impact they once had and are only a shade removed from expressions that, though once figurative, have become literal: the eye of a needle, a branch office, the face of a clock.

Third, good figurative language is usually (1) concrete, (2) condensed, and (3) interesting. The concreteness lends precision and vividness; when Keats writes that he felt "like some watcher of the skies / When a new planet swims into his ken," he more sharply characterizes his feelings than if he had said, "I felt excited." His simile isolates for us a precise kind of excitement, and the metaphoric "swims" vividly brings up the oceanic aspect of the sky. The second of these three qualities, condensation, can be seen by attempting to paraphrase some of the figures. A paraphrase or rewording will commonly use more words than the original and will have less impact—as the gradual coming of night usually has less impact on us than a sudden darkening of the sky, or as a prolonged push has less impact than a sudden blow. The third quality, interest, largely depends on the previous two: the successful figure often makes us open our eyes wider and take notice. Keats's "deep-browed Homer" arouses our interest in Homer as "thoughtful Homer" or "meditative Homer" does not. Similarly, when W. B. Yeats says (p. 867):

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
A tattered coat upon a stick, unless
Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing
For every tatter in its mortal dress,

the metaphoric identification of an old man with a scarecrow jolts us out of all our usual unthinking attitudes about old men as kind, happy folk content to have passed from youth to senior citizenship.

Finally, the point must be made that although figurative language is one of the poet's chief tools, a poem does not have to contain figures. The anonymous ballad "Edward" (p. 972) contains no figures, yet surely it is a poem, and no one would say that the addition of figures would make it a better poem.

Here is a poem by William Carlos Williams. Does it contain any figures of speech?

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

William Carlos Williams (1883–1963) was the son of an English traveling salesman and a Basque-Jewish woman. The couple met in Puerto Rico and settled in Rutherford, New Jersey, where Williams was born. He spent his life there, practicing as a pediatrician and writing poems in the moments between seeing patients who were visiting his office.

The following poems rely heavily on figures of speech.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892), the son of an English clergyman, was born in Lincolnshire, where he began writing verse at age 5. Educated at Cambridge, he had to leave without a degree when his father died and Alfred had to accept responsibility for bringing up his brothers and sisters. In fact, the family had inherited ample funds, but for some years the money was tied up by litigation. In 1850 Tennyson was made poet laureate following Wordsworth's death. With his government pension he moved with his family to the Isle of Wight, where he lived in vast comfort until his death.

The Eagle [1851]

Fragment

He clasps the crag with crooked hands;

Close to the sun in lonely lands,

Ringed with the azure world, he stands.

The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls:

He watches from his mountain walls, 5

And like a thunderbolt he falls.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What figure is used in line 1? In line 4? In line 6? Can it be argued that the figures give us a sense of the eagle that is not to be found in a literal description?

2. -In line 2 we get overstatement, or hyperbole, for the eagle is not really close to the sun. Suppose instead of "Close to the sun" Tennyson had written "Waiting on high"? Do you think the poem would be improved or worsened?

SEAMUS HEANEY

Seamus Heaney was born in Belfast, Northern Ireland, in 1939. He grew up on a farm, and then went to Queens University in Belfast. "Digging," the first poem in his first book, reveals his concern with getting to the bottom of things. Heaney, who now lives in Dublin, has lectured widely in Ireland, En-gland, and the United States. In addition to writing poetry, he has written essays about poetry. In 1995 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Digging [1966]

Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.
Under my window, a clean rasping sound
When the spade sinks into gravelly ground:
My father, digging, I look down
Till his straining rump among the flowerbeds
Bends low, comes up twenty years away
Stooping in rhythm through potato drills
Where he was digging.
The coarse boot nestled on the lug, the shaft
Against the inside knee was levered firmly.
He rooted out tall tops, buried the bright edge deep
To scatter new potatoes that we picked Loving their cool hardness in our hands.
By God, the old man could handle a spade.
Just like his old man.
My grandfather cut more turf in a day
Than any other man on Toner's bog.
Once I carried him milk in a bottle
Corked sloppily with paper. He straightened up

To drink it, then fell to right away

Nicking and slicing neatly, heaving sods

Over his shoulder, going down and down

For the good turf. Digging.

The cold smell of potato mould, the squelch and slap

Of soggy peat, the curt cuts of an edge

Through living roots awaken in my head.

But I've no spade to follow men like them.

Between my finger and my thumb

The squat pen rests.

I'll dig with it.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -The poem ends with the speaker saying that he will "dig" with his pen. Given all the preceding lines, what will he dig?

2. -The first lines compare the pen with a gun. What implications are suggested by this comparison?

To be made of it! To have it

It greases the palm, feathers a nest, holds heads above water,

makes both ends meet.

Money breeds money.

Gathering interest, compounding daily.

Always in circulation

Money. You don't know where it's been, but you put it where your mouth is.

And it talks.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Are any of the terms in the poem unfamiliar to you? If so, check a dictionary, and if you don't find an explanation in a dictionary, turn to other resources—the Internet, and friends and classmates. Do some of the terms come from particular worlds of discourse—for instance, banking, gambling, or drug-dealing?

2. -Suppose the last stanza had been placed first. Would the poem be better? Or worse? Why?

3. -Write a somewhat comparable poem on a topic of your choice—for instance, students, teachers, athletes, or work.

CRAIG RAINE

Born in England in 1945, Raine graduated from Oxford, where after his graduation he was appointed a lecturer. Since 1981 he has been poetry editor for the English publisher, Faber and Faber. He gives frequent readings of his poetry both in England and in America.

Much of his poetry, including the poem we reprint here, is designed to help the reader to see the world from a fresh point of view.

I have never seen one fly, but sometimes they perch on the hand.

and rests its soft machine on ground:
then the world is dim and bookish like engravings under tissue paper.
Rain is when the earth is television.
It has the property of making colours darker.

that snores when you pick it up.
If the ghost cries, they carry it to their lips and soothe it to sleep with sounds. And yet, they wake it up deliberately, by tickling with a finger.
Only the young are allowed to suffer in colour, with their eyelids shut.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

You will encounter Shakespeare (1564–1616) several times in this book—for instance, as the author of songs (Chapter 15), sonnets (Chapter 20), two tragedies (Chapter 30), and a comedy (Chapter 31).

Here we give one of his sonnets (probably written in the mid-1590s), in which he playfully rejects similes and other figures of speech. His contemporaries often compared a woman's hair to fine-spun gold, her lips to coral or to cherries, her cheeks to roses, her white breast to snow; when such a woman walked, she seemed to walk on air (the grass did not bend beneath her), and when she spoke, her voice was music. Shakespeare himself uses such figures in some of his poems and plays, but in this sonnet he praises his beloved by saying she does not need such figures.

Sonnet 130

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;

Coral is far more red than her lips' red;

If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;

If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head.

I have seen roses damasked, red and white,

But no such roses see I in her cheeks;

And in some perfumes is there more delight

Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.

I love to hear her speak, yet well I know

That music hath a far more pleasing sound;

I grant I never saw a goddess go;°

My mistress, when she walks, treads on the ground. 12

And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare°

As any she belied° with false compare.

Imagery and Symbolism

When we read the word “rose”—or, for that matter, “finger” or “thumb”—we may more or less call to mind a picture, an image. The term imagery is used to refer to whatever in a poem appeals to any of our sensations, including sensations of pressure and heat as well as of sight, smell, taste, touch, and sound.

Consider the opening lines of Seamus Heaney’s “Digging” (page 752):

Between my finger and my thumb

The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.

We may in our mind’s eye see a finger, thumb, and pen; and perhaps, stimulated by “squat,” we may almost feel the pen. Notice, too, that in Heaney’s line the pen is compared to a gun, so there is yet another image in the line. In short, images are the sensory content of the work, whether literal (the finger, thumb, and pen) or figurative (the gun, to which the pen is compared). Edmund Waller’s rose in “Go, Lovely Rose” (page 749) is an image that happens to be compared in the first stanza to a woman (“I resemble her to thee”); later in the poem this image comes to stand for “all things rare.” Yet we never forget that the rose is a rose, and that the poem is chiefly a revelation of the poet’s attitude toward his beloved.

If a poet says “my rose” and is speaking about a rose, we have an image, even though we do not have a figure of speech. If a poet says “my rose” and, we gather, is speaking not really or chiefly about a rose but about something else—let’s say the transience of beauty—we can say that the poet is using the rose as a symbol.

Some symbols are natural symbols, recognized as standing for something in particular even by people from different cultures. Rain, for instance, usually stands for fertility or the renewal of life. A forest often stands for mental darkness or chaos, a mountain for stability, a valley for a place of security, and so on. There are many exceptions, but by and large these meanings prevail.

Other symbols, however, are conventional symbols, which people have agreed to accept as standing for something other than themselves: A poem about the cross would probably be about Christianity. Similarly, the rose has long been a symbol for love. In Virginia Woolf's novel Mrs. Dalloway, the husband communicates his love by proffering this conventional symbol: "He was holding out flowers—roses, red and white roses. (But he could not bring himself to say he loved her; not in so many words.)" Objects that are not conventional symbols, however, also may give rise to rich, multiple, indefinable associations. The following poem uses the symbol of the rose, but uses it in a nontraditional way.

WILLIAM BLAKE

A biography of Blake, followed by three additional poems, appears on page 979.

The Sick Rose [1794]

O rose, thou are sick!
The invisible worm
That flies in the night
In the howling storm
Has found out thy bed
Of crimson joy,
And his dark secret love
Does thy life destroy.

One might argue that the worm is "invisible" (line 2) merely because it is hidden within the rose, but an "invisible worm / That flies in the night" is more than a long, slender, soft-bodied creeping animal; and a rose that has, or is, a "bed / Of crimson joy" is more than a gardener's rose.

Blake's worm and rose suggest things beyond themselves—a stranger, more vibrant world than the world we are usually aware of. Many readers find themselves half-thinking, for example, that the worm is male, the rose female, and that the poem is about the violation of virginity. Or that the poem is about the destruction of beauty: woman's beauty, rooted in joy, is destroyed by a power that feeds on her. But these interpretations are not fully satisfying: the poem presents a worm and a rose, and yet it is not merely about a worm and a rose. These objects resonate, stimulating our thoughts toward something else, but the something else is elusive, whereas it is not elusive in Burns's "A Red, Red Rose" (page 743).

A symbol, then, is an image so loaded with significance that it is not simply literal, and it does not simply stand for something else; it is both itself and something else that it richly suggests, a manifestation of something too complex or too elusive to be otherwise revealed. Blake's poem is about a blighted rose and at the same time about much more. In a symbol, as Thomas Carlyle wrote, "the Infinite is made to blend with the Finite, to stand visible, and as it were, attainable there." Probably it is not fanciful to say that the American slaves who sang "Joshua fought the battle of Jericho, / And the walls came tumbling down" were singing both about an ancient occurrence and about a new embodiment of the ancient, the imminent collapse of slavery in the nineteenth century. Not one or the other, but both: the present partook of the past, and the past partook of the present.

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born in a farmhouse in rural Long Island, New York, but was brought up in Brooklyn, then an independent city in New York. He attended public school for a few years (1825–1830), apprenticed as a printer in the 1830s, and then worked as a typesetter, journalist, and newspaper editor. In 1855 he published the first edition of a collection of his poems, Leaves of Grass, a book that he revised and published in one edition after another throughout the remainder of his life. During the Civil War he served as a volunteer nurse for the Union army.

In the third edition of Leaves of Grass (1860), Whitman added two groups of poems, one called "Children of Adam" and the other (named for an aromatic grass that grows near ponds and swamps) called "Calamus." "Children of Adam" celebrates heterosexual relations, whereas "Calamus" celebrates what Whitman called "manly love." Although many of the "Calamus" poems seem clearly homosexual, perhaps the very fact that Whitman published them made them seem relatively innocent; in any case, those nineteenth-century critics who condemned Whitman for the sexuality of his writing concentrated on the poems in "Children of Adam."

"I Saw in Louisiana" is from the "Calamus" section. It was originally published in the third edition of Leaves of Grass and was revised into its final form in the 1867 edition. We give it in the 1867 version. We also give the manuscript, showing it in its earliest extant version.

I Saw in Louisiana a Live-Oak Growing [1867]

I saw in Louisiana a live-oak growing,
All alone stood it and the moss hung down from the branches,
Without any companion it grew there uttering joyous leaves of dark green,
And its look, rude, unbending, lusty, made me think of myself,
But I wonder'd how it could utter joyous leaves standing alone there without its friend near, for I knew I could not,
And I broke off a twig with a certain number of leaves upon it, and twined around it a little moss,
And brought it away, and I have placed it in sight in my room,
It is not needed to remind me as of my own dear friends,
(For I believe lately I think of little else than of them,)
Yet it remains to me a curious token, it makes me think of manly love;
For all that, and though the live-oak glistens there in Louisiana solitary in a wide flat space, Uttering joyous leaves all its life without a friend a lover near,
I know very well I could not.

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

-Compare the final version (1867) of the poem with the manuscript version of 1860. Which version do you prefer? Why?

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834) was born in Devonshire in England, the son of a clergyman. He attended Christ's Hospital school in London and Cambridge University, which he left without receiving a degree. With his friend William Wordsworth in 1798 he published, anonymously, a volume of poetry, Lyrical Ballads, which became the manifesto of the Romantic movement.

Kubla Khan [1798]

Or, A Vision in a Dream. A Fragment.

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.
But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
A savage place! as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon-lover!
And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing
A mighty fountain momently was forced;
Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst
Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail:
And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever
It flung up momently the sacred river.
Five miles meandering with a mazy motion
Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,

Then reached the caverns measureless to man,
And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean:
And ’mid this tumult Kubla heard from far Ancestral voices prophesying war!
 The shadow of the dome of pleasure
 Floated midway on the waves;
 Where was heard the mingled measure
 From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device,
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!
 A damsel with a dulcimer
 In a vision once I saw:
 It was an Abyssinian maid,
 And on her dulcimer she played,
 Singing of Mount Abora.
 Could I revive within me
 Her symphony and song,
 To such a deep delight ’twould win me,
That with music loud and long,
I would build that dome in air,
That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
And all who heard should see them there,
And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
Weave a circle round him thrice,
And close your eyes with holy dread,
For he on honey-dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise.

When Coleridge published “Kubla Khan” in 1816, he prefaced it with this explanatory note:

> The following fragment is here published at the request of a poet of great and deserved celebrity, and, as far as the author’s own opinions are concerned, rather as a psychological curiosity, than on the ground of any supposed poetic merits.
> In the summer of the year 1797, the author, then in ill health, had retired to a lonely farmhouse between Porlock and Linton, on the Exmoor confines of Somerset and Devonshire. In consequence of a slight indisposition, an anodyne had been prescribed, from the effects of which he fell asleep in his chair at the moment that he was reading the following sentence, or words of the same substance, in Purchas’ Pilgrimage: “Here the Khan Kubla commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground were inclosed with a wall.” The author continued for about three hours in a profound sleep, at least of the external senses, during which time he has the most vivid confidence that he could not have composed less than from two to three hundred lines; if that indeed can be called composition in which all the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions, without any sensation or consciousness of effort. On awaking he appeared to himself to have a distinct recollection of the whole, and taking his pen, ink, and paper, instantly and eagerly wrote down the lines that are here preserved. At this moment he was unfortunately called out by a person on business from Porlock, and detained by him above an hour, and on his return to his room, found, to his no small surprise and mortification, that though he still retained some vague and dim recollection of the general purport of the vision, yet, with the exception of some eight or ten scattered lines and images, all the rest had passed away like the images on the surface of a stream into which a stone has been cast, but, alas! without the after restoration of the latter!

Then all the charm

Is broken—all that phantom world so fair
Vanishes, and a thousand circlets spread,
And each misshape[s] the other. Stay awhile,

Poor youth! who scarcely dar'st lift up thine eyes—

The stream will soon renew its smoothness, soon

The visions will return! And lo, he stays,

And soon the fragments dim of lovely forms

Come trembling back, unite, and now once more

The pool becomes a mirror.

—Coleridge, The Picture; or, the Lover's Resolution, lines 91–100

Yet from the still surviving recollections in his mind, the author has frequently purposed to finish for himself what had been originally, as it were, given to him. Σαμερου αϑιου αοω [today I shall sing more sweetly]: "But the tomorrow is yet to come."

1. -Coleridge changed the "palace" of his source into a "dome" (line 2). What do you think are the relevant associations of "dome"?

2. -What pairs of contrasts (e.g., underground river, fountain) do you find? What do you think they contribute to the poem?

3. -If Coleridge had not said that the poem is a fragment, might you take it as a complete poem, the first thirty-six lines describing the creative imagination, and the remainder lamenting the loss of poetic power?

FREDERICK MORGAN

Frederick Morgan was born in New York City in 1922. He attended private grammar and high schools, and then went on to receive his undergraduate degree from Princeton University. After serving in the army during World War II, he returned to New York City and in 1947 co-founded a literary journal, The Hudson Review. For the next twenty years he focused on his editorial work, but in response to the shock of his son's suicide in 1968 he turned to serious and sustained writing of poetry. His books of poetry include Poems of the Two Worlds (1977), Death Mother (1979), Northbrook (1982), and Poems: New and Selected (1987).

We reprint a poem about a painting of a horse, attributed to Han Gan (formerly called Han Kan), a Chinese painter of the eighth century who was famous for his paintings of horses belonging to the emperor. The white horse depicted here was named Night-Shining White, or Shining Light of Night, because his whiteness was said to illuminate the dark. (Many scholars believe that the painting is an old copy of a lost work by Han Gan, rather than an original.)

The Master [1986]

When Han Kan was summoned to the imperial capital
it was suggested he sit at the feet of the illustrious senior court painter to learn from the refinements of the art.
"No, thank you," he replied,
"I shall apprentice myself to the stables."
And he installed himself and his brushes amid the dung and the flies, and studied the horses—their bodies' keen alertness—eye-sparkle of one, another's sensitive stance, the way a third moved graceful in his bulk—and painted at last the emperor's favorite, the charger named "Nightshining White," whose likeness after centuries still dazzles.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Which does Morgan make you see more clearly, "the illustrious senior court painter" or "the stables"? Explain how and why.

2. -In the last line Morgan says that the painted "likeness" of the horse dazzles us. But the "likeness" to a live horse obviously is not very great in, say, the small legs, the disproportionately large head, and the up-standing mane. According to Morgan, Han Gan (the modern spelling for the painter whose name used to be spelled Han Kan) apprenticed himself to the stables (line 7), but does the painting reveal that he wasted his time? Explain.

3. -In the final line, what does “dazzles” mean? Why do you think Morgan ends the poem with this word?

4. -Morgan puts a space after lines 5, 7, 11, and 13. Explain what, if anything, these spaces do.

5. -Do you think the title of the poem is effective? Invent two other titles, and in two paragraphs indicate why they are better than or inferior to Morgan’s title.

CLAUDE McKAY

Claude McKay (1889–1948), born in Jamaica, briefly served as a police officer in Jamaica, published two books of dialect poems in 1912, and in the same year left Jamaica forever—although, as the poem we reprint shows, it remained a source of inspiration. In the United States he studied briefly at Tuskegee Institute, then for two years at Kansas State University, and then went to New York, writing poems and working on a radical journal, The Liberator. In 1922 he visited Russia, and from 1923 to 1934 he lived abroad, chiefly in France and North Africa, writing fiction and journalism as well as poetry. He returned to the United States, recanted his Communist beliefs, and in 1945 converted to Catholicism. He then wrote a good deal of prose and poetry that did not get published in his lifetime.

Although the earliest poems were in dialect, McKay quickly repudiated such diction; his later work uses traditional diction and traditional British poetic forms (here, three quatrains, with alternating rhymes), in contrast to the vernacular language used by his contemporary, Langston Hughes.

The Tropics in New York [1922]

Bananas ripe and green, and ginger-root,
Cocoa in pods and alligator pears,
And tangerines and mangoes and grape fruit,
Fit for the highest prize at parish fairs,
Set in the window, bringing memories
Of fruit-trees laden by low-singing rills,
And dewy dawns, and mystical blue skies
In benediction over nun-like hills.

My eyes grew dim, and I could no more gaze;

A wave of longing through my body swept,

And, hungry for the old, familiar ways,

I turned aside and bowed my head and wept. 12

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Describe as fully as possible the effect of the details given in the first three lines. What kind of basis or foundation do these details establish for the rest of the poem?

2. -What is the purpose of the religious terms and images that the poet uses?

3. -Is the poem sentimental? (On sentimentality, see page 1822.) If it is sentimental, is that a bad thing? Why, or why not?

I put on the body-armor of black rubber 5

the absurd flippers

the grave and awkward mask.

I am having to do this not like Cousteau° with his assiduous team aboard the sun-flooded schooner but here alone.

There is a ladder.
The ladder is always there hanging innocently close to the side of the schooner.
We know what it is for,
we who have used it.
Otherwise
it’s a piece of maritime floss
some sundry equipment.
I go down.
Rung after rung and still the oxygen immerses me
the blue light
the clear atoms
of our human air.
I go down.
My flippers cripple me,
I crawl like an insect down the ladder and there is no one to tell me when the ocean will begin.
First the air is blue and then it is bluer and then green and then black I am blacking out and yet

my mask is powerful

it pumps my blood with power

the sea is another story

the sea is not a question of power

I have to learn alone to turn my body without force in the deep element.

And now: it is easy to forget what I came for among so many who have always lived here

swaying their crenellated fans between the reefs

and besides

you breathe differently down here.

I came to explore the wreck.

The words are purposes.

The words are maps.

I came to see the damage that was done and the treasures that prevail.

I stroke the beam of my lamp slowly along the flank of something more permanent than fish or weed

the thing I came for:

the wreck and not the story of the wreck

the thing itself and not the myth

the drowned face always staring toward the sun

the evidence of damage

worn by salt and sway into this threadbare beauty

the ribs of the disaster

curving their assertion among the tentative haunters.

This is the place.

And I am here, the mermaid whose dark hair streams black, the merman in his armored body

We circle silently

about the wreck

we dive into the hold.

I am she: I am he whose drowned face sleeps with open eyes whose breasts still bear the stress whose silver, copper, vermeil cargo lies obscurely inside barrels

half-wedged and left to rot

we are the half-destroyed instruments that once held to a course

the water-eaten log

the fouled compass

We are, I am, you are

by cowardice or courage

the one who find our way back to this scene

carrying a knife, a camera

a book of myths

in which our names do not appear.

Christina Rossetti

Christina Rossetti (1830–1894) was the daughter of an exiled Italian patriot who lived in London and the sister of the poet and painter Dante Gabriel Rossetti. After her father became an invalid, she led an extremely ascetic life, devoting most of her life to doing charitable work. Her first and best-known volume of poetry, Goblin Market and Other Poems, was published in 1862.

Uphill [1858]

Does the road wind uphill all the way?

Yes, to the very end.

Will the day's journey take the whole long day?

From morn to night, my friend.

But is there for the night a resting-place?

A roof for when the slow dark hours begin.

May not the darkness hide it from my face?

You cannot miss that inn.

Shall I meet other wayfarers at night?

Those who have gone before.

Then must I knock, or call when just in sight?

They will not keep you standing at that door.

Shall I find comfort, travel-sore and weak?

Of labor you shall find the sum.

Will there be beds for me and all who seek?

Yea, beds for all who come.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Suppose that someone told you this poem is about a person preparing to go on a hike. The person is supposedly making inquiries about the road and the possible hotel arrangements. What would you reply?

2. -Who is the questioner? A woman? A man? All human beings collectively? “Uphill” does not use quotation marks to distinguish between two speakers. Can one say that in “Uphill” the questioner and the answerer are the same person?

3. -Are the answers unambiguously comforting? Or can it, for instance, be argued that the “roof” is (perhaps among other things) the lid of a coffin—hence the questioner will certainly not be kept “standing at that door”? If the poem can be read along these lines, is it chilling rather than comforting?

WALLACE STEVENS

Wallace Stevens (1879–1955), educated at Harvard and at New York Law School, earned his living as a lawyer and an insurance executive; at his death he was a vice president of the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company. While pursuing this career, however, he also achieved distinction as a poet, and today he is widely regarded as among the most important American poets of the twentieth century.

Anecdote of the Jar [1923]

I placed a jar in Tennessee,
And round it was, upon a hill.
It made the slovenly wilderness Surround that hill.
The wilderness rose up to it,
And sprawled around, no longer wild.
The jar was round upon the ground
And tall and of a port in air.
It took dominion everywhere.
The jar was gray and bare.
It did not give of bird or bush,

Like nothing else in Tennessee. 12

Stevens asked for an interpretation of another poem, said (in The Explicator, November 1948): "Things that have their origin in the imagination or in the emotions (poems) . . . very often take on a form that is ambiguous or uncertain. It is not possible to attach a single, rational meaning to such things without destroying the imaginative or emotional ambiguity or uncertainty that is inherent in them and that is why poets do not like to explain. That the meanings given by others are sometimes meanings not intended by the poet or that were never present in his mind does not impair them as meanings."

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What is the meaning of line 8? Check "port" in a dictionary.
2. -Do you think the poem suggests that the jar organizes slovenly nature, or that the jar impoverishes abundant nature? Or both, or neither? What do you think of the view that the jar is a symbol of the imagination, or of the arts, or of material progress?

The Emperor of Ice-Cream [1923]

Call the roller of big cigars,
The muscular one, and bid him whip
In kitchen cups concupiscent curds.
Let the wenches dawdle in such dress
As they are used to wear, and let the boys
Bring flowers in last month's newspapers.
Let be be finale of seem.
The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.
Take from the dresser of deal,°
Lacking the three glass knobs, that sheet
On which she embroidered fantails once
And spread it so as to cover her face.
If her horny feet protrude, they come

To show how cold she is, and dumb.

Let the lamp affix its beam.

The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.

9 deal fir or pine wood.

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

-What associations does the word “emperor” have for you? The word “ice-cream”? What, then, do you make of “the emperor of ice-cream”? The poem describes the preparations for a wake, and in line 15 (“Let the lamp affix its beam”) it insists on facing the reality of death. In this context, then, what do you make of the last line of each stanza?

EDGAR ALLAN POE

Edgar Allan Poe (1809–1849) was the son of traveling actors. His father abandoned the family almost immediately after his birth, and his mother died when Poe was two. The child was adopted—though never legally—by a prosperous merchant and his wife in Richmond. The tensions were great, aggravated by Poe’s drinking and heavy gambling, and in 1827 Poe left Richmond for Boston. He wrote, served briefly in the army, attended West Point but left within a year, and became an editor for the remaining eighteen years of his life. It was during these years, too, that he wrote the poems, essays, and fiction—especially detective stories and horror stories—that have made him famous.

To Helen [1831–1843]*

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean° barks of yore,
That gently, o’er a perfumed sea,
The weary, way-worn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.5
On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth hair,° thy classic face
Thy Naiad° airs have brought me home

To the glory that was Greece

And the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo! in yon brilliant window-niche

How statue-like I see thee stand!

The agate lamp within thy hand

Ah! Psyche,° from the regions which

Are Holy Land!°

7 hyacinth hair naturally curling hair, like that of Hyacinthus, beautiful Greek youth beloved by Apollo. 8 Naiad a nymph associated with lakes and streams. 14 Psyche Greek for "soul." 15 Holy Land ancient Rome or Athens, i.e., a sacred realm of art.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In the first stanza, to what is Helen's beauty compared? To whom does the speaker apparently compare himself? What does "way-worn" in line 4 suggest to you? To what in the speaker's experience might the "native shore" in line 5 correspond?

2. -What do you take "desperate seas" to mean in line 6, and who has been traveling them? To what are they contrasted in line 8? How does "home" seem to be defined in this stanza (stanza 2)?

3. -What further light is shed on the speaker's home or destination in stanza 3?

4. -Do you think that "To Helen" can be a love poem and also a poem about spiritual beauty or about the love of art? Why or why not?

HERMAN MELVILLE

Herman Melville (1819–1891) was born into a prosperous family in New York City. The bankruptcy and death of his father when Melville was 12 forced the boy to leave school. During his early years he worked first as a bank clerk, then as a farm laborer, then as a store clerk and a bookkeeper, and then as a schoolmaster. In 1837 he sailed to England as a cabin boy and signed on for other voyages, notably on whalers in the South Pacific, where he spent time in the Marquesas Islands and Tahiti. Out of his marine adventures he produced commercially successful books, Typee (1846), Omoo (1847), Mardi (1849), and Redburn (1849), but the book for which he is best known today, Moby Dick (1851), was a commercial failure. In 1866 a book of poems about the Civil War—we print one of the poems here—was published, but it, too, was a failure. Abandoning his attempt to live by his pen, Melville survived on some inherited money, and on a political appointment as a customs inspector in New York City.

DuPont's Round Fight [1866]*

(November, 1861)

In time and measure perfect moves
    All Art whose aim is sure;
Evolving rhyme and stars divine
                                Have rules, and they endure.4

Nor less the Fleet that warred for Right,
    And, warring so, prevailed,
In geometric beauty curved,
                                And in an orbit sailed.8

The rebel at Port Royal felt
    The Unity overawe,
And rued the spell. A type was here,
                                And victory of LAW.12

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In the first stanza Melville says that all art is characterized by "measure." Take any art in which you have some interest—poetry, potting, dancing, music, whatever—and explain in an essay of 250 words how "measure" is essential.

2. -In the third line Melville says that the stars no less than poems "have rules." What is he getting at?

3. -Check a dictionary for the various meanings of "type," and see which meaning best fits line 11.

Neutral Tones [1898]

We stood by a pond that winter day,
And the sun was white, as though chidden of God,
And a few leaves lay on the starving sod;
—They had fallen from an ash, and were gray.4

Your eyes on me were as eyes that rove
Over tedious riddles of years ago;
And some words played between us to and fro
On which lost the more by our love.8

The smile on your mouth was the deadest thing
Alive enough to have strength to die;
And a grin of bitterness swept thereby
Like an ominous bird a-wing. . . .12

Since then, keen lessons that love deceives,
And wrings with wrong, have shaped to me
Your face, and the God-cursed sun, and a tree,
And a pond edged with grayish leaves.16

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In a sentence or two, summarize the story implicit in the poem. What has happened between the time of the episode narrated and the time of this utterance?

2. -Do you think that the speaker is actually addressing the woman, or is he recollecting her and addressing her image? Or does it matter?

3. -Why do you think that “keen lessons that love deceives” always remind the speaker of this scene?

4. -Characterize, in a sentence or two, the speaker’s state of mind in the first stanza. Is he composed, or agitated? Bitter, or meditative? Or what? Next, characterize his mind as it seems to be revealed in the final stanza.

A NOTE ON HAIKU

One form of poetry that puts a great emphasis on sharp images is the haiku, a Japanese poem of seventeen syllables, arranged in three lines of five, seven, and five syllables. Japanese poetry is unrhymed, but English versions sometimes rhyme the first and third lines. The subject matter can be high or low—the Milky Way or the screech of automobile brakes—but usually it is connected with the seasons, and it is described objectively and sharply. Most haiku set forth a sense of where, what, and when—but the when may be implicit, as in the first haiku.

MORITAKE (1452–1540)

Fallen petals rise

Translated by Harold G. Henderson

Fallen petals rise

back to the branch—I watch

oh . . . butterflies!

Concentrating his attention on the phenomenon (butterflies moving upward), the poet nevertheless conveys an emotion through the images (wonder, and then the recognition of the familiar), stirring the reader's imagination to supply the emotion that completes the experience.

RICHARD WRIGHT

Richard Wright (1908–1960), the grandson of a slave, was born on a cotton plantation near Natchez, Mississippi. He dropped out of school after completing the ninth grade, took a variety of odd jobs, and in 1927 moved to Chicago, where he served as a director of the Federal Negro Theater. In 1939 he became the Harlem editor of The Daily Worker, a communist newspaper in New York, and in the following year he published Native Son, the first book by an African-American author to reach a wide white audience. Wright and his family moved to Paris in 1947, where they lived until he suffered a fatal heart attack.

Four Haiku

A balmy spring wind
Reminding me of something
I cannot recall.

The green cockleburrs
Caught in the thick wooly hair
Of the black boy's head.

Standing in the field,
I hear the whispering of Snowflake to snowflake.

It is September
The month in which I was born,
And I have no thoughts.

Writing a Haiku

Although the haiku originated in Japan, it is now written throughout the world.

For a start, you may want to take some ordinary experience—tying your shoelaces, seeing a cat at the foot of the stairs, glancing out of a window and seeing unexpected snowflakes, hearing the alarm clock—and present it interestingly. One way to make it interesting is to construct the poem in two parts—the first line balanced against the next two lines, or the first two lines balanced against the last line. If you construct a poem on this principle, the two sections should be related to each other, but they should also in some degree make a contrast with each other. For instance, in the following poem by Taigi, there is a contrast between pleasant sociability (the first two lines) and loneliness (the last line).

TAIGI (1723–1776)

Look, O look, there go

Translated by Kenneth Yasuda

"Look, O look, there go

Fireflies," I would like to say—

But I am alone.

Basho said, "He who creates three to five haiku during a lifetime is a haiku poet. He who attains to ten is a master."

Cyber-Haiku

It has come to our attention that students have enjoyed composing haiku as substitutes for Microsoft's error messages. Here are two examples:

First snow, then silence.

This thousand-dollar screen dies

So beautifully.

A crash reduces

Your expensive computer

To a simple stone.

Why not try your hand at something on this topic?

In Chapter 27 (page 962) we reprint additional haiku and we offer suggestions about translating them.

Walt Whitman

Walt Whitman

Walt Whitman, "I Saw in Louisiana a Live-Oak Growing," manuscript of 1860. On the first leaf, in line 3 Whitman deleted "with." On the second leaf (see page 760), in the third line (line 8 of the printed text) he added, with a caret, “lately.” In the sixth line on this leaf he deleted “I write these pieces, and name them after it,” replacing the deletion with “it makes me think of manly love.” In the next line he deleted “tree” and inserted “live oak.” When he reprinted the poem in the 1867 version of Leaves of Grass, he made further changes, as you will see if you compare the printed text with this manuscript version.

Irony

There is a kind of discourse which, though nonliteral, need not use similies, metaphors, apostrophes, personification, or symbols. Without using these figures, speakers may say things that are not to be taken literally. They may, in short, employ irony.

In Greek comedy, the eiron was the sly underdog who, by dissembling inferiority, outwitted his opponent. As Aristotle puts it, irony (employed by the eiron) is a "pretense tending toward the underside" of truth. Later, Cicero somewhat altered the meaning of the word: He defined it as saying one thing and meaning another, and he held that Socrates, who feigned ignorance and let his opponents entrap themselves in their own arguments, was the perfect example of an ironist.

In verbal irony, as the term is now used, what is stated is in some degree negated by what is suggested. A classic example is Lady Macbeth's order to get ready for King Duncan's visit: "He that's coming / Must be provided for." The words seem to say that she and Macbeth must busy themselves with household preparations so that the king may be received in appropriate style, but this suggestion of hospitality is undercut by an opposite meaning: preparations must be made for the murder of the king. Two other examples of verbal irony are Melville's comment and the lover's assertion (in Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress") that

What like a bullet can undeceive!

The grave's a fine and private place,

But none, I think, do there embrace.

Under Marvell's cautious words ("I think") we detect a wryness; the understatement masks yet reveals a deep-felt awareness of mortality and the barrenness of the grave. The self-mockery in this understatement proclaims modesty, but suggests assurance. The speaker here, like most ironists, is both playful and serious at once. Irony packs a great deal into a few words.* What we call irony here, it should be mentioned, is often called sarcasm, but a distinction can be made: sarcasm is notably contemptuous and crude or heavy-handed ("You're a great guy, a real friend," said to a friend who won't lend you ten dollars). Sarcasm is only one kind of irony, and a kind almost never found in literature.

Overstatement (hyperbole), like understatement, is ironic when it contains a contradictory suggestion:

For Brutus is an honorable man;

So are they all, all honorable men.

The sense of contradiction that is inherent in verbal irony is also inherent in a paradox. Paradox has several meanings for philosophers, but we need only be concerned with its meaning of an apparent contradiction. In Gerard Manley Hopkins's "Spring and Fall: To a Young Child" (page 733), there is an apparent contradiction in the assertions that Margaret is weeping for the woods (line 2) and for herself (line 15), but the contradiction is not real: both the woods and Margaret are parts of the nature blighted by Adam's sin. Other paradoxes are

The child is father of the man;

—Wordsworth

and (on the soldiers who died to preserve the British Empire)

The saviors come not home tonight;

Themselves they could not save;

—Housman

and

One short sleep past, we wake eternally,

And Death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

—Donne

Donne's lines are a reminder that paradox is not only an instrument of the poet. Christianity embodies several paradoxes: God became a human being; through the death on the cross, human beings can obtain eternal life; human beings do not live fully until they die.

Some critics have put a high premium on ironic and paradoxical poetry. Briefly, their argument runs that great poetry recognizes the complexity of experience, and that irony and paradox are ways of doing justice to this complexity. I. A. Richards uses "irony" to denote "The bringing in of the opposite, the complementary impulses," and suggests (in The Principles of Literary Criticism) that irony in this sense is a characteristic of poetry of "the highest order." It is dubious that all poets must always bring in the opposite, but it is certain that much poetry is ironic and paradoxical.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822) was born in Sussex in England, the son of a prosperous country squire. Educated at Eton, he went on to Oxford but was expelled for having written a pamphlet supporting a belief in atheism. Like John Keats he was a member of the second generation of English romantic poets. (The first generation included Wordsworth and Coleridge.) And like Keats, Shelley died young; he was drowned during a violent storm off the coast of Italy while sailing with a friend.

Ozymandias [1817]

I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert . . . Near them, on the sand,
Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
The hand that mocked them, and the heart that fed:
And on the pedestal these words appear:
"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

Lines 4–8 are somewhat obscure, but the gist is that the passions—still evident in the "shattered visage"—survive the sculptor's hand that "mocked"—that is, (1) imitated or copied, (2) derided—them, and the passions also survive the king's heart that had nourished them.

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

There is an irony of plot here: Ozymandias believed that he created enduring works, but his intentions came to nothing. However, another irony is also present: How are his words, in a way he did not intend, true?

ANDREW MARVELL

Born in 1621 near Hull in England, Marvell attended Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated in 1638. During the English Civil War he was tutor to the daughter of Sir Thomas Fairfax in Yorkshire at Nun Appleton House, where most of his best-known poems were written. In 1657 he was appointed assistant to John Milton, the Latin Secretary for the Commonwealth. After the Restoration of the monarchy in 1659, Marvell represented Hull as a member of parliament until his death. Most of his poems were not published until after his death in 1678.

To His Coy Mistress [1681]

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
Should'st rubies find: I by the tide
Of Humber would complain.° I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews.
My vegetable° love should grow

Vaster than empires, and more slow.
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze:
Two hundred to adore each breast:
But thirty thousand to the rest.
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.
For, lady, you deserve this state,
Nor would I love at lower rate.
But at my back I always hear Time's winged chariot hurrying near;
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found,
Nor in thy marble vault shall sound
My echoing song; then worms shall try
That long preserved virginity,
And your quaint honor turn to dust,
And into ashes all my lust.
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.
Now therefore, while the youthful hue
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
And while thy willing soul transpires
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like am'rous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour,

Than languish in his slow-chapt° power,
Let us roll all our strength, and all
Our sweetness, up into one ball;
And tear our pleasures with rough strife
Thorough° the iron gates of life.
Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still, yet we will make him run.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Do you find the assertions in lines 1–20 so inflated that you detect behind them a playfully ironic tone? Explain. Why does the speaker say, in line 8, that he would love "ten years before the Flood," rather than merely "since the Flood"?
2. -Explain lines 21–24. Why is time behind the speaker, and eternity in front of him? Is this "eternity" the same as the period discussed in lines 1–20? What do you make of the change in the speaker's tone after line 20?
3. -Do you agree with the comment on page 777 about the understatement in lines 31–32? What more can you say about these lines, in context?
4. -Why "am'rous birds of prey" (line 38) rather than the conventional doves? Is the idea of preying continued in the poem?
5. -Try to explain the last two lines, and characterize the speaker's tone. Do you find these lines anticlimactic?
6. -The poem is organized in the form of an argument. Trace the steps.

JOHN DONNE

John Donne (1572–1631) was born into a Roman Catholic family in England, but in the 1590s he abandoned that faith. In 1615 he became an Anglican priest and soon was known as a great preacher. Of his sermons 160 survive, including one with the famous line, "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less . . . ; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee." From 1621 until his death, Donne was dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. His love poems (often bawdy and cynical) are said to be his early work, and his "Holy Sonnets" (among the greatest religious poems written in English) his later work.

Holy Sonnet XIV [1633]

Batter my heart, three-personed God; for you
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
Your force, to break, blow, burn, and make me new.
I, like an usurped town, to another due,
Labor to admit you, but oh, to no end,
Reason, your viceroy in me, me should defend,
But is captived, and proves weak or untrue.
Yet dearly I love you, and would be loved fain,
But am betrothed unto your enemy:
Divorce me, untie, or break that knot again,
Take me to you, imprison me, for I
Except you enthrall me, never shall be free,
Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Explain the paradoxes in lines 1, 3, 13, and 14. Explain the double meanings of "enthrall" (line 13) and "ravish" (line 14).

2. -In lines 1–4, what is God implicitly compared to (considering especially lines 2 and 4)? How does this comparison lead into the comparison that dominates lines 5–8? What words in lines 9–12 are especially related to the earlier lines?

3. -What do you think is gained by piling up verbs in lines 2–4?

4. -Do you find sexual references irreverent in a religious poem? (As already mentioned, Donne was an Anglican priest.)

LANGSTON HUGHES

Other poems by Langston Hughes (1902–1967) appear on pages 943–949. A biography and more of his poems appear in Chapter 26.

Dream Boogie [1951]

Good morning, daddy!
Ain't you heard
The boogie-woogie rumble
Of a dream deferred?
Listen closely:
You'll hear their feet
Beating out and beating out a—
You think
It's a happy beat?
Listen to it closely:
Ain't you heard something underneath like a—
What did I say?
Sure,
I'm happy!
Take it away!
Hey, pop!
Re-bop!
Mop!

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What is boogie, or boogie-woogie?
2. -Why did many whites assume that boogie was "a happy beat" (line 9)? In fact, what was boogie chiefly an expression of?
3. -Why does Hughes in lines 33–34 quote part of the Pledge of Allegiance?

MARTÍN ESPADA

Martín Espada was born in Brooklyn in 1957. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Wisconsin and a law degree from Northeastern University. He is now an associate professor of English at the University of Massachusetts (Amherst).

Tony Went to the Bodega* but He Didn't Buy Anything [1987]

para Angel Guadalupe

and the Long Island city projects, leaving a mongrel-skinny puertorriqueño boy nine years old who had to find work.
Makengo the Cuban
let him work at the bodega.
In grocery aisles
he learned the steps of the dry-mop mambo, banging the cash register
like piano percussion
in the spotlight of Machito's orchestra, polite with the abuelas° who bought on credit, practicing the grin on customers he'd seen Makengo grin with his bad yellow teeth.
Tony left the projects too,
with a scholarship for law school.
But he cursed the cold primavera° in Boston;
the cooking of his neighbors left no smell in the hallway and no one spoke Spanish (not even the radio).
So Tony walked without a map
through the city,
a landscape of hostile condominiums and the darkness of white faces, sidewalk-searcher lost

till he discovered the projects.
Tony went to the bodega
but he didn't buy anything:
he sat by the doorway satisfied to watch la gente° (people island-brown as him) crowd in and out, hablando español,° thought: this is beautiful, and grinned
his bodega grin.
This is a rice and beans success story:
today Tony lives on Tremont Street,
above the bodega.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Why do you suppose Espada included the information about Tony's father? The information about young Tony "practicing" a grin?
2. -Why does Tony leave?
3. -How would you characterize Tony?

Love Is Not All: It Is Not Meat nor Drink [1931]

Love is not all: it is not meat nor drink
Nor slumber nor a roof against the rain;
Nor yet a floating spar to men that sink
And rise and sink and rise and sink again;
Love can not fill the thickened lung with breath,
Nor clean the blood, nor set the fractured bone;
Yet many a man is making friends with death
Even as I speak, for lack of love alone.
It well may be that in a difficult hour,
Pinned down by pain and moaning for release,
Or nagged by want past resolution's power,
I might be driven to sell your love for peace,
Or trade the memory of this night for food.
It well may be. I do not think I would.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -"Love Is Not All" is a sonnet. Using your own words, briefly summarize the argument of the octet (the first 8 lines). Next, paraphrase the sestet (the six lines from line 9 through line 14), line by line. On the whole, does the sestet repeat the idea of the octet, or does it add a new idea? Whom did you imagine to be speaking the octet? What does the sestet add to your knowledge of the speaker and the occasion? (And how did you paraphrase line 11?)

2. -The first and last lines of the poem consist of words of one syllable, and both lines have a distinct pause in the middle. Do you imagine the lines to be spoken in the same tone of voice? If not, can you describe the difference and account for it?

3. -Lines 7 and 8 appear to mean that the absence of love can be a cause of death. To what degree do you believe that to be true?

4. -Would you call "Love Is Not All" a love poem? Why or why not? Describe the kind of person who might include the poem in a love letter or valentine, or who would be happy to receive it. (One of our friends recited it at her wedding. What do you think of that idea?)

SHERMAN ALEXIE

The short-story writer, essayist, poet, and film director Sherman J. Alexie Jr., was born in October 1966 and was raised on the Spokane Indian Reservation in Wellpinit, Washington, located fifty miles northwest of Spokane. He went to high school off reservation in Reardan, Washington, where he was an excellent student and played on the basketball team. He attended Gonzaga University in Spokane for two years and then transferred to Washington State University in Pullman. There, he began writing poetry, graduating with a degree in American Studies. His books include The Business of Fancydancing: Stories and Poems (1992), The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven (1994), and Reservation Blues (1995).

HENRY REED

Born in Birmingham, England, Henry Reed (1914–1986) served in the British army during the Second World War. Later, in civilian life he had a distinguished career as a journalist, a translator of French and Italian literature, a writer of radio plays, and a poet.

"Naming of Parts" draws on his experience as a military recruit.

Naming of Parts [1946]

Today we have naming of parts. Yesterday,
We had daily cleaning. And tomorrow morning,
We shall have what to do after firing. But today,
Today we have naming of parts. Japonica
Glistens like coral in all of the neighboring gardens,
And today we have naming of parts.
This is the lower sling swivel. And this Is the upper sling swivel, whose use you will see,
When you are given your slings. And this is the piling swivel,
Which in your case you have not got. The branches
Hold in the gardens their silent, eloquent gestures,
Which in our case we have not got.
This is the safety-catch, which is always released
With an easy flick of the thumb. And please do not let me See anyone using his finger. You can do it quite easy
If you have any strength in your thumb. The blossoms
Are fragile and motionless, never letting anyone see
Any of them using their finger.
And this you can see is the bolt. The purpose of this Is to open the breech, as you see. We can slide it Rapidly backwards and forwards: we call this Easing the spring. And rapidly backwards and forwards
The early bees are assaulting and fumbling the flowers:

They call it easing the Spring.

They call it easing the Spring: it is perfectly easy

If you have any strength in your thumb: like the bolt,

And the breech, and the cocking-piece, and the point of balance,

Which in our case we have not got; and the almond-blossom

Silent in all of the gardens and the bees going backwards and forwards,

For today we have naming of parts.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -How many speakers do you hear in the poem? How would you characterize each of them?

2. -Why do we include this poem in a chapter on “irony”?

*A word of caution: We have been talking about verbal irony, not irony of situation. Like ironic words, ironic situations have in them an element of contrast. A clown whose heart is breaking must make his audience laugh; an author’s worst book is her only financial success; a fool solves a problem that vexes the wise.

Rhythm and Versification

Up and down the City Road,

In and out the Eagle;

That's the way the money goes,

Pop goes the weasel.

Probably very few of the countless children—and adults—who sometimes find themselves singing this ditty have the faintest idea of what it is about. It endures because it is catchy—a strong, easily remembered rhythm. Even if you just read it aloud without singing it, we think you will agree.

If you try to specify exactly what the rhythm is—for instance, by putting an accent mark on each syllable that you stress heavily—you may run into difficulties. You may become unsure of whether you stress up and down equally; maybe you will decide that up is hardly stressed more than and, at least compared with the heavy stress that you put on down. Different readers (really, singers) will recite it differently. Does this mean that anything goes? Of course not. No one will emphasize and or the, just as no one will emphasize the second syllable in city or the second syllable in money. There may be some variations from reader to reader, but there will also be a good deal that all readers will agree on. And surely all readers agree that it is memorable.

Does this song have a meaning? Well, historians say that the Eagle was a tavern and music hall in the City Road, in Victorian London. People went there to eat, drink, and sing, with the result that they sometimes spent too much money and then had to pawn (or "pop") the "weasel"—though no one is sure what the weasel is. It doesn't really matter; the song lives by its rhythm.

Now consider this poem by Ezra Pound (1885–1972). Pound's early work is highly rhythmical; later he became sympathetic to Fascism and he grew increasingly anti-Semitic, with the result that for many readers his later work is much less interesting—just a lot of nasty ideas, rather than memorable expressions. Pound ought to have remembered his own definition of literature: “Literature is news that stays news.” One way of staying is to use unforgettable rhythms.

EZRA POUND

An Immorality [1919]

Sing we for love and idleness,
Naught else is worth the having.
Though I have been in many a land,
There is naught else in living.
And I would rather have my sweet,
Though rose-leaves die of grieving,
Than do high deeds in Hungary
To pass all men’s believing.

A good poem. To begin with, it sings; as Pound said, “Poetry withers and dries out when it leaves music, or at least imagined music, too far behind it. Poets who are not interested in music are, or become, bad poets.” Hymns and ballads, it must be remembered, are songs, and other poetry, too, is sung, especially by children. Children reciting a counting-out rhyme, or singing on their way home from school, are enjoying poetry:

Pease-porridge hot,
Pease-porridge cold,
Pease-porridge in the pot
Nine days old.

Nothing very important is being said, but for generations children have enjoyed the music of these lines, and adults, too, have recalled them with pleasure—though few people know what pease-porridge is.

The “music”—the catchiness of certain sounds—should not be underestimated. Here are lines chanted by the witches in Macbeth:

Double, double, toil and trouble;

Fire burn and cauldron bubble.

This is rather far from words that mean approximately the same thing: “Twice, twice, work and care; / Fire ignite, and pot boil.” The difference is more in the sounds than in the instructions. What is lost in the paraphrase is the magic, the incantation, which resides in elaborate repetitions of sounds and stresses.

Rhythm (most simply, in English poetry, stresses at regular intervals) has a power of its own. A good march, said John Philip Sousa (the composer of “Stars and Stripes Forever”), “should make even someone with a wooden leg step out.” A highly pronounced rhythm is common in such forms of poetry as charms, college yells, and lullabies; all of them (like the witches’ speech) are aimed at inducing a special effect magically. It is not surprising that carmen, the Latin word for “poem” or “song,” is also the Latin word for charm, and the word from which “charm” is derived.

Rain, rain, go away;

Come again another day.

Block that kick! Block that kick! Block that kick!

Rock-a-bye baby, on the tree top,

When the wind blows, the cradle will rock.

In much poetry, rhythm is only half-heard, but its omnipresence is suggested by the fact that when poetry is printed it is customary to begin each line with a capital letter. Prose (from Latin prorsus, “forward,” “straight on”) keeps running across the paper until the right-hand margin is reached, and then, merely because the paper has given out, the writer or printer starts again at the left, with a small letter. But verse (Latin versus, “a turning”) often ends well short of the right-hand margin, and the next line begins at the left—usually with a capital—not because paper has run out but because the rhythmic pattern begins again. Lines of poetry are continually reminding us that they have a pattern.

Before turning to some other highly rhythmical pieces, a word of caution: a mechanical, unvarying rhythm may be good to put the baby to sleep, but it can be deadly to readers who wish to keep awake. Poets vary their rhythm according to their purpose; a poet ought not to be so regular that he or she is (in W. H. Auden’s words) an “accentual pest.” In competent hands, rhythm contributes to meaning; it says something. The rhythm in the lines from Macbeth, for example, helps suggest the strong binding power of magic. Again Ezra Pound has a relevant comment: "Rhythm must have meaning. It can't be merely a careless dash off, with no grip and no real hold to the words and sense, a tumty tum tumty tum tum ta." Some examples will be useful.

Consider this description of Hell from John Milton's Paradise Lost (the heavier stresses are marked by ´):

Rócks, cav´es, lak es, fen´s, bog´s, den´s, an˘d shádes of deáth.

Such a succession of stresses is highly unusual. Elsewhere in the poem Milton chiefly uses iambic feet—alternating unstressed and stressed syllables—but here he immediately follows one heavy stress with another, thereby helping to communicate the "meaning"—the impressive monotony of Hell. As a second example, consider the function of the rhythm in two lines by Alexander Pope:

Whe˘n Ájax˘ str´ives som˘e roc´k's vas´t weig´ht to˘ thr´ow,

Th e lin´e toó lábo˘rs, an˘d th e wor´ds móve slów.

The heavier stresses (again, marked by ´) do not merely alternate with the lighter ones (marked ˘); rather, the great weight of the rock is suggested by three consecutive stressed words, "rock's vast weight," and the great effort involved in moving it is suggested by another three consecutive stresses, "line too labors," and by yet another three, "words move slow." Note, also, the abundant pauses within the lines. In the first line, unless one's speech is slovenly, one must pause at least slightly after "Ajax," "strives," "rock's," "vast," "weight," and "throw." The grating sounds in "Ajax" and "rock's" do their work, too, and so do the explosive t's. When Pope wishes to suggest lightness, he reverses his procedure and he groups *un*stressed syllables:

Not so, when swift Camilla scours the plain,

Fliés o'e˘r th'un˘béndi ng córn, an˘d skíms a˘lon˘g th e máin.

This last line has twelve syllables and is thus longer than the line about Ajax, but the addition of "along" helps to communicate lightness and swiftness because in this line (it can be argued) neither syllable of "along" is strongly stressed. If "along" is omitted, the line still makes grammatical sense and becomes more "regular," but it also becomes less imitative of lightness.

The very regularity of a line may be meaningful too. Shakespeare begins a sonnet thus:

Whe˘n Í do˘ coúnt th e cloc´k tha˘t télls th e tim´e.

This line about a mechanism runs with appropriate regularity. (It is worth noting, too, that "*c*ount the *c*lock" and "*t*ells the *t*ime" emphasize the regularity by the repetition of sounds and syntax.) But notice what Shakespeare does in the middle of the next line:

An˘d sée th e bráve dáy sun´k in˘ hídeo˘us nig´ht.

What has he done? And what is the effect?

Here is another poem that refers to a clock. In England, until capital punishment was abolished, executions regularly took place at 8:00 A.M.

A. E. HOUSMAN

For another poem by the English poet A. E. Housman (1859–1936) and for a brief biography, see page 683.

Eight O'Clock [1922]

He stood, and heard the steeple
Sprinkle the quarters on the morning town.
One, two, three, four, to market-place and people
It tossed them down.
Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour,
He stood and counted them and cursed his luck;
And then the clock collected in the tower
Its strength, and struck.

The chief (but not unvarying) pattern is iambic; that is, the odd syllables are less emphatic than the even ones, as in

He˘ stóod, an˘d heárd th e stéeple˘

Try to mark the syllables, stressed and unstressed, in the rest of the poem. Be guided by your ear, not by a mechanical principle, and don't worry too much about difficult or uncertain parts; different readers may reasonably come up with different results.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Where do you find two or more consecutive stresses? What explanations (related to meaning) can be offered?

2. -What do you think is the effect of the short line at the end of each stanza? And what significance can you attach to the fact that these lines (unlike the first and third lines in each stanza) end with a stress?

Following are some poems in which the strongly felt pulsations are highly important.

The Dance [1944]

In Breughel's great picture, The Kermess,° the dancers go round, they go round and around, the squeal and the blare and the tweedle of bagpipes, a bugle and fiddles tipping their bellies (round as the thick-sided glasses whose wash they impound) their hips and their bellies off balance to turn them. Kicking and rolling about the Fair Grounds, swinging their butts, those shanks must be sound to bear up under such rollicking measures, prance as they dance
in Breughel's great picture, The Kermess.

1. -Read Williams's poem aloud several times, and decide where the heavy stresses fall. Mark the heavily stressed syllables ´, the lightly stressed ones ^, and the unstressed ones ˘. Are all the lines identical? What effect is thus gained, especially when read aloud? What does the parenthetical statement (lines 5–6) do to the rhythm? Does a final syllable often receive a heavy stress here? Are there noticeable pauses at the ends of the lines? What is the consequence? Are the dancers waltzing?

2. -What syllables rhyme or are repeated (e.g., "round" in lines 2 and 5, and "–pound" in line 6; "–ing" in lines 5, 8, 9, and 11)? What effect do they have?

3. -What do you think the absence at the beginning of each line of the customary capital contributes to the meaning? Why is the last line the same as the first?

ROBERT FRANCIS

Robert Francis (1901–1987) was born in Upland, Pennsylvania, and educated at Harvard. He taught only briefly, a term here or there and an occasional summer, devoting himself for the most part to reading and writing.

The Pitcher [1960]

His art is eccentricity, his aim
How not to hit the mark he seems to aim at,
His passion how to avoid the obvious,
His technique how to vary the avoidance.
The others throw to be comprehended. He Throws to be a moment misunderstood.
Yet not too much. Not errant, arrant, wild,
But every seeming aberration willed.
Not to, yet still, still to communicate
Making the batter understand too late.

If you read this poem aloud, pausing appropriately where the punctuation tells you to, you will hear the poet trying to represent something of the pitcher's "eccentricity." ("Eccentric," you may know, literally means "off center.") A pitcher tries to deceive a batter, perhaps by throwing a ball that will unexpectedly curve over the plate; the poet playfully deceives the reader, for instance, with unexpected pauses. In line 5, for example, he puts a heavy pause (indicated by a period) not at the end of the line, but just before the end.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Notice that some lines contain no pauses, but the next-to-last line contains two within it (indicated by commas) and none at the end. What do you suppose Francis is getting at?
2. -What significance can be attached to the fact that only the last two lines really rhyme (communicate/late), whereas other lines do not quite rhyme?

VERSIFICATION: A GLOSSARY FOR REFERENCE

The technical vocabulary of prosody (the study of the principles of verse structure, including meter, rhyme, and other sound effects, and stanzaic patterns) is large. An understanding of these terms will not turn anyone into a poet, but it will enable one to discuss some aspects of poetry more efficiently. A knowledge of them, like a knowledge of most other technical terms (e.g., "misplaced modifier," "woofer," "automatic transmission"), allows for quick and accurate communication. The following are the chief terms of prosody.

Meter

Most English poetry has a pattern of stressed (accented) sounds, and this pattern is the meter (from the Greek word for "measure"). Although in Old En-glish poetry (poetry written in England before the Norman-French Conquest in 1066) a line may have any number of unstressed syllables in addition to four stressed syllables, most poetry written in England since the Conquest not only has a fixed number of stresses in a line but also has a fixed number of unstressed syllables before or after each stressed one. (One really ought not to talk of "unstressed" or "unaccented" syllables, since to utter a syllable—however lightly—is to give it some stress. It is really a matter of relative stress, but the fact is that "unstressed" or "unaccented" are parts of the established terminology of versification.)

In a line of poetry, the foot is the basic unit of measurement. On rare occasions it is a single stressed syllable, but generally a foot consists of two or three syllables, one of which is stressed. (Stress is indicated by ´, lack of stress by ˘.) The repetition of feet, then, produces a pattern of stresses throughout the poem.

Two cautions:

1. -A poem will seldom contain only one kind of foot throughout; significant variations usually occur, but one kind of foot is dominant.

2. -In reading a poem one pays attention to the sense as well as to the metrical pattern. By paying attention to the sense, one often finds that the stress falls on a word that according to the metrical pattern would be unstressed. Or a word that according to the pattern would be stressed may be seen to be unstressed. Furthermore, by reading for sense, one finds that not all stresses are equally heavy; some are almost as light as unstressed syllables, and sometimes there is a hovering stress; that is, the stress is equally distributed over two adjacent syllables. To repeat: read for sense, allowing the meaning to help indicate the stresses.

Metrical Feet

The most common feet in English poetry are the following six.

Iamb (adjective: iambic): one unstressed syllable followed by one stressed syllable. The iamb, said to be the most common pattern in English speech, is surely the most common in English poetry. The following example has four iambic feet:

My͘ héart i s líkee a͘ sin´gin͘g bírd.

—Christina Rossetti

Trochee (trochaic): one stressed syllable followed by one unstressed.

Wé wer͘e vér͘y tíre͘d, wé we͘re vér͘y mérr͘y

—Edna St. Vincent Millay

Anapest (anapestic): two unstressed syllables followed by one stressed.

The͘re ar͘e mány͘ wh o sáy tha͘t a͘ dóg ha͘s hi s dáy.

—Dylan Thomas

Dactyl (dactylic): one stressed syllable followed by two unstressed. This trisyllabic foot, like the anapest, is common in light verse or verse suggesting joy, but its use is not limited to such material, as Longfellow's Evangeline shows. Thomas Hood's sentimental "The Bridge of Sighs" begins:

Tak´e he͘r up͘ ténd erly͘.

Spondee (spondaic): two stressed syllables; most often used as a substitute for an iamb or trochee.

Smárt lád, toˇ slíp beˇtímes aˇw´ay.

—A. E. Housman

Pyrrhic: two unstressed syllables; it is often not considered a legitimate foot in English.

Metrical Lines

A metrical line consists of one or more feet and is named for the number of feet in it. The following names are used:

monometer: one foot	pentameter: five feet
dimeter: two feet	hexameter: six feet
trimeter: three feet	heptameter: seven feet
tetrameter: four feet	octameter: eight feet

A line is scanned for the kind and number of feet in it, and the scansion tells you if it is, say, anapestic trimeter (three anapests):

˘ ˘ ˘ ˘ ˘ ˘

A s I ca´me toˇ th e édgge of th e wóods.

—Robert Frost

Or, in another example, iambic pentameter:

˘ ´

Th e súmmeˇr thúndeˇr, lik e aˇ wóodeˇn béll

—Louise Bogan

A line ending with a stress has a masculine ending; a line ending with an extra unstressed syllable has a feminine ending. The caesura (usually indicated by the symbol //) is a slight pause within the line. It need not be indicated by punctuation (notice the fourth and fifth lines in the following quotation), and it does not affect the metrical count:

Awake, my St. John! // leave all meaner things

To low ambition, // and the pride of kings.

Let us // (since life can little more supply

Than just to look about us // and to die)

Expatiate free // o'er all this scene of Man;

A mighty maze! // but not without a plan;

A wild, // where weeds and flowers promiscuous shoot;

Or garden, // tempting with forbidden fruit.

—Alexander Pope

The varying position of the caesura helps to give Pope's lines an informality that plays against the formality of the pairs of rhyming lines.

An end-stopped line concludes with a distinct syntactical pause, but a run-on line has its sense carried over into the next line without syntactical pause. (The running on of a line is called enjambment.) In the following passage, only the first is a run-on line:

Yet if we look more closely we shall find

Most have the seeds of judgment in their mind:

Nature affords at least a glimmering light;

The lines, though touched but faintly, are drawn right.

—Alexander Pope

Meter produces rhythm, recurrences at equal intervals; but rhythm (from a Greek word meaning "flow") is usually applied to larger units than feet. Often it depends most obviously on pauses. Thus, a poem with run-on lines will have a different rhythm from a poem with end-stopped lines, even though both are in the same meter. And prose, though it is unmetrical, can have rhythm, too.

In addition to being affected by syntactical pause, rhythm is affected by pauses attributable to consonant clusters and to the length of words. Words of several syllables establish a different rhythm from words of one syllable, even in metrically identical lines. One can say, then, that rhythm is altered by shifts in meter, syntax, and the length and ease of pronunciation. But even with no such shift, even if a line is repeated word for word, a reader may sense a change in rhythm. The rhythm of the final line of a poem, for example, may well differ from that of the line before, even though in all other respects the lines are identical, as in Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" (page 936), which concludes by repeating "And miles to go before I sleep." One may simply sense that the final line ought to be spoken, say, more slowly and with more stress on "miles."

Patterns of Sound

Though rhythm is basic to poetry, rhyme—the repetition of the identical or similar stressed sound or sounds—is not. Rhyme is, presumably, pleasant in itself; it suggests order; and it may also be related to meaning, for it brings two words sharply together, often implying a relationship, as in the now trite dove and love, or in the more imaginative throne and alone.

Perfect, or exact, rhyme: Differing consonant sounds are followed by identical stressed vowel sounds, and the following sounds, if any, are identical (foe—toe; meet—fleet; buffer—rougher). Notice that perfect rhyme involves identity of sound, not of spelling. Fix and sticks, like buffer and rougher, are perfect rhymes.

Half-rhyme (or off-rhyme): Only the final consonant sounds of the words are identical; the stressed vowel sounds as well as the initial consonant sounds, if any, differ (soul—oil; mirth—forth; trolley—bully).

Eye-rhyme: The sounds do not in fact rhyme, but the words look as though they would rhyme (cough—bough).

Masculine rhyme: The final syllables are stressed and, after their differing initial consonant sounds, are identical in sound (stark—mark; support—retort).

Feminine rhyme (or double rhyme): Stressed rhyming syllables are followed by identical unstressed syllables (revival—arrival; flatter—batter).

Triple rhyme is a kind of feminine rhyme in which identical stressed vowel sounds are followed by two identical unstressed syllables (machinery—scenery; tenderly—slenderly).

End rhyme (or terminal rhyme): The rhyming words occur at the ends of the lines.

Internal rhyme: At least one of the rhyming words occurs within the line (Oscar Wilde's "Each narrow cell in which we dwell").

Alliteration: Sometimes defined as the repetition of initial sounds ("*A*ll the *a*wful *a*uguries," or "*B*ring me my *b*ow of *b*urning gold"), and sometimes as the prominent repetition of a consonant ("a*f*ter li*f*e's *f*it*f*ul *f*ever").

Assonance: The repetition, in words of proximity, of identical vowel sounds preceded and followed by differing consonant sounds. Whereas tide and hide are rhymes, tide and mine are assonantal.

Consonance: The repetition of identical consonant sounds and differing vowel sounds in words in proximity (fail—feel; rough—roof; pitter—patter). Sometimes consonance is more loosely defined merely as the repetition of a consonant (fail—peel).

Onomatopoeia: The use of words that imitate sounds, such as hiss and buzz. There is a mistaken tendency to see onomatopoeia everywhere—for example in thunder and horror. Many words sometimes thought to be onomatopoeic are not clearly imitative of the thing they refer to; they merely contain some sounds that, when we know what the word means, seem to have some resemblance to the thing they denote. Tennyson's lines from "Come down, O maid" are usually cited as an example of onomatopoeia:

> The moan of doves in immemorial elms
> And murmuring of innumerable bees.

If you have read the preceding—and, admittedly, not entirely engaging—paragraphs, you may have found yourself mentally repeating some catchy sounds, let's say our example of internal rhyme ("Each narrow cell in which we dwell") or our example of alliteration ("Bring me my bow of burning gold"). As the creators of advertising slogans know, all of us—not just poets—can be hooked by the sounds of words, but probably poets are especially fond of savoring words. Consider the following poem.

GALWAY KINNELL

Born in 1927 in Providence, Rhode Island, Galway Kinnell was educated at Princeton and the University of Rochester. He is the author of several books of poems, and he has won many awards, including the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry and the American Book Award.

Blackberry Eating [1980]

I love to go out in late September among the fat, overripe, icy, black blackberries to eat blackberries for breakfast, the stalks very prickly, a penalty
they earn for knowing the black art of blackberry-making: and as I stand among them lifting the stalks to my mouth, the ripest berries fall almost unbidden to my tongue, as words sometimes do, certain peculiar words like strengths or squinched,

many-lettered, one-syllabled lumps,
which I squeeze, squinch open, and splurge well in the silent, startled, icy, black language of blackberry-eating in late September.

Kinnell does not use rhyme, but he uses other kinds of aural repetition. For instance, in the first line we get "*l*ove" and "*l*ate," and the l sound (already present in the title of the poem) is picked up in the second line, in "black blackberries." The k sound is then continued in the next line, in "stalks" and the l and k in "prickly," and "prickly" contains not only the k and the l of "blackberry" but also the r.

In lines 7–9 Kinnell compares eating blackberries—an action involving the tongue and the lips, and the mind also, if one is savoring the berries—to speaking "certain peculiar words." There is no need for us to point out additional connections between words in the poem, but we do want to mention that the last line ends with the same two words as the first, providing closure, which is one of the things rhyme normally does.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Specify three words that you like to "squinch," and explain why.
2. -Specify one poem, other than a poem in this chapter (the poem need not be in this book), in which you think the repetitions of sounds are especially important, and explain why you hold this view.

A Note about Poetic Forms

"Art is nothing without form," the French author Gustave Flaubert maintained, and it's true that works of art have a carefully designed shape. Most obviously, for instance, a good story has an ending that satisfies the reader or hearer. In real life, things keep going, but when a good story ends, the audience feels that there is nothing more to say, at least nothing more of interest to say.

With poems that rhyme, the rhyme-scheme provides a pattern, a shape, a structure that seems inseparable from the content. If you recite a limerick, you will immediately see how the shape is inseparable from the content:

There was a young fellow from Lynn
Who was so exceedingly thin
    That when he essayed
    To drink lemonade
He slipped through the straw and fell in.

If you put the words in a different order, and you ignore meter and rhyme—that is, if you destroy the form and turn the passage into something like "A young man, so thin that he fell through a straw into a glass of lemonade, lived in Lynn"—you can instantly see the importance of form.

Let's briefly look at a more serious example. You may recall Housman's "Eight O'Clock" (page 791), a poem whose title corresponds to the hour at which executions in England used to take place.

He stood, and heard the steeple
    Sprinkle the quarters on the morning town.
One, two, to market-place and people
    It tossed them down.
Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour,
    He stood and counted them and cursed his luck;
And then the clock collected in the tower
    Its strength, and struck.

The rhyme of "struck" with "luck" (in this instance, bad luck) is conclusive. We don't ask if the body was removed from the gallows and buried, or if the condemned man's wife (if he had one) grieved, or if his children (if he had any) turned out well or badly. None of these things is of any relevance. There is nothing more to say. The form and the content perfectly go together. In this example, the lines, each of which rhymes with another line—we might say that each line is tied to another line—seem especially appropriate for a man who is "strapped" and "noosed."

But why do poets use forms established by rhyme? In an essay called "The Constant Symbol," Robert Frost says that a poet regards rhymes as "stepping stones. . . . The way will be zigzag, but it will be a straight crookedness like the walking stick he cuts in the bushes for an emblem." Housman's stepping-stones in the second stanza took Houseman (and take the reader) from hour to luck, then to tower and then with great finality to the end of the walk, struck. We think this stanza is inspired, and we imagine that Housman's inspiration was mightily helped by his need for rhymes—his need to get "stepping stones" that would allow him to continue the "straight crookedness" of his walk with this condemned man. His walk-with-words, or rather his walk with words-that-set-forth-ideas, produced "luck" and "struck," and enabled him to give to his readers the memorable image of the clock as a machine that executes the man.

When you read Housman's or Frost's actual lines—or better, when you read them aloud and hear and feel the effect of these rhymes—you can understand why Frost more than once said he would as soon write unrhymed poetry as he would "play tennis with the net down." The rules governing the game of tennis or the game of writing do not interfere with the game; rather, the rules allow the players to play a game. The rules allow poets to write poems; the rules—the restraints—provide the structure that allows poets to accomplish something. Poets are somewhat like Houdini, who accepted shackles so that he could triumph over them. Without the handcuffs and other restraints, he could accomplish nothing. Or consider the string on a kite; far from impeding the kite's flight, the string allows the kite to fly. Speaking in less high-flying terms, we can quote from a talk that Frost gave to college students in 1937, "The Poet's Next of Kin in College." He told them—and he was speaking not only to young poets but to all students—that in their endeavors, of whatever sort, they "must have form—performance. The thing itself is indescribable, but it is felt like athletic form. To have form, feel form in sports—and by analogy feel form in verse."

Poets have testified that they use rhyme partly because, far from impeding them, it helps them to say interesting things in a memorable way. True, some rhymes have been used so often that although they were once rich in meaning—for instance—"love" and "dove" or "moon" and "June"—they have become clichés, their use indicating not an imaginative leap but a reliance on what has been said too often. But other rhymes—let's say "earth" and "birth" or "law" and "flaw"—can lead poets to say interesting things that they might otherwise not have thought of.

In his "Letter of Advice to a Young Poet," Jonathan Swift (whom you may know as the author of Gulliver's Travels, 1726), said: "Verse without rhyme is a body without a soul." A striking, and indeed surprising, comment: Swift dares to propose that the soul of a poem depends not on the content but, rather, on a crucial element of its form, the presence of rhyme. In part he is reminding us here of the importance of craft in the writing of a poem, of the sheer skill and deliberation that makes the literary work feel exactly right, as though it had to be this way.

Stanzaic Patterns

Lines of poetry are commonly arranged in a rhythmical unit called a stanza (from an Italian word meaning "room" or "stopping-place"). Usually all the stanzas in a poem have the same rhyme pattern. A stanza is sometimes called a verse, though verse may also mean a single line of poetry. (In discussing stanzas, rhymes are indicated by identical letters. Thus, abab indicates that the first and third lines rhyme with each other, while the second and fourth lines are linked by a different rhyme. An unrhymed line is denoted by x.) Common stanzaic forms in English poetry are the following:

Couplet: a stanza of two lines, usually but not necessarily with end-rhymes. Couplet is also used for a pair of rhyming lines. The octosyllabic couplet is iambic or trochaic tetrameter:

Had we but world enough and time,

This coyness, lady, were no crime.

—Andrew Marvell

Heroic couplet: a rhyming couplet of iambic pentameter, often "closed," that is, containing a complete thought, with a fairly heavy pause at the end of the first line and a still heavier one at the end of the second. Commonly, there is a parallel or an antithesis (contrast) within a line or between the two lines. It is called heroic because in England, especially in the eighteenth century, it was much used for heroic (epic) poems.

Some foreign writers, some our own despise;

The ancients only, or the moderns, prize.

—Alexander Pope

Triplet (or tercet): a three-line stanza, usually with one rhyme.

Whenas in silks my Julia goes

Then, then (methinks) how sweetly flows

That liquefaction of her clothes.

—Robert Herrick

Quatrain: a four-line stanza, rhymed or unrhymed. The heroic (or elegiac) quatrain is iambic pentameter, rhyming abab. That is, the first and third lines rhyme (so they are designated a), and the second and fourth lines rhyme (so they are designated b).

THREE COMPLEX FORMS: THE SONNET, THE VILLANELLE, AND THE SESTINA

The Sonnet

A sonnet is a fourteen-line poem, predominantly in iambic pentameter. The rhyme is usually according to one of two schemes. The Italian or Petrarchan sonnet, named for the Italian poet Francesco Petrarch (1304–1374), has two divisions: The first eight lines (rhyming abba abba) are the octave, and the last six (rhyming cd cd cd, or a variant) are the sestet. Gerard Manley Hopkins's "God's Grandeur" (page 991) is an Italian sonnet. The second kind of sonnet, the English or Shakespearean sonnet, is usually arranged into three quatrains and a couplet, rhyming abab cdcd efef gg. (For examples see the next two poems.) In many sonnets there is a marked correspondence between the rhyme scheme and the development of the thought. Thus an Italian sonnet may state a generalization in the octave and a specific example in the sestet. Or an English sonnet may give three examples—one in each quatrain—and draw a conclusion in the couplet.

Why poets choose to imprison themselves in fourteen tightly rhymed lines is something of a mystery. Tradition has a great deal to do with it: the form, having been handled successfully by major poets, stands as a challenge. In writing a sonnet a poet gains a little of the authority of Petrarch, Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, and other masters who showed that the sonnet is not merely a trick. A second reason perhaps resides in the very tightness of the rhymes, which can help as well as hinder. Many poets have felt, along with Richard Wilbur (in Mid-Century American Poets, ed. John Ciardi), that the need for a rhyme has suggested

. . . arbitrary connections of which the mind may take advantage if it likes. For example, if one has to rhyme with tide, a great number of rhyme-words at once come to mind (ride, bide, shied, confide, Akenside, etc.). Most of these, in combination with tide, will probably suggest nothing apropos, but one of them may reveal precisely what one wanted to say. If none of them does, tide must be dispensed with. Rhyme, austerely used, may be a stimulus to discovery and a stretcher of the attention.

Six Sonnets

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609 a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) poet. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A contemporary writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare's "sugred Sonnets [circulate] among his private friends."

Sonnet 73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs° where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou see'st the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by-and-by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest,
In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,

Consumed with that which it was nourished by. 12

This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,

To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In the first quatrain (the first four lines) to what "time of year" does Shakespeare compare himself? In the second quatrain (lines 5–8) to what does he compare himself? In the third? If the sequence of the three quatrains were reversed, what would be gained or lost?

2. -In line 8, what is "Death's second self"? What implications do you perceive in "seals up all in rest," as opposed, for instance, to "brings most welcome rest"?

3. -In line 13, exactly what is "This"?

4. -In line 14, suppose in place of "To love that well which thou must leave ere long," Shakespeare had written "To love me well whom thou must leave ere long." What if anything would have been gained or lost?

5. -What is your personal response to this sonnet? Do you feel that its lessons apply to you? Please explain.

6. -Did you find this sonnet hard to understand when you read it for the first time? After you reread and studied it, did it become more difficult, or less so? Do you like to read difficult poems?

Sonnet 146

Poor soul, the center of my sinful earth,

My sinful earth° these rebel pow'rs that thee array,

Why doest thou pine within and suffer dearth,

Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?

Why so large cost,° having so short a lease, 5

Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?

Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,

Eat up thy charge? Is this thy body's end?

Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,

And let that pine to aggravate thy store; 10

Buy terms divine° in selling hours of dross;

Within be fed, without be rich no more.

So shalt thou feed on Death, that feeds on men,

And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -As we indicate in our comment on the facsimile of this poem, the first three words of the second line probably should be replaced with other words. What words would you suggest? (We give some of the most widely accepted suggestions, but feel free to offer your own.)

2. -In what tone of voice would you speak the first line? The last line? Trace the speaker's shifts in emotion throughout the poem.

3. -What is your personal response to this poem? Do you feel that its lessons apply to you? Do you find this sonnet more meaningful, or less meaningful, to you than Sonnet 73 (above)? Please explain

4. -Did you find this poem hard to understand when you read it for the first time? After you reread and studied it, did the poem become more difficult, or less so? Is this sonnet more difficult than Sonnet 73 (above)? What is the difference between a poem that is challenging, a poem that is difficult, and a poem that is obscure?

JOHN MILTON

John Milton (1608–1674) was born into a well-to-do family in London, where from childhood he was a student of languages, mastering at an early age Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and a number of modern languages. Instead of becoming a minister in the Anglican Church, he resolved to become a poet and spent five years at his family's country home, reading. His attacks against the monarchy secured him a position in Oliver Cromwell's Puritan government as Latin secretary for foreign affairs. He became totally blind, but he continued his work through secretaries, one of whom was Andrew Marvell, author of "To His Coy Mistress" (page 779). With the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, Milton was for a time confined but was later pardoned in the general amnesty. Until his death he continued to work on many subjects, including his greatest poem, the epic Paradise Lost.

When I Consider How My Light Is Spent [1655]

When I consider how my light is spent
Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent which is death to hide°
Lodged with me useless,° though my soul more bent 4
To serve therewith my Maker, and present
My true account, lest he returning chide;
"Doth God exact day-labor, light denied?"
I fondly° ask; but Patience to prevent° 8
That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need Either man's work or his own gifts; who best Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
Is kingly. Thousands at his bidding speed 12
And post o'er land and ocean without rest:
They also serve who only stand and wait."

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -This sonnet is sometimes called "On His Blindness," though Milton never gave it a title. Do you think this title gets toward the heart of the poem? Explain. If you were to give it a title, what would the title be?

2. -Read the parable in Matthew 25.14–30, and then consider how close the parable is to Milton's life as Milton describes it in this poem.

3. -Where is the turn? What characteristics are attributed to God after the turn?

4. -Compare the tone of the first and the last sentences. How does the length of each of these sentences contribute to the tone?

5. -Could you imagine someone saying, "This poem changed my life"? What kind of change in a person's life might this sonnet produce?

6. -What is your own experience of blindness? Have you ever lost your eyesight? For a long or a short period? Do you know a blind person? What is the nature of your interaction with him or her?

JOHN CROWE RANSOM

A graduate of Vanderbilt University and a Rhodes scholar at Oxford, John Crowe Ransom returned to teach at Vanderbilt, where he and others founded an important poetry journal, The Fugitive. In 1937 he moved to Kenyon College, where he founded and edited the Kenyon Review. Distinguished as a poet and a teacher, he also wrote significant literary criticism. One of his books, The New Criticism (1941), gave its name to a critical movement (see pages 1742–1744).

Piazza Piece [1927]

—I am a gentleman in a dustcoat trying
To make you hear. Your ears are soft and small
And listen to an old man not at all,
They want the young men's whispering and sighing.
But see the roses on your trellis dying
And hear the spectral singing of the moon;
For I must have my lovely lady soon,
I am a gentleman in a dustcoat trying.
—I am a lady young in beauty waiting Until my truelove comes, and then we kiss.
But what gray man among the vines is this Whose words are dry and faint as in a dream?
Back from my trellis, Sir, before I scream!
I am a lady young in beauty waiting.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Who speaks the octave? What words especially characterize him? Characterize the speaker of the sestet.

2. -In lines 9–10, the young lady is waiting for her "truelove." Comment on the suggestions in this word. In line 14 she is still "waiting." For whom does she think she is waiting? For whom does the reader know she is waiting? How do you know?

3. -The first and last lines of the octave are identical, and so are the first and last lines of the sestet. What does this indicate about the degree to which the speakers communicate to each other?

4. -What is the point of Ransom's poem? Is this an appropriate question to ask about a poem—whether it does or does not make a point? Please explain.

X. J. KENNEDY

X. J. Kennedy was born in New Jersey in 1929. He has taught at Tufts University and is the author of several books of poems, books for children, and college textbooks.

Kennedy alludes (line 4) to Milton's Paradise Lost, VII, 205–07: "Heaven opened wide / Her ever-during gates, harmonious sound / On golden hinges moving. . . ." For an account of the slaughter of the innocents (line 5), see Matthew 2.16. The Venerable Bede (675–735), in line 6, was an English theologian and historian.

Nothing in Heaven Functions as It Ought [1965]

Nothing in Heaven functions as it ought:
Peter's bifocals, blindly sat on, crack;
His gates lurch wide with the cackle of a cock,
Not turn with a hush of gold as Milton had thought;
Gangs of the slaughtered innocents keep huffing
The nimbus off the Venerable Bede
Like that of an old dandelion gone to seed;
And the beatific choir keep breaking up, coughing.
But Hell, sleek Hell hath no freewheeling part:
None takes his own sweet time, none quickens pace.
Ask anyone, How come you here, poor heart?—
And he will slot a quarter through his face,
You'll hear an instant click, a tear will start

Imprinted with an abstract of his case.

U Topic for Critical Thinking and Writing

In the octave Kennedy uses off-rhymes (crack, cock; huffing, coughing), but in the sestet all the rhymes are exact. How do the rhymes help to convey the meaning? (Notice, too, that lines, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 8 all have more than the usual ten syllables. Again, why?)

BILLY COLLINS

Born in New York City in 1941, Collins is a professor of English at Lehman College of the City University of New York. He is the author of six books of poetry and the recipient of numerous awards, including one from the National Endowment for the Arts. Collins's Sailing Alone Around the Room: New and Selected Poems was published in 2001; in the same year, he was appointed poet laureate of the United States.

The following sonnet uses the Petrarchan form of an octave and a sestet. (See page 801.) Petrarch is additionally present in the poem by the allusion in line 3 to "a little ship on love's storm-tossed seas," because Petrarch compared the hapless lover, denied the favor of his mistress, to a ship in a storm: The lover cannot guide his ship because the North Star is hidden (Petrarch's beloved Laura averts her eyes), and the sails of the ship are agitated by the lover's pitiful sighs. As you will see, Petrarch and Laura explicitly enter the poem in the last three lines.

In line 8 Collins refers to the stations of the cross. In Roman Catholicism, one of the devotions consists of prayers and meditations before each of fourteen crosses or images set up along a path that commemorates the fourteen places at which Jesus halted when, just before the Crucifixion, he was making his way in Jerusalem to Golgotha.

Sonnet [1999]

All we need is fourteen lines, well, thirteen now, and after this next one just a dozen to launch a little ship on love's storm-tossed seas, then only ten more left like rows of beans.
How easily it goes unless you get Elizabethan and insist the iambic bongos must be played and rhymes positioned at the ends of lines, one for every station of the cross. 8

But hang on here while we make the turn into the final six where all will be resolved, where longing and heartache will find an end, where Laura will tell Petrarch to put down his pen, 12
take off those crazy medieval tights, blow out the lights, and come at last to bed.

1. -The headnote explains the stations of the cross (line 8), but what is the point of introducing this image into a sonnet?
2. -Normally the "turn" (volta) in an Italian sonnet occurs at the beginning of the ninth line; the first eight lines (the octave) establish some sort of problem, and the final six lines (the sestet) respond, for instance by answering a question, or by introducing a contrasting emotion. In your view, how satisfactorily does Collins handle this form?
3. -Does this sonnet interest you? Do you find it clever? Is that a good thing or a bad thing?
4. -Do you think that you could have written this sonnet? Could you have written Shakespeare's sonnets 73 and 146 (pages 802–803)? What do your responses to these questions suggest to you about the writing of poetry?

The Villanelle

The name comes from an Italian words, villanella, meaning "country song" or "peasant song," and originally, in the sixteenth century, the subject was the supposedly simple life of the shepherd, but in France in the seventeenth century elaborate rules were developed. Variations occur, but usually a villanelle has the following characteristics:

- -Five stanzas with three lines each (tercets), rhyming aba, and a final stanza with four lines (a quatrain).

- -The first line of the first stanza is repeated as the last line of the second stanza and the last line of the fourth stanza.
- -The third line of the first stanza is repeated as the last line of the third stanza and the last line of the fifth stanza.
- -The quatrain that concludes the villanelle rhymes abaa, using the first and third lines of the first stanza as the next-to-last and the last lines of the final stanza—i.e., the poem ends with a couplet.

Because the villanelle repeats one sound thirteen times (in the first and last line of each tercet, and in the first, third, and fourth lines of the quatrain), it strongly conveys a sense of return, a sense of not going forward, even a sense of dwelling on the past. We give four examples of the form.

If you are going to write a villanelle, here are two tips:

- -Begin by writing a couplet (a pair of rhyming lines); in fact, write several couplets on different topics, and then decide which couplet you think is most promising. Next, insert between these two lines a line that makes sense in the context but that does not rhyme with them.
- -Each line need not end with a pause, and in fact some run-on lines probably will help to prevent the poem from becoming too sing-songy.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

Edwin Arlington Robinson (1869–1935) was born in Head Tide, Maine, and raised in the nearby town of Gardner, which he later adapted as the setting, "Tilbury Town," for many of his poems. His books of verse include The Torrent and the Night Before (1896); Captain Craig and Other Poems (1902); The Town Down the River (1910); and—his first major success—The Man Against the Sky (1916).

The House on the Hill [1896]

They are all gone away,

The House is shut and still,

There is nothing more to say. 3

Through broken walls and gray

The winds blow bleak and shrill:

They are all gone away.

Nor is there one to-day

To speak them good or ill:

There is nothing more to say.

Why is it then we stray

Around the sunken sill?

They are all gone away,

And our poor fancy-play

For them is wasted skill:

There is nothing more to say.

There is ruin and decay

In the House on the Hill:

They are all gone away.

There is nothing more to say.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Line 1 is repeated several times. Please explain your response to the line the first time you hear it. Now explain your response when you hear it the final time. What conclusions are you led to?

2. -Were you surprised to encounter the pronoun “we” in stanza four? How does this “we” affect your response to the poem? And how does it bear on your understanding of the speaker?

3. -Not, too, the use of “our” in stanza five. Does the poet need this “our” or not? Please explain.

4. -In the first and last stanzas, “House” is capitalized. Does this choice add to or detract from the impact of the poem?

5. -We have printed the version of “The House on the Hill” that Robinson gave in his Collected Poems, published in 1937. But the original version of 1896 is somewhat different. Here, for example, is the original stanza three:

Are we more fit than they

To meet the Master’s will?—

There is nothing more to say.

In your view, does the revision make the poem better or worse? Who is the "Master"? And what is the purpose of this reference?

6. -Once a poem has been published, do you think that its author has the right to revise it? Isn't it confusing for readers to have different versions of "the same poem"?

DYLAN THOMAS

Dylan Thomas (1914–1953) was born and grew up in Swansea, in Wales. His first volume of poetry, published in 1934, immediately made him famous. Endowed with a highly melodious voice, on three tours of the United States he was immensely successful as a reader both of his own and of other poets' work. He died in New York City.

Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night [1952]

Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.
Though wise men at their end know dark is right, Because their words had forked no lightning they
Do not go gentle into that good night.
Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.
Wild men who caught and sang the sun in flight,
And learn, too late, they grieved it on its way,
Do not go gentle into that good night.
Grave men, near death, who see with blinding sight
Blind eyes could blaze like meteors and be gay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.
And you, my father, there on the sad height,

Curse, bless, me now with your fierce tears, I pray.

Do not go gentle into that good night.

Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -The intricate form of the villanelle might seem too fussy for a serious poem about dying. Do you find it too fussy? Or does the form here somehow succeed?
2. -How would you describe the speaker's tone? Is it accurate or misleading to say that "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" is an angry poem?
3. -What is the speaker's attitude toward death? Do you share this attitude or not? Please explain.
4. -This is a famous poem. Why do you think that is the case?

ELIZABETH BISHOP

Elizabeth Bishop (1911–1979) was born in Worcester, Massachusetts. Because her father died when she was eight months old and her mother was confined to a sanitarium four years later, Bishop was raised by relatives in New England and Nova Scotia. After graduation from Vassar College in 1934, where she was co-editor of the student literary magazine, she lived (on a small private income) for a while in Key West, France, and Mexico, and then for much of her adult life in Brazil, before returning to the United States to teach at Harvard.

One Art [1976]

The art of losing isn't hard to master;
so many things seem filled with intent to be lost that their loss is no disaster.
Lose something every day. Accept the fluster of lost door keys, the hour badly spent.
The art of losing isn't hard to master.
Then practice losing farther, losing faster:
places, and names, and where it was you meant to travel. None of these will bring disaster.

I lost my mother's watch. And look! my last, or next-to-last, of three loved houses went.
The art of losing isn't hard to master.
I lost two cities, lovely ones. And, vaster, some realms I owned, two rivers, a continent.
I miss them, but it wasn't a disaster.
—Even losing you (the joking voice, a gesture
I love) I shan't have lied. It's evident the art of losing's not too hard to master though it may look like (Write it!) like disaster.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What was your response to the title when you first read it? Did your response change after you read the poem and studied it further?

2. -Is the form connected to the poem's theme? If so, in what way?

3. -Linger over line 1: Why is "losing" an "art"? And why does Bishop echo the phrasing of the first line in lines later in the poem? Does the echo make the poem feel repetitive?

4. -Follow Bishop's uses of the words "lose," "losing," and "loss" from one to the next. Do you find her reliance on these very closely related words to be important for the poem's meaning, or does it strike you as a lot or a little confusing? Can a poem be a lot or a little confusing and yet still be a good poem?

5. -Can we tell what kind of loss Bishop is exploring? If we can, where does this kind of loss become clear?

6. -Whom is Bishop addressing when she says (not the exclamation point) "Write it!"? Why is this command in the poem, and why is it in parentheses?

7. -Has this poem helped you to understand a loss or losses that you have experienced yourself? Something, perhaps, that you did not understand before about what "losing" someone or something important means? Do you have an insight of your own into losing and loss that Bishop has not considered, at least not in this poem? Is this an insight that you would want to share with others—in a poem, for example—or keep to yourself?

WENDY COPE

Wendy Cope was born in 1945 in Kent, in the south of England, and educated at St. Hilda's College at Oxford University, where she took a degree in history, and then at the Westminster College of Education. After working for a number of years as a music teacher in London, she became a television critic, a columnist, a freelance writer, and, above all, a poet. Her books of verse include Making Cocoa for Kingsley Amis (1986) and Serious Concerns (1991), both of which were best-sellers in England, and If I Don't Know (2001).

Reading Scheme [1986]

Here is Peter. Here is Jane. They like fun.
Jane has a big doll. Peter has a ball.
Look, Jane, look! Look at the dog! See him run!
Here is Mummy. She has baked a bun.
Here is the milkman. He has come to call.
Here is Peter. Here is Jane. They like fun.
Go Peter! Go Jane! Come, milkman, come!
The milkman likes Mummy. She likes them all.
Look, Jane, look! Look at the dog! See him run!
Here are the curtains. They shut out the sun.
Let us peep! On tiptoe Jane! You are small!
Here is Peter. Here is Jane. They like fun.
I hear a car, Jane. The milkman looks glum.
Here is Daddy in his car. Daddy is tall.
Look, Jane, look! Look at the dog! See him run!
Daddy looks very cross. Has he a gun?

Up milkman! Up milkman! Over the wall!

Here is Peter. Here is Jane. They like fun. 18

Look, Jane, look! Look at the dog! See him run!

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What was your first response to this poem? After you read it through several times, did your response change? Please explain.
2. -What does the word “scheme” mean? What makes this word in the title a good choice for the poem that follows?
3. -Do you think that Cope intends her poem to be comic in its effect on the reader? Or would you characterize the effect in different terms?
4. -How does the form of this poem contribute to its meaning? Could you imagine the poem affecting you in the same way if Cope had written it in a different form—for example, without the pattern of rhymes?
5. -Has this poem given you a new insight into the relationship between form and meaning? If so, please describe this insight and explain how it will affect your reading of other poems.

The Sestina

This fiendishly elaborate form developed in twelfth-century Europe, especially in southern France, among the troubadours, court poets who sang for nobles. (The name comes from the Italian sesto, “sixth,” because there are six stanzas of six lines each—but then, to complicate matters, there is a seventh stanza, a three-line “envoy” or “envoi,” a summing up that uses key words of the first six stanzas.)

More precisely—this is mind-boggling—the six words that end the six lines of the first stanza are used at the ends of all the following lines but in a different though fixed order in each stanza. (Rhyme is not used in this form.) This fixed order has been characterized as a sort of bottoms-up pattern, a term that will become clear as we describe the stanzas. In the second stanza the first line ends with the last word of the last line (the bottom) of the first stanza; the second line of the second stanza ends with the first line of the first; the third line ends with the last word of the fifth line of the first stanza—i.e., with the next-to-bottom line of the first stanza. The fourth line of the second stanza ends with the second line of the first, the fifth with the fourth line of the first, and the sixth with the third line of the first.

Thus, if we designate the final words of the first stanza, line by line, as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, the final words of the second stanza are 6, 1, 5, 2, 4, 3;

the third stanza: 3, 6, 4, 1, 2, 5

the fourth stanza: 5, 3, 2, 6, 1, 4

the fifth stanza: 4, 5, 1, 3, 6, 2

the sixth stanza: 2, 4, 6, 5, 3, 1

The envoy of three lines must use these six words, but there are various possible patterns—for instance, 5, 3, 1 at the ends of the three lines, and 2, 4, 6 in the middle of the lines.

If you are going to write a sestina, two tips:

- -Once you have settled on your topic—let's say "loss" or "a restless spirit of adventure"—jot down six words that you think are relevant, and get going.
- -You need not end each line with a pause, and in fact most good sestinas use considerable enjambment—i.e., the sense of the line runs over into the next line.

RUDYARD KIPLING

Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936) was born in India of English parents, but at the age of six he was sent to England for his education. He returned to India when he was seventeen, worked as a journalist and creative writer for seven years in Bombay, and then returned to England. Much of his writing celebrates the achievements of British colonialism, and he is therefore out of favor today, but if it is true that he did not see that imperialism is partly a money-making racket built on exploitation, it is nevertheless also true that he often depicts the "natives" with great sympathy and insight.

In his poems he often adopted the voice of the uneducated London cockney who has 'listed as a soldier, a-servin' of 'Er Majesty the Queen in Africa, Afghanistan, or Injia. Some readers have felt that some of the poems are better when one reads them without heeding the dialect.

Sestina of the Tramp-Royal [1896]

Speakin' in general, I 'ave tried 'em all—

The ’appy roads that take you o’er the world.
Speakin’ in general, I ’ave found them good
For such as cannot use one bed too long,
But must get ’ence, the same as I ’ave done,
An’ go observin’ matters till they die.
What do it matter where or ’ow we die,
So long as we’ve our ’ealth to watch it all—
The different ways that different things are done,
An’ men an’ women lovin’ in this world;
Takin’ our chances as they come along,
An’ when they ain’t, pretendin’ they are good?
In cash or credit—no, it aren’t no good;
You ’ave to ’ave the ’abit or you’d die,
Unless you lived your life but one day long,
Nor didn’t prophesy nor fret at all,
But drew your tucker some’ow from the world,
An’ never bothered what you might ha’ done.
But, Gawd, what things are they I ’aven’t done!
I’ve turned my ’and to most, an’ turned it good,
In various situations round the world—
For ’im that doth not work must surely die;
But that’s no reason man should labour all
’Is life on one same shift—life’s none so long.
Therefore, from job to job I’ve moved along.
Pay couldn’t ’old me when my time was done,
For something in my ’ead upset it all,
Till I ’ad dropped whatever ’t was for good,
An’, out at sea, be’eld the dock-lights die,

An’ met my mate—the wind that tramps the world!
It’s like a book, I think, this bloomin’ world,
Which you can read and care for just so long,
But presently you feel that you will die
Unless you get the page you’re readin’ done,
An’ turn another—likely not so good;
But what you’re after is to turn ’em all.
Gawd bless this world! Whatever she ’ath done—
Excep’ when awful long—I’ve found it good.
So write, before I die, “’E liked it all!”

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -As our headnote mentions, Kipling’s speakers often are cockneys, uneducated Londoners who drop their h’s and their final g’s. Is the dialect effective in this poem, or does the poem get better if you read it straight in standard English? Explain.

2. -How would you characterize the speaker’s view of life? And how would you characterize the speaker himself? Would you agree with someone who said that the speaker is a shallow egoist, an irresponsible fellow who seeks only his own instant gratification? Explain.

3. -Try your hand at writing your own envoy (Kipling’s last three lines) for this poem. Like Kipling, you will have to use world and done in your first line, long and good in your second, and die and all in your third.

Sestina [1965]

September rain falls on the house.
In the failing light, the old grandmother sits in the kitchen with the child beside the Little Marvel Stove, reading the jokes from the almanac,

laughing and talking to hide her tears.
She thinks that her equinoctial tears and the rain that beats on the roof of the house were both foretold by the almanac, but only known to a grandmother.
The iron kettle sings on the stove.
She cuts some bread and says to the child,
It's time for tea now; but the child is watching the teakettle's small hard tears dance like mad on the hot black stove,
the way the rain must dance on the house.
Tidying up, the old grandmother hangs up the clever almanac on its string. Birdlike, the almanac hovers half open above the child, hovers above the old grandmother and her teacup full of dark brown tears.
She shivers and says she thinks the house feels chilly, and puts more wood in the stove.
It was to be, says the Marvel Stove.
I know what I know, says the almanac.
With crayons the child draws a rigid house and a winding pathway. Then the child puts in a man with buttons like tears and shows it proudly to the grandmother.
But secretly, while the grandmother

busies herself about the stove,

the little moons fall down like tears from between the pages of the almanac into the flower bed the child has carefully placed in the front of the house. 36

Time to plant tears, says the almanac.

The grandmother sings to the marvelous stove and the child draws another inscrutable house.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Does Bishop's choice of title seem strange to you? Why would she use the name of the poetic form for her title? Do you think that a different title might be more effective? Please give examples, and explain why they would or would not be better.

2. -As carefully as you can, describe the effect of line 1.

3. -In the first stanza, why is the grandmother crying? How are her tears in lines 6 and 7 related to the "small hard tears" of the teakettle in line 14? Note, too, the later references to tears. Please comment on these as well.

4. -Several of the lines in this poem are italicized. Do the italics make the lines more forceful? Should Bishop have made the force of the lines clear without changing the "look" of the lines on the page?

5. -What is an almanac? Have you ever seen one? Why would someone want an almanac? What is the significance of the almanac in this poem?

6. -What is your response to the fact that this poem is a sestina? Do you think you could write a poem in this form? What would be the benefit to you of such an assignment?

SHAPED POETRY OR PATTERN POETRY

We have been talking about shapes or patterns determined by rhymes, but some poems—admittedly few—take their shape from the length of the lines, which form a simple image, such as a sphere, an egg, a vase, or a wing. We have already printed one poem of this sort in our first chapter, James Merrill's "Christmas Tree," which is shaped like—well, you can guess.

Here is a famous example of shaped poetry, a pair of wings. We print it sideways, as it was printed in the earliest edition, in 1633, though in that edition the first stanza was printed on the left-hand page, the second on the right-hand page.

GEORGE HERBERT

George Herbert (1593–1633), born into a distinguished Welsh family, studied at the University of Cambridge (England) and became a clergyman. By all accounts he lived an admirable life and was deservedly known in his community as "Holy Mr. Herbert."

Note: In line 1, store means "abundance," "plenty." In line 10, the fall refers to the loss of innocence that resulted when Adam ate the forbidden fruit in the garden of Eden. In the next-to-last line, imp, a term from falconry, means "to graft, to insert feathers into a wing."

Easter-Wings

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Why are wings especially relevant to a poem about Easter?

2. -We don't think one can argue that the length of every line is exactly suited to the meaning of the line, but we do think that some of the lengths are parallel or reinforce some of the ideas within those lines. For instance, the first line, speaking of a man's original "wealth and store," is a long line. Why is this length more appropriate to the meaning than it would be to, say, "Lord, who created a man who soon would fall"? And note especially the fifth and sixth lines of each stanza: Would you agree that their length suits their meaning?

3. -Do you think this poem is a mere novelty, or do you think it deserves close attention and indeed is memorable? Please explain

LILLIAN MORRISON

Lillian Morrison, born in Jersey City, New Jersey, is an anthologist and folklorist and a writer of children's books as well as a poet in her own right. The first books she published were collections of folk rhymes that she assembled and edited while working as a librarian at the New York Public Library. In 1987 Morrison received the Grolier Award for “outstanding contributions to the stimulation of reading by young people.” She lives in New York City.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Is the poem really about a skateboard? If not, what is it about?

2. -The first line is “Skimming.” Would the poem be improved or weakened if it began “I skim”? Please explain.

3. -The second line rhymes with the fifth and seventh (“sea,” “the”) and with the ninth (“only”). What other rhymes do you find? What is the effect of using rhymes that are not at the ends of the lines?

4. -From a grammatical point of view, a period could be put at the end of line 8. Why do you suppose Morrison did not put a period there?

BLANK VERSE AND FREE VERSE

A good deal of English poetry is unrhymed, much of it in blank verse—that is, unrhymed iambic pentameter. Introduced into English poetry by Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, in the middle of the sixteenth century, late in the century it became the standard medium (especially in the hands of Marlowe and Shakespeare) of English drama. In the seventeenth century, Milton used it for Paradise Lost, and it has continued to be used in both dramatic and nondramatic literature. For an example see the first scene of Hamlet (page 1189). A passage of blank verse that has a rhetorical unity is sometimes called a verse paragraph.

The second kind of unrhymed poetry fairly common in English, especially in the twentieth century, is free verse (or vers libre): rhythmical lines varying in length, adhering to no fixed metrical pattern and usually unrhymed. Such poetry may seem formless; Robert Frost, who strongly preferred regular meter and rhyme, said that he would not consider writing free verse any more than he would consider playing tennis without a net. But free verse does have a form or pattern, often largely based on repetition and parallel grammatical structure. Whitman's "A Noiseless Patient Spider" (page 713) is an example; Arnold's "Dover Beach" (page 990) is another example, though less typical because it uses rhyme. Thoroughly typical is Whitman's "When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer."

WALT WHITMAN

For a biography of the American poet Walt Whitman (1819–1892), see the note prefacing "A Noiseless Patient Spider" (page 713).

When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer [1865]

When I heard the learn'd astronomer,
When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns before me,
When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them,
When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room,
How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick,
Till rising and gliding out I wander'd off by myself,
In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,

Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars.

What can be said about the rhythmic structure of this poem? Rhymes are absent, and the lines vary greatly in the number of syllables, ranging from 9 (the first line) to 23 (the fourth line), but when we read the poem we sense a rhythmic structure. The first four lines obviously hang together, each beginning with "When"; indeed, three of these four lines begin "When I." We may notice, too, that each of these four lines has more syllables than its predecessor (the numbers are 9, 14, 18, and 23); this increase in length, like the initial repetition, is a kind of pattern. But then, with the fifth line, which speaks of fatigue and surfeit, there is a shrinkage to 14 syllables, offering an enormous relief from the previous swollen line with its 23 syllables. The second half of the poem—the pattern established by "When" in the first four lines is dropped, and in effect we get a new stanza, also of four lines—does not relentlessly diminish the number of syllables in each succeeding line, but it almost does so: 14, 14, 13, 10.

The second half of the poem thus has a pattern too, and this pattern is more or less the reverse of the first half of the poem. We may notice too that the last line (in which the poet, now released from the oppressive lecture hall, is in communion with nature) is very close to an iambic pentameter line; that is, the poem concludes with a metrical form said to be the most natural in English. The effect of naturalness or ease in this final line, moreover, is increased by the absence of repetitions (e.g., not only of "When I," but even of such syntactic repetitions as "charts and diagrams," "tired and sick," "rising and gliding") that characterize most of the previous lines. This final effect of naturalness is part of a carefully constructed pattern in which rhythmic structure is part of meaning. Though at first glance free verse may appear unrestrained, as T. S. Eliot (a practitioner) said, "No vers is libre for the man who wants to do a good job"—or for the woman who wants to do a good job.

THE PROSE POEM

The term prose poem is sometimes applied to a short work that looks like prose but that is highly rhythmical or rich in images, or both. Here is a modern example.

CAROLYN FORCHÉ

Carolyn Forché was born in Detroit in 1950. After earning a bachelor's degree from Michigan State University and a master's degree from Bowling Green State University, she traveled widely in the Southwest, living among Pueblo Indians. Between 1978 and 1986 she made several visits to El Salvador, documenting human rights violations for Amnesty International. Her first book of poems, Gathering the Tribes, won the Yale Younger Poets award in 1975. Her second book of poems, The Country Between Us (1981), includes "The Colonel," which has been called a prose poem.

The Colonel [1978, publ. 1981]

What you have heard is true. I was in his house. His wife carried a tray of coffee and sugar. His daughter filed her nails, his son went out for the night. There were daily papers, pet dogs, a pistol on the cushion beside him. The moon swung bare on its black cord over the house. On the television was a cop show. It was in English. Broken bottles were embedded in the walls around the house to scoop the kneecaps from a man's legs or cut his hands to lace. On the windows there were gratings like those in liquor stores. We had dinner, rack of lamb, good wine, a gold bell was on the table for calling the maid. The maid brought green mangoes, salt, a type of bread. I was asked how I enjoyed the country. There was a brief commercial in Spanish. His wife took everything away. There was some talk then of how difficult it had become to govern. The parrot said hello on the terrace. The colonel told it to shutup, and pushed himself from the table. My friend said to me with his eyes: say nothing. The colonel returned with a sack used to bring groceries home. He spilled many human ears on the table. They were like dried peach halves. There is no other way to say this. He took one of them in his hands, shook it in our faces, dropped it into a water glass. It came alive there. I am tired of fooling around he said. As for the rights of anyone, tell your people they can go fuck themselves. He swept the ears to the floor with his arm and held the last of his wine in the air. Something for your poetry, no? he said. Some of the ears on the floor caught this scrap of his voice. Some of the ears on the floor were pressed to the ground.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -How would you characterize the colonel in a few sentences?
2. -We are told that the colonel spoke of "how difficult it had become to govern." What do you suppose the colonel assumes is the purpose of government? What do you assume its purpose is?
3. -How much do we know about the narrator? Can we guess the narrator's purpose in visiting the colonel? How would you characterize the narrator's tone? Do you believe the narrator?

4. -What is your response to the last sentence?

5. -What, if anything, is gained by calling this work a "prose poem" rather than a short story?

Sonnet 146 as it appears in the first publication of Shakespeare's sonnets, 1609. Notice that the first line ends with the words "my sinful earth," and the second line begins with the same words. Virtually all readers agree that the printer mistakenly repeated the words. First of all, the line makes almost no sense;

secondly, it has 12 syllables ("powres" is monosyllabic) where 10 syllables are normal. Among attractive suggested emendations—usually two syllables instead of the four of "My sinful earth"—are those that pick up imagery of conflict explicit in "rebbell powres," such as "Prey to," "Thrall to," "Foiled by," and "Vexed by," and emendations that pick up imagery of hunger explicit in "Eate" and "fed," such as "Feeding" and "Starved by." But there are plenty of other candidates, such as "Fooled by," "Rebuke these," and "Leagued with."

In Brief: Writing Arguments about Poetry

If you are going to write about a fairly short poem (say, under 30 lines), it's not a bad idea to copy out the poem, writing or typing it double-spaced. By writing it out you will be forced to notice details, down to the punctuation. After you have copied the poem, proofread it carefully against the original. Catching an error—even the addition or omission of a comma—may help you to notice a detail in the original that you might otherwise have overlooked. And now that you have the poem with ample space between the lines, you have a worksheet with room for jottings.

A good essay is based on a genuine response to a poem; a response may be stimulated in part by first reading the poem aloud and then considering the following questions.

Remember, even an explication—an unfolding of the implications of the poem—is an argument. In the example on page 667, the student begins by asserting a thesis, a claim: ‘‘‘Harlem’ is only eleven lines long, but it is charged with power.” The thesis, the arguable claim, of course is not that “the poem is only eleven lines long,” but that “it is charged with power,” and the rest of the explication is devoted to supporting this claim, to pointing out almost word by word, the sources of the power,

FIRST RESPONSE

What was your response to the poem on first reading? Did some parts especially please or displease you, or puzzle you? After some study—perhaps checking the meanings of some of the words in a dictionary and reading the poem several times—did you modify your initial response to the parts and to the whole?

SPEAKER AND TONE

1. -Who is the speaker? (Consider age, sex, personality, frame of mind, and tone of voice.) Is the speaker defined fairly precisely (for instance, an older woman speaking to a child), or is the speaker simply a voice meditating? (Jot down your first impressions, then reread the poem and make further jottings, if necessary.)

2. -Do you think the speaker is fully aware of what he or she is saying, or does the speaker unconsciously reveal his or her personality and values? What is your attitude toward this speaker?

3. -Is the speaker narrating or reflecting on an earlier experience or attitude? If so, does he or she convey a sense of new awareness, such as regret for innocence lost?

AUDIENCE

To whom is the speaker speaking? What is the situation (including time and place)? (In some poems a listener is strongly implied, but in others, especially those in which the speaker is meditating, there may be no audience other than the reader, who "overhears" the speaker.)

STRUCTURE AND FORM

1. -Does the poem proceed in a straightforward way, or at some point or points does the speaker reverse course, altering his or her tone or perception? If there is a shift, what do you make of it?

2. -Is the poem organized into sections? If so, what are these sections—stanzas, for instance—and how does each section (characterized, perhaps, by a certain tone of voice, or a group of rhymes) grow out of what precedes it?

3. -What is the effect on you of the form—say, quatrains (stanzas of four lines) or blank verse (unrhymed lines of ten syllables of iambic pentameter)? If the sense overflows the form, running without pause from (for example) one quatrain into the next, what effect is created?

CENTER OF INTEREST AND THEME

1. -What is the poem about? Is the interest chiefly in a distinctive character, or in meditation? That is, is the poem chiefly psychological or chiefly philosophical?

2. -Is the theme stated explicitly (directly) or implicitly? How might you state the theme in a sentence? What is lost by reducing the poem to a statement of a theme?

DICTION

1. -How would you characterize the language? Colloquial, or elevated, or what?
2. -Do certain words have rich and relevant associations that relate to other words and help to define the speaker or the theme or both?
3. -What is the role of figurative language, if any? Does it help to define the speaker or the theme?
4. -What do you think is to be taken figuratively or symbolically, and what literally?

SOUND EFFECTS

1. -What is the role of sound effects, including repetitions of sound (for instance, alliteration) and of entire words, and shifts in versification?
2. -If there are off-rhymes (for instance, dizzy and easy, or home and come), what effect do they have on you? Do they, for instance, add a note of tentativeness or uncertainty?
3. -If there are unexpected stresses or pauses, what do they communicate about the speaker's experience? How do they affect you?

A NOTE ON EXPLICATION

On page 42 we discuss the form known as explication, a line-by-line commentary seeking to make explicit or to explain the meaning that is implicit or hidden within the words. (Explication comes from the Latin explicare, meaning "to unfold," from ex = out + plicare = to fold.) The implication of such an activity is that writers "fold" a meaning into their words, and the reader perceives or unfolds the message. (Implication, also from the Latin word for "fold," means something entangled or involved in something else.)

An example will clarify these remarks. If we say to someone, "Shut the door," obviously we are conveying a message through these words. Also obviously, the message in "Shut the door" is not exactly the same as the message in "Would you mind shutting the door, please?" An explication would point out that the first sentence contains an authoritative tone that is not found in the second. In effect, the first sentence "says" (in addition to the point about the door) that the speaker may give orders to the hearer; or, to put it the other way around, folded into the second sentence (but not the first) is the speaker's awareness that the person receiving the words is the speaker's social equal. A slightly more complicated and much more interesting example is Julius Caesar's "I came, I saw, I conquered" (Latin: veni, vidi, vici). An explication would point out that in addition to the explicit meaning there are implicit meanings, for example that a man like Caesar does not waste words, that he is highly disciplined (the pattern of words suggests that he is a master of language), and that he is the sort of person who, on seeing something, immediately gets it under control by taking the appropriate action.

Because explication is chiefly concerned with making explicit what is implicit in a text, it is not concerned with such matters as the poet's place in history or the poet's biography, nor is it concerned with the reader's response to the poem—except to the degree that the reader's explication really may not be an objective decoding of the poem but may depend in large part on the reader's private associations. (Some literary critics would argue that the underlying premise of explication—that a writer puts a specific meaning into a work and that a reader can objectively recover that meaning—is based on the mistaken belief that readers can be objective.) If you look at the sample explication on pages 43–46, you can decide for yourself whether the student unfolded implicit meanings that the author (William Butler Yeats) had tucked into the words of his poem or whether the explication really is a personal response to the poem.

A STUDENT'S WRITTEN RESPONSE TO A POEM

What we give in this chapter is not an explication but a more personal response to a poem by Louise Glück. Like an explication, it is concerned with the author's meaning; but unlike an explication, it does not hesitate to go beyond the poem and into "the real world" that the writer of the paper lives in. The essay is not so personal that the poem disappears (as it might in an essay that says something like "This poem reminds me of the time that I ..."), but it does not claim merely to unfold meanings that Glück has embodied or entangled in her words.

First read the following biographical note and the poem.

Louise Glück

One of the leading contemporary poets, Louise Glück was born in New York City in 1943, grew up on Long Island, and attended Sarah Lawrence College and Columbia University. She has taught at a number of colleges and universities, including the University of Iowa and Williams College. Firstborn, her first book of poems, was published in 1968. Her later books include The House on Marshland (1975), from which the following poem is taken; The Triumph of Achilles (1985); The Wild Iris (1992); and Vita Nova (1999). Glück's poetry has been widely anthologized and translated. Proofs and Theories: Essays on Poetry (1995) is a collection of her literary criticism on Stanley Kunitz, T. S. Eliot, and other authors.

Gretel in Darkness [1975]

This is the world we wanted.
All who would have seen us dead are dead. I hear the witch's cry break in the moonlight through a sheet of sugar: God rewards.
Her tongue shrivels into gas. . . .
Now, far from women's arms and memory of women, in our father's hut
we sleep, are never hungry.
Why do I not forget?
My father bars the door, bars harm
from this house, and it is years.
No one remembers. Even you, my brother, summer afternoons you look at me as though you meant to leave.
as though it never happened.
But I killed for you. I see armed firs,
the spires of that gleaming kiln—
Nights I turn to you to hold me
but you are not there.
Am I alone? Spies
hiss in the stillness, Hansel,
we are there still and it is real, real,
that black forest and the fire in earnest.

A student named Jennifer Anderson was assigned to write about this poem in an Introduction to Literature course. Jennifer started her work by copying the poem on a sheet of paper and annotating it.

To follow up on these annotations and develop them, Jennifer turned next to her writing journal. She jotted down responses and ideas, and her questions about aspects of the poem and details of the language that intrigued and puzzled her.

Here are the pages from her journal:

Great poem! Haunting, eerie. My favorite so far in the course.

Story of Hansel and Gretel--Look this up. Should I summarize the story in the paper?

Speaker--Gretel. Why her, and not Hansel? Not both of them as speakers?

"in darkness"--really in darkness, or is darkness a metaphor?

Repetition in the poem: dead/dead, bar/bar, real/real.

The tone of the opening stanza--scary, ominous. Darkness, dead.

The reference to the witch. "Shrivels into gas"--creepy detail.

But the witch has been defeated. Through the power of God? Why is God mentioned in this line?--not mentioned elsewhere.

Women (not mothers) seem the enemy in stanza two. (Odd that the second stanza is indented.) The father provides safety. But safety is not enough. Gretel cannot forget the past: the real enemy is not the witch or the mothers, but her memory.

She has to talk about her memory, her experiences. "No one remembers," but she does.

I think that this is a poem about Memory: "Why do I not forget?"

Gretel doesn't want her brother to forget. She reminds him.

"Killed"--such a strong word, very direct. Gretel is angry with her brother; she feels him pulling away from her.

Something disturbed, unnatural about the poem?--the detail about Gretel looking for her brother to hold her. But he is absent. Where is he?

Who are the "Spies"? Lots of "s" sounds in these lines--spies, hiss, stillness, Hansel, still.

She addresses him by name.

She cannot escape, maybe she doesn't want to escape. Note that Gretel is describing her memories of what happened--not a poem that tells the story of Hansel and Gretel. Glück is interested in how Gretel remembers, how she feels about remembering.

Jennifer knew the main features of the Hansel and Gretel story—the brother and sister, their abandonment, their capture by a witch, and their escape. But she wanted to remind herself about the details, as her note to herself in her journal indicates.

As an experiment, Jennifer used one of the Internet search engines that her instructor had described during class. She went to:

Go2Net Network: Metacrawler http://www.go2net.com/search.html

And she searched for "hansel and gretel." A number of the results looked promising, and she linked to this one:

Grimm's Fairy Tales—Hansel and Gretel

http://www.mordent.com/folktales/grimms/hng/hng.html

Jennifer had not reread "Hansel and Gretel" since she was a child. Rereading it now was very helpful, for it clarified a number of important details in Glück's poem. It explained, for example, "the witch's cry" in the first stanza, which alludes to the witch's "horrible howl" when Gretel pushes her into the oven. It also fills out the reference to the "women" in the second stanza, who in the story include the children's cruel stepmother as well as the evil witch. Jennifer could have prepared and written her paper without taking the time to check on the story, but it was better that she did.

A Memory Poem:

Louise Glück's "Gretel in Darkness"

Everyone knows the story of Hansel and Gretel, one of the best-known of Grimm's Fairy Tales. In her poem "Gretel in Darkness" (825), Louise Glück takes for granted that we know the story--the brother and sister who are mistreated by their father and, especially, by their stepmother; their abandonment in a forest; their capture by a witch who lives in a house made of cakes and candy; the witch's plan to fatten them up (Hansel first) and then eat them; Gretel's killing of the witch by pushing her into an oven; and, finally, the children's discovery of the witch's jewels that makes them and their father (the stepmother has died) rich and happy at last. Glück's subject is not the story itself, but, instead, Gretel's memories. "Gretel in Darkness" is a haunting poem about horrors that Gretel, Glück's speaker, cannot forget.

The poem takes place after the witch has been killed and Hansel and Gretel have returned to the safety of their father's cottage. Everything now should be fine, Gretel says: "This is the world we wanted." "God rewards": God has heard their prayers and saved them. But as if it were still present, Gretel hears "the witch's cry," the witch whom Gretel killed. And the image about the witch's death that she uses is graphic and disturbing: "Her tongue shrivels into gas...." The witch was horrible, but this image is horrifying; it sticks in Gretel's mind, and the reader's too, like a shocking detail from a nightmare.

In a way the entire poem reports on a nightmare that Gretel is doomed to live in forever. "Why do I not forget?"--the key line in the poem, I think--really means that she knows she will always remember what happened to her and her brother. For Gretel this fairy tale does not have a happy ending.

Yet it does for her brother, or so it seems to Gretel. She resents Hansel's failure to remember as she does, and, with a vivid, direct choice of verb, she reminds him: "I killed for you." The nightmarish quality of Gretel's thoughts and feelings is shown again in the next lines, which once more make clear how much her past dominates the present:

I see armed firs,

the spires of that gleaming kiln--

Gretel is safe but threatened, sheltered at home but still in danger. She is caught by a terrifying and terrible past she cannot break free from. The repetitions--dead/dead, bars/bar, real/real--imply that she is trapped, not able to re-enter the present and look forward to the future. She turns to her brother for help, yet without finding the support she seeks:

Nights I turn to you to hold me

but you are not there.

Hansel (who is only named once) is not there for Gretel, and at first I felt her hurt. But Glück is not meaning to criticize Hansel for his distance, his separation from his sister. Or if Glück is, she is balancing that against Gretel's Anderson 3 absorption in the terror of her experiences. She feels that she and her brother are still in the middle of them.

As I thought further about this poem, I wondered: Strange as it sounds, maybe Gretel prefers the past to the present, because the past was so real. Life is all too safe and comfortable now, while then everything, like the fire in the oven, was so earnest, that is, so serious and intense. It was not the world she wanted--who would want to be in that house of horrors! Even now her life is menaced, as those snaky "s" sounds in the middle of the final stanza suggest. But perhaps the frightful feelings, in their intensity, were (and still are) keener and deeper than anything that Gretel knew before, or knows now, in the secure world she lives in with her father and brother. She and her brother then were so absolutely close, as they are not now. Gretel cannot let go of her past, and she does not want to.

1. -Jennifer’s instructor told the class that the essay should be “about 500 words.” Jennifer’s paper is more than that—about 650 words. Do you think that she uses her space well? Could she have shortened the essay, to bring it closer to the assigned length? If you had to suggest cuts, where would you propose to make them?

2. -Does Jennifer omit important details in the poem that you think she should have included in the paper? Explain why these should be part of her response.

3. -Give Jennifer’s paper a grade, and in a paragraph written to her, highlight the strengths and limitations of this paper. Provide her, too, with one or two specific suggestions for improving her writing in the next paper.

Poets at Work

When we read a poem aloud, whether an anonymous nursery rhyme such as “Jack and Jill went up a hill” or a work by one of the great names, the words seem so right, so inevitable, that it is hard to believe they did not flow easily. Reading, say, Keats’s “On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer” (page 747), we may think that he must have sat down and simply let the words stream from his pen. And certainly Keats himself emphasized spontaneity: In a letter he says, “If poetry comes not as naturally as leaves to a tree it had better not come at all.” Yet Keats’s manuscripts indicated that he revised his work heavily, so heavily that some of the manuscripts are almost indecipherable. Probably William Butler Yeats was speaking for all poets when he said (in a poem called “Adam’s Curse”) that a poem must seem spontaneous but is the result of hard work:

> A line will take us hours maybe;
> Yet if it does not seem a moment’s thought,
> Our stitching and unstitching has been naught.

In this chapter we give the following material:

1. -Three versions of a poem by Yeats.

2. -Two versions of a poem by Cathy Song, introduced by her comment.
3. -Two versions of a poem by Walt Whitman.
4. -Two versions of a poem by Donald Justice.

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born in a farmhouse in rural Long Island, New York, but was brought up in Brooklyn, then an independent city in New York. He attended public school for a few years (1825–1830), apprenticed as a printer in the 1830s, and then worked as a typesetter, journalist, and newspaper editor. In 1855 he published the first edition of a collection of his poems, Leaves of Grass, a book that he revised and published in one edition after another throughout the remainder of his life. During the Civil War he served as a volunteer nurse for the Union army.

In the third edition of Leaves of Grass (1860) Whitman added two groups of poems, one called "Children of Adam" and the other (named for an aromatic grass that grows near ponds and swamps) called "Calamus." "Children of Adam" celebrates heterosexual relations, whereas "Calamus" celebrates what Whitman called "manly love." Although many of the "Calamus" poems seem clearly homosexual, perhaps the very fact that Whitman published them made them seem relatively innocent; in any case, those nineteenth-century critics who condemned Whitman for the sexuality of his writing concentrated on the poems in "Children of Adam."

Enfans d'Adam, number 9 [1860]

[Leaves of Grass, 1860 edition]

Once, I passed through a populous city, imprinting my brain, for future use, with its shows, architecture, customs and traditions;
Yet now, of all that city, I remember only a woman I casually met there, who detained me for love of me, Day by day and night by night we were together,—All else has long been forgotten by me,
I remember I say only that woman that passionately clung to me,
Again we wander—we love—we separate again,
Again she holds me by the hand—I must not go!
I see her close beside me, with silent lips, sad and tremulous.

Donald Justice

Donald Justice was born in Miami, Florida, in 1925, attended local schools there, and graduated from the University of Miami in 1945. Many of his poems focus on his experiences in Florida and in Georgia, where he spent the summers during the 1930s, living on his grandparents' farm. Justice's books include A Donald Justice Reader (1991) and Collected Poems (2004). He died in 2004. Elsewheres [2004]

South

The long green shutters are drawn.
Against what parades?
Closing our eyes to the sun,

We try to imagine
The darkness of an interior learn what it is
In which something still might happen:
The razor lying open

On the cool marble washstand,
The drip of something—is it water?—

Upon stone floors.

North

Waiting Room

Already it is midsummer
In the Sweden of our lives.
The peasants have joined hands,
The trains late,
They are circling the haystacks.
We watch from the veranda.
We sit, mufflered,
Humming the tune in snatches
Great farms surround us,
Under our breath.
We tremble sometimes,
Taking our places, we wait,
Not with emotion.

Reading the signs,
We learn to expect—
The machines out of order
We
To stare out into space.
Squares of a checkerboard
We wait to be moved.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What was your response to the title, "Elsewheres," when you first encountered it? How did your response change after you read and studied the three poems?

2. -What is your response to "South"? Did you find you responded to it differently after you read "North"? How would your response change if "North" came first and "South" second?

3. -Do you think that “South” and “North” could stand together effectively as a pair? What does “Waiting Room” contribute to our experience of “Elsewheres” as a whole?

4. -Poets are often encouraged to make good use of specific details. Circle the details in these poems and comment on their significance. What is their relationship to the parts of the poems that you did not circle?

5. -Is Justice seeking to teach us something through these three poems? Please explain.

6. -Imagine that Justice had chosen to print the three poems of “Elsewheres” vertically on the page. Would that make a difference in our response? Notice that in the manuscript, the poems are presented vertically.

7. -What is your response to the manuscript page we have included, with its markings and jottings? In your view, which kind of poem is likely to be better, one that has been revised a great deal or one that has been revised hardly at all? When you read a poem, can you tell whether it has been revised? Is there a poem in this book that you feel needs further revision? Please identify it and explain your response.

CATHY SONG

Cathy Song, born in Honolulu in 1955 of a Chinese-American mother and a Korean-American father, holds a bachelor’s degree from Wellesley College and a master’s degree in creative writing from Boston University. She is the author of three books of poems, the first of which, Picture Bride (1983), was the winner in the Yale Series of Younger Poets. She has also won the Hawaii Award for Literature, and the Shelley Memorial Award from the Poetry Society of America.

Here we print a draft of an untitled poem, and the final version, now titled “Out of Our Hands.” Ms. Song has kindly provided us with a comment on the origins of the poem:

> “Out of Our Hands” was written for the poet Wing Tek Lum. Long before Wing Tek and I became friends, I had already encountered his work. The poem is informed by our friendship; my abiding respect for the poet is deepened by my affection for the man. Knowing the reality of his warm humanity allowed me to imagine the poem in a larger context—what I had felt in his poems was present and true—and in a sense, when I first encountered his work, I was ready to receive the “seeds of a language / I needed to know.” I was ready for this poet who had something to teach me.

The sense of magic and transformation is alive and well in the poem because his poems, his presence allowed that to happen with me. The images of birds and flight, children and language have everything to do with the way gifts are given and received—serendipitous and yet, there are no coincidences. When a poem is written there is someone out there waiting to read it, to have the gift descend, touch you like a leaf, a feather, a letter written just for you.

Out of Our Hands [1994]

—for Wing Tek Lum

Out of a hat
on a piece of paper
someone once gave me your name.
Your name flew out of my hand,
the black letters
dismantling the air
above the school.
I watched the letters
form the bird
seeds of a language
I needed to know,
a language borrowed
from the children I taught who shivered in borrowed coats.
Toward evening they scattered outside the school, red-bricked and torn
on the edge of Chinatown.
I watched them disappear into their lives,

undisciplined like starlings,

they disappeared

in the broken shoes of the wind.

One day your name

came back

in a poem you were writing in another city,

a poem you were determined to write for the rest of your life.

The poem a subversive act.

The poem about being Chinese,

skin the glorious color of chicken fat.

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS:

"LEDA AND THE SWAN" (THREE VERSIONS)

William Butler Yeats (1865–1939) was born in Dublin, Ireland. The early Yeats was much interested in highly lyrical, romantic poetry, often drawing on Irish mythology. The later poems, from about 1910 (and especially after Yeats met Ezra Pound in 1911), are often more colloquial. Although these later poems often employ mythological references, too, one feels that the poems are more down-to-earth. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1923.

According to Greek mythology, Zeus fell in love with Leda, disguised himself as a swan, and ravished her. Among the offspring of this union were Helen and Clytemnestra. Paris abducted Helen, causing the Greeks to raze Troy; Clytemnestra, wife of Agamemnon, murdered her husband on his triumphant return to Greece. Yeats saw political significance in the myth of beauty and war engendered by a god; but, as he tells us, when he was composing "Leda and the Swan" the political significance evaporated:

After the individualistic, demagogic movements, founded by Hobbes and popularized by the Encyclopaedists and the French Revolution, we have a soil so exhausted that it cannot grow that crop again for centuries. Then I thought "Nothing is now possible but some movement, or birth from above, preceded by some violent annunciation." My fancy began to play with Leda and the Swan for metaphor, and I began this poem, but as I wrote, bird and lady took such possession of the scene that all politics went out of it.

The first version of the poem, titled "Annunciation," is from a manuscript dated 18 September 1923; the second version was printed in a magazine, June 1924; the third version, first published in his Collected Poems of 1933, is Yeats's final one. But this third version had been almost fully achieved by 1925; the 1933 version differs from the 1925 version only in two punctuation marks: The question marks at the ends of lines 6 and 8 in the latest version were, in 1925, respectively, a comma and a semicolon.

Annunciation [1923]

Now can the swooping Godhead have his will Yet hovers, though her helpless thighs are pressed
By the webbed toes; and that all powerful bill
Has suddenly bowed her face upon his breast,
How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
All the stretched body's laid on that white rush
And feels the strange heart beating where it lies
A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead . . .
    Being so caught up
Did nothing pass before her in the air?
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop.

Leda and the Swan [1924]

A rush, a sudden wheel, and hovering still
The bird descends, and her frail thighs are pressed
By the webbed toes, and that all-powerful bill
Has laid her helpless face upon his breast
How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs!
All the stretched body's laid on the white rush
And feels the strange heart beating where it lies;
A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead.
Being so caught up,
So mastered by the brute blood of the air,
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?

Leda and the Swan [1933]

A sudden blow: the great wings beating still Above the staggering girl, her thighs caressed
By the dark webs, her nape caught in his bill,
He holds her helpless breast upon his breast.
How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
And how can body, laid in that white rush,
But feel the strange heart beating where it lies?
A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower

And Agamemnon dead.

Being so caught up, 12

So mastered by the brute blood of the air,

Did she put on his knowledge with his power

Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?

Walt Whitman

Walt Whitman, 1860 manuscript, for the poem “Once I Passed Through a Populous City,” included in the “Enfans d’Adam” (Children of Adam) section of Leaves of Grass (1860 ed.). The extensive markings on this page, some of them in dark ink, and others in light pencil, show that Whitman revised this poem carefully. Notice, for example, that Whitman wrote and crossed out both “great” and “populous” and then seemed to settle on the word “celebrated,” only to write (barely visible in the upper right corner) “populous” again, which became his final choice for the phrase “a populous city.” Note, too, the changes in gender from “only a man” and “that youth” (crossed out) and “one rude and ignorant man” to—in the published poem—“that woman” and “she holds me.”

The Span of Life: Poems from the Cradle to the Grave

"Span" is a Middle English word for a unit of measurement (the measure of space between two extremities), and the "span of life" is thus the period that measures the time from birth to death. The classical world developed the idea that human life is divided into Seven Ages, from infancy and childhood to second childhood, senility. Seven is a mystical number in many cultures: the ancient Hebrews spoke of the seven names of God, Buddhists speak of the Seven Buddhas of the Past, Pythagoreans regard seven as a lucky number, Christians speak of the Seven Deadly Sins and the Seven Last Words of Christ, Islam speaks of the Seventh Heaven, and wives speak of husbands having a seven-year itch.

True, one also finds the span of life conceived in smaller and larger numbers, for instance three (summarized by the speaker of T. S. Eliot's "Sweeney Agonistes" as "birth, and copulation, and death"), but the most memorable number is seven, perhaps because seven already had developed grand associations: The Bible speaks of the seven days of creation, and (until relatively modern times) the planets were thought to number seven.

The most famous account of the Seven Ages is by Shakespeare, spoken by the melancholy Jaques in the second act of As You Like It. Jaques is not a mouthpiece through which Shakespeare expresses his own views; rather, Jaques is a distinctive character in a comedy. He is a figure who chooses to stand apart from the general merriment, entertaining us by his engaging cynical observations. For instance, he sees the infant not as smiling or sleeping peacefully but as "mewling and puking," and he sees the "whining" freshly scrubbed schoolchild with "shining morning face, creeping like snail / Unwillingly to school." For the wry Jaques, there is no joy in infancy, no play in childhood, no laughter in youth, no loving friendship or happy marriage in maturity, no comfort or solace in old age. We see—and we greatly enjoy—the force of his seven brief descriptions of the periods of life, but we also know there is much more to life than the ridiculous and ultimately pitiful caricatures that Jaques sets forth. Indeed in the rest of As You Like It, Shakespeare gives us a much fuller view. For instance, according to Jaques, in the last stage of life human beings are left with nothing at all ("Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing"), but just after Jaques utters this line, the young lover in the play, Orlando, enters, tenderly carrying an aged, exhausted servant. Orlando's devoted care for the poor old man doesn't exactly refute Jaques, but it does help us to see that his view of the span of life is extremely narrow.

We have delayed long enough: Here is Jaques's speech.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players;
They have their exits and their entrances,
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. At first the infant,
Mewling° and puking in the nurse's arms.
Then the whining schoolboy, with his satchel
And shining morning face, creeping like snail Unwillingly to school. And then the lover, Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
Made to his mistress' eyebrow, Then a soldier,
Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,°
Jealous° in honor, sudden, and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth. And then the justice,
In fair round belly with good capon lined,
With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws° and modern instances;

And so he plays his part. The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slippered pantaloon,° 20
With spectacles on nose, and pouch on side,
His youthful hose,° well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank, and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. Last scene of all, 25
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness, and mere oblivion,
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -As we have said, the speech occurs in a play, in a dramatic situation: Jaques is one of a number of courtiers who have accompanied Duke Senior—the rightful duke and a good man, who has been banished to the forest by a usurper. In this scene, they are about to eat when the Duke comments that "This wide and universal theater / Presents more woeful pageants [i.e., scenes] than we play in." Jaques picks up the theatrical motif and offers his speech. Directors differ greatly in how they stage this speech. For instance, sometimes Jaques advances toward the audience and delivers the lines as a set speech; sometimes he remains seated; sometimes he seems casual, perhaps munching on an apple; sometimes he seems to be thinking hard, and improvising (i.e., pausing as if mentally searching for the appropriate images); sometimes he uses different voices and gestures, appropriate to the infant, the school boy, the lover, the soldier, the justice, the foolish old pantaloon, and the man in second childhood. If you were directing the play, how would you instruct Jaques to perform?

2. -The speech gives a rather dark view of life, yet it is one of Shakespeare's best-known and most-loved speeches. How do you account for its popularity?

Jaques is not Shakespeare's only character who thinks of life as a brief performance in which we each play a part. King Lear says, "When we are born, we cry that we are come / To this great stage of fools," and Macbeth says, "Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player / That struts and frets his hour upon the stage / And then is heard no more." Notice too, later in this section, that Shakespeare's contemporary, Sir Walter Raleigh, in a short poem that begins "What is our life? a play of passion," also conceives of life as a brief theatrical performance. Raleigh's poem ends:

Thus march we, playing, to our latest° rest, last

Only we die in earnest—that's no jest.

What does a human life—this life, my life—amount to? Poets across the centuries have engaged and explored this question, as the following selections in their different ways attest.

THREE SHORT LONG VIEWS

ROBERT FROST

For a biographical note on Frost (1874–1963), see page 931.

The Span of Life [1936]

The old dog barks backward without getting up.

I can remember when he was a pup.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Suppose the second line were different: "Rover leaped about when he was a pup." Have we improved or weakened the poem? Why? Come to think about it, what are your thoughts on the following version?

Old Rover barks backward without getting up.

He used to frolic when he was a pup.

Has anything been gained? Lost?

2. -The preceding question chiefly directs your thought toward relatively large-scale changes: In the revisions, the dog is named, and the speaker is no longer as evident (the difference between "I can remember," and "He used to frolic"). But now consider smaller-scale effects. In Frost's version, which of the two lines jingles a bit more than the other? Why?

SIR WALTER RALEIGH

Walter Raleigh (1552–1618) is known chiefly as a soldier and a colonizer—he was the founder of the settlement in Virginia, and he introduced tobacco into Europe—but in his own day he was known also as a poet.

What Is Our Life?

What is our life? a play of passion,
Our mirth the music of division,°
Our mothers' wombs the tiring-houses° be,
Where we are dressed for this short comedy.
Heaven the judicious, sharp spectator is,
That sits and marks still° who doth act amiss;
Our graves that hide us from the searching sun
Are like drawn curtains when the play is done.
Thus march we, playing, to our latest° rest,
Only we die in earnest—that's no jest.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Early copies of this poem vary widely in their punctuation, and none are in Raleigh's hand, so the punctuation here is the editors', not the author's. We decided not to use a capital letter for "a" in the first line, and to use a period at the end of line 8 (some editors use a semicolon), and to use a dash in line 10 (some editors use a comma). Do you approve of our choices? Why, or why not?

2. -Suppose in line 9 Raleigh had written "Thus go we, playing," instead of "Thus march we, playing." What, if anything, would be gained or lost?

3. -In line 5 Raleigh expresses the traditional Christian view that God takes notice of our behavior. If you are not a believer, does the poem therefore not interest you? Or do you still find much truth in it, for instance in such a line as "Thus march we, playing, to our latest rest"?

4. -The following short poem appears in the New England Primer, a textbook small enough to fit into a child's pocket. The earliest extant edition of the book is 1727, but this poem is believed to be several decades older.

Our days begin with trouble here,

Our life is but a span,

And cruel death is always near,

So frail a thing is man.

Which poem—this or Raleigh's—do you find more interesting? Which more memorable? Why? Does one seem truer than the other? More shapely, more aesthetically attractive? Explain.

E. E. CUMMINGS

e. e. cummings was the pen name of Edwin Estlin Cummings (1894–1962), who grew up in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and was graduated from Harvard, where he became interested in modern literature and art, especially in the movements called cubism and futurism. His father, a conservative clergyman and a professor at Harvard, seems to have been baffled by the youth's interests, but Cummings's mother encouraged his artistic activities, including his use of unconventional punctuation and capitalization.

Politically liberal in his youth, Cummings became more conservative after a visit to Russia in 1931, but early and late his work emphasizes individuality and freedom of expression.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Put into normal order (as far as possible) the words of the first two stanzas, and then compare your version with Cummings's. What does Cummings gain—or lose?

2. -Characterize the "anyone" who "sang his didn't" and "danced his did." In your opinion, how does he differ from the people who “sowed their isn’t they reaped their same”?

3. -Some readers interpret “anyone died” (line 25) to mean that the child matured and became as dead as the other adults. How might you support or refute this interpretation?

EARLY YEARS

WILLIAM BLAKE

William Blake (1757–1827) was born in London and at fourteen was apprenticed for seven years to an engraver. A Christian visionary poet, he made his living by giving drawing lessons and by illustrating books, including his own Songs of Innocence (1789) and Songs of Experience (1794). These two books represent, he said, “two contrary states of the human soul.” (“Infant Joy” comes from Innocence, “Infant Sorrow” from Experience.) In 1809 Blake exhibited his art, but the show was a failure. Not until he was in his sixties, when he stopped writing poetry, did he achieve any public recognition—and then it was as a painter.

Infant Joy [1789]

“I have no name,

I am but two days old.”

What shall I call thee?

“I happy am,

Joy is my name.” 5

Sweet joy befall thee!

Pretty joy!

Sweet joy but two days old,

Sweet joy I call thee

Thou dost smile, 10

I sing the while—

Sweet joy befall thee.

Infant Sorrow [1794]

My mother groaned! my father wept.

Into the dangerous world I leapt,

Helpless, naked, piping loud;

Like a fiend hid in a cloud. 4

Struggling in my father's hands,

Striving against my swadling bands;

Bound and weary I thought best

To sulk upon my mother's breast. 8

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -"Infant Joy" begins "I have no name," but by line 5 the infant says "Joy is my name." What does the mother reply? Does she know the infant's name?

2. -In line 9 the mother says, "Sweet joy I call thee." Does the line suggest how the mother has learned the name? What is the child's response?

3. -In "Infant Sorrow," why is the infant sorrowful? What does the baby struggle against? Does "Like a fiend" suggest that it is inherently wicked and therefore should be repressed? Or does the adult world wickedly repress energy?

4. -Why does the mother groan? Why does the father weep? Is the world "dangerous" to the infant in other than an obviously physical sense? To what degree are its parents its enemies? To what degree does the infant yield to them? In the last line, one might expect a newborn baby to nurse. What does this infant do?

5. -Compare "Infant Joy" with "Infant Sorrow." What differences in sound do you hear? In "Infant Sorrow," for instance, look at lines 3, 5, 6, and 7. What repeated sounds do you hear?

ANONYMOUS

Many of the nursery rhymes that are common today are at least two hundred years old, and some are much older. Some of their lines are nonsense ("Hey, diddle diddle," "Humpty Dumpty," "Hickory, dickory, dock"), and some are close to nonsense ("Sing a song of sixpence, a pocket full of rye") though perhaps they once made sense. Indeed, their nonsense may be part of why they endure; they evoke a strange world, a world with a cat who has a fiddle, where a cow jumped over the moon, and where "The little dog laughed, to see such sport, / And the dish ran away with the spoon." And of course they endure partly because of their strong rhythms: "Jack Sprat could eat no fat, / His wife could eat no lean, / And so between the two of them, / They licked the platter clean." True, if one is determined to connect literature with life and to find a meaning and a moral in every verse, one can say that "Jack Sprat" offers comforting reassurance that a happy marriage can be built on contrary personalities; but if this poem supports the view that "opposites attract," one wonders how much truth is in the proverbial view that "Birds of a feather flock together."

In any case, no account of the span of life can neglect the poetry that infants and children treasure. In the following nursery rhyme, "Can I get there by candle-light?" means "Can I get there before a candle is needed, that is, before dark?" rather than "Can I get there with the aid of a candle?"

How Many Miles to Babylon

How many miles to Babylon?

Three score miles and ten.

Can I get there by candle-light?

Yes, and back again.

If your heels are nimble and light,

You may get there by candle-light.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Some scholars have suggested that "Babylon" is a corruption of "Babyland," that is, the second childhood or senility that may characterize the last stage of life. In this view, “three score miles and ten” is metaphoric; life is a journey of 70 miles (cf. Psalm 90, which says “The days of our years are three score and ten”). This interpretation cannot be proved—or disproved. Does it enrich the rhyme for you? Or do you wish you had not heard of it?

2. -Recite—preferably aloud—a favorite nursery rhyme. What do you especially like about it? Why do you think it has stayed in your mind? The rhythm? The sounds of certain words? The imagery it calls to mind?

3. -You may be familiar with nursery rhymes in a language other than En-glish. If so, could you provide an example, and a translation? Do the nursery rhymes you know in this other language seem similar to or different from nursery rhymes you have heard in English?

SHARON OLDS

Sharon Olds was born in San Francisco in 1942. She was educated at Stanford University and Columbia University, has published several volumes of poetry, and has received major awards.

Rites of Passage [1983]

As the guests arrive at my son’s party
They gather in the living room—short men, men in first grade with smooth jaws and chins.
Hands in pockets, they stand around jostling, jockeying for place, small fights breaking out and calming. One says to another How old are you? Six. I’m seven. So?
They eye each other, seeing themselves tiny in the other’s pupils. They clear their throats a lot, a room of small bankers, they fold their arms and frown. I could beat you
up, a seven says to a six,

the dark cake, round and heavy as a turret, behind them on the table. My son, freckles like specks of nutmeg on his cheeks, chest narrow as the balsa keel of a model boat, long hands
cool and thin as the day they guided him out of me, speaks up as a host for the sake of the group.
We could easily kill a two-year-old,
he says in his clear voice. The other men agree, they clear their throats like Generals, they relax and get down to playing war, celebrating my son's life.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Focus on the details that the speaker provides about the boys—how they look, how they speak. What do the details reveal about them?
2. -Is the speaker's son the same as or different from the other boys?
3. -Some readers find the ironies in this poem (e.g., "short men") to be somewhat comical, while others, noting such phrases as "kill a two-year-old" and "playing war," conclude that the poem as a whole is meant to be upsetting, even frightening. How would you describe the kinds of irony that Olds uses here?
4. -An experiment in irony and point of view: Try writing a poem like this one, from the point of view of a father about the birthday party of his son, and then try writing another one by either a father or mother about a daughter's party.

LOUISE GLÜCK

Louise Glück (b. 1943) was born in New York City and attended Sarab Lawrence College and Columbia University. She has taught at Goddard College in Vermont and at Warren Wilson College in North Carolina. Her volume of poems, The Triumph of Achilles (1985), won the National Book Critics Circle Award for poetry.

The School Children [1975]

The children go forward with their little satchels.
And all morning the mothers have labored to gather the late apples, red and gold, like words of another language.
And on the other shore
are those who wait behind great desks to receive these offerings.
How orderly they are—the nails on which the children hang their overcoats of blue or yellow wool.
And the teachers shall instruct them in silence and the mothers shall scour the orchards for a way out, drawing to themselves the gray limbs of the fruit trees bearing so little ammunition.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Which words in the poem present a cute picture-postcard view of small children going to school?
2. -Which words undercut this happy scene?
3. -In the last stanza we read that “the teachers shall instruct” and “the mothers shall scour.” What, if anything, is changed if we substitute “will” for “shall”?

ROBERT HAYDEN

Robert Hayden (1913–1980) was born in Detroit, Michigan. His parents divorced when he was a child, and he was brought up by a neighboring family, whose name he adopted. In 1942, at the age of 29, he graduated from Detroit City College (now Wayne State University), and he received a master’s degree from the University of Michigan. He taught at Fisk University from 1946 to 1969 and after that, for the remainder of his life, at the University of Michigan. In 1979 he was appointed Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress, the first African-American to hold the post.

Those Winter Sundays [1962]

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him.
I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
When the rooms were warm, he'd call,
and slowly I would rise and dress,
fearing the chronic angers of that house.
Speaking indifferently to him,
who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
What did I know, what did I know of love's austere and lonely offices?

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In line 1, what does the word "too" tell us about the father? What does it suggest about the speaker and the implied hearer of the poem?
2. -How old do you believe the speaker was at the time he recalls in the second and third stanzas? What details suggest this age?
3. -What is the meaning of "offices" in the last line? What does this word suggest that other words Hayden might have chosen do not?
4. -What do you take to be the speaker's present attitude toward his father? What circumstances, do you imagine, prompted his memory of "Those Winter Sundays"?
5. -In a page or two, try to get down the exact circumstances when you spoke "indifferently," or not at all, to someone who had deserved your gratitude.

SEX, LOVE, MARRIAGE, CHILDREN

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS

William Butler Yeats (1865–1939) was born in Dublin, Ireland. The early Yeats was much interested in highly lyrical, romantic poetry, often drawing on Irish mythology. The later poems, say from about 1910, are often more colloquial, more down-to-earth, more hardheaded. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1923.

For another poem by Yeats, on old age, see page 838.

For Anne Gregory* [1930]

"Never shall a young man,
Thrown into despair
By those great honey-coloured Ramparts at your ear
Love you for yourself alone
And not your yellow hair."
"But I can get a hair-dye
And set such colour there,
Brown, or black, or carrot,
That young men in despair
May love me for myself alone
And not my yellow hair."
"I heard an old religious man
But yesternight declare
That he had found a text to prove
That only God, my dear,
Could love you for yourself alone
And not your yellow hair."

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What does it mean to say that one wants to be loved “for oneself alone”?
2. -How satisfactory is the answer given to the young woman?
3. -Is the poem sexist? Explain.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609 a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) poet. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A contemporary writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare’s “sugred Sonnets [circulate] among his private friends.”

Sonnet 116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments; love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove.
O, no, it is an ever-fixèd mark° 5
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star° to every wand’ring bark,
Whose worth’s unknown, although his height be taken.
Love’s not Time’s fool,° though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle’s compass° come; 10
Love alters not with his° brief hours and weeks
But bears° it out even to the edge of doom.°
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

KITTY TSUI

Born in Hong Kong in 1953, Kitty Tsui lived there and in England until 1969, when she came to the United States. She is an actor, an artist, and a professional bodybuilder as well as a writer. Her publications include Breathless: Erotica (1996).

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

An important element of the poem is the very conventional nature of the speaker's family, with its values and views so at odds with the speaker's. Do you think that the conflict between the speaker and her family might be too obvious, too predictable? If you do, how would you respond to the poet if she said, "But that's the way it really was"?

FRANK O'HARA

Frank O'Hara (1926–1966) was born in Baltimore, and died in a tragic accident—he was run over by a beach vehicle—on Fire Island, New York. O'Hara was not only a prolific writer of verse but also an astute critic of sculpture and painting who worked as an assistant curator at the Museum of Modern Art, in New York, and as an editor of Art News. O'Hara's first volume of poetry was A City Winter, and Other Poems (1952); Collected Poems was issued in 1971, but it was not complete. It has been supplemented by two additional volumes, Early Poems (1977) and Poems Retrieved (1977).

Homosexuality [1971]

So we are taking off our masks, are we, and keeping our mouths shut? as if we'd been pierced by a glance!

The song of an old cow is not more full of judgment than the vapors which escape one's soul when one is sick;

so I pull the shadows around me like a puff 5 and crinkle my eyes as if at the most exquisite moment of a very long opera, and then we are off!

without reproach and without hope that our delicate feet will touch the earth again, let alone “very soon.”

It is the law of my own voice I shall investigate.

I start like ice, my finger to my ear, my ear to my heart, that proud cur at the garbage can in the rain. It’s wonderful to admire oneself with complete candor, tallying up the merits of each of the latrines. 14th Street is drunken and credulous, 53rd tries to tremble but is too at rest. The good love a park and the inept a railway station, and there are the divine ones who drag themselves up and down the lengthening shadow of an Abyssinian head in the dust, trailing their long elegant heels of hot air crying to confuse the brave “It’s a summer day, and I want to be wanted more than anything else in the world.”

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Describe your response to the word that O’Hara chooses for his title. In what ways does the poem define and explore the meanings of this word and our responses to it?

2. -Characterize the point of view and tone of the speaker. Who is or are the “we” named in line 1?

3. -In line 1 the speaker declares that “we are taking off our masks,” but then immediately seems to confuse or contradict his point when he says “we” are “keeping / our mouths shut.” Explain as clearly as you can what the speaker is suggesting in this first stanza.

4. -Some of the language in this poem is ugly or unpleasant—for example, the “cur at the garbage can,” “the latrines.” What is the purpose of such language? What is its place in the structure of the poem as a whole?

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950) was born in Rockland, Maine. Even as a child she wrote poetry, and by the time she graduated from Vassar College (1917) she had achieved some notice as a poet. Millay settled for a while in Greenwich Village, a center of Bohemian activity in New York City, where she wrote, performed in plays, and engaged in feminist causes. In 1923, the year she married, she became the first woman to win the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry. Numerous other awards followed. Though she is best known as a lyric poet—especially as a writer of sonnets—she also wrote memorable political poetry and nature poetry as well as short stories, plays, and a libretto for an opera.

Sonnet xli [1923]

I, being born a woman and distressed
By all the needs and notions of my kind,
Am urged by your propinquity to find
Your person fair, and feel a certain zest
To bear your body’s weight upon my breast:
So subtly is the fume of life designed,
To clarify the pulse and cloud the mind,
And leave me once again undone, possessed.
Think not for this, however, the poor treason
Of my stout blood against my staggering brain,
I shall remember you with love, or season

My scorn with pity,—let me make it plain:

I find this frenzy insufficient reason

For conversation when we meet again.

WYATT PRUNTY

Wyatt Prunty was born in 1947 in Humboldt, Tennessee, and raised in Athens, Georgia. His books include Unarmed and Dangerous: New and Selected Poems (2000). He is the Carlton Professor of English at the University of the South in Sewanee, Tennessee, where he directs the Sewanee Writers' Conference and edits the Sewanee Writers' Series.

Learning the Bicycle [2000]

for Heather

The older children pedal past

Stable as little gyros, spinning hard

To supper, bath, and bed, until at last

We also quit, silent and tired

Beside the darkening yard where trees

Now shadow up instead of down.

Their predictable lengths can only tease

Her as, head lowered, she walks her bike alone

Somewhere between her wanting to ride

And her certainty she will always fall.

Tomorrow, though I will run behind,

Arms out to catch her, she'll tilt then balance wide

Of my reach, till distance makes her small,

Smaller, beyond the place I stop and know

That to teach her I had to follow

And when she learned I had to let her go.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Wyatt Prunty has said, “Form elevates utterance.” What do you think he means? Does “Learning the Bicycle” show this principle in action? Please explain.

2. -Please reread the poem as though it consisted only of the first stanza. How would you interpret it?

3. -What is the function of the second stanza?

4. -How does Prunty keep his poem from becoming cute and sentimental? Please be specific.

5. -What does this poem teach us about youth and age, innocence and experience?

6. -Do you know how to ride a bicycle? When did you first learn? Do you recall this experience as an especially important one in your life? What other experiences are similar to it?

ANONYMOUS

The following lines have been attributed to various writers, including the American philosopher William James (1842–1910), but to the best of our knowledge the author is unknown.

Higamus, Hogamus

Higamus, Hogamus.

Woman’s monogamous;

Hogamus higamus.

Man is polygamous.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -If you find these lines engaging, how do you account for their appeal? Does it make any difference—even a tiny difference—if the pairs are reversed: that is, if the first two lines are about men, and the second two about women?

2. -The underlying idea largely coincides with the saying, “Men are from Mars, women are from Venus.” But consider the four lines of verse: Do you agree that in the form we have just given them, they are more effective than “Men are from Mars, women are from Venus”? And how about “Women are from Venus, men are from Mars”? Admittedly the differences are small, but do you agree that one form is decidedly more effective than the others? If you do agree, how do you explain the greater effectiveness?

WORK, PLAY, GETTING ON

John Updike

John Updike (b. 1932) is best known as a writer of fiction—short stories and novels—but throughout his professional career he has also written essays and poems. (For a more complete biography, see page 101.)

Ex-Basketball Player [1958]

Pearl Avenue runs past the high-school lot,
Bends with the trolley tracks, and stops, cut off
Before it has a chance to go two blocks,
At Colonel McComsky Plaza. Berth's Garage
Is on the corner facing west, and there,
Most days, you'll find Flick Webb, who helps Berth out.
Flick stands tall among the idiot pumps—
Five on a side, the old bubble-head style,
Their rubber elbows hanging loose and low.
One's nostrils are two S's, and his eyes
An E and O. And one is squat, without A head at all—more of a football type.
Once Flick played for the high-school team, the Wizards.
He was good: in fact, the best. In '46
He bucketed three hundred ninety points,
A county record still. The ball loved Flick.
I saw him rack up thirty-eight or forty
In one home game. His hands were like wild birds.
He never learned a trade, he just sells gas,
Checks oil, and changes flats. Once in a while,
As a gag, he dribbles an inner tube,
But most of us remember anyway.

His hands are fine and nervous on the lug wrench.
It makes no difference to the lug wrench, though.
Off work, he hangs around Mae's Luncheonette.
Grease-gray and kind of coiled, he plays pinball,
Smokes those thin cigars, nurses lemon phosphates.
Flick seldom says a word to Mae, just nods
Beyond her face toward bright applauding tiers
Of Necco Wafers, Nibs, and Juju Beads.

RITA DOVE

Rita Dove was born in 1952 in Akron, Ohio. After graduating summa cum laude from Miami University (Ohio) she earned an M.F.A. at the Iowa Writers' Workshop. She has been awarded fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts, and she now teaches at the University of Virginia. In 1993 she was appointed poet laureate for 1993–1994. Dove is currently writing a book about the experiences of an African-American volunteer regiment in France during World War I.

Daystar [1986]

She wanted a little room for thinking:
but she saw diapers steaming on the line,
a doll slumped behind the door.
So she lugged a chair behind the garage to sit out the children's naps.
Sometimes there were things to watch—
the pinched armor of a vanished cricket, a floating maple leaf. Other days she stared until she was assured
when she closed her eyes
she'd see only her own vivid blood.
She had an hour, at best, before Liza appeared pouting from the top of the stairs.

And just what was mother doing out back with the field mice? Why, building a palace. Later that night when Thomas rolled over and lurched into her, she would open her eyes and think of the place that was hers for an hour—where
she was nothing,
pure nothing, in the middle of the day.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -How would you characterize the woman who is the subject of the poem?
2. -What do you make of the title?

GARY SNYDER

Gary Snyder, born in 1930, grew up on a farm north of Seattle and then in Portland, Oregon. He then went to Reed College, working during the summers with the U.S. Forest Service and in logging camps. After studying linguistics and American Indian culture at the University of Indiana, he moved to San Francisco, where he studied Japanese and became part of the "Beat" movement. (He is the hero of Jack Kerouac's novel, The Dharma Bums.) In 1956 he went to Japan, where he lived for ten years. He then returned and settled with his family in the foothills of the northern Sierra Nevada.

Hay for the Horses [1959]

He had driven half the night
From far down San Joaquin Through Mariposa, up the Dangerous mountain roads,
And pulled in at eight a.m.
With his big truckload of hay behind the barn.

With winch and ropes and hooks

We stacked the bales up clean

To splintery redwood rafters

High in the dark, flecks of alfalfa

Whirling through shingle-cracks of light,

Itch of haydust in the sweaty shirt and shoes.

At lunchtime under Black oak

Out in the hot corral,

—The old mare nosing lunchpails,

Grasshoppers crackling in the weeds—

"I'm sixty-eight" he said,

"I first bucked hay when I was seventeen.

I thought, that day I started,

I sure would hate to do this all my life.

And dammit, that's just what

I've gone and done."

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -The speaker does not explicitly offer his opinion of the man who "had driven half the night" but do the first two sentences (lines 1–14) communicate at least a hint of an attitude?

2. -The old man who speaks lines 19–24 sums up his life. He seems to regard it as wasted, but as we hear his words do we hear bitterness? Self-pity? What is our attitude toward him, and how does it compare with that of the speaker of the poem?

JAMES WRIGHT

James Wright (1927–1980) was born in Martins Ferry, Ohio, which provided him with the locale for many of his poems. He is often thought of as a poet of the Midwest, but (as in the example that we give) his poems move beyond the scenery. Wright was educated at Kenyon College in Ohio and at the University of Washington. He wrote several books of poetry and published many translations of European and Latin-American poetry.

Lying in a Hammock at William Duffy's Farm in Pine Island, Minnesota [1963]

Over my head, I see the bronze butterfly,

Asleep on the black trunk,

Blowing like a leaf in green shadow.

Down the ravine behind the empty house,

The cowbells follow one another 5

Into the distances of the afternoon.

To my right,

In a field of sunlight between two pines,

The droppings of last year's horses

Blaze up into golden stones. 10

I lean back, as the evening darkens and comes on.

A chicken hawk floats over, looking for home.

I have wasted my life.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -How important is it that the poet is "lying in a hammock"? That he is at some place other than his own home?

2. -Do you take the last line as a severe self-criticism, or as a joking remark, or as something in between, or what?

3. -Imagine yourself lying in a hammock—perhaps you can recall an actual moment in a hammock—or lying in bed, your eye taking in thesurroundings. Write a description ending with some sort of judgment or concluding comment, as Wright does. You may want to parody Wright's poem, but you need not. (Keep in mind the fact that thebest parodies are written by people who regard the original with affection.)

MARGE PIERCY

Marge Piercy, born in Detroit in 1936, was the first member of her family to attend college. After earning a bachelor's degree from the University of Michigan in 1957 and a master's degree from Northwestern University in 1958, she moved to Chicago. There she worked at odd jobs while writing novels (unpublished) and engaging in action on behalf of women and blacks and against the war in Vietnam. In 1970—the year she moved to Wellfleet, Massachusetts, where she still lives—she published her first book, a novel. Since then she has published other novels, as well as short stories, poems, and essays.

To be of use [1974]

The people I love the best jump into work head first without dallying in the shallows and swim off with sure strokes almost out of sight.
They seem to become natives of that element,
the black sleek heads of seals
bouncing like half-submerged balls.
I love people who harness themselves, an ox to a heavy cart,
who pull like water buffalo, with massive patience, who strain in the mud and the muck to move things forward,
who do what has to be done, again and again.
I want to be with people who submerge in the task, who go into the fields to harvest and work in a row and pass the bags along, who are not parlor generals and field deserters
but move in a common rhythm
when the food must come in or the fire be put out.
The work of the world is common as mud.
Botched, it smears the hands, crumbles to dust.

But the thing worth doing well done has a shape that satisfies, clean and evident.
Greek amphoras for wine or oil,
Hopi vases that held corn, are put in museums
but you know they were made to be used.
The pitcher cries for water to carry and a person for work that is real.

LAST YEARS

GWENDOLYN BROOKS

Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000) was born in Topeka, Kansas, but was raised in Chicago's South Side, where she spent most of her life. In 1950, when she won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, she became the first African-American writer to win a Pulitzer Prize.

The Bean Eaters [1960]

They eat beans mostly, this old yellow pair.
Dinner is a casual affair.
Plain chipware on a plain and creaking wood,
Tin flatware.
Two who are Mostly Good.
Two who have lived their day,
But keep on putting on their clothes
And putting things away.
And remembering . . .
Remembering, with twinklings and twinges,
As they lean over the beans in their rented back room that is full of beads and receipts and dolls and clothes, tobacco crumbs, vases and fringes.

ROBERT BURNS

Robert Burns (1759–1796), born into a poor family in Scotland, developed heart trouble as a child and died when he was only thirty-seven. His formal schooling was sketchy, but he was an avid reader, especially of English and of Scots poetry. In 1786 Burns published his first book, Poems, Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect, and found himself an overnight celebrity. Although most of his best poetry—for instance, "John Anderson" and "Auld Lang Syne" (long ago times)—is written in Scots, a northern dialect of English spoken by Scottish peasants, Burns was perfectly capable of writing standard English, such as the song "Flow Gently, Sweet Afton."

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS

For a biographical note on Yeats, see p. 838.

In the seventh century BCE the ancient Greeks founded the city of Byzantium in Thrace, where Istanbul, Turkey, now stands. (Constantine, the first Christian ruler of the Roman empire, built a new city there in CE 330. Named Constantinople, the city served as the capital of the Roman empire until 1453, when the Turks captured it. In 1930 the name was officially changed to Istanbul.) The capital of the Roman Empire and the "holy city" of the Greek Orthodox Church, Byzantium had two golden ages. The first, in its early centuries, continued the traditions of the antique Greco-Roman world. The second, which is what Yeats had in mind, extended from the mid-ninth to the mid-thirteenth century and was a distinctive blend of classical, Christian, Slavic, and even Islamic culture. This period is noted for mysticism, for the preservation of ancient learning, and for exquisitely refined symbolic art. In short, Byzantium (as Yeats saw it) was wise and passionless. In A Vision, his prose treatment of his complex mystical system, Yeats says:

> I think that in early Byzantium, maybe never before or since in recorded history, religious, aesthetic and practical life were one, that architect and artificers—though not, it may be, poets, for language has been the instrument of controversy and must have grown abstract—spoke to the multitude and the few alike. The painter, the mosaic worker, the worker in gold and silver, the illuminator of sacred books, were almost impersonal, almost perhaps without the consciousness of individual design, absorbed in their subject matter and that the vision of the whole people. They could copy out of old Gospel books those pictures that seemed as sacred as the text, and yet weave all into a vast design, the work of many that seemed the work of one, that made building, picture, pattern, metal-work of rail and lamp, seem but a single image.

Sailing to Byzantium [1926]

I

That is no country for old men. The young

In one another's arms, birds in the trees
—Those dying generations—at their song,
The salmon-falls, the mackerel-crowded seas,
Fish, flesh, or fowl, commend all summer long
Whatever is begotten, born, and dies.

Caught in that sensual music all neglect

Monuments of unaging intellect.

II

An aged man is but a paltry thing,

A tattered coat upon a stick, unless

Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing

For every tatter in its mortal dress.

Nor is there singing school but studying

Monuments of its own magnificence;

And therefore I have sailed the seas and come

To the holy city of Byzantium.

III

O sages standing in God’s holy fire

As in the gold mosaic of a wall,

Come from the holy fire, perne° in a gyre,

And be the singing-masters of my soul.

Consume my heart away; sick with desire

And fastened to a dying animal

It knows not what it is; and gather me

Into the artifice of eternity.

IV

Once out of nature I shall never take

My bodily form from any natural thing,

But such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make

Of hammered gold and gold enameling

To keep a drowsy Emperor awake;

Or set upon a golden bough to sing

To lords and ladies of Byzantium

Of what is past, or passing, or to come.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -What is “that . . . country,” mentioned in the first line?

2. -By the end of the first stanza, the speaker seems to be dismissing the natural world. Do you agree that even in this stanza, however, he sounds attracted to it?

3. -The poem is filled with oppositions, for instance “old men” versus “the young” (both in line 1), and “birds in the trees” (line 2) versus the mechanical bird in the final stanza. List as many opposites as you see in the poem, and then explain what Yeats is getting at.

4. -The first stanza speaks of “monuments of unaging intellect.” What might be some examples of these?

5. -After reading and rereading this poem, do you think you will—even if only briefly—act differently, redirect any of your choices?

6. -Have you ever visited any place—perhaps the place where you or your parents or grandparents were born, or perhaps a house of worship, or perhaps a college campus—that you have come to see symbolically, standing for a way of life or for some aspect of life? If so, describe the place and the significance that you give it.

GOOD NIGHTS

A. E. HOUSMAN

A. E. Housman (1859–1936) was one of the most distinguished classical scholars of his time. Though he left Oxford without a degree (having failed his examinations), through hard work, discipline, and rigorous study he earned an appointment in 1892 as professor of Latin at University College, London, and in 1911 as professor of Latin at Cambridge and fellow of Trinity College. Only two volumes of Housman’s poems appeared during his lifetime: A Shropshire Lad (1896) and Last Poems (1922).

To an Athlete Dying Young [1896]

The time you won your town the race

We chaired you through the market-place;

Man and boy stood cheering by,
And home we brought you shoulder-high.
Today, the road all runners come,
Shoulder-high we bring you home,
And set you at your threshold down,
Townsman of a stiller town.
Smart lad, to slip betimes away
From fields where glory does not stay
And early though the laurel grows
It withers quicker than the rose.
Eyes the shady night has shut
Cannot see the record cut,
And silence sounds no worse than cheers
After earth has stopped the ears:
Now you will not swell the rout
Of lads that wore their honors out,
Runners whom renown outran
And the name died before the man.
So set, before its echoes fade,
The fleet foot on the sill of shade,
And hold to the low lintel up
The still-defended challenge-cup.
And round that early laurelled head
Will flock to gaze the strengthless dead
And find unwithered on its curls
The garland briefer than a girl's.

W. H. AUDEN

Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) was born in York, England, and educated at Oxford. In the 1930s his left-wing poetry earned him wide acclaim as the leading poet of his generation. He went to Spain during the Spanish Civil War, intending to serve as an ambulance driver for the Republicans in their struggle against fascism, but he was so distressed by the violence of the Republicans that he almost immediately returned to England. In 1939 he came to America, and in 1946 he became a citizen of the United States, though he returned to England for his last years. Much of his poetry is characterized by a combination of colloquial diction and technical dexterity.

The Unknown Citizen[1940]

(To JS/07/M378

This Marble Monument

Is Erected by the State)

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
One against whom there was no official complaint,
And all the reports on his conduct agree
That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word, he was a saint,
For in everything he did he served the Greater Community.
Except for the War till the day he retired
He worked in a factory and never got fired,
But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
Yet he wasn't a scab or odd in his views,
For his Union reports that he paid his dues,
(Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
And our Social Psychology workers found
That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
The Press are convinced that he bought a paper every day
And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way.
Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured,
And his Health-card shows he was once in hospital but left it cured.

Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare
He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Installment Plan
And had everything necessary to the Modern Man,
A phonograph, radio, a car and a frigidaire.
Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
When there was peace, he was for peace; when there was war, he went.
He was married and added five children to the population,
Which our Eugenist says was the right number for a parent of his generation,
And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

ANONYMOUS

On page 707, in our chapter on lyric poetry, we talk briefly about African- American spirituals. These songs were first printed shortly after the Civil War. We reprint here a song from a fairly early collection, J. B. T. March's The Story of the Jubilee Singers (1881).

"Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" derives its basic images from the geography of ancient Israel (the Jordan River flows north from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea) and from a book in the Hebrew Bible (2 Kings 2.11 reports that Elijah and his friend Elisha were walking by the Jordan, when "there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder, and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven"). There may also be some influence of the New Testament, Luke 16.22, which reports that a rich man named Dives and a poor man were "carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom." Further, the line "I'm sometimes up and sometimes down," from a secular song, "Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen," often found its way into "Swing Low," as in this version, where the fourth verse goes:

I'm sometimes up and sometimes down.
But still my soul feels heavenly bound.

Swing Low, Sweet Chariot

Voices from Below

William Shakespeare

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) returned to his native Stratford about 1611, after a theatrical career in London. The grave slab beneath which he is buried warns against disturbing his bones. If you have read Hamlet you know that in old parish churches, the bones of persons long dead might be disturbed in the course of digging a grave for a new corpse. These four lines, probably by Shakespeare (but there really is no proof as to who wrote them), have effectively kept his bones where they were originally deposited.

Note: What looks like the letter Y is a letter called thorn, no longer in our alphabet, pronounced "th" (either as in the or thin). In writing the word the, the e was customarily placed above the thorn, and to a modern viewer the word looks like Ye, but it was never pronounced as "ye." (See the manuscript of "Western Wind," page 699, for another example.)

Epitaph

GOOD FREND FOR JESUS SAKE FORBEARE,

TO DIGG THE DUST ENCLOASED HEARE:

BLESTE BE Y^{E} MAN Y^{T} SPARES THES STONES,

AND CURST BE HE Y^{T} MOVES MY BONES.

Thomas Hardy

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England, the son of a stonemason. Despite great obstacles he studied the classics and architecture, and in 1862 he moved to London to study and practice as an architect. Ill health forced him to return to Dorset, where he continued to work as an architect and to write. Best known for his novels, Hardy ceased writing fiction after the hostile reception of Jude the Obscure in 1896 and turned to writing lyric poetry.

Ah, Are You Digging on My Grave [1916]

"Ah, are you digging on my grave,

My loved one?—planting rue?"

—"No: yesterday he went to wed

One of the brightest wealth has bred.

‘It cannot hurt her now,’ he said,
‘That I should not be true.’”
“Then who is digging on my grave?
My nearest dearest kin?”
—“Ah, no: they sit and think, ‘What use!
What good will planting flowers produce?
No tendance of her mound can loose
Her spirit from Death’s gin.’”°
“But some one digs upon my grave?
My enemy?—prodding sly?”
—“Nay: when she heard you had passed the Gate
That shuts on all flesh soon or late,
She thought you no more worth her hate,
And cares not where you lie.”
“Then, who is digging on my grave?
Say—since I have not guessed!”
—“O it is I, my mistress dear,
Your little dog, who still lives near,
And much I hope my movements here
Have not disturbed your rest?”
“Ah, yes! You dig upon my grave . . .
Why flashed it not on me
That one true heart was left behind!
What feeling do we ever find
To equal among human kind
A dog’s fidelity!”
“Mistress, I dug upon your grave
To bury a bone, in case

I should be hungry near this spot

When passing on my daily trot.

I am sorry, but I quite forgot

It was your resting-place."

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -If the dog had returned to the grave out of affection, would the poem be sentimental? If so, is Hardy's poem necessarily unsentimental? Or is there, despite the cynicism, a kind of sentimentality (overindulgence in feeling, excessive appeal to pity) in the poem? Explain.

2. -Is the order of the first three stanzas arbitrary, or is there some logic to the arrangement? What, if anything, would be lost by the omission of the third stanza?

3. -How does this poem resemble a popular ballad? (See pages 676–677.) How does it not?

EDGAR LEE MASTERS

Edgar Lee Masters (1869–1950) achieved international fame with The Spoon River Anthology (1915), a collection of poems spoken by the deceased inhabitants of a mythical village called Spoon River. We present here a group of three related poems.

Minerva Jones [1915]

I am Minerva, the village poetess,

Hooted at, jeered at by the Yahoos of the street

For my heavy body, cock-eye, and rolling walk,

And all the more when "Butch" Weldy

Captured me after a brutal hunt.

He left me to my fate with Doctor Meyers;

And I sank into death, growing numb from the feet up,

Like one stepping deeper and deeper into a stream of ice.

Will someone go to the village newspaper

And gather into a book the verses I wrote?—

I thirsted so for love!

I hungered so for life!

Doctor Meyers [1915]

No other man, unless it was Doc Hill,

Did more for people in this town than I.

And all the weak, the halt, the improvident

And those who could not pay flocked to me.

I was good-hearted, easy Doctor Meyers.

I was healthy, happy, in comfortable fortune,

Blest with a congenial mate, my children raised,

All wedded, doing well in the world.

And then one night, Minerva, the poetess,

Came to me in her trouble, crying.

I tried to help her out—she died—

They indicted me, the newspapers disgraced me,

My wife perished of a broken heart,

And pneumonia finished me.

Mrs. Meyers [1915]

He protested all his life long

That newspapers lied about him villainously;

That he was not at fault for Minerva's fall,

But only tried to help her.

Poor soul so sunk in sin he could not see

That even trying to help her, as he called it,

He had broken the law human and divine.

Passers-by, an ancient admonition to you:

If your ways would be ways of pleasantness,

And all your pathways peace,

Love God and keep his commandments.

American Voices: Poems for a Diverse Nation

PAULA GUNN ALLEN

Part Sioux-Laguna and part Lebanese-Jewish, Paula Gunn Allen was born in 1939 in Cubero, New Mexico, into a family that used five languages. Allen, who holds a Ph.D. from the University of New Mexico, teaches Native American Studies at San Francisco State University. She has written several books of poems, a novel, a collection of traditional tales, and a collection of essays, The Sacred Hoop: Recovering the Feminine in American Indian Traditions (1986).

Captain John Smith (1580–1631), an English colonist in Virginia, was captured in 1608 by Chesapeake Indians, who brought him to their chief or king, Powhatan. Years later, in the account he gave in The Generall Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles (1624), he says he was condemned to death but saved by Powhatan's daughter, Pocahontas ("Playful One"). The fact that Smith did not report this episode in his earlier account of the Virginia colony, A True Relation . . . of Virginia (1608), has caused many historians to doubt it. Whatever the truth of Smith's report that Pocahontas (c. 1595–1617) rescued him, it is a fact that in 1613 Pocahontas was captured, taken to Jamestown, and held as hostage for English prisoners held by Powhatan. In Jamestown she was converted to Christianity, baptized, and in 1614, with the permission of her father and of the governor of the colony she was married to John Rolfe, a colonist. In 1616 Pocahontas and several other Indians went to England, where she was presented as a princess to the king and queen, and where, dressed in the English fashion, her portrait was engraved. In 1617 she started to return from England, but died before she could embark. She is buried in the parish churchyard at Gravesend, on the Thames River.

Pocahontas to Her English Husband, John Rolfe [1988]

Had I not cradled you in my arms, oh beloved perfidious one,
you would have died.
And how many times did I pluck you from certain death in the wilderness—my world through which you stumbled as though blind?
Had I not set you tasks
your masters far across the sea would have abandoned you—did abandon you, as many times they left you to reap the harvest of their lies;
still you survived oh my fair husband and brought them gold wrung from a harvest I taught you to plant: Tobacco. It is not without irony that by this crop your descendants die, for other powers than those you know take part in this.
And indeed I did rescue you not once but a thousand thousand times and in my arms you slept, a foolish child,
and beside me you played,
chattering nonsense about a God
you had not wit to name;

and wondered you at my silence—simple foolish wanton maid you saw, dusky daughter of heathen sires who knew not the ways of grace—no doubt, no doubt.
I spoke little, you said.
And you listened less.
But played with your gaudy dreams and sent ponderous missives to the throne striving thereby to curry favor with your king. I saw you well. I understood the ploy and still protected you, going so far as to die in your keeping—a wasting, putrifying death, and you, deceiver, my husband, father of my son, survived, your spirit bearing crop slowly from my teaching, taking certain life from the wasting of my bones.

In Acton.° And the Miller is said to have laughed—
If you like to call such a sound a laugh.
But he gave no one else a laugher's license.
For he turned suddenly grave as if to say,
"Whose business,—if I take it on myself,
Whose business—but why talk round the barn?—

When it's just that I hold with getting a thing done with."

You can't get back and see it as he saw it.

It's too long a story to go into now.

You'd have to have been there and lived it.

Then you wouldn't have looked on it as just a matter of who began it between the two races.

Some guttural exclamation of surprise

The Red Man gave in poking about the mill

Over the great big thumping shuffling mill-stone

Disgusted the Miller physically as coming

From one who had no right to be heard from.

"Come, John,' he said, 'you want to see the wheel pit?"°

He took him down below a cramping rafter,

And showed him, through a manhole in the floor,

The water in desperate straits like frantic fish,

Salmon and sturgeon, lashing with their tails.

Then he shut down the trap door with a ring in it

That jangled even above the general noise,

And came up stairs alone—and gave that laugh,

And said something to a man with a meal-sack

That the man with the meal-sack didn't catch—then.

Oh, yes, he showed John the wheel pit all right.

AURORA LEVINS MORALES

Aurora Levins Morales, born in Puerto Rico in 1954, came to the United States with her family in 1967. She has lived in Chicago and New Hampshire and now lives in the San Francisco Bay area. Levins Morales has published stories, essays, prose poems, and poems.

Child of the Americas [1986]

I am a child of the Americas,

a light-skinned mestiza of the Caribbean,

a child of many diaspora,° born into this continent at a crossroads.

I am a U.S. Puerto Rican Jew, a product of the ghettos of New York I have never known.

An immigrant and the daughter and granddaughter of immigrants.

I speak English with passion: it's the tongue of my consciousness, a flashing knife blade of crystal, my tool, my craft.

I am Caribeña,° island grown. Spanish is in my flesh, ripples from my tongue, lodges in my hips:

the language of garlic and mangoes,

the singing in my poetry, the flying gestures of my hands.

I am of Latinoamerica, rooted in the history of my continent:

I speak from that body.

I am not african. Africa is in me, but I cannot return.

I am not taína.° Taíno is in me, but there is no way back.

I am not european. Europe lives in me, but I have no home there.

I am new. History made me. My first language was spanglish.°

I was born at the crossroads and I am whole.

JOSEPH BRUCHAC III

Joseph Bruchac III (the name is pronounced "Brewshack") was born in Saratoga Springs, New York, in 1942, and educated at Cornell University, Syracuse University, and Union Graduate School. Like many other Americans, he has a multicultural ethnic heritage, and he includes Native Americans as well as Slovaks among his ancestors. Bruchac, who has taught in Ghana and in the United States, has chiefly worked as an editor.

"Much of my writing and my life," Bruchac says, "relates to the problem of being an American. . . .

While in college I was active in Civil Rights work and in the anti-war movement. . . . I went to Africa to teach—but more than that to be taught. It showed me many things. How much we have as Americans and take for granted. How much our eyes refuse to see because they are blinded to everything in a man's face except his color."

Ellis Island [1978]

Beyond the red brick of Ellis Island where the two Slovak children who became my grandparents waited the long days of quarantine, after leaving the sickness,
the old Empires of Europe,
a Circle Line ship slips easily on its way to the island of the tall woman, green as dreams of forests and meadows waiting for those who'd worked a thousand years
yet never owned their own.
Like millions of others,
I too come to this island,
nine decades the answerer of dreams.
Yet only one part of my blood loves that memory.
Another voice speaks of native lands
within this nation.
Lands invaded
when the earth became owned.

Lands of those who followed the changing Moon,
knowledge of the seasons
in their veins.

MITSUYE YAMADA

Mitsuye Yamada, the daughter of Japanese immigrants to the United States, was born in Japan in 1923, during her mother's return visit to her native land. Yamada was raised in Seattle; but in 1942 she and her family were incarcerated and then relocated in a camp in Idaho, when Executive Order 9066 gave military authorities the right to remove any and all persons from "military areas." In 1954 she became an American citizen. She has taught in the Asian American Studies Program at the University of California at Irvine, and she is the author of poems and stories.

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA

Yusef Komunyakaa was born in 1947 in Bogalusa, Louisiana. After graduating from high school he entered the army and served in Vietnam, where he was awarded the Bronze Star. On his return to the United States he earned a bachelor's degree at the University of Colorado, and then earned an M.A. at Colorado State University and an M.F.A. in creative writing at the University of California, Irvine. The author of several books of poetry, he has been teaching at Indiana University in Bloomington since 1985.

“Facing It” is the last poem in a book of poems about Vietnam, Dien Cai Dau (1988). The title of the book is a slang word for crazy.

Facing It [1988]

My black face fades, hiding inside the black granite.
I said I wouldn’t,
dammit: No tears.
I’m stone. I’m flesh.
My clouded reflection eyes me like a bird of prey, the profile of night slanted against morning. I turn this way—the stone lets me go.
I turn that way—I’m inside
the Vietnam Veterans Memorial again, depending on the light to make a difference.
I go down the 58,022 names,
half-expecting to find 15
my own in letters like smoke.
I touch the name Andrew Johnson;
I see the booby trap’s white flash.
Names shimmer on a woman’s blouse
but when she walks away
the names stay on the wall.
Brushstrokes flash, a red bird’s wings cutting across my stare.
The sky. A plane in the sky.
A white vet’s image floats closer to me, then his pale eyes look through mine. I'm a window.

He's lost his right arm

inside the stone. In the black mirror

a woman's trying to erase names:

No, she's brushing a boy's hair.

Claude McKay

Claude McKay (1890–1948), born in Jamaica, came to the United States when he was 23. McKay is known chiefly for his militant left-wing writings—novels and essays as well as poems—but he wrote a wide range of lyric poetry, and despite his radicalism he favored (like his friend Countee Cullen) traditional poetic forms such as the sonnet.

America [1921]

Although she feeds me bread of bitterness,

And sinks into my throat her tiger's tooth,

Stealing my breath of life, I will confess

I love this cultured hell that tests my youth!

Her vigor flows like tides into my blood,

Giving me strength against her hate.

Her bigness sweeps my being like a flood.

Yet as a rebel fronts a king in state,

I stand within her walls with not a shred

Of terror, malice, not a word of jeer.

Darkly I gaze into the days ahead,

And see her might and granite wonders there,

Beneath the touch of Time's unerring hand,

Like priceless treasures sinking in the sand.

DUDLEY RANDALL

Born in Washington, D.C., in 1914, Randall graduated from Wayne State University and the University of Michigan, and worked as a reference librarian and as poet in residence at the University of Detroit. In 1965 he founded the Broadside Press, widely recognized as influential far beyond its size. Broadside Press issues excellent small books and single sheets with poems by African-Americans.

The Melting Pot [1968]

There is a magic melting pot where any girl or man can step in Czech or Greek or Scot, step out American.
Johann and Jan and Jean and Juan,
Giovanni and Ivan
step in and then step out again
all freshly christened John.
Sam, watching, said, "Why, I was here even before they came,"
and stepped in too, but was tossed out before he passed the brim.
And every time Sam tried that pot
they threw him out again.
"Keep out. This is our private pot
We don't want your black stain."
At last, thrown out a thousand times,
Sam said, "I don't give a damn.
Shove your old pot. You can like it or not, but I'll be just what I am."

Jimmy Santiago Baca

Jimmy Santiago Baca, of chicano and Apache descent, was born in 1952. When he was 2 his parents divorced, and a grandparent brought him up until he was 5, when he was placed in an orphanage in New Mexico. He ran away when he was 11, lived on the streets, took drugs, and at the age of 20 was convicted of drug possession. In prison he taught himself to read and write, and he began to compose poetry. A fellow inmate urged him to send some poems to Mother Jones magazine, and the work was accepted. In 1979 Louisiana State University Press published a book of his poems, Immigrants in Our Own Land. He has since published several other books.

So Mexicans Are Taking Jobs from Americans [1979]

O Yes? Do they come on horses with rifles, and say,
Ese gringo,° gimmee your job?
And do you, gringo, take off your ring, drop your wallet into a blanket spread over the ground, and walk away?
I hear Mexicans are taking your jobs away.
Do they sneak into town at night,
and as you're walking home with a whore,
do they mug you, a knife at your throat,
saying, I want your job?
Even on TV, an asthmatic leader crawls turtle heavy, leaning on an assistant,
and from a nest of wrinkles on his face,
a tongue paddles through flashing waves of lightbulbs, of cameramen, rasping

“They’re taking our jobs away.”
Well, I’ve gone about trying to find them, asking just where the hell are these fighters.
The rifles I hear sound in the night are white farmers shooting blacks and browns whose ribs I see jutting out and starving children,
I see the poor marching for a little work,
I see small white farmers selling out to clean-suited farmers living in New York, who’ve never been on a farm,
don’t know the look of a hoof or the smell of a woman’s body bending all day long in fields.
I see this, and I hear only a few people got all the money in this world, the rest count their pennies to buy bread and butter.
Below that cool green sea of money,
millions and millions of people fight to live,
search for pearls in the darkest depths of their dreams, hold their breath for years trying to cross poverty to just having something.
The children are dead already. We are killing them, that is what America should be saying;
on TV, in the streets, in offices, should be saying,
“We aren’t giving the children a chance to live.”
Mexicans are taking our jobs, they say instead.
What they really say is, let them die,
and the children too.

Sherman Alexie

Sherman Alexie, born in 1966 in Spokane, Washington, holds a B.A. from Washington State University. Author of novels, stories, and poems, Alexie has been awarded a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. Of his life and his work he says, "I am a Spokane Coeur d'Alene Indian. . . . I live on the Spokane Indian Reservation. Everything I do now, writing and otherwise, has its origin in that."

On the Amtrak from Boston to New York City [1993]

The white woman across the aisle from me says, "Look, look at all the history, that house on the hill there is over two hundred years old,"
as she points out the window past me into what she has been taught. I have learned little more about American history during my few days back East than what I expected and far less of what we should all know of the tribal stories whose architecture is 15,000 years older than the corners of the house that sits museumed on the hill. "Walden Pond,"° the woman on the train asks, "Did you see Walden Pond?"
and I don't have a cruel enough heart to break her own by telling her there are five Walden Ponds on my little reservation out West and at least a hundred more surrounding Spokane, the city I pretend to call my home. "Listen,"
I could have told her. "I don't give a shit about Walden. I know the Indians were living stories around that pond before Walden's grandparents were born and before his grandparents' grandparents were born.
I'm tired of hearing about Don-fucking-Henley° saving it, too, because that's redundant. If Don Henley's brothers and sisters and mothers and fathers hadn't come here in the first place then nothing would need to be saved."

But I didn't say a word to the woman about Walden Pond because she smiled so much and seemed delighted that I thought to bring her an orange juice back from the food car. I respect elders of every color. All I really did was eat my tasteless sandwich, drink my Diet Pepsi and nod my head whenever the woman pointed out another little piece of her country's history while I, as all Indians have done since this war began, made plans for what I would do and say the next time somebody from the enemy thought I was one of their own.

My Mother, Who Came from China, Where She Never Saw Snow [1977]

In the huge, rectangular room, the ceiling

a machinery of pipes and fluorescent lights,

ten rows of women hunch over machines,

their knees pressing against pedals and hands pushing the shiny fabric thick as tongues through metal and thread.

My mother bends her head to one of these machines.

Her hair is coarse and wiry, black as burnt scrub.

She wears glasses to shield her intense eyes.

A cone of orange thread spins. Around her,

Variations on Themes: Poems and Paintings

WRITING ABOUT POEMS AND PAINTINGS

Are there, one may ask, significant correspondences among the arts? If we talk about rhythm in a painting, are we talking about a quality similar to rhythm in a poem? Are the painter's colors comparable to the poet's images? Does it make sense to say, as Goethe (1749–1832) said, that architecture is frozen music? Or to call architecture "music in space"? Many artists of one sort have felt that their abilities ought to enable them to move into a "sister art," and they have tried their hand at something outside their specialty, usually with no great success. (William Blake, represented in this book by several poems and pictures, is often said to be the only figure in English arts who is significant both as a poet and as a painter.) For instance, the painter Edgar Degas (1834–1917) tried to write sonnets, but could not satisfy even himself. When he complained to his friend, the poet Stéphane Mallarmé, that he couldn't write poems even though he had plenty of ideas, Mallarmé replied, "You don't write poems with ideas; you write them with words."

Painters have been moved, for many centuries, to illustrate texts. More than two thousand years ago the painters of Greek vases illustrated the Greek myths, and from the Middle Ages onward artists have illustrated the Bible. Conversely, poets have been moved to write about paintings or sculptures. In this chapter we reprint several poems about paintings by Brueghel, van Gogh, and others.

Despite Mallarmé's witty remark that poems are made not with ideas but with words (and despite Archibald MacLeish's assertion, on page 998, that "A poem should not mean/But be"), of course poems use ideas, and of course they have meanings. When you read the poems that we print along with paintings, you might think about some of the following questions:

- -What is your own first response to the painting? In interpreting the painting, consider the subject matter, the composition (for instance, balanced masses, as opposed to an apparent lack of equilibrium), the technique (for instance, vigorous brushstrokes of thick paint, as opposed to thinly applied strokes that leave no trace of the artist's hand), the color, and the title.
- -Now that you have read the poem, do you see the painting in a somewhat different way?
- -To what extent does the poem illustrate the painting, and to what extent does it depart from the painting and make a very different statement?
- -Beyond the subject matter, what (if anything) do the two works have in common?

A Sample Student Essay

On page 903 read (preferably aloud) Anne Sexton's "The Starry Night," which was inspired by van Gogh's painting of the same name. Then read the following essay.

Two Ways of Looking at a Starry Night

About a hundred years ago Vincent van Gogh looked up into the sky at night and painted what he saw, or what he felt. We know that he was a very religious man, but even if we had not heard this in an art course or read it in a book we would know it from his painting The Starry Night, which shows a glorious heaven, with stars so bright that they all have halos. Furthermore, almost in the lower center of the picture is a church, with its steeple rising above the hills and pointing to the heavens.

Anne Sexton's poem is about this painting, and also (we know from the line she quotes above the poem) about van Gogh's religious vision of the stars. But her poem is not about the heavenly comfort that the starry night offered van Gogh. It is a poem about her wish to die. As I understand the poem, she wants to die in a blaze of light, and to become extinct. She says, Washington 2 in the last line of the poem, that she wants to disappear with "no cry" (903), but this seems to me to be very different from anything van Gogh is saying. His picture is about the glorious heavens, not about himself. Or if it is about himself, it is about how wonderful he feels when he sees God's marvelous creation. Van Gogh is concerned with praising God as God expresses himself in nature; Anne Sexton is concerned with expressing her anguish and with her hope that she can find extinction. Sexton's world is not ruled by a benevolent God but is ruled by an "old unseen serpent." The night is a "rushing beast," presided over by a "great dragon."

Sexton has responded to the painting in a highly unique way. She is not trying to put van Gogh's picture into words that he might approve of. Rather, she has boldly used the picture as a point of departure for her own word-picture.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Do you agree with this student's analysis, especially her point about Sexton's poem?
2. -Has the student cited and examined passages from the poem in a convincing way?
3. -A general question: Do you think poets are obliged to be faithful to the paintings that they write about, or do poets enjoy the freedom—a kind of poetic license—to interpret a painting just as they choose, doing with it whatever the purpose of the poem requires?

JANE FLANDERS

Jane Flanders, born in Waynesboro, Pennsylvania, in 1940, and educated at Bryn Mawr College and Columbia University, is the author of three books of poems. Among her awards are poetry fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts and the New York Foundation for the Arts.

Van Gogh's Bed [1985]

is orange,

like Cinderella's coach, like the sun when he looked it straight in the eye.
is narrow,
he slept alone, tossing between two pillows, while it carried him bumpily to the ball.
is clumsy,
but friendly. A peasant built the frame; an old wife beat the mattress till it rose like meringue.
is empty,
morning light pours in like wine, melody, fragrance,
the memory of happiness.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

-Jane Flanders has told us that the poem is indebted not only to the painting but also to two comments in letters that van Gogh wrote to his brother, Theo:

> I can tell you that for my part I will try to keep a straight course, and will paint the most simple, the most common things.
>
> My eyes are still tired, but then I had a new idea in my head and here is the sketch of it. . . . It's just simply my bedroom, only here color is to do everything, and giving by its simplification a grander style to things, is to be suggestive here of rest or of sleep in general. In a word, to look at the picture ought to rest the brain or rather the imagination.
> (September 1888)

1. -Does the painting convey "rest" to you? If not, has van Gogh failed to paint a picture of interest?

What does the picture convey to you?

2. -In an earlier version, the last stanza of the poem went thus:

empty,

morning light pours in like wine; the sheets are what they are, casting no shadows.

Which version do you prefer? Why?

ADRIENNE RICH

Adrienne Rich's most recent books of poetry are The School Among the Ruins: Poems 2000–2004, and Fox: Poems 1998–2000 (Norton). A selection of her essays, Arts of the Possible: Essays and Conversations, was published in 2001. A new edition of What is Found There: Notebooks on Poetry and Politics, appeared in 2003. Mourning Picture[1965]

(The picture was painted by Edwin Romanzo Elmer (1850–1923) as a memorial to his daughter Effie. In the poem, it is the dead girl who speaks.)

They have carried the mahogany chair and the cane rocker out under the lilac bush, and my father and mother darkly sit there, in black clothes.

Our clapboard house stands fast on its hill,

my doll lies in her wicker pram gazing at western Massachusetts.

This was our world.

I could remake each shaft of grass

feeling its rasp on my fingers, draw out the map of every lilac leaf or the net of veins on my father's grief-tranced hand.

Out of my head, half-bursting,
still filling, the dream condenses—
shadows, crystals, ceilings, meadows, globes of dew.
Under the dull green of the lilacs, out in the light carving each spoke of the pram, the turned porch-pillars, under high early-summer clouds,
I am Effie, visible and invisible,
remembering and remembered.
They will move from the house,
give the toys and pets away.
Mute and rigid with loss my mother will ride the train to Baptist Corner,
the silk-spool will run bare.
I tell you, the thread that bound us lies faint as a web in the dew.
Should I make you, world, again,
could I give back the leaf its skeleton, the air its early-summer cloud, the house its noonday presence, shadowless, and leave this out? I am Effie, you were my dream.

Beauty and Sadness [1983]

for Kitagawa Utamaro

He drew hundreds of women
in studies unfolding
like flowers from a fan.
Teahouse waitresses, actresses,
geishas, courtesans and maids.
They arranged themselves before this quick, nimble man whose invisible presence
one feels in these prints is as delicate as the skinlike paper
he used to transfer and retain their fleeting loveliness.
Crouching like cats,
they purred amid the layers of kimono swirling around them
as though they were bathing in a mountain pool with irises growing in the silken sunlit water.
Or poised like porcelain vases, slender, erect and tall: their heavy brocaded hair was piled high with sandalwood combs and blossom sprigs poking out like antennae.
They resembled beautiful iridescent insects, creatures from a floating world.

Utamaro absorbed these women of Edo in their moments of melancholy
He captured the wisp of shadows, the half-draped body emerging from a bath; whatever skin was exposed was powdered white as snow.
A private space disclosed.
Portraying another girl catching a glimpse of her own vulnerable face in the mirror, he transposed the trembling plum lips
like a drop of blood
soaking up the white expanse of paper.
At times, indifferent to his inconsolable eye, the women drifted through the soft gray feathered light, maintaining stillness, the moments in between.
Like the dusty ash-winged moths that cling to the screens in summer and that the Japanese venerate
as ancestors reincarnated;
Utamaro graced these women with immortality in the thousand sheaves of prints fluttering into the reverent hands of keepers:
the dwarfed and bespectacled painter holding up to a square of sunlight what he had carried home beneath his coat

one afternoon in winter.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In the first stanza the women in Utamaro's prints possess a "fleeting loveliness." What does "fleeting" suggest here? What are Utamaro's characteristics in this stanza?

2. -In the second stanza would you say that the women are beautiful, or not? And in the third stanza? What do they look like in each stanza?

3. -In the last stanza, in the last few lines, we learn that Utamaro was a "dwarfed and bespectacled painter." We might have learned this earlier or not at all. Why does Song wait until this late in the poem to tell us?

CARL PHILLIPS

Carl Phillips was born in 1959 in Everett, Washington, and educated at Harvard and at Boston University. African-American, gay, a scholar of classical Greek and Latin, and the author of several books of poetry, he has taught creative writing at Harvard, and he now teaches English and African-American Studies at Washington University in St. Louis.

Luncheon on the Grass [1993]

They're a curious lot, Manet's scandalous lunch partners. The two men, lost in cant and full dress, their legs sprawled subway-style, as mens legs invariably are, seem remarkably unruffled, all but oblivious to their nude female companion. Her nudity is puzzling and correct; clothes for her are surely only needed to shrug a shoulder out of. She herself appears baldly there-for-the-ride; her eyes, moving out toward the viewer, are wide with the most banal, detached surprise, as if to say, "where's
the real party?"

Now, in a comparable state of outdoor undress, I'm beginning to have a fair idea of what's going on in that scene. Watching you, in clothes, remove one boot to work your finger toward an itch in your athletic sock,
I look for any similarities between art and our afternoon here on abandoned property. The bather in the painting's background, presumably there for a certain balance of composition, is for us an ungainly, rusted green dumpster, rising from overgrown weeds that provide a contrast only remotely pastoral. We are two to Manet's main group of three, but the hum of the odd car or truck on the highway below us offers a transient third.
Like the nude, I don't seem especially hungry, partly because it's difficult eating naked when everyone else is clothed, partly because you didn't remember I hate chicken salad.
The beer you opened for me sits untouched, going flat in the sun. I stroke the wet bottle fitfully, to remind myself just how far we've come or more probably have always been from the shape of romance. My dear, this is not art; we're not anywhere close to Arcadia.°

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -The author is openly gay. Does knowledge of his sexual orientation affect the way in which you read the poem? Explain.

2. -Do you agree that the speaker and the partner are “not anywhere close/ to Arcadia”? Support your response with evidence.

ANNE SEXTON

Anne Sexton (1928–1975) was born in Newton, Massachusetts. She attended Garland Junior College, married at 20, and began a life as a housewife. After a mental breakdown at the age of 28 she took up writing poetry on the suggestion of a therapist. She published eight books of poetry, the third of which won a Pulitzer Prize. Despite her literary success, her life was deeply troubled. She committed suicide in 1975.

The Starry Night [1961]

That does not keep me from having a terrible need of—shall I say the word—religion. Then I go out at night to paint the stars.

—Vincent van Gogh in a letter to his brother

The town does not exist

except where one black-haired tree slips up like a drowned woman into the hot sky.

The town is silent. The night boils with eleven stars

Oh starry starry night! This is how

I want to die.

It moves. They are all alive.

Even the moon bulges in its orange irons to push children, like a god, from its eye.

The old unseen serpent swallows up the stars.

Oh starry starry night! This is how

I want to die:

into that rushing beast of the night,

sucked up by that great dragon, to split from my life with no flag, 15

no belly,

no cry.

U Topic for Critical Thinking and Writing

-Sexton calls her poem “The Starry Night” and uses an epigraph from van Gogh. In what ways does her poem not describe or evoke van Gogh’s painting? In what ways does it describe the painting?

Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) was born in York, England, and educated at Oxford. In the 1930s his witty left-wing poetry earned him wide acclaim as the leading poet of his generation. He went to Spain during the Spanish Civil War, intending to serve as an ambulance driver for the Republicans in their struggle against Fascism, but he was so distressed by the violence of the Republicans that he almost immediately returned to England. In 1939 he came to America, and in 1946 he became a citizen of the United States, though he spent his last years in England. Much of his poetry is characterized by a combination of colloquial diction and technical dexterity.

In the following poem, Auden offers a meditation triggered by a painting in the Museum of Fine Arts in Brussels. The painting, by Pieter Brueghel (c. 1525–1569), is based on the legend of Icarus, told by the Roman poet Ovid (43 BCE–17 CE) in his Metamorphoses. The story goes thus: Daedalus, father of Icarus, was confined with his son on the island of Crete. In order to escape, Daedalus made wings for himself and for Icarus by fastening feathers together with wax, but Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax melted, and Icarus fell into the sea. According to Ovid, the event—a boy falling through the sky—was witnessed with amazement by a ploughman, a shepherd, and an angler. In the painting, however, these figures seem to pay no attention to Icarus, who is represented not falling through the sky but already in the water (in the lower right corner, near the ship), with only his lower legs still visible.

Musée des Beaux Arts [1938]

About suffering they were never wrong.

The Old Masters: how well they understood

Its human position; how it takes place

While someone else is eating or opening a window or just walking dully along;

How, when the aged are reverently, passionately waiting

For the miraculous birth, there always must be

Children who did not specially want it to happen, skating

On a pond at the edge of the wood;

They never forgot

That even the dreadful martyrdom must run its course

Anyhow in a corner, some untidy spot

Where the dogs go on with their doggy life and the torturer's horse

Scratches its innocent behind on a tree.

In Brueghel's Icarus, for instance: how everything turns away

Quite leisurely from the disaster; the plowman may

Have heard the splash, the forsaken cry.

But for him it was not an important failure; the sun shone

As it had to on the white legs disappearing into the green

Water, and the expensive delicate ship that must have seen

Something amazing, a boy falling out of the sky,

Had somewhere to get to and sailed calmly on.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -In your own words sum up what, according to the speaker (in lines 1–13), the Old Masters understood about human suffering. (The Old Masters were the great European painters who worked from about 1500 to about 1750.)

2. -Suppose the first lines read:

> The Old Masters were never wrong about suffering.
>
> They understood its human position well.

What (beside the particular rhymes) would change or be lost?

3. -Reread the poem (preferably over the course of several days) a number of times, jotting down your chief responses after each reading. Then, in connection with a final reading, study your notes, and write an essay of 500 words setting forth the history of your final response to the poem. For example, you may want to report that certain difficulties soon were clarified and that your enjoyment increased. Or, conversely, you may want to report that the poem became less interesting (for reasons you will set forth) the more you studied it. Probably your history will be somewhat more complicated than these simple examples. Try to find a chief pattern in your experience, and shape it into a thesis.

4. -Consider a picture, either in a local museum or reproduced in a book, and write a 500-word reflection on it. If the picture is not well known, include a reproduction (a postcard from the museum or a photocopy of a page of a book).

X. J. KENNEDY

X. J. Kennedy was born in New Jersey in 1929. He has taught at Tufts University and is the author of several books of poems, books for children, and college textbooks.

Marcel Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase, No. 2 (1912) was exhibited in 1913 in the Armory Show, an international exhibition held at an armory in New York, and later in Chicago and Boston. The Armory Show gave America its first good look at contemporary European art—for instance, cubism, which had influenced Duchamp's painting.

Nude Descending a Staircase [1961]

Toe upon toe, a snowing flesh,
A gold of lemon, root and rind,
She sifts in sunlight down the stairs
With nothing on. Nor on her mind.
We spy beneath the banister
A constant thresh of thigh on thigh—
Her lips imprint the swinging air
That parts to let her parts go by
One-woman waterfall, she wears

Her slow descent like a long cape

And pausing, on the final stair

Collects her motions into shape. 12

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -To what extent does the poem describe the painting? To what extent does it do something else?

2. -Some viewers have found Duchamp's painting strange and confusing. Does Kennedy's poem help you to understand Duchamp's style of art? Explain.

SHERMAN ALEXIE

The short-story writer, essayist, poet, and film director Sherman J. Alexie Jr. was born in October 1966. He was raised on the Spokane Indian Reservation in Wellpinit, Washington, located fifty miles northwest of Spokane. He went to high school off reservation in Reardan, Washington, where he was an excellent student and played on the basketball team. He attended Gonzaga University in Spokane for two years and then transferred to Washington State University in Pullman, where he began writing poetry, graduating with a degree in American Studies. His books include The Business of Fancydancing: Stories and Poems (1992), The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven (1994), and Reservation Blues (1995).

For additional poems of Alexie, see pages 786 and 888; for a story, see page 291.

At Navajo Monument Valley Tribal School [1992]

from the photograph by Skeet McAuley

the football field rises to meet the mesa. Indian boys gallop across the grass, against 3

the beginning of their body.

On those Saturday afternoons, unbroken horses gather to watch 6 their sons growing larger in the small parts of the world.

Everyone is the quarterback. 9
There is no thin man in a big hat writing down all the names in two columns: winners and losers. 12
This is the eternal football game, Indians versus Indians. All the Skins in the wooden bleachers fancydancing, 15 stomping red dust straight down into nothing. Before the game is over, the eighth-grade girls' track team 18
comes running, circling the field, their thin brown legs echoing wild horses, wild horses, wild horses. 21

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -What do you make of "the small parts of the world" and of "Everyone is the quarterback" (lines 9–10)?
2. -Why do you think Alexie ended the poem by introducing the girls' track team? And what function(s) does the repetition serve in the final line?
3. -Some readers find the poem's tone affirmative, even celebratory; others hear it as melancholy, even mournful. Do you agree with either of these descriptions, or would you use a different term or set of terms? Point to evidence in the text to explain and support your interpretation.
4. -Look again at the photograph. Do you think that the creation of a playing field on this site is a desecration of the environment? Why, or why not?

John Updike

John Updike, born in 1932, grew up in Shillington, Pennsylvania, where his father was a teacher and his mother was a writer. After receiving a B.A. degree from Harvard he studied drawing at Oxford for a year, but an offer from The New Yorker magazine brought him back to the United States. He at first served as a reporter for the magazine, but soon began contributing poetry, essays, and fiction. Today he is one of America's most prolific and well-known writers.

Before the Mirror[1996]

How many of us still remember when Picasso's "Girl Before a Mirror" hung at the turning of the stairs in the pre-expansion Museum of Modern Art?
Millions of us, probably, but we form a dwindling population. Garish and brush-slashed and yet as balanced as a cardboard Queen in a deck of giant cards, the painting proclaimed, "Enter here and abandon preconception." She bounced the erotic balls of herself back and forth between reflection and reality.
Now I discover, in the recent retrospective at the same establishment, that the vivid painting dates
from March of 1932,
the very month in which I first saw light,
squinting in nostalgia for the womb.
I bend closer, inspecting. The blacks,
the stripy cyanide greens are still uncracked,
I note with satisfaction; the cherry reds and lemon yellows full of childish juice.
No sag, no wrinkle. Fresh as paint. Back then they knew just how, I reflect, to lay it on.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -The painting shows a young woman looking into a mirror. In viewing a picture with this subject, what associations might reasonably come to mind? Vanity? Mortality? Or what?

2. -The woman (at the left) has two faces, one in profile. Do you think Picasso is showing us two views of the same face, or perhaps two stages in the woman's life? And what of the face in the mirror? Do you think it shows either or both of the faces at the left, or a third face or stage?

3. -Why do you suppose the woman is reaching out toward the mirror? (There cannot be any way of proving whatever you or anyone else might offer as an answer, but why do you offer the explanation that you do offer?)

4. -What do you think the poem is chiefly about? The distinctiveness of modern art (meaning the age of Picasso)? The excellent condition of the picture? The speaker's response to the picture? Explain.

5. -The first twelve lines of this poem describe the speaker's thoughts "then," when he first saw Girl Before a Mirror; the last twelve lines describe his ideas and feelings "now." In two paragraphs, or in one extended paragraph, write a "Then and Now," describing a picture or a song or a scene—a lake, a house, a kitchen—or a person, then and now.

GREG PAPE

Greg Pape was born in 1947 in Eureka, California, and educated at Fresno State College (now California State University, Fresno) and the University of Arizona. The author of several books of poems, he has served as writer-in-residence at several colleges and universities, and now teaches at Northern Arizona University, in Flagstaff.

American Flamingo [1998]

I know he shot them to know them.
I did not know the eyes of the flamingo are blue, a deep live blue. 3
And the tongue is lined with many small tongues, thirteen, in the sketch

by Audubon,° to function as a sieve.
I knew the long rose-pink neck,
the heavy tricolored down-sweeping bill,
the black primaries.
But I did not know the blue eye drawn so passionately by Audubon it seems to look out, wary, intense, from the paper it is printed on.
—what
Is man but his passion?
asked Robert Penn Warren.° In the background of this sketch, tenderly subtitled Old Male, beneath the over-draping feathered monument of the body, between the long flexible neck and the long bony legs covered with pink plates of flesh, Audubon has given us eight postures, eight stunning movements in the ongoing dance of the flamingos.
Once at Hialeah° in late afternoon
I watched the satin figures of the jockeys perched like bright beetles on the backs of horses pounding down the home stretch, a few crops whipping the lathering flanks, the loud flat metallic voice of the announcer fading as the flamingos, grazing the pond water at the far end of the infield, rose in a feathery blush, only a few feet off the ground, and flew one long clipped-winged ritual lap 36

in the heavy Miami light, a great slow swirl of grace from the old world that made tickets fall from hands, 39

stilled horses, and drew toasts from the stands

as they settled down again

like a rose-colored fog on the pond. 42

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Why is the speaker preoccupied with the flamingo's eyes?

2. -A transition occurs in lines 14–15, with the italicized quotation from Robert Penn Warren. What is the relationship of this to the description of the flamingo (and the speaker's reflections) that precede it?

3. -From line 25 to the end, the speaker carefully describes a scene at Hialeah. Take note of the specific details and terms that the speaker presents, and explain how these make the poem both a vivid description and something more than that.

CHAPTER

Three Poets in Depth: Emily Dickinson, Robert Frost, and Langston Hughes

ON READING AUTHORS REPRESENTED IN DEPTH

If you have read several works by an author, whether tragedies by Shakespeare or detective stories about Sherlock Holmes by Arthur Conan Doyle, you know that authors return again and again to certain themes (tragedy for Shakespeare, crime for Conan Doyle), yet each treatment is different. Hamlet, Macbeth, and Romeo and Juliet are all tragedies, and they all share certain qualities that we think of as Shakespearean, yet each is highly distinctive.

When we read several works by an author, we find ourselves thinking about resemblances and differences. We enjoy seeing the author return to some theme (for instance, God, or nature, or love) or to some literary form (for instance, the sonnet, or blank verse, or pairs of rhyming lines); and we may find, to our delight, that the author has handled things differently and that we are getting a sense of the writer's variety and perhaps even of the writer's development. Indeed, we sometimes speak of the shape or design of the author's career, meaning that our careful study of the writings has led us to an understanding of the story—with its beginning, middle, and end—that the writings tell across a period of time. Often, once we read one poem by an author and find it intriguing or compelling, we want to read more: Are there other poems like this one? What kinds of poems were written before or after this one? Our enjoyment and understanding of one poem helps us to enjoy and understand others, and makes us curious about the place that each one occupies in a larger structure, the shape of the author's career.

We can go further and say that the reading of a second author can help us—perhaps by way of contrast—to understand the first. In the preface to one of his volumes of poetry, Robert Frost put it this way:

> A poem is best read in the light of all the other poems ever written. We read A the better to read B (we have to start somewhere; we may get very little out of A). We read B the better to read C, C the better to read D, D the better to go back and get something more out of A. Progress is not the aim, but circulation. The thing is to get among the poems where they hold each other apart in their places as the stars do.

In an Introduction to Literature course, although you'll often be asked to write analytical papers about a single poem, story, or play, sometimes you'll be assigned a paper that requires a comparison and contrast of, for example, two poems by different authors. Less frequent perhaps, but equally important, is the paper that examines a central theme or idea as it is expressed and explored in three or more works.

At first this might seem a daunting task, but there are helpful ways of getting in control of the assignment. One of the best is to begin with a single work and then to move outward from it, making connections to works that show interesting similarities to, or differences from, it.

One of our students, Mark Bradley, was assigned to write on a theme (which he had to define himself) in a selection of poems by Langston Hughes. Mark started by closely studying a poem by Hughes that had caught his attention when he made his way through the group of poems for the first time. In one of his journal entries, Mark wrote:

> The poem "The South" surprised me. It wasn't what I expected. I thought Hughes would attack the South for being so racist--he wrote the poem in the 1920s, when segregation was everywhere in the South. He says some tough stuff about the South, that's for sure: "Beast strong, / Idiot-brained." But he also says that the South is attractive in some ways, and I'm not convinced that when he brings in the North at the end, he really believes that the North is superior.

Intrigued by this poem, Mark made it his point of departure for the thematic paper he was assigned. He judged that if he worked intensively on this poem and came to know it well, he could review other Hughes poems and see how they were both like and unlike the poem with which he began.

When you write an essay on several works, keep two points especially in mind: the length of the assignment, and the choice of examples. You want to treat the right number of examples for the space you are given, and, furthermore, to provide sufficient detail in your analysis of each of them. You might call this the principle of proportion.

Preparing an outline can be valuable. It will lead you to think carefully about which examples you have selected for your argument and the main idea about each one that you will present. You might begin by examining one poem in depth, and then proceed to relate it to key passages in other poems. Or maybe you'll find one passage in a poem so significant that it—rather than the poem in its entirety—can serve as a good beginning. Whichever strategy you choose, when you review the rough draft, use a pen to mark off the amount of space that you have devoted to each example. Ask yourself:

- -Is this example clearly connected to my argument in the paper as a whole?
- -Have I not only referred to the example but also provided adequate quotation from it?
- -Have I made certain to comment on the passage? (Remember that passages do not interpret themselves. You have to explicate and explain them.)
- -Has each example received its due?

There is no easy rule of thumb for knowing how much space each example should be given. Some passages are more complicated than others; some demand more intensive scrutiny. But you'll be well on the way toward handling this aspect of the paper effectively if you are self-aware about your choices, alert to the principle of proportion.

EMILY DICKINSON

Emily Dickinson (1830–1886) was born into a proper New England family in Amherst, Massachusetts. Although she spent her seventeenth year a few miles away, at Mount Holyoke Seminary (now Mount Holyoke College), in the next twenty years she left Amherst only five or six times, and in her last twenty years she may never have left her house. Her brother was probably right when he said that having seen something of the rest of the world—she had visited Washington with her father, when he was a member of Congress—"she could not resist the feeling that it was painfully hollow. It was to her so thin and unsatisfying in the face of the Great Realities of Life."

Dickinson lived with her parents (a somewhat reclusive mother and an austere, remote father) and a younger sister; a married brother lived in the house next door. She formed some passionate attachments, to women as well as men, but there is no evidence that they found physical expression.

By the age of twelve Dickinson was writing witty letters, but she apparently did not write more than an occasional poem before her late twenties. At her death—she died in the house where she was born—she left 1,775 poems, only seven of which had been published (anonymously) during her lifetime.

We begin this section with sixteen poems by Dickinson. Next, we present a seventeenth poem, "I Felt a Funeral, in my Brain," in multiple versions: the poem as we know it today; the poem in manuscript; and the poem in its first published version. Then, two more poems, which are similar in phrasing to one another and show an affinity to "I Felt a Funeral, in my Brain." We conclude with three of Dickinson's letters about poetry.

These are the days when Birds come back [1859]

Oh Last Communion in the Haze—
Permit a child to join.
Thy sacred emblems to partake—
Thy consecrated bread to take

And thine immortal wine!

We reprint here and on the next page Dickinson's manuscript for "I felt a Funeral, in my Brain," and we follow it with the version of the poem as we know it today, where it is #280 in The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson, ed. Thomas H. Johnson (Boston: Little, Brown, 1957). This edition follows the text that Johnson presented in his three-volume scholarly edition, The Poems of Emily Dickinson (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1955). Johnson proposes a date of sometime in 1861 for this poem, but the editor of a new scholarly edition, The Poems of Emily Dickinson: Variorum Edition, 3 vols. (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1998), R. W. Franklin, while agreeing with Johnson's version of the poem, suggests a date of summer 1862.

I felt a Funeral, in my Brain [1861 or 1862]

I felt a Funeral, in my Brain,
And Mourners to and fro
Kept treading—treading—till it seemed

That Sense was breaking through—
And when they all were seated,
A Service, like a Drum—
Kept beating—beating—till I thought
My Mind was going numb—
And then I heard them lift a Box
And creak across my Soul
With those same Boots of Lead, again,
Then Space—began to toll,
As all the Heavens were a Bell,
And Being, but an Ear,
And I, and Silence, some strange Race
Wrecked, solitary, here—
And then a Plank in Reason, broke,
And I dropped down, and down—
And hit a World, at every plunge,
And Finished knowing—then—

Pages 925–926 reproduce the poem as it appears in Dickinson's own hand. Our copy is taken from The Manuscript Books of Emily Dickinson, edited by R. W. Franklin and published in 1981. Like nearly all of Dickinson's poems, this one was not published in her lifetime. She wrote her poems on sheets of letter paper, which she then bound together with string into packets. Perhaps these personal manuscript books or "fascicles" (that is, a small bundle, or the divisions of a book published in parts) represented for Dickinson a form of publication—though a very private one.

Notice that in line 10, Dickinson wrote "Brain," but then crossed it out and selected the word "Soul" instead. Notice also that in manuscript, the poem concludes with a line not in the poem, but that seems to give alternatives for words in lines 19 and 20. Refer to the poem as we know it (pages 926–927) to see how Thomas Johnson has worked from the manuscript to make his choices about how the poem should read.

In her will Dickinson stipulated that upon her death, her papers and letters should be burned. Her sister

Lavinia, however, who discovered the poems, decided that her sister's request did not include them, and she soon became determined to see the poems published. This task was taken up by Mabel Loomis Todd (1856–1932), who was a friend of Dickinson's—and the lover of Austin Dickinson, Emily's older (and already married) brother. With help from the critic and man-of-letters Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Todd edited two series of Dickinson's poems (1890, 1891), and then edited a third series (1896) and the Letters of Emily Dickinson (2 vols., 1984) herself. Both Todd and Higginson removed many of the boldly original features of the poems' language, structure, and punctuation. They sought to make Dickinson more conventional, more like other poets of the age. This, in their view, was the best way to make her less difficult and hence more accessible to readers. But the result was that they eliminated the daring, brilliant innovations that make Dickinson extraordinary. This first published version of "I Felt a Funeral, in my Brain" is taken from Poems by Emily Dickinson, third series (Boston: Little, Brown, 1896).

I felt a funeral in my brain,
And mourners, to and fro,
Kept treading, treading, till it seemed
That sense was breaking through.
And when they all were seated,
A service like a drum
Kept beating, beating, till I thought
My mind was going numb.
And then I heard them lift a box,
And creak across my soul
With those same boots of lead, again.
Then space began to toll
As all the heavens were a bell,
And Being but an ear,
And I and silence some strange race,
Wrecked, solitary, here.

Here are two more poems, similar to one another and somewhat similar to "I felt a Funeral, in my Brain." Thomas Johnson dates the first one as having been written in 1864, and the second in the following year. The second, Johnson explains, is not so much a separate poem as a variant on the first, a variant that Dickinson probably sent to her sister-in-law Susan Gilbert Dickinson, who was married to Dickinson's brother Austin. In his more recent edition, R. W. Franklin says more firmly that the first poem was written in early 1864 and that, without address or signature, Dickinson sent a version of its second stanza to Susan.

I felt a Cleaving in my Mind— [1864]

I felt a Cleaving in my Mind—
As if my Brain had split—
I tried to match it—Seam by Seam—
But could not make them fit.
The thought behind, I strove to join Unto the thought before—
But Sequence ravelled out of Sound
Like Balls—upon a Floor.

The Dust behind I strove to join [1865]

The Dust behind I strove to join
Unto the Dust before—
But Sequence ravelled out of Sound
Like Balls upon a Floor—

LETTERS ABOUT POETRY

We include three of Dickinson's letters, the first of which is addressed to Susan Gilbert, probably her dearest friend and the wife of Dickinson's brother, Austin. The two other letters are addressed to Thomas Wentworth Higginson, a writer and leading abolitionist. After reading in Atlantic Monthly (April 1862) Higginson's article offering advice to young authors, Dickinson (31 at the time) sent Higginson some of her poems along with a letter, and a correspondence ensued, lasting until Dickinson's death.

To Susan Gilbert (Dickinson) [late April 1852]

So sweet and still, and Thee, Oh Susie, what need I more, to make my heaven whole?

Sweet Hour, blessed Hour, to carry me to you, and to bring you back to me, long enough to snatch one kiss, and whisper Good bye, again.

I have thought of it all day, Susie, and I fear of but little else, and when I was gone to meeting it filled my mind so full, I could not find a chink to put the worthy pastor; when he said "Our Heavenly Father," I said "Oh Darling Sue"; when he read the 100th Psalm, I kept saying your precious letter all over to myself, and Susie, when they sang—it would have made you laugh to hear one little voice, piping to the departed. I made up words and kept singing how I loved you, and you had gone, while all the rest of the choir were singing Hallelujahs. I presume nobody heard me, because I sang so small, but it was a kind of a comfort to think I might put them out, singing of you. I a'nt there this afternoon, tho', because I am here, writing a little letter to my dear Sue, and I am very happy. I think of ten weeks—Dear One, and I think of love, and you, and my heart grows full and warm, and my breath stands still. The sun does'nt shine at all, but I can feel a sunshine stealing into my soul and making it all summer, and every thorn, a rose. And I pray that such summer's sun shine on my Absent One, and cause her bird to sing!

You have been happy, Susie, and now are sad—and the whole world seems lone; but it wont be so always, "some days must be dark and dreary"! You wont cry any more, will you, Susie, for my father will be your father, and my home will be your home, and where you go, I will go, and we will lie side by side in the kirkyard.

I have parents on earth, dear Susie, but your's are in the skies, and I have an earthly fireside, but you have one above, and you have a "Father in Heaven," where I have none—and sister in heaven, and I know they love you dearly, and think of you every day.

Oh I wish I had half so many dear friends as you in heaven—I couldn't spare them now—but to know they had got there safely, and should suffer nevermore—Dear Susie! . . .

Emilie—

To T. W. Higginson [25 April 1862]

Mr Higginson,

Your kindness claimed earlier gratitude—but I was ill—and write today, from my pillow.

Thank you for the surgery1—it was not so painful as I supposed. I bring you others—as you ask—though they might not differ—

While my thought is undressed—I can make the distinction, but when I put them in the Gown—they look alike, and numb.

You asked how old I was? I made no verse—but one or two—until this winter—Sir—

I had a terror—since September—I could tell to none—and so I sing, as the Boy does by the Burying Ground—because I am afraid—You inquire my Books—For Poets—I have Keats—and Mr and Mrs Browning. For Prose—Mr Ruskin—Sir Thomas Browne—and the Revelations.2 I went to school—but in your manner of the phrase—had no education. When a little Girl, I had a friend, who taught me Immortality—but venturing too near, himself—he never returned—Soon after, my Tutor, died—and for several years, my Lexicon—was my only companion—Then I found one more—but he was not contented I be his scholar—so he left the Land.

You ask of my Companions Hills—Sir—and the Sundown—and a Dog—large as myself, that my Father bought me—They are better than Beings—because they know—but do not tell—and the noise in the Pool, at Noon—excels my Piano. I have a Brother and Sister—My Mother does not care for thought—and Father, too busy with his Briefs3—to notice what we do—He buys me many Books—but begs me not to read them—because he fears they joggle the Mind. They are religious—except me—and address an Eclipse, every morning—whom they call their "Father." But I fear my story fatigues you—I would like to learn—Could you tell me how to grow—or is it unconveyed—like Melody—or Witchcraft?

You speak of Mr Whitman—I never read his Book4—but was told that he was disgraceful—

I read Miss Prescott's "Circumstance,"5 but it followed me, in the Dark—so I avoided her—

Two Editors of Journals came to my Father's House, this winter—and asked me for my Mind—and when I asked them "Why," they said I was penurious—and they, would use it for the World—

I could not weigh myself—Myself—

My size felt small—to me—I read your Chapters in the Atlantic—and experienced honor for you—I was sure you would not reject a confiding question—

Is this—Sir—what you asked me to tell you?

Your friend,

E—Dickinson.

To T. W. Higginson [1876]

Nature is a Haunted House—but Art—a House that tries to be haunted.

Robert Frost

Robert Frost (1874–1963) was born in California. After his father's death in 1885, Frost's mother brought the family to New England, where she taught in high schools in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Frost studied for part of one term at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, then did odd jobs (including teaching), and from 1897 to 1899 was enrolled as a special student at Harvard. He then farmed in New Hampshire, published a few poems in local newspapers, left the farm and taught again, and in 1912 left for England, where he hoped to achieve more popular success as a writer. By 1915 he had won a considerable reputation, and he returned to the United States, settling on a farm in New Hampshire and cultivating the image of the country-wise farmer-poet. In fact he was well read in the classics, the Bible, and English and American literature.

Among Frost's many comments about literature, here are three: "Writing is unboring to the extent that it is dramatic"; "Every poem is . . . a figure of the will braving alien entanglements"; and, finally, a poem "begins in delight and ends in wisdom. . . . It runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion."

And for good measure, here is Frost, in a letter, writing about his own work.

> You get more credit for thinking if you restate formulae or cite cases that fall in easily under formulae, but all the fun is outside[,] saying things that suggest formulae that won't formulate—that almost but don't quite formulate. I should like to be so subtle at this game as to seem to the casual person altogether obvious. The casual person would assume I meant nothing or else I came near enough meaning something he was familiar with to mean it for all practical purposes. Well, well, well.

We give fifteen of Frost's poems, arranged in chronological order, and we follow these poems with some of Frost's comments about poetry. The first poem, "The Pasture," is one that Frost customarily put at the beginning of his collected poems. The last words of each stanza, "You come too," are an invitation to the reader to join him.

The Pasture [1913]

I'm going out to clean the pasture spring;
I'll only stop to rake the leaves away
(And wait to watch the water clear, I may):
I shan't be gone long.—You come too.
I'm going out to fetch the little calf
That's standing by the mother. It's so young,
It totters when she licks it with her tongue.
I shan't be gone long.—You come too.

Mending Wall [1914]

Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it,
And spills the upper boulder in the sun;
And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.
The work of hunters is another thing:
I have come after them and made repair
Where they have left not one stone on a stone,
But they would have the rabbit out of hiding,
To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,
No one has seen them made or heard them made,
But at spring mending-time we find them there.
I let my neighbor know beyond the hill;
And on a day we meet to walk the line
And set the wall between us once again.
We keep the wall between us as we go.

To each the boulders that have fallen to each.

And some are loaves and some so nearly balls

We have to use a spell to make them balance:

“Stay where you are until our backs are turned!”

We wear our fingers rough with handling them.

Oh, just another kind of outdoor game,

One on a side. It comes to little more:

There where it is we do not need the wall:

He is all pine and I am apple orchard.

My apple trees will never get across

And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him.

He only says, “Good fences make good neighbours.”

Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder

If I could put a notion in his head:

“Why do they make good neighbours? Isn’t it

Where there are cows? But here there are no cows.

Before I built a wall I’d ask to know

What I was walling in or walling out,

And to whom I was like to give offence.

Something there is that doesn’t love a wall,

That wants it down.” I could say “Elves” to him,

But it’s not elves exactly, and I’d rather

He said it for himself. I see him there

Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top

In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed.

He moves in darkness as it seems to me,

Not of woods only and the shade of trees.

He will not go behind his father’s saying,

And he likes having thought of it so well

He says again, “Good fences make good neighbours.”

The Wood-Pile [1914]

Out walking in the frozen swamp one grey day,

I paused and said, “I will turn back from here.

No, I will go on farther—and we shall see.”

The hard snow held me, save where now and then

One foot went through. The view was all in lines

Straight up and down of tall slim trees

Too much alike to mark or name a place by

So as to say for certain I was here

Or somewhere else: I was just far from home.

A small bird flew before me. He was careful

To put a tree between us when he lighted,

And say no word to tell me who he was

Who was so foolish as to think what he thought.

He thought that I was after him for a feather—

The white one in his tail; like one who takes Everything said as personal to himself.

One flight out sideways would have undeceived him.

And then there was a pile of wood for which

I forgot him and let his little fear

Carry him off the way I might have gone,

Without so much as wishing him good-night.

He went behind it to make his last stand.

It was a cord of maple, cut and split

And piled—and measured, four by four by eight.

And not another like it could I see.

No runner tracks in this year's snow looped near it.
And it was older sure than this year's cutting,
Or even last year's or the year's before.
The wood was grey and the bark warping off it
And the pile somewhat sunken. Clematis
Had wound strings round and round it like a bundle.
What held it though on one side was a tree
Still growing, and on one a stake and prop,
These latter about to fall. I thought that only Someone who lived in turning to fresh tasks Could so forget his handiwork on which
He spent himself, the labour of his axe,
And leave it there far from a useful fireplace
To warm the frozen swamps as best it could
With the slow smokeless burning of decay.

The Road Not Taken [1916]

Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
And sorry I could not travel both
And be one traveler, long I stood
And looked down one as far as I could
To where it bent in the undergrowth;
Then took the other, as just as fair,
And having perhaps the better claim,
Because it was grassy and wanted wear;
Though as for that the passing there
Had worn them really about the same,
And both that morning equally lay
In leaves no step had trodden black.

Oh, I kept the first for another day!

Yet knowing how way leads on to way,

I doubted if I should ever come back.

I shall be telling this with a sigh

Somewhere ages and ages hence:

Two roads diverged in a wood, and I—

I took the one less traveled by,

And that has made all the difference.

The Telephone [1916]

"When I was just as far as I could walk

From here to-day

There was an hour

All still

When leaning with my head against a flower

I heard you talk.

Don't say I didn't, for I heard you say—

You spoke from that flower on the window sill—

Do you remember what it was you said?"

"First tell me what it was you thought you heard."

"Having found the flower and driven a bee away,

I leaned my head,

And holding by the stalk,

I listened and I thought I caught the word—

What was it? Did you call me by my name?

Or did you say—

Someone said 'Come'—I heard it as I bowed."

"I may have thought as much, but not aloud."

"Well, so I came."

The Oven Bird [1916]

There is a singer everyone has heard,
Loud, a mid-summer and a mid-wood bird,
Who makes the solid tree trunks sound again.
He says that leaves are old and that for flowers
Mid-summer is to spring as one to ten.
He says the early petal-fall is past
When pear and cherry bloom went down in showers
On sunny days a moment overcast;
And comes that other fall we name the fall.
He says the highway dust is over all.
The bird would cease and be as other birds
But that he knows in singing not to sing.
The question that he frames in all but words
Is what to make of a diminished thing.

The Aim Was Song [1923]

Before man came to blow it right
The wind once blew itself untaught,
And did its loudest day and night
In any rough place where it caught.
Man came to tell it what was wrong:
It hadn’t found the place to blow;
It blew too hard—the aim was song.
And listen—how it ought to go!
He took a little in his mouth,
And held it long enough for north
To be converted into south,

And then by measure blew it forth.

By measure. It was word and note,

The wind the wind had meant to be—

A little through the lips and throat.

The aim was song—the wind could see.

The Need of Being Versed in Country Things [1923]

The house had gone to bring again

To the midnight sky a sunset glow.

Now the chimney was all of the house that stood,

Like a pistil after the petals go.

The barn opposed across the way,

That would have joined the house in flame

Had it been the will of the wind, was left

To bear forsaken the place's name.

No more it opened with all one end

For teams that came by the stony road

To drum on the floor with scurrying hoofs

And brush the mow with the summer load.

The birds that came to it through the air

At broken windows flew out and in,

Their murmur more like the sigh we sigh

From too much dwelling on what has been.

Yet for them the lilac renewed its leaf,

And the aged elm, though touched with fire;

And the dry pump flung up an awkward arm;

And the fence post carried a strand of wire.

For them there was really nothing sad.

But though they rejoiced in the nest they kept,

One had to be versed in country things

Not to believe the phoebes wept.

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening [1923]

Whose woods these are I think I know.

His house is in the village, though;

He will not see me stopping here

To watch his woods fill up with snow.

My little horse must think it queer

To stop without a farmhouse near

Between the woods and frozen lake

The darkest evening of the year.

He gives his harness bells a shake

To ask if there is some mistake.

The only other sound’s the sweep

Of easy wind and downy flake.

The woods are lovely, dark and deep,

But I have promises to keep,

And miles to go before I sleep,

And miles to go before I sleep.

Acquainted with the Night [1928]

I have been one acquainted with the night.

I have walked out in rain—and back in rain.

I have outwalked the furthest city light.

I have looked down the saddest city lane.

I have passed by the watchman on his beat

And dropped my eyes, unwilling to explain.

I have stood still and stopped the sound of feet

When far away an interrupted cry

Came over houses from another street,

But not to call me back or say good-bye;

And further still at an unearthly height,

One luminary clock against the sky

Proclaimed the time was neither wrong nor right.

I have been one acquainted with the night.

Desert Places [1936]

Snow falling and night falling fast oh fast

In a field I looked into going past,

And the ground almost covered smooth in snow,

But a few weeds and stubble showing last.

The woods around it have it—it is theirs.

All animals are smothered in their lairs.

I am too absent-spirited to count;

The loneliness includes me unawares.

And lonely as it is that loneliness

Will be more lonely ere it will be less—

A blanker whiteness of benighted snow

With no expression, nothing to express.

They cannot scare me with their empty spaces

Between stars—on stars where no human race is.

I have it in me so much nearer home

To scare myself with my own desert places.

Design [1936]

I found a dimpled spider, fat and white,

On a white heal-all, holding up a moth

Like a white piece of rigid satin cloth—
Assorted characters of death and blight
Mixed ready to begin the morning right,
Like the ingredients of a witches' broth—
A snow-drop spider, a flower like froth,
And dead wings carried like a paper kite.
What had that flower to do with being white,
The wayside blue and innocent heal-all?
What brought the kindred spider to that height,
Then steered the white moth thither in the night?
What but design of darkness to appall?—
If design govern in a thing so small.

The Silken Tent [1942]

She is as in a field a silken tent
At midday when a sunny summer breeze
Has dried the dew and all its ropes relent,
So that in guys it gently sways at ease,
And its supporting central cedar pole,
That is its pinnacle to heavenward
And signifies the sureness of the soul,
Seems to owe naught to any single cord,
But strictly held by none, is loosely bound
By countless silken ties of love and thought
To everything on earth the compass round,
And only by one's going slightly taut
In the capriciousness of summer air
Is of the slightest bondage made aware.

Come In [1942]

As I came to the edge of the woods.
Thrush music—hark!
Now if it was dusk outside,
Inside it was dark.
Too dark in the woods for a bird
By sleight of wing
To better its perch for the night,
Though it still could sing.
The last of the light of the sun
That had died in the west
Still lived for one song more
In a thrush's breast.
Far in the pillared dark Thrush music went—Almost like a call to come in
To the dark and lament.
But no, I was out for stars:
I would not come in.
I meant not even if asked,
And I hadn't been.

The Most of It [1942]

He thought he kept the universe alone;
For all the voice in answer he could wake
Was but the mocking echo of his own
From some tree-hidden cliff across the lake.
Some morning from the boulder-broken beach

He would cry out on life, that what it wants
Is not its own love back in copy speech,
But counter-love, original response.
And nothing ever came of what he cried
Unless it was the embodiment that crashed
In the cliff's talus on the other side,
And then in the far distant water splashed,
But after a time allowed for it to swim,
Instead of proving human when it neared
And someone else additional to him,
As a great buck it powerfully appeared,
Pushing the crumpled water up ahead,
And landed pouring like a waterfall,
And stumbled through the rocks with horny tread,
And forced the underbrush—and that was all.

ROBERT FROST ON POETRY

The Figure a Poem Makes

Abstraction is an old story with the philosophers, but it has been like a new toy in the hands of the artists of our day. Why can't we have any one quality of poetry we choose by itself? We can have in thought. Then it will go hard if we can't in practice. Our lives for it.

Granted no one but a humanist much cares how sound a poem is if it is only a sound. The sound is the gold in the ore. Then we will have the sound out alone and dispense with the inessential. We do till we make the discovery that the object in writing poetry is to make all poems sound as different as possible from each other, and the resources for that of vowels, consonants, punctuation, syntax, words, sentences, meter are not enough. We need the help of context—meaning—subject matter. That is the greatest help towards variety. All that can be done with words is soon told. So also with meters—particularly in our language where there are virtually but two, strict iambic and loose iambic. The ancients with many were still poor if they depended on meters for all tune. It is painful to watch our sprung-rhythmists straining at the point of omitting one short from a foot for relief from monotony. The possibilities for tune from the dramatic tones of meaning struck across the rigidity of a limited meter are endless. And we are back in poetry as merely one more art of having something to say, sound or unsound. Probably better if sound, because deeper and from wider experience.

Then there is this wildness whereof it is spoken. Granted again that it has an equal claim with sound to being a poem's better half. If it is a wild tune, it is a poem. Our problem then is, as modern abstractionists, to have the wildness pure: to be wild with nothing to be wild about. We bring up as aberrationists, giving way to undirected associations and kicking ourselves from one chance suggestion to another in all directions as of a hot afternoon in the life of a grasshopper. Theme alone can steady us down. Just as the first mystery was how a poem could have a tune in such a straightness as meter, so the second mystery is how a poem can have wildness and at the same time a subject that shall be fulfilled.

It should be of the pleasure of a poem itself to tell how it can. The figure a poem makes. It begins in delight and ends in wisdom. The figure is the same as for love. No one can really hold that the ecstasy should be static and stand still in one place. It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion. It has denouement. It has an outcome that though unforeseen was predestined from the first image of the original mood—and indeed from the very mood. It is but a trick poem and no poem at all if the best of it was thought of first and saved for the last. It finds its own name as it goes and discovers the best waiting for it in some final phrase at once wise and sad—the happy-sad blend of the drinking song.

No tears in the writer, no tears in the reader. No surprise for the writer, no surprise for the reader. For me the initial delight is in the surprise of remembering something I didn't know I knew. I am in a place, in a situation, as if I had materialized from cloud or risen out of the ground. There is a glad recognition of the long lost and the rest follows. Step by step the wonder of unexpected supply keeps growing. The impressions most useful to my purpose seem always those I was unaware of and so made no note of at the time when taken, and the conclusion is come to that like giants we are always hurling experience ahead of us to pave the future with against the day when we may want to strike a line of purpose across it for somewhere. The line will have the more charm for not being mechanically straight. We enjoy the straight crookedness of a good walking stick. Modern instruments of precision are being used to make things crooked as if by eye and hand in the old days.

I tell how there may be a better wildness of logic than of inconsequence. But the logic is backward, in retrospect, after the act. It must be more felt than seen ahead like prophecy. It must be a revelation, or a series of revelations, as much for the poet as for the reader. For it to be that there must have been the greatest freedom of the material to move about in it and to establish relations in it regardless of time and space, previous relation, and everything but affinity. We prate of freedom. We call our schools free because we are not free to stay away from them till we are sixteen years of age. I have given up my democratic prejudices and now willingly set the lower classes free to be completely taken care of by the upper classes. Political freedom is nothing to me. I bestow it right and left. All I would keep for myself is the freedom of my material—the condition of body and mind now and then to summons aptly from the vast chaos of all I have lived through.

Scholars and artists thrown together are often annoyed at the puzzle of where they differ. Both work from knowledge; but I suspect they differ most importantly in the way their knowledge is come by. Scholars get theirs with conscientious thoroughness along projected lines of logic; poets theirs cavalierly and as it happens in and out of books. They stick to nothing deliberately, but let what will stick to them like burrs where they walk in the fields. No acquirement is on assignment, or even self-assignment. Knowledge of the second kind is much more available in the wild free ways of wit and art. A school boy may be defined as one who can tell you what he knows in the order in which he learned it. The artist must value himself as he snatches a thing from some previous order in time and space into a new order with not so much as a ligature clinging to it of the old place where it was organic.

More than once I should have lost my soul to radicalism if it had been the originality it was mistaken for by young converts. Originality and initiative are what I ask for my country. For myself the originality need be no more than the freshness of a poem run in the way I have described: from delight to wisdom. The figure is the same as for love. Like a piece of ice on a hot stove the poem must ride on its own melting. A poem may be worked over once it is in being, but may not be worried into being. Its most precious quality will remain its having run itself and carried away the poet with it. Read it a hundred times: it will forever keep its freshness as a metal keeps its fragrance. It can never lose its sense of a meaning that once unfolded by surprise as it went.

From "The Constant Symbol"

There are many other things I have found myself saying about poetry, but the chieftest of these is that it is metaphor, saying one thing and meaning another, saying one thing in terms of another, the pleasure of ulteriority. Poetry is simply made of metaphor. So also is philosophy—and science, too, for that matter, if it will take the soft impeachment from a friend. Every poem is a new metaphor inside or it is nothing. And there is a sense in which all poems are the same old metaphor always.

Every single poem written regular is a symbol small or great of the way the will has to pitch into commitments deeper and deeper to a rounded conclusion and then be judged for whether any original intention it had has been strongly spent or weakly lost; be it in art, politics, school, church, business, love, or marriage—in a piece of work or in a career. Strongly spent is synonymous with kept.

LANGSTON HUGHES

Langston Hughes (1902–1967) was an accomplished poet, short-story writer, dramatist, essayist, and editor. He was born in Joplin, Missouri; he grew up in Lawrence, Kansas, and Cleveland, Ohio; and he spent a year living in Mexico before entering Columbia University in 1921. He left Columbia the following year and traveled extensively in Europe, returning to the United States in the mid-1920s. During these years, Hughes pursued his academic studies at Lincoln University in Pennsylvania (graduating in 1929) and published his first two books of verse, The Weary Blues (1926) and Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927). His many achievements in literature, drawing upon spirituals, blues, jazz, and folk expression, and his rich, productive career have led his biographer, Arnold Rampersad, to describe him as "perhaps the most representative black American writer."

Here we provide a selection of Hughes's poetry that shows the range of his themes and the variety of his speaking voices. We begin with one of his best-known works, "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," a poem first published in the June 1921 issue of The Crisis, the official magazine of the NAACP. We give eleven of Hughes's poems here (and we have already given some of his poems in earlier chapters), and two selections from his prose.

The Negro Speaks of Rivers [1921]

I've known rivers:

I've known rivers ancient as the world and older than the flow of human blood in human veins.

My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

I bathed in the Euphrates when dawns were young.

I built my hut near the Congo and it lulled me to sleep.

I looked upon the Nile and raised the pyramids above it.

I heard the singing of the Mississippi when Abe Lincoln went down to New Orleans, and I've seen its muddy bosom turn all golden in the sunset.

I've known rivers:

Ancient, dusky rivers.

My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

Mother to Son [1922]

Well, son, I'll tell you:

Life for me ain't been no crystal stair.

It's had tacks in it,

And splinters,

And boards torn up,

And places with no carpet on the floor—

Bare.

But all the time

I'se been a-climbin' on,

And reachin' landin's,

And turnin' corners,

And sometimes goin' in the dark

Where there ain’t been no light.

So boy, don’t you turn back.

Don’t you set down on the steps

’Cause you finds it’s kinder hard.

Don’t you fall now—

For I’se still goin’, honey,

I’se still climbin’,

And life for me ain’t been no crystal stair.

The Weary Blues [1925]

Droning a drowsy syncopated tune,

Rocking back and forth to a mellow croon,

I heard a Negro play.

Down on Lenox Avenue the other night

By the pale dull pallor of an old gas light

He did a lazy sway. . . .

He did a lazy sway. . . .

To the tune o’ those Weary Blues.

With his ebony hands on each ivory key

He made that poor piano moan with melody.

O Blues!

Swaying to and fro on his rickety stool

He played that sad raggy tune like a musical fool.

Sweet Blues!

Coming from a black man’s soul.

O Blues!

In a deep song voice with a melancholy tone

I heard that Negro sing, that old piano moan—

“Ain’t got nobody in all this world,

Ain’t got nobody but ma self.

I’s gwine to quit ma frownin’

And put ma troubles on the shelf.”

Thump, thump, thump, went his foot on the floor.

He played a few chords then he sang some more—

“I got the Weary Blues

And I can’t be satisfied.

Got the Weary Blues

And can’t be satisfied—

I ain’t happy no mo’

And I wish that I had died.”

And far into the night he crooned that tune.

The stars went out and so did the moon.

The singer stopped playing and went to bed

While the Weary Blues echoed through his head.

He slept like a rock or a man that’s dead.

The South [1922]

The lazy, laughing South

With blood on its mouth.

The sunny-faced South,

Beast-strong,

Idiot-brained.

The child-minded South

Scratching in the dead fire’s ashes

For a Negro’s bones.

Cotton and the moon,

Warmth, earth, warmth,

The sky, the sun, the stars,

The magnolia-scented South.

Beautiful, like a woman,

Seductive as a dark-eyed whore,

Passionate, cruel,

Honey-lipped, syphilitic—

That is the South.

And I, who am black, would love her

But she spits in my face.

And I, who am black,

Would give her many rare gifts

But she turns her back upon me.

So now I seek the North—

The cold-faced North,

For she, they say,

Is a kinder mistress,

And in her house my children

May escape the spell of the South.

Ruby Brown [1926]

She was young and beautiful

And golden like the sunshine

That warmed her body.

And because she was colored

Mayville had no place to offer her,

Nor fuel for the clean flame of joy

That tried to burn within her soul.

One day,

Sitting on old Mrs. Latham’s back porch

Polishing the silver,

She asked herself two questions

And they ran something like this:

What can a colored girl do

On the money from a white woman's kitchen?

And ain't there any joy in this town?

Now the streets down by the river

Know more about this pretty Ruby Brown,

And the sinister shuttered houses of the bottoms

Hold a yellow girl

Seeking an answer to her questions.

The good church folk do not mention

Her name any more.

But the white men,

Habitués of the high shuttered houses,

Pay more money to her now

Than they ever did before,

When she worked in their kitchens.

Poet to Patron [1939]

What right has anyone to say

That I

Must throw out pieces of my heart

For pay?

For bread that helps to make

My heart beat true,

I must sell myself

To you?

A factory shift's better,

A week's meagre pay,

Than a perfumed note asking:

What poems today?

Ballad of the Landlord [1940]

Landlord, landlord,

My roof has sprung a leak.

Don't you member I told you about it

Way last week?

Landlord, landlord,

These steps is broken down.

When you come up yourself

It's a wonder you don't fall down.

Ten Bucks you say I owe you?

Ten Bucks you say is due?

Well, that's Ten Bucks more'n I'll pay you

Till you fix this house up new.

What? You gonna get eviction orders?

You gonna cut off my heat?

You gonna take my furniture and Throw it in the street?

Um-huh! You talking high and mighty.

Talk on—till you get through.

You ain't gonna be able to say a word

If I land my fist on you.

Police! Police!

Come and get this man!

He's trying to ruin the government

And overturn the land!

Copper's whistle!

Patrol bell!

Arrest.

Precinct Station.

Iron cell.

Headlines in press:

Too Blue [1943]

I got those sad old weary blues.

I don't know where to turn.

I don't know where to go.

Nobody cares about you

When you sink so low.

What shall I do?

What shall I say?

Shall I take a gun

And put myself away?

I wonder if

One bullet would do?

As hard as my head is,

It would probably take two.

But I ain't got

Neither bullet nor gun—

And I'm too blue

To look for one.

Harlem [1] [1949]

Here on the edge of hell
Stands Harlem—
Remembering the old lies,
The old kicks in the back,
The old “Be patient”
They told us before.
Sure, we remember.
Now when the man at the corner store
Says sugar’s gone up another two cents,
And bread one,
And there’s a new tax on cigarettes—
We remember the job we never had,
Never could get,
And can’t have now
Because we’re colored.
So we stand here
On the edge of hell
In Harlem
And look out on the world
And wonder
What we’re gonna do
In the face of what
We remember.

Theme for English B [1949]

The instructor said,

Go home and write a page tonight.

And let that page come out of you—

Then, it will be true.

I wonder if it's that simple?

I am twenty-two, colored, born in Winston-Salem.

I went to school there, then Durham, then here to this college on the hill above Harlem.

I am the only colored student in my class.

The steps from the hill lead down into Harlem, through a park, then I cross St. Nicholas,

Eighth Avenue, Seventh, and I come to the Y,

the Harlem Branch Y, where I take the elevator up to my room, sit down, and write this page:

It's not easy to know what is true for you or me at twenty-two, my age. But I guess I'm what

I feel and see and hear, Harlem, I hear you:

hear you, hear me—we two—you, me, talk on this page.

(I hear New York, too.) Me—who?

Well, I like to eat, sleep, drink, and be in love.

I like to work, read, learn, and understand life.

I like a pipe for a Christmas present, or records—Bessie, bop, or Bach.

I guess being colored doesn't make me not like the same things other folks like who are other races.

So will my page be colored that I write?

Being me, it will not be white.

But it will be a part of you, instructor.

You are white—

yet a part of me, as I am a part of you.

That's American.

Sometimes perhaps you don't want to be a part of me.

Nor do I often want to be a part of you.

But we are, that's true!

As I learn from you,

I guess you learn from me—

although you're older—and white—and somewhat more free.

This is my page for English B.

Poet to Bigot [1953]

I have done so little

For you,

And you have done so little

For me,

That we have good reason

Never to agree.

I, however,

Have such meagre

Power,

Clutching at a Moment,

While you control

An hour.

But your hour is

A stone.

My moment is

A flower.

LANGSTON HUGHES ON POETRY

The Negro and the Racial Mountain [1926]

Hughes often examined the challenges he faced in writing both as an American and an African American, as in this provocative essay published in 1926.

One of the most promising of the young Negro poets said to me once, “I want to be a poet—not a Negro poet,” meaning, I believe, “I want to write like a white poet”; meaning subconsciously, “I would like to be a white poet”; meaning behind that, “I would like to be white.” And I was sorry the young man said that, for no great poet has ever been afraid of being himself. And I doubted then that, with his desire to run away spiritually from his race, this boy would ever be a great poet. But this is the mountain standing in the way of any true Negro art in America—this urge within the race toward whiteness, the desire to pour racial individuality into the mold of American standardization, and to be as little Negro and as much American as possible.

But let us look at the immediate background of this young poet. His family is of what I suppose one would call the Negro middle class: people who are by no means rich yet never uncomfortable nor hungry—smug, contented, respectable folk, members of the Baptist church. The father goes to work every morning. He is a chief steward at a large white club. The mother sometimes does fancy sewing or supervises parties for the rich families of the town. The children go to a mixed school. In the home they read white papers and magazines. And the mother often says “Don’t be like niggers” when the children are bad. A frequent phrase from the father is, “Look how well a white man does things.” And so the word white comes to be unconsciously a symbol of all the virtues. It holds for the children beauty, morality, and money. The whisper of “I want to be white” runs silently through their minds. This young poet’s home is, I believe, a fairly typical home of the colored middle class. One sees immediately how difficult it would be for an artist born in such a home to interest himself in interpreting the beauty of his own people. He is never taught to see that beauty. He is taught rather not to see it, or if he does, to be ashamed of it when it is not according to Caucasian patterns.

For racial culture the home of a self-styled “high-class” Negro has nothing better to offer. Instead there will perhaps be more aping of things white than in a less cultured or less wealthy home. The father is perhaps a doctor, lawyer, landowner, or politician. The mother may be a social worker, or a teacher, or she may do nothing and have a maid. Father is often dark but he has usually married the lightest woman he could find. The family attend a fashionable church where few really colored faces are to be found. And they themselves draw a color line. In the North they go to white theaters and white movies. And in the South they have at least two cars and a house “like white folks.” Nordic manners, Nordic faces, Nordic hair, Nordic art (if any), and an Episcopal heaven. A very high mountain indeed for the would-be racial artist to climb in order to discover himself and his people.

But then there are the low-down folks, the so-called common element, and they are the majority—may the Lord be praised! The people who have their nip of gin on Saturday nights and are not too important to themselves or the community, or too well fed, or too learned to watch the lazy world go round. They live on Seventh Street in Washington or State Street in Chicago and they do not particularly care whether they are like white folks or anybody else. Their joy runs, bang! into ecstasy. Their religion soars to a shout. Work maybe a little today, rest a little tomorrow. Play awhile. Sing awhile. O, let’s dance! These common people are not afraid of spirituals, as for a long time their more intellectual brethren were, and jazz is their child. They furnish a wealth of colorful, distinctive material for any artist because they still hold their own individuality in the face of American standardizations. And perhaps these common people will give to the world its truly great Negro artist, the one who is not afraid to be himself. Whereas the better-class Negro would tell the artist what to do, the people at least let him alone when he does appear. And they are not ashamed of him—if they know he exists at all. And they accept what beauty is their own without question.

5 Certainly there is, for the American Negro artist who can escape the restrictions the more advanced among his own group would put upon him, a great field of unused material ready for his art. Without going outside his race and even among the better classes with their “white” culture and conscious American manners, but still Negro enough to be different, there is sufficient matter to furnish a black artist with a lifetime of creative work. And when he chooses to touch on the relations between Negroes and whites in this country with their innumerable overtones and undertones, surely, and especially for literature and the drama, there is an inexhaustible supply of themes at hand. To these the Negro artist can give his racial individuality, his heritage of rhythm and warmth, and his incongruous humor that so often, as in the Blues, becomes ironic laughter mixed with tears. But let us look again at the mountain.

A prominent Negro clubwoman in Philadelphia paid eleven dollars to hear Raquel Meller sing Andalusian popular songs. But she told me a few weeks before she would not think of going to hear "that woman," Clara Smith, a great black artist, sing Negro folksongs. And many an upper-class Negro church, even now, would not dream of employing a spiritual in its services. The drab melodies in white folks' hymnbooks are much to be preferred. "We want to worship the Lord correctly and quietly. We don't believe in 'shouting.' Let's be dull like the Nordics," they say, in effect.

The road for the serious black artist, then, who would produce a racial art is most certainly rocky and the mountain is high. Until recently he received almost no encouragement for his work from either white or colored people. The fine novels of Chestnutt1 go out of print with neither race noticing their passing. The quaint charm and humor of Dunbar's2 dialect verse brought to him, in his day, largely the same kind of encouragement one would give a sideshow freak (A colored man writing poetry! How odd!) or a clown (How amusing!).

The present vogue in things Negro, although it may do as much harm as good for the budding colored artist, has at least done this: it has brought him forcibly to the attention of his own people among whom for so long, unless the other race had noticed him beforehand, he was a prophet with little honor. I understand that Charles Gilpin acted for years in Negro theaters without any special acclaim from his own, but when Broadway gave him eight curtain calls, Negroes, too, began to beat a tin pan in his honor. I know a young colored writer, a manual worker by day, who had been writing well for the colored magazines for some years, but it was not until he recently broke into the white publications and his first book was accepted by a prominent New York publisher that the "best" Negroes in his city took the trouble to discover that he lived there. Then almost immediately they decided to give a grand dinner for him. But the society ladies were careful to whisper to his mother that perhaps she'd better not come. They were not sure she would have an evening gown.

The Negro artist works against an undertow of sharp criticism and misunderstanding from his own group and unintentional bribes from the whites. “O, be respectable, write about nice people, show how good we are,” say the Negroes. “Be stereotyped, don’t go too far, don’t shatter our illusions about you, don’t amuse us too seriously. We will pay you,” say the whites. Both would have told Jean Toomer not to write “Cane.” The colored people did not praise it. The white people did not buy it. Most of the colored people who did read “Cane” hate it. They are afraid of it. Although the critics gave it good reviews the public remained indifferent. Yet (excepting the work of DuBois3) “Cane” contains the finest prose written by a Negro in America. And like the singing of Robeson,4 it is truly racial.

10 But in spite of the Nordicized Negro intelligentsia and the desires of some white editors we have an honest American Negro literature already with us. Now I await the rise of the Negro theater. Our folk music, having achieved world-wide fame, offers itself to the genius of the great individual American Negro composer who is to come. And within the next decade I expect to see the work of a growing school of colored artists who paint and model the beauty of dark faces and create with new technique the expres- sions of their own soul-world. And the Negro dancers who will dance like flame and the singers who will continue to carry our songs to all who listen—they will be with us in even greater numbers tomorrow.

Most of my own poems are racial in theme and treatment, derived from the life I know. In many of them I try to grasp and hold some of the meanings and rhythms of jazz. I am sincere as I know how to be in these poems and yet after every reading I answer questions like these from my own people: Do you think Negroes should always write about Negroes? I wish you wouldn’t read some of your poems to white folks. How do you find anything interesting in a place like a cabaret? Why do you write about black people? You aren’t black. What makes you do so many jazz poems?

But jazz to me is one of the inherent expressions of Negro life in America: the eternal tom-tom beating in the Negro soul—the tom-tom of revolt against weariness in a white world, a world of subway trains, and work, work, work; the tom-tom of joy and laughter, and pain swallowed in a smile. Yet the Philadelphia clubwoman is ashamed to say that her race created it and she does not like me to write about it. The old subconscious “white is best” runs through her mind. Years of study under white teachers, a lifetime of white books, pictures, and papers, and white manners, morals, and Puritan standards made her dislike the spirituals. And now she turns up her nose at jazz and all its manifestations—likewise almost everything else distinctly racial. She doesn't care for the Winold Reiss portraits of Negroes because they are "too Negro." She does not want a true picture of herself from anybody. She wants the artist to flatter her, to make the white world believe that all Negroes are as smug and as near white in soul as she wants to be. But, to my mind, it is the duty of the younger Negro artist, if he accepts any duties at all from outsiders, to change through the force of his art that old whispering "I want to be white," hidden in the aspirations of his people, to "Why should I want to be white? I am a Negro—and beautiful!"

So I am ashamed for the black poet who says, "I want to be a poet, not a Negro poet," as though his own racial world were not as interesting as any other world. I am ashamed, too, for the colored artist who runs from the painting of Negro faces to the painting of sunsets after the manner of the academicians because he fears the strange un-whiteness of his own features. An artist must be free to choose what he does, certainly, but he must also never be afraid to do what he might choose.

Let the blare of Negro jazz bands and the bellowing voice of Bessie Smith singing Blues penetrate the closed ears of the colored near-intellectuals "until they listen and perhaps understand. Let Paul Robeson singing Water Boy, and Rudolph Fisher writing about the streets of Harlem, and Jean Toomer holding the heart of Georgia in his hands, and Aaron Douglas drawing strange black fantasies cause the smug Negro middle class to turn from their white, respectable, ordinary books and papers to catch a glimmer of their own beauty. We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, it doesn't matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too. The tom-tom cries and the tom-tom laughs. If colored people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, their displeasure doesn't matter either. We build our temples for tomorrow, strong as we know how, and we stand on top of the mountain, free within ourselves.

On the Cultural Achievements of African-Americans [1960]

Without them, on my part, there would have been no poems; without their hopes and fears and dreams, no stories; without their struggles, no dramas; without their music, no songs.

Had I not heard as a child in the little churches of Kansas and Missouri, "Deep river, my home is over Jordan," or "My Lord, what a morning when the stars begin to fall," I might not have come to realize the lyric beauty of living poetry....

There is so much richness in Negro humor, so much beauty in black dreams, so much dignity in our struggle, and so much universality in our problems, in us—in each living human being of color—that I do not understand the tendency today that some American Negro artists have of seeking to run away from themselves, of running away from us, of being afraid to sing our own songs, paint our pictures, write about ourselves—when it is our music that has given America its greatest music, our humor that has enriched its entertainment media for the past 100 years, our rhythm that has guided its dancing feet from plantation days to the Charleston.... Yet there are some of us who say, "Why write about Negroes? Why not be just a writer?" And why not—if one wants to be "just a writer?" Negroes in a free world should be whatever each wants to be—even if it means being "just a writer...."

There is nothing to be ashamed of in the strength and dignity and laughter of the Negro people. And there is nothing to be afraid of in the use of their material.

Could you be possibly afraid that the rest of the world will not accept it? Our spirituals are sung and loved in the great concert halls of the whole world. Our blues are played from Topeka to Tokyo. Harlem's jive talk delights Hong Kong and Paris. Those of our writers who have most concerned themselves with our very special problems are translated and read around the world. The local, the regional can—and does—become universal. Sean O'Casey's Irishmen are an example. So I would say to young Negro writers, do not be afraid of yourself. You are the world....

Poetry and Translation

During the course of reading this section you will be invited to translate a poem. If you are competent in a language other than English, you will be asked to translate a poem of your choice from that language, and also to write about the particular difficulties you experienced while translating. Or you can choose to translate one of the French, Spanish, and Japanese poems that we print in this chapter; you don't have to know any of these languages, since we provide English translations.

A POEM TRANSLATED FROM SPANISH, IN AN ESSAY BY A STUDENT

We begin with a student's discussion of his translation of Federico García Lorca's short poem, "Despedida."

Guzman 1

George Guzman

Professor Tredo

English 101

20 September 2005

García Lorca's "Despedida"

My father sometimes quotes, half-jokingly although it is a serious poem, Federico García Lorca's "Despedida," which he learned when he was a schoolboy in Cuba. Because it is short and because he quotes it so often, I know it by heart. In Spanish it goes like this:

Guzman 2

Despedida

Si muero,

dejad el balcón abierto.

El niño come naranjas.

(Desde mi balcón lo veo.)

El segador siega el trigo.

(Desde mi balcón lo siento.)

¡Si muero,

dejad el balcón abierto!

When I translated the poem for this assignment, I didn't find any serious difficulties--probably because the poem does not rhyme. The only word in the poem that I think is especially hard to translate is the title, "Despedida." It comes from a verb, "despedir," which Spanish-English dictionaries define as "to take one's leave." In English, however, no one "takes one's leave"; we just say "Goodbye," and go. But "Goodbye" is too informal for "Despedida," so I settled on "Farewell." No one speaking English ever says "Farewell," but I think it catches the slight formality of the Spanish, and it has the right tone for this poem about a man who is talking about leaving the world. Still another possibility that seems good to me is "parting."

Aside from the title, I at first found the poem easy to translate, but on further thinking about my translation, I found a few things that I wish I could do better. Here, for a start, is my literal translation.

Farewell

If I die,

leave the balcony open.

The boy eats oranges.

(From my balcony I see him.)

The reaper reaps the wheat.

(From my balcony I hear him.)

If I die,

leave the balcony open!

There are subtle things in this poem, but most of them can be translated easily. For instance, in the first and the last stanzas the poet speaks of “el balcón” (the balcony), but in the middle two stanzas he speaks of “mi balcón” (my balcony). That is, in the first and last stanzas, where he imagines himself dead, he realizes the balcony is not his anymore, but is simply “the balcony.” There is no difficulty in translating this idea from Spanish into English.

Because I knew the poem by heart, I translated it without first looking at the original on the page. But when I wrote it out in Spanish, too, I became aware of a small difficulty. In Spanish if a sentence ends with an exclamation point (or a question mark) it also begins with one, so the reader knows at the beginning of a sentence what sort of sentence it will be. We don’t do this in English, and I think something is lost in English. The two exclamation marks in García Lorca’s last sentence, one at the beginning and one at the end, seem to me to call more attention to the sentence, and make it more sad. And since the first and last sentences are identical except for the exclamation marks around the last sentence, the punctuation makes the last sentence different from the first. Superficially the poem begins and ends with the same sentence, but the last sentence is much more final.

A second difficulty is this: On rereading my translation, I wondered if it should try to catch the o sounds that in the original are at the end of every line except the third. It’s hard to explain, but I think this repeated o sound has several effects. Certainly the repetition of the sound gives unity to the poem. But it also is part of the meaning, in two ways. First of all, the sound of o is like a lament or a cry. Second, because the sound is repeated again and again, in line after line, it is as if the poet wants the present to continue, doesn’t want to stop, wants to keep living. Obviously he is not looking forward to dying. He doesn’t say anything about hoping to go to heaven. All he thinks of is what he sees now, and he suggests that he would like to keep seeing it from his balcony.

Balcón in Spanish means, as I have translated it, “balcony,” but to say “leave the balcony open”--which is perfectly all right in Spanish--sounds a little funny in English, maybe especially because we don’t have many balconies here, unlike (I am told) Spain. The idea of course is to leave open the door, or if it is glass it is also a window, that leads to the balcony. Maybe, then, it makes better sense to be a little free in the translation, and to say, “Leave the window open,” or even “Do not draw the curtain,” or some such thing. In fact, if we can put “window” at the end of the line, we get the o sound of the original.

If I die,

Leave open the window.

But in the original the first line (“Si muero,” literally “If I die”) has this o sound also, and I can’t think of any way of getting this into the translation. For a moment I thought of beginning,

If I go,

Leave open the window,

but “If I go” just isn’t a moving way of saying “If I die,” which is what “Si muero” means. Still, we might translate line 4 as “I see him from my window,” and line 6 as “I hear him from my window.” In the end, I decided not to begin by saying “If I go,” but (even though I lose the o sound in the first line) to substitute “window” for the “balcony” in lines 2, 4, and 6, in order to get the repetition and the sad o sound. My final version goes like this:

Farewell

If I die,

leave open the window.

The boy eats oranges.

(I see him from my window.)

The reaper reaps the wheat.

(I hear him from my window.)

If I die,

leave open the window!

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Here are our responses. If yours differ, consider putting them into writing.

1. -This seems like an excellent translation to us. Do you agree?

2. -When the student shared his essay with others in the class, it was praised for being "thoughtful." What gives the essay this quality?

A Note on Using the First-Person Singular Pronoun in Essays

Some handbooks on writing tell students never to use I in an essay. But this rule is too rigid; in the case of the essay you have just read, the personal touches make it all the more interesting and engaging. Often the problem is not really with the use of I, but, rather, with the absence of explanation and evidence that make clear what prompted the "I" to respond as he or she does. This student does a good job of focusing on the poem, commenting on details of language, and keeping the nature of the assignment in mind. His use of I occurs as part of a careful analysis and argument.

TRANSLATING A POEM OF YOUR CHOICE, AND COMMENTING ON THE TRANSLATION

If you are at ease in a language other than English, translate a short poem from that language into English. It may be a poem that you learned in school or at home or on the street.

We suggest that you begin by jotting down a line-for-line prose translation, and then work on a poetic version. Your prose version of course will not be a word-for-word translation. After all, a word-for-word translation of the Spanish "Me llamo Juan" is "Me [or "Myself"] I call John," but no one speaking English says this. The English version of these words is "My name is John"—even though the Spanish word for name (nombre) does not appear in the original sentence. Similarly, a native speaker of French, when asked whether he or she is going to class this morning , may reply "Mais oui," which in a word-for-word translation would be "But yes." In English, however, we would simply say "Yes" or "Certainly," and therefore the "But" ought to be omitted in a translation. Or consider the phrase "les hommes d'équipage" in the first line of Baudelaire's "L'Albatros" (see page 968). A word-for-word translation would be "men of the crew," but does one say this? Perhaps "members of the crew" is better? Or perhaps simply "the crew"?

Or “crewmen”? Or, perhaps best of all, “sailors”? In any case, the French equipage certainly cannot be translated as “equipment.” (Translators call words that look alike but have different meanings “false friends.” Examples: French advertissement means “warning”; German also means “therefore”; Spanish constipado means “having a head cold.”)

The prose translation ought to sound like English, and this means going beyond a word-for-word translation, at least to a phrase-by-phrase translation. If English is not your native language, you may want to check your prose version with a native-born speaker of English. In any case, once you have a prose version that is in idiomatic English, try to put it into a poetic form.

This does not mean that (assuming your original uses rhyme) you must preserve the exact rhyme scheme. If the original rhymes abab, you may find it satisfactory to produce a version in which only the second and fourth lines rhyme. Similarly, even if the original line has 11 or 12 syllables, you may prefer to reduce the line to 10 syllables because the pentameter line (10 syllables) is so widely used in English that it seems natural. Admittedly, your task is easier if you choose an unrhymed poem, and much of the world’s poetry—to cite only two instances, Native American poetry and Japanese poetry—does not use rhyme. (We discuss one Japanese form, the haiku, on page 962.)

When you have done your best, relax for a while, and then jot down (in preparation for drafting an essay that will accompany your translation) some notes about the particular problems involved in translating the work. Is there a pun in the original that is impossible to translate? Are there historical or mythological allusions that are clear to people who belong to the culture that produced the poem but that are obscure to outsiders? Are there qualities in the original language (specialists call it “the source language”) that simply cannot be reproduced in the “host” (or “target”) language? For instance, Japanese has several verbs meaning “to give”; the word used in “I gave you a book” differs from the word in “You gave me a book.” It is rather as if one had to say, “You bestowed a book on me”—but of course no one does say this in English. What, then, is a translator to do?

In the end, you will produce a translation, and an essay of some 500 words, explaining the particular difficulties you encountered, and perhaps explaining the hardest decisions that you ultimately made.

LAST-MINUTE HELP: THREE SPANISH POEMS

If you don’t know a poem in a language other than English, consider translating one or both of these Spanish folk songs, or, finally, the poem we print by the Chilean poet Gabriela Mistral.

Ya se van los pastores, alla Estremadura	The shepherds are already leaving on their way to Estremadura
Ya se queda la Sierra triste y obscura.	And the mountain ridge is already sad and gloomy.
Ya se van los pastores ya se van marchando	The shepherds are already going, they are already departing
Ya las pobres niñas se queden llorando.	And the poor girls remain there, crying.

Here is the second song:

Una gallina con pollos cinco duro me costó	I bought a hen and chicks for five duros
Corrocloclo corrocloclo	Corrocloclo corrocloclo
La compré por la mañana, y a la tarde se perdió	I bought her in the morning and in the afternoon it lost its way
Corrocloclo corrocloclo	Corrocloclo corrocloclo
Yo no siento la gallina ni el dinero que costó	I’m not sorry about the hen or the money it cost
Corrocloclo corrocloclo	Corrocloclo corrocloclo
Solo siento los pollitos que sin madre los quedó	I’m only sorry for the chicks who are left without a mother
Corrocloclo corrocloclo.	Corrocloclo corrocloclo.

GABRIELA MISTRAL

Lucila Godoy Alacayaga (1889–1957) adopted the pseudonym Gabriela Mistral. A teacher and a director of schools in Chile, she achieved fame there in 1914, when she won first prize in a national poetry contest; she received international fame in 1945, when she was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature, the first Latin-American writer to win the award. She was also distinguished in two other careers, as an educator—she is esteemed for her revision of the Mexican school system and she was a beloved professor at Barnard College in New York—and as a figure in the world of international politics, representing Chile in the League of Nations and the United Nations.

The following poem originates in a response to a statue, Rodin's The Thinker. If you do work on a translation of Mistral's poem, you might keep in mind a comment by an earlier translator of her work, the poet Langston Hughes, who in his Introduction to Selected Poems of Gabriela Mistral (1957) wrote: "I have no theories of translation. I simply try to transfer into English as much as I can of the literal content, emotion, and style of each poem." Unfortunately Hughes did not include a translation of the following poem.

El Pensador de Rodin

Con el mentón caído sobre la mano ruda, el Pensador se acuerda que es carne de la huesa,
carne fatal, delante del destino denuda,
carne que odia la muerte, y tembló de belleza.
Y tembló de amor, toda su primavera ardiente,
y ahora, al otoño, anégase de verdad y tristeza.
El "de morir tenemos" pasa sobre su frente,
en todo agudo bronce, cuando la noche empieza.
Y en la angustia, sus músculos se hienden, sufridores.
Los surcos de su carne se llenan de terrores.
Se hiende, como la hoja de otoño, al Señor fuerte que la llama en los bronces . . . Y no hay árbol torcido de sol en la llanura, ni león de flanco herido, crispados como este hombre que medita en la muerte.

Rodin's Thinker

*Translated by Gustavo Alfaro

With his chin fallen on his rough hand,
the Thinker, remembering that his flesh is of the grave, mortal flesh, naked before its fate,
flesh that hates death, trembled for beauty.
And he trembled for love, his whole ardent spring,
and now in autumn, he is overcome with truth and sadness.
"We must die" passes across his brow,
in every piercing trumpet sound, when night begins to fall.
And in his anguish, his long suffering muscles split.
The furrows of his flesh are filled with terrors.
It splits, like the autumn leaf before the mighty Lord who calls it with trumpet calls . . . And there is no tree twisted by the sun in the plain, nor lion wounded on its side, as tense as this man who meditates on death.

TRANSLATING HAIKU

Earlier in this book (pages 774–776) we looked at some haiku, a Japanese poetic form that consists of 17 syllables, arranged into lines of 5, 7, and 5 syllables. (Strictly speaking, it is written in a continuous line, as we write prose, but it is conceived as three units, 5-7-5.) It is unrhymed, but some English translations and imitations use rhyme.

Here is the most famous of all haiku, in Japanese and with a word-by-word literal translation:

BASHO (1644–1694)

Furuike ya	old pond
kawazu tobikomu	frog jumps in
mizu no oto	water's sound

One of the things that made this poem remarkable was that it probably was the first Japanese poem about a frog that did not talk about the noise of the frog croaking, but instead talked about the noise of the water. (By the way, for an American poem that calls attention to the croaking of a frog, see Emily Dickinson's "I'm Nobody! Who are you?" on page 719.)

How to translate Basho's poem? We have already given a literal translation, but here are some efforts at more literary versions:

The old pond
A frog jumps in
The sound of water.

Old garden lake!
The frog jumps in,
And the waters wake.

The old pond
A frog jumps;
The water slurps.

An old pond a frog jumps in—Plop.

A bog

A frog

A sound

Drowned.

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Offer your own translation or adaptation of the haiku, perhaps keeping the 5-7-5 arrangement of the original; or compose an original poem that responds to Basho's. Here are two examples of responses that our students have produced:

An old pond—	An old pond—
Basho jumps in;	If Basho were here
No more noise.	I'd push him in.

Here is another haiku by Basho, in Japanese and with a graceless word-by-word translation. (The original has, unusually, nine syllables in the second line, a permissible variation.)

Kare-eda ni	withered branch on karasu no tomari-keri	crow is perched
aki no kure	autumn evening

Japanese does not usually distinguish between the singular and the plural, so what we translate as "crow is perched" could equally be translated "crows are perched." Further, what we translated as "autumn evening" may equally be translated "late autumn."

The next poem, also by Basho, was composed at the site of a battle where one of Japan's most famous warriors committed suicide after being defeated by forces acting on behalf of his own brother. It is impossible to find an exact parallel in American history, but perhaps the death of Stonewall Jackson at the Battle of Chancellorsville (1863) comes close in feeling, especially because Jackson was mortally wounded by his own men.

Natsu-gusa ya	Summer grasses
tsuwamono-domo ga	strong warriors'
yume no ato	dreams' relics

In the second line, we use "warriors" rather than "soldiers" because the Japanese word has an archaic flavor. (By the way, in this instance, unlike the poem about the crow or crows, the word for "warriors" is plural.) The gist of the idea of the poem is that grasses (or weeds) now flourish where strong soldiers once fought; all that is left of the dreams (or ambitions) of the soldiers is the summer grass. Here are two versions that students produced, using off-rhymes:

Summer grasses	Weeds flourish
All that is left	where soldiers nourished
where warriors passed.	dreams of glory.

Here are two versions, again by students, that retain the 5-7-5 pattern of the original.

On this grassy spot	Grasses grow today
Here once a noble army	Where heroic soldiers died
Dreamed its dream and died.	Leaving bones and dreams.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Try your hand at translating Basho's poems about the crow(s) and about the dead warriors, or invent an adaptation of each poem. You might, for instance, write a poem about a bird in a season other than the fall, and a poem about the ironic implications of some local site.
2. -Here are literal translations of two more haiku by Basho. Create versions that are more memorable.

FURTHER THOUGHTS ABOUT TRANSLATING POETRY

If you have read the preceding pages and have had the pleasures of wrestling with a translation and of writing an essay about your efforts, you are ready for an advanced course—the next few pages. But even if you have not engaged in the preliminaries, you may find that the following discussion of poems and translations will help you to think about the language and structure of poetry.

We begin these supplementary remarks by looking at a very short poem by the Roman author Catullus (87?–55? BCE). The subject is the paradoxical quality of the feelings of a lover. (There are countless poems about love as a pleasing pain, a heavenly hell, and about the lover as both active and passive, eagerly loving and yet tormented by love. See, for instance, Aphra Behn's poem on page 670.) Here is Catullus' poem:

Odi et amo, quare id faciam, fortasse requiris?

Nescio, sed fieri sentitio et excrucior.

This can be translated more or less literally as:

I hate and I love. Why do I do that, perhaps you ask.

I don't know, but I feel it to be happening, and I am tortured.

Notice that the language of this poem is not so remote from English as it may seem at first glance:

- -In the first line, the Latin odi ("I hate") is related to the English word odious; amo ("I love") to our word amorous; and requiris ("you ask") to our require and inquire.
- -In the second line, sentitio ("I feel") is related to our sentient, and ex-crucior ("I am crucified" or "I am tortured") to our excruciate. (This last word includes crux, or "cross.")

Next—and here we get closer to our topic, poetry—notice the arrangement or pattern of the words, since one of the things literature does is to put experience into a pattern. In Catullus' little poem, there is a pattern of long and short syllables (but we need not discuss classical versification here), and also a pattern of verbs. Each line contains four verbs. Those in the first line are active ("I hate," "I love," "I do," "you ask"), whereas those in the second line are passive or describe a passive condition ("I don't know," "I feel it to be happening," "I am tortured"). And so we can say that Catullus catches an aspect—or rather, two aspects—of love,

- the sense of activity and also
- the sense of helplessness.

Each verb in the first line is echoed or balanced in the second; thus Odi et amo ("I hate and I love") at the beginning of the first line chimes with sentio et excrucior ("I feel . . . and I am tortured") at the end of the second. Moreover, the active faciam (“I do”) in the first line connects with the passive form of the verb, fieri (“to be done,” “to happen”) in the second.

Having tried to convey something of the poetry of Catullus’ two lines—something of their artful expressiveness—let’s look at a few translations. The original does not rhyme, but many translators have believed that an English version needs to rhyme if it is to be seen and felt as a poem.

I hate and love—the why I cannot tell,

But by my tortures know the fact too well.

—Theodore Martin

In the next two versions the translators suggest particular tortures:

I hate and love. Why do that? Good question.

No answer save “I do.” Nailed, through either hand.

—Frederic Raphael and Kenneth McLeish

I hate and I love. And if you ask me how,

I do not know—I only feel it, and I’m torn in two.

—Peter Whigham

The first of these versions, by Raphael and McLeish, clearly—perhaps too clearly—evokes crucifixion. The second, with “I’m torn in two,” catches the double nature of love that is the subject of Catullus’ poem, and it evokes visions of the instrument of torture known as the rack, or perhaps of a victim whose limbs were tied to two or more horses that were then whipped into flight.

Here is one more version:

“At once I hate and love as well.”

—“In heaven’s name, Catullus, how?”

—“God knows! And yet I feel it now Here in my heart: the whole of hell.”

—M. H. Tattersall

Tattersall’s version is free in that it converts the poem into a dialogue and names Catullus, but one can argue that it is true to the spirit of the poem. It is widely agreed that in the translation of poetry the spirit is more important than the letter. Some of the worst—least moving, indeed least readable—translations are word-by-word translations that can claim to be very close to the original but that are unlike anything we can imagine being spoken in English.

CAN POETRY BE TRANSLATED?

Having looked at a range of translations, we can perhaps now move from a particular work to a general problem or question. To translate is (literally) "to carry across"; a text is carried from one language into another. But can poetry be translated? Robert Frost once defined poetry as "what gets lost in translation." He was not the only person to think that poetry can't be translated. An Italian proverb generalizes, "Traduttori, traditori"—that is, "Translators are traitors," or, more freely, "Translation betrays"—but as you can see, much is lost in our translation.

The idea that poetry can't be translated is rooted in the fact that poets make use not only of the gist of the obvious meaning of a word but also of patterns of sound. We can see this most easily by first looking at a statement that is not a poem but that relies heavily on its sounds. Consider

Look before you leap.

The most obvious pattern is the alliteration (words that begin with the same sound), look and leap, but there is also a pattern of stresses. The sentence begins and ends with a stress, and "before" and "you leap" each consist of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable. If you compare "Look before you leap" with "Watch out before you leap," or with "Before leaping, look around," you'll see that these translations of English words into other English words lose much of what counts in the original.

You might take a moment to try to put into other words such expressions as "There's no fool like an old fool," "Penny wise and pound foolish," or "A penny saved is a penny earned." Even better, if you are familiar with a memorable saying in a language other than English, try to capture its effectiveness in an English translation of your own.

Let's think now of some issues specific to translating poetry. Rhyme of course is a kind of pattern (a recurring sound), and it can cause a translator difficulty, since effective rhyme often conveys some sort of meaning. It may bring together two words that not only sound alike but have some association in common, as in the greeting-card rhymes of moon and June, or dove and love. Or a rhyme may achieve a poignant ironic effect by bringing together two words that sound alike but that differ sharply in meaning, such as light (with its associations of life) and night (with its associations of death). “Look before you leap” doesn’t contain rhyme in the usual sense of the word, but the alliterating l sounds can be called initial rhyme. And like rhyme, alliteration—because of the identity in sound—can imply some sort of identity between the alliterating words, or as here, it can make an effective contrast: Look implies caution and probably motionless, whereas leap implies reckless activity.

Probably everyone will agree that translators should strive to capture the subtleties of the original, and probably everyone will agree—here we get back to Robert Frost’s view—that inevitably much will be lost. But what is gained in translation, or what may be gained, is a new poem.

Something along these line is suggested by Edwin Cranston, a leading translator of classical Japanese poetry, in A Waka Anthology. Translators have duties to their authors, but they also have duties to their own powers. Cranston makes this point by calling attention to a tenth-century Japanese poet’s assertion that poems “have their seed in the human heart, and burgeon forth into the myriad leaves of words.” In similar fashion, Cranston says, the translator “descends into the poem and lets something happen”; the translator serves “as a medium for the new growth.” But of course the process of translating is not passive. As Cranston says, if translators enter into the work and listen to it, they also have their own ideas. The original is strongly there, but so is the translator’s creative impulse, which has its own direction and has “its own life and integrity. Nothing is more persuasive than something that works, and if a line somehow works, it is hard to abandon it.”

The result may be a translation that is free rather than faithful. Or if it is faithful, it is faithful to the spirit of literature rather than to the letter of the original work. If we push this view further than Cranston himself does, the translation—perhaps better called a version or an adaptation—is a success if it has life as a poem, however removed it may be from the original. More than one translator has defended his or her work as Edward FitzGerald (translator of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khavyamn) did, by quoting from Ecclesiastes, “Better a live dog than a dead lion.” One translator we know tells us he likes to think of the original as a “control.” The original serves as a control on the act of translation, though it rests with the translator to decide whether he or she allows the original to control a lot or a little. Translators can give themselves a great deal of freedom, or only a little. But in either case, because their work is a translation of something else, they are always referring back to another text while they compose a new one.

LOOKING AT TRANSLATIONS OF A POEM BY CHARLES BAUDELAIRE

In the following poem the French poet Charles Baudelaire (1821–1867) compares the albatross—majestic when soaring above oceangoing ships, but pitiful when captured and flopping on the deck—with the poet, whose lofty imagination makes him unsuited for the workaday world. The poem was first published in the 1859 edition of Baudelaire's book, Fleur du mal (Flowers of Evil).

L'Albatros [1859]

Souvent, pour s'amuser, les hommes d'équipage
Prennent des albatros, vastes oiseaux des mers.
Qui suivent, indolents compagnons de voyage,
Le navire glissant sur les gouffres amers.
À peine les ont-ils déposés sur les planches,
Que ces rois de l'azur, maladroits et honteux,
Laissent piteusement leurs grandes ailes blanches
Comme des avirons traîner à côté d'eux.
Ce voyager ailé, comme il est gauche et veule!
Luis, naguère si beau, qu'il est comique et laid!
L'un agace son bec avec un brûle-gueule,
L'autre mime, en boitant, l'infirme qui volait!
Le Poète est semblable au prince des nuées
Qui hante la tempêt se rit de l'archer;
Exilé sur le sol au milieu des huées,
Ses ailes de géant l'empêchent de marcher.

A literal translation, almost word by word, would go something as follows. (We retain the lineation of the original, and we offer it not as a satisfactory version of the poem but only as a starting point, in order to help readers who do not know French to follow the poem.)

Often, to amuse themselves, sailors capture albatrosses, great sea birds, who follow, indolent companions of the journey,

the ship, gliding on the bitter deeps.
As soon as they stretch them out on the deck
these monarchs of the blue, awkward and ashamed, pitifully let their large white wings like oars drag by their sides.
The winged traveler, how awkward and feeble!
He who a short time ago was so beautiful,
one sailor teases his beak with a clay pipe,
and another, limping, mimics the cripple who flew.
The Poet is like the prince of the clouds who is at home in the tempest and who scorns the archer, exiled on the earth, an object of scorn,
his giant wings hinder him as he walks.

Let's look now at some verse translations of the first stanza. In the original, the first and third lines of each stanza rhyme, as do the second and fourth, the rhyme scheme thus being abab. The task of following Baudelaire's rhyme scheme is difficult, and it can lead to very strained lines; some translators therefore prefer to rhyme only two of the four lines, or to settle for an off-rhyme, as in the first example here, where sea and indolently rhyme, and where selves and gulfs chime less precisely:

Sometimes, sailors to amuse themselves catch albatrosses, great birds of the sea, which as companions follow indolently
the vessel gliding over bitter gulfs.

—C. F. MacIntyre

In the next version, all four lines rhyme closely, but, not surprisingly, the translation is somewhat freer:

Often, when bored, the sailors of the crew
Trap albatross, the great birds of the seas,

Mild travelers escorting in the blue

Ships gliding on the ocean's mysteries.

—James McGowan

We say this version is freer because, after all, Baudelaire spoke not of "the ocean's mysteries" but of les gouffres amers, the bitter deeps. In short, there often is a trade-off between closely following what might be called the formal properties of the poem (in this case, rhyme) and the precise meaning. On the other hand, here is a rhymed translation that is remarkably faithful to the original. We quote the entire version:

Often, for pastime, mariners will ensnare

The albatross, that vast sea-bird who sweeps

On high companionable pinion where

Their vessel glides upon the bitter deeps.

Torn from his native space, this captive king

Flounders upon the deck in stricken pride,

And pitiably lets his great white wing

Drag like a heavy paddle at his side.

This rider of winds, how awkward he is, and weak!

How droll he seems, who lately was all grace!

A sailor pokes a pipestem into his beak;

Another, hobbling, mocks his trammeled pace.

The Poet is like this monarch of the clouds,

Familiar of storms, of stars, and of all high things;

Exiled on earth amidst its hooting crowds,

He cannot walk, borne down by his giant wings.

—Richard Wilbur

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Produce your own version—rhymed or unrhymed—of the final stanza of "The Albatross." For your convenience we offer some rhymes that other translators have used, but you are under no compulsion to use them. MacIntyre used mocks, clouds, crowds, walk; McGowan used clouds, day, crowds, way. George Dillon (who collaborated with Edna St. Vincent Millay on a translation of The Flowers of Evil) used cloud, slings, crowd, wings. Francis Duke, in his translation of Flowers of Evil, used clouds, defiant, crowds, giant.

Translator's note: Mistral's bronce in line 8 and bronces in line 12 I translate as trumpet sound and trumpet calls. Given the context, this reading seems to me to be more plausible than a reading that takes bronce and bronces to refer to the bronze sculpture itself.

ANONYMOUS BRITISH BALLAD

The Three Ravens

There were three ravens sat on a tree,
Downe a downe, hay downe, hay downe
There were three ravens sat on a tree,
With a downe
There were three ravens sat on a tree,
They were as blacke as they might be,
With a downe derrie, derrie, derrie, downe, downe.
The one of them said to his mate,
“Where shall we our breakfast take?”
“Down in yonder greene field,
There lies a knight slain under his shield.
His hounds they lie downe at his feete,
So well they can their master keepe.
His haukes they flie so eagerly,
There’s no fowle dare him come nie.”
Downe there comes a fallow° doe,°

As great with yong as she might goe.

She lift up his bloudy hed,

And kist his wounds that were so red.

She got him up upon her backe,

And carried him to earthen lake.°

She buried him before the prime,°

She was dead herselfe ere even-song time.

God send every gentleman

Such haukes, such hounds, and such a leman.°

The Twa Corbies

As I was walking all alane,

I heard twa corbies° making a mane;°

The tane° unto the t' other say,

"Where sall we gang° and dine to-day?"

"In behint yon auld fail dyke,°

I wot° there lies a new-slain knight;

And naebody kens° that he lies there,

But his hawk, his hound, and lady fair.

"His hound is to the hunting gane,

His hawk, to fetch the wild-fowl hame,

His lady's ta'en another mate,

So we may mak our dinner sweet.

"Ye'll sit on his white hause-bane,°

And I'll pike out his bonny blue een.°

Wi' ae° lock o' his gowden° hair

We'll theek° our nest when it grows bare.

“Mony a one for him makes mane,

But nane sall ken whare he is gane;

O’er his white banes, when they are bare,

The wind sall blaw for evermair.”

Edward

“Why dois your brand° sae° drap wi’ bluid,

Edward, Edward?

Why dois your brand sae drap wi’ bluid?

And why sae sad gang° yee, O?”

“O, I hae killed my hauke sae guid,

Mither, mither,

O, I hae killed my hauke sae guid,

And I had nae mair bot hee, O.”

“Your haukis bluid was nevir sae reid,

Edward, Edward,

“Your haukis bluid was nevir sae reid,

My deir son I tell thee, O.”

“O, I hae killed my reid-roan steid,

Mither, mither,

O, I hae killed my reid-roan steid,

That erst° was sae fair and frie,° O.”

“Your steid was auld, and ye hae gat mair,

Edward, Edward,

Your steid was auld, and ye hae gat mair,

Sum other dule° ye drie,° O.”

“O, I hae killed my fadir deir,

Mither, mither,

O, I hae killed my fadir deir,

Alas, and wae is mee, O!”

“And whatten penance wul ye drie for that,

Edward, Edward?

And whatten penance wul ye drie for that?

My deir son, now tell me, O.”

“Ile set my feit in yonder boat,

Mither, mither,

Ile set my feit in yonder boat,

And Ile fare ovir the sea, O.”

“And what wul ye doe wi’ your towirs and your ha’,°

Edward, Edward,

And what wul ye doe wi’ your towirs and your ha’,

That were sae fair to see, O?”

“Ile let thame stand tul they doun fa’,°

Mither, mither,

Ile let thame stand tul they doun fa’,

For here nevir mair maun° I bee, O.”

“And what wul ye leive to your bairns° and your wife,

Edward, Edward?

And what wul ye leive to your bairns and your wife,

When ye gang ovir the sea, O?”

“The warldis° room, late° them beg thrae° life,

Mither, mither,

The warldis room, late them beg thrae life,

For thame nevir mair wul I see, O.”

“And what wul ye leive to your ain mither deir,

Edward, Edward?

And what wul ye leive to your ain mither deir?

My deir son, now tell me, O.”

“The curse of hell frae me sall ye beir,

Mither, mither,

The curse of hell frae me sall ye beir.

Sic° counseils ye gave to me, O.”

ANONYMOUS

*John Henry

John Henry was a very small boy,

Sitting on his mammy’s knee;

He picked up a hammer and a little piece of steel,

Saying, “A hammer’ll be the death of me, O Lord,

A hammer’ll be the death of me.”

John Henry went up on the mountain

And he came down on the side.

The mountain was so tall and John Henry was so small

That he laid down his hammer and he cried, “O Lord,”

He laid down his hammer and he cried.

John Henry was a man just six feet in height,

Nearly two feet and a half across the breast.

He’d take a nine-pound hammer and hammer all day long

And never get tired and want to rest, O Lord,

And never get tired and want to rest.

John Henry was a steel-driving man, O Lord,

He drove all over the world.

He come to Big Bend Tunnel on the C. & O. Road

Where he beat the steam drill down, O Lord,

Where he beat the steam drill down.

John Henry said to the captain,

“Captain, you go to town,

Bring me back a twelve-pound hammer

And I’ll beat that steam drill down, O Lord,

And I’ll beat that steam drill down.”

They placed John Henry on the right-hand side,

The steam drill on the left;

He said, “Before I let that steam drill beat me down

I’ll die with my hammer in my hand, O Lord,

And send my soul to rest.”

The white folks all got scared,

Thought Big Bend was a-fallin’ in;

John Henry hollered out with a very loud shout,

“It’s my hammer a-fallin’ in the wind, O Lord,

It’s my hammer a-fallin’ in the wind.”

John Henry said to his shaker,

“Shaker, you better pray,

For if I miss that little piece of steel

Tomorrow’ll be your buryin’ day, O Lord,

Tomorrow’ll be your buryin’ day.”

The man that invented that steam drill

He thought he was mighty fine.

John Henry sunk the steel fourteen feet

While the steam drill only made nine, O Lord,

While the steam drill only made nine.

John Henry said to his loving little wife,

"I'm sick and want to go to bed.

Fix me a place to lay down, Child;

There's a roarin' in my head, O Lord,

There's a roarin' in my head."

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609 a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) poet. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A contemporary writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare's "sugred Sonnets [circulate] among his private friends."

Sonnet 29

When, in disgrace with Fortune and men's eyes,

I all alone beweep my outcast state,

And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless° cries,

And look upon myself and curse my fate,

Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,

Featured like him, like him° with friends possessed,

Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,

With what I most enjoy contented least;

Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,

Haply° I think on thee, and then my state,

Like to the lark at break of day arising

From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate;

For thy sweet love rememb'red such wealth brings,

That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

John Donne

John Donne (1572–1631) was born into a Roman Catholic family in En-gland, but in the 1590s he abandoned that faith. In 1615 he became an Anglican priest and soon was known as a great preacher. Of his sermons 160 survive, including one with the famous line, "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less . . .; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee." From 1621 until his death he was dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. Most of his love poems (often bawdy and cynical) are said to be his early work, and his "Holy Sonnets" (among the greatest religious poems written in English) his later work.

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning [1633]

As virtuous men pass mildly away;
And whisper to their souls, to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
"The breath goes now," and some say, "No":
So let us melt, and make no noise.
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move.
'Twere profanation of our joys
To tell the laity our love.
Moving of the earth° brings harms and fears,
Men reckon what it did and meant;
But trepidation of the spheres,
Though greater far, is innocent.°
Dull sublunary° lovers' love (Whose soul is sense) cannot admit Absence, because it doth remove
Those things which elemented it.
But we, by a love so much refined
That our selves know not what it is,

Inter-assuréd of the mind,
Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.
Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.
If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compasses° are two:
Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if the other do.
And though it in the center sit,
Yet when the other far doth roam,
It leans, and hearkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.
Such wilt thou be to me, who must
Like the other foot, obliquely run:
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
And makes me end where I begun.

The Flea [1633]

Mark but this flea, and mark in this How little that which thou deny'st me is;
It sucked me first, and now sucks thee,
And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;
Thou know'st that this cannot be said
A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead;
Yet this enjoys before it woo,
And pampered swells with one blood made of two,
And this, alas, is more than we would do.

Oh stay, three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, yea, more than married are.
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, we are met
And cloistered in these living walls of jet.
Though use° make you apt to kill me,
Let not to that, self-murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.
Cruel and sudden, has thou since
Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st and say'st that thou Find'st not thyself, nor me the weaker now.
'Tis true. Then learn how false fears be:
Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

BEN JONSON

Ben Jonson (1572–1637), born in London, was Shakespeare's contemporary. Like Shakespeare, he wrote for the theater, and in fact Shakespeare acted in Jonson's first important play, Every Man in His Humour (1598). But unlike Shakespeare, Jonson produced a fairly large body of nondramatic poetry.

Jonson's son, born in 1596, died on his birthday in 1603. Like the father, the boy was named Benjamin, which in Hebrew means "son of the right hand," a phrase Jonson draws on the first line of the poem.

On My First Son [1616]

Farewell, thou child of my right hand and joy;

My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy.
Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.
O, could I lose all father now! For why
Will man lament the state he should envy?
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age?
Rest in soft peace, and asked, say here doth lie
Ben Jonson, his best piece of poetry:
For whose sake, henceforth, all his vows be such,

As what he loves may never like too much.

The following song is from a play, Epicoene, or the Silent Woman.

Still to Be Neat [1609]

Still° to be neat, still to be dressed
As° you were going to a feast;
Still to be powdered, still perfumed—
Lady, it is to be presumed,
Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound.
Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:
Such sweet neglect more taketh me
Than all the adulteries° of art;
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.

ROBERT HERRICK

Robert Herrick (1591–1674) was born in London, the son of a goldsmith. After taking an M.A. at Cambridge, he was ordained in the Church of England. Later, he was sent to the country parish of Dean Prior in Devonshire, where he wrote most of his poetry. A loyal supporter of the king, in 1647 he was expelled from his parish by the Puritans, though in 1662 he was restored to Dean Prior.

Delight in Disorder [1648]

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness.
A lawn° about the shoulders thrown Into a fine distraction;
An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher,°
A cuff neglectful, and thereby Ribbons to flow confusedly;
A winning wave, deserving note,
In the tempestuous petticoat;
A careless shoestring, in whose tie
I see a wild civility;
Do more bewitch me than when art
Is too precise in every part.

WILLIAM BLAKE

William Blake (1757–1827) was born in London and at age 14 was apprenticed for seven years to an engraver. A Christian visionary poet, he made his living by giving drawing lessons and by illustrating books, including his own Songs of Innocence (1789) and Songs of Experience (1794). These two books represent, he said, "two contrary states of the human soul." ("The Lamb" comes from Songs of Innocence; "The Tyger" and "London" are from Songs of Experience.) In 1809 Blake exhibited his art, but the show was a failure. Not until he was in his sixties, when he stopped writing poetry, did he achieve any public recognition—and then it was as a painter.

The Lamb [1789]

Little Lamb, who made thee?

Dost thou know who made thee?

Gave thee life, and bid thee feed

By the stream and o’er the mead;

Gave thee clothing of delight,

Softest clothing, wooly, bright;

Gave thee such a tender voice,

Making all the vales rejoice?

Little Lamb, who made thee?

Dost thou know who made thee?

Little Lamb, I’ll tell thee,

Little Lamb, I’ll tell thee:

He is calléd by thy name,

For he calls himself a Lamb.

He is meek, and he is mild;

He became a little child.

I a child, and thou a lamb,

We are calléd by his name.

Little Lamb, God bless thee!

Little Lamb, God bless thee!

The Tyger [1793]*

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright

In the forests of the night,

What immortal hand or eye

Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies

Burnt the fire of thine eyes?

On what wings dare he aspire?

What the hand dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder, and what art,

Could twist the sinews of thy heart?

And, when thy heart began to beat,

What dread hand? and what dread feet?

What the hammer? what the chain?

In what furnace was thy brain?

What the anvil? what dread grasp

Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears,

And watered heaven with their tears,

Did he smile his work to see?

Did he who made the lamb make thee?

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright

In the forests of the night,

What immortal hand or eye,

Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

London [1794]

I wander thro’ each charter’d street,

Near where the charter’d Thames does flow,

And mark in every face I meet

Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

In every cry of every Man,

In every Infant’s cry of fear,

In every voice, in every ban,

The mind-forg'd manacles I hear.

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry

Every black'ning Church appalls;

And the hapless Soldier's sigh

Runs in blood down Palace walls.

But most thro' midnight streets I hear

How the youthful Harlot's curse

Blasts the new-born Infant's tear,

And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

William Wordsworth (1770–1850), the son of an attorney, grew up in the Lake District of England. After graduating from Cambridge University in 1791, he spent a year in France, falling in love with a French girl, with whom he had a daughter. His enthusiasm for the French Revolution waned, and he returned alone to England, where, with the help of a legacy, he devoted his life to poetry. With his friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge, in 1798 he published anonymously a volume of poetry, Lyrical Ballads, which changed the course of English poetry. In 1799 he and his sister Dorothy settled in Grasmere in the Lake District, where he married and was given the office of distributor of stamps. In 1843 he was appointed poet laureate.

The World Is Too Much with Us [1807]

The world is too much with us; late and soon,

Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;

Little we see in Nature that is ours;

We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!°

This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon,

The winds that will be howling at all hours,

And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers,

For this, for everything, we are out of tune;

It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus° rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton° blow his wreathéd horn.

I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud [1807]

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils,
Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.
Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay;
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.
The waves beside them danced, but they Outdid the sparkling waves in glee;
A poet could not but be gay,
In such a jocund company;
I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought:
For oft, when on my couch I lie
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye

Which is the bliss of solitude;

And then my heart with pleasure fills,

And dances with the daffodils.

The Solitary Reaper [1807]

Behold her, single in the field,

Yon solitary Highland lass!

Reaping and singing by herself;

Stop here, or gently pass!

Alone she cuts and binds the grain,

And sings a melancholy strain;

O listen! for the Vale profound

Is overflowing with the sound.

No Nightingale did ever chant

More welcome notes to weary bands

Of travelers in some shady haunt,

Among Arabian sands:

A voice so thrilling ne’er was heard

In spring-time from the Cuckoo-bird,

Breaking the silence of the seas

Among the farthest Hebrides.°

Will no one tell me what she sings?—

Perhaps the plaintive numbers° flow

For old, unhappy, far-off things,

And battles long ago:

Or is it some more humble lay,°

Familiar matter of to-day?

Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,

That has been, and may be again?

Whate'er the theme, the Maiden sang
    As if her song could have no ending;
I saw her singing at her work,
    And o'er the sickle bending;—
I listened, motionless and still;
And, as I mounted up the hill,
The music in my heart I bore,
Long after it was heard no more.

PHILLIS WHEATLEY

Kidnapped in Africa when she was a child of about age 7, and brought to Boston on the schooner Phillis, Phillis Wheatley (1753–1784) owed her first name to the ship and her second to the family name of the merchant who bought her to attend on his wife. She was educated in English, Latin, history, and geography, and especially in the Bible, and within a few years she was writing poetry in the approved manner—that is, the manner of eighteenth-century England. In 1773, the year she was granted freedom, she published a book of her poems in England.

Despite her education and the style of writing that she adopted, Wheatley of course did not move freely in the white world. But neither did she move freely in the black world, since her educators kept her away from other persons of African origin. Perhaps the best single sentence ever written about Phillis Wheatley is Richard Wright's: "Before the webs of slavery had so tightened as to snare nearly all Negroes in our land, one was freed by accident to give in clear, bell-like limpid cadence the hope of freedom in the New World." One other sentence about Wheatley, by another African-American writer, should also be quoted here. Alice Walker, commenting on Wheatley's much criticized assumption of white values, says, in an address to Wheatley, "It is not so much what you sang, as that you kept alive, in so many of our ancestors, the notion of song."

"On Being Brought from Africa to America" alludes to the story of Cain and Abel, in Genesis 4, which reports that Cain killed Abel, and that "the Lord set a mark upon Cain" (4.15). The biblical text explicitly says that the mark was to protect Cain from someone who might take vengeance on him, but it does not say what the mark was. Nevertheless, some Christians developed the idea that the color of Africans was the mark of Cain.

On Being Brought from Africa to America [1772]

'Twas mercy brought me from my pagan land, Taught my beknighted soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Savior too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
Some view our sable race with scornful eye,
"Their color is a diabolic dye."
Remember, Christians; Negroes, black as Cain,
May be refined, and join the angelic train.

Lydia Howard Huntley Sigourney

Lydia Sigourney (1791–1865), born in Norwich, Connecticut, of humble family, was taken up by her father's employer as a child prodigy and tutored in Latin and Hebrew. She wrote poetry chiefly on public issues, such as historical events and slavery, rather than personal lyric poetry. A fair number of her poems concern the displacement of Native Americans; she did not condemn the settling of the continent, but she did criticize the failure of whites to treat the Native Americans according to Christian ethics.

The Indian's Welcome to the Pilgrim Fathers [1835]

"On Friday, March 16th, 1622, while the colonists were busied in their usual labors, they were much surprised to see a savage walk boldly towards them, and salute them with, 'much welcome, English, much welcome, Englishmen.'"

Above them spread a stranger sky
Around, the sterile plain,
The rock-bound coast rose frowning nigh,
Beyond,—the wrathful main:
Chill remnants of the wintry snow
Still chok'd the encumber'd soil,

Yet forth these Pilgrim Fathers go,
To mark their future toil.
'Mid yonder vale their corn must rise
In Summer's ripening pride,
And there the church-spire woo the skies
Its sister-school beside.
Perchance 'mid England's velvet green
Some tender thought repos'd,—
Though nought upon their stoic mien
Such soft regret disclos'd.
When sudden from the forest wide
A red-brow'd chieftain came,
With towering form, and haughty stride,
And eye like kindling flame:
No wrath he breath'd, no conflict sought,
To no dark ambush drew,
But simply to the Old World brought,
The welcome of the New.
That welcome was a blast and ban
Upon thy race unborn.
Was there no seer, thou fated Man!
Thy lavish zeal to warn?
Thou in thy fearless faith didst hail
A weak, invading band,
But who shall heed thy children's wail,
Swept from their native land?
Thou gav'st the riches of thy streams,
The lordship o'er thy waves,

The region of thine infant dreams,
And of thy fathers' graves,
But who to yon proud mansions pil'd
With wealth of earth and sea,
Poor outcast from thy forest wild,
Say, who shall welcome thee?

JOHN KEATS

John Keats (1795–1821), son of a London stable keeper, was taken out of school when he was 15 and apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary. In 1816 he was licensed to practice as an apothecary-surgeon, but he almost immediately abandoned medicine and decided to make a career as a poet. His progress was amazing; he quickly moved from routine verse to major accomplishments, publishing books of poems—to mixed reviews—in 1817, 1818, and 1820, before dying of tuberculosis at the age of 25. Today he is esteemed as one of England's greatest poets.

To Autumn [1819]

I

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;
To bend with apples the mossed cottage-trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease,
For summer has o'er-brimmed their clammy cells.

II

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
  Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
  Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind;
Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep,
  Drowsed with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
    Spares the next swath and all its twinéd flowers:
And sometime like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook;
  Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
    Thou watchest the last oozings hours by hours.

III

Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
  Think not of them, thou hast thy music too,—
While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
  And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
  Among the river sallows, borne aloft
    Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn;
  Hedge-crickets sing; and now with treble soft
  The red-breast whistles from a garden-croft;
    And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892), the son of an English clergyman, was born in Lincolnshire, where he began writing verse at age 5. Educated at Cambridge, he had to leave without a degree when his father died and Alfred had to accept responsibility for bringing up his brothers and sisters. In fact, the family had inherited ample funds, but for some years the money was tied up by litigation. Following Wordsworth's death in 1850, Tennyson was made poet laureate. With his government pension he moved with his family to the Isle of Wight, where he lived in comfort until his death.

Ulysses* [1833]

It little profits that an idle king,
By this still hearth, among these barren crags,
Matched with an aged wife, I mete and dole
Unequal laws unto a savage race,
That hoard, and sleep, and feed, and know not me.
I cannot rest from travel; I will drink
Life to the lees. All times I have enjoyed Greatly, have suffered greatly, both with those That loved me, and alone; on shore, and when Thro' scudding drifts the rainy Hyades
Vext the dim sea. I am become a name;
For always roaming with a hungry heart
Much have I seen and known,—cities of men
And manners, climates, councils, governments, Myself not least, but honored of them all,—
And drunk delight of battle with my peers,
Far on the ringing plains of windy Troy.
I am a part of all that I have met;
Yet all experience is an arch wherethro'
Gleams that untravelled world whose margin fades
For ever and for ever when I move.
How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!

As tho’ to breathe were life! Life piled on life
Were all too little, and of one to me
Little remains; but every hour is saved
From that eternal silence, something more,
A bringer of new things; and vile it were
For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
And this gray spirit yearning in desire
To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.
This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
To whom I leave the scepter and the isle,—
Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfill
This labor, by slow prudence to make mild
A rugged people, and thro’ soft degrees
Subdue them to the useful and the good.
Most blameless is he, centered in the sphere
Of common duties, decent not to fail
In offices of tenderness, and pay Meet adoration to my household gods,
When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.
There lies the port; the vessel puffs her sail;
There gloom the dark, broad seas. My mariners,
Souls that have toiled, and wrought, and thought with me,—
That ever with a frolic welcome took
The thunder and the sunshine, and opposed
Free hearts, free foreheads,—you and I are old;
Old age hath yet his honor and his toil.
Death closes all; but something ere the end,

Some work of noble note, may yet be done,
Not unbecoming men that strove with Gods.
The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks;
The long day wanes; the slow moon climbs; the deep Moans round with many voices. Come, my friends.
'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
Push off, and sitting well in order smite
The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths
Of all the western stars, until I die.
It may be that the gulfs will wash us down;
It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,
And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.
Tho' much is taken, much abides; and tho'
We are not now that strength which in old days Moved earth and heaven, that which we are, we are.
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

ROBERT BROWNING

Born in a suburb of London into a middle-class family, Browning (1812– 1889) was educated primarily at home, where he read widely. For a while he wrote for the English stage, but after marrying Elizabeth Barrett—she too was a poet—he lived with her in Italy until her death in 1861. He then returned to England and settled in London with their son. Regarded as one of the most distinguished poets of the Victorian period, he is buried in Westminster Abbey.

Porphyria's Lover [1834]

The rain set early in tonight,

The sullen wind was soon awake,
It tore the elm-tops down for spite,
And did its worst to vex the lake:
I listened with heart fit to break.
When glided in Porphyria; straight
She shut the cold out and the storm,
And kneeled and made the cheerless grate
Blaze up, and all the cottage warm;
Which done, she rose, and from her form
Withdrew the dripping cloak and shawl,
And laid her soiled gloves by, untied
Her hat and let the damp hair fall,
And, last, she sat down by my side
And called me. When no voice replied,
She put my arm around her waist,
And made her smooth white shoulder bare
And all her yellow hair displaced,
And stooping, made my cheek lie there,
And spread, o'er all, her yellow hair,
Murmuring how she loved me—she Too weak, for all her heart's endeavor,
To set its struggling passion free
From pride, and vainer ties dissever,
And give herself to me forever.
But passion sometimes would prevail,
Nor could tonight's gay feast restrain
A sudden thought of one so pale
For love of her, and all in vain:

So, she was come through wind and rain.
Be sure I looked up at her eyes
    Happy and proud; at last I knew Porphyria worshipped me; surprise
    Made my heart swell, and still it grew
While I debated what to do.
That moment she was mine, mine, fair,
    Perfectly pure and good: I found
A thing to do, and all her hair
    In one long yellow string I wound
Three times her little throat around,
And strangled her. No pain felt she;
    I am quite sure she felt no pain.
As a shut bud that holds a bee,
    I warily oped her lids: again
Laughed the blue eyes without a stain.
And I untightened next the tress
    About her neck; her cheek once more Blushed bright beneath my burning kiss:
    I propped her head up as before,
Only, this time my shoulder bore
Her head, which droops upon it still:
    The smiling rosy little head,
So glad it has its utmost will,
    That all it scorned at once is fled,
And I, its love, am gained instead!
Porphyria's love: she guessed not how
    Her darling one wish would be heard.

And thus we sit together now,

And all night long we have not stirred,

And yet God has not said a word!

MATTHEW ARNOLD

Matthew Arnold (1822–1888) was the son of a famous educator, Dr. Thomas Arnold, the headmaster of Rugby School. After graduating from Oxford, Matthew Arnold became an inspector of schools, a post he held until two years before his death. Besides writing poetry, Arnold wrote literary criticism and was appointed professor of poetry at Oxford from 1857 to 1867. He traveled widely on the Continent and lectured in the United States.

Dover Beach [c. 1851]

The sea is calm to-night.

The tide is full, the moon lies fair

Upon the straits;—on the French coast the light

Gleams and is gone; the cliffs of England stand,

Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay.

Come to the window, sweet is the night-air!

Only, from the long line of spray

Where the sea meets the moon-blanch'd land,

Listen! you hear the grating roar

Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,

At their return, up the high strand,

Begin, and cease, and then again begin,

With tremulous cadence slow, and bring

The eternal note of sadness in.

Sophocles long ago

Heard it on the Ægean, and it brought

Into his mind the turbid ebb and flow

Of human misery; we Find also in the sound a thought,
Hearing it by this distant northern sea.
The Sea of Faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl'd.
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating, to the breath
Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles° of the world.
Ah, love, let us be true
To one another! for the world, which seems
To lie before us like a land of dreams,
So various, so beautiful, so new,
Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
And we are here as on a darkling plain
Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
Where ignorant armies clash by night.

Gerard Manley Hopkins

Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844–1889) was born near London and was educated at Oxford, where he studied the classics. A convert from Anglicanism to Roman Catholicism, he was ordained a Jesuit priest in 1877. After serving as a parish priest and teacher, he was appointed Professor of Greek at the Catholic University in Dublin.

Hopkins published only a few poems during his lifetime, partly because he believed that the pursuit of literary fame was incompatible with his vocation as a priest, and partly because he was aware that his highly individual style might puzzle readers.

God's Grandeur [1877]

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
Crushed. Why do men then now not reck his rod?
Generations have trod, have trod, have trod;
And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell: the soil
Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.
And for all this, nature is never spent;
There lives the dearest freshness deep down things;
And though the last lights off the black West went
Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs—
Because the Holy Ghost over the bent World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.

Pied Beauty* [1877]

Glory be to God for dappled things—
For skies of couple-colour as a brinded° cow;
For rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim;
Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls; finches' wings;
Landscape plotted and pieced—fold, fallow, and plough;°
And áll trádes, their gear and tackle and trim.°
All things counter, original, spare, strange;
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adazzle, dim;
He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change:
Praise him.

JAMES WELDON JOHNSON

Born in Jacksonville, Florida, James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) received a bachelor's and a master's degree from Atlanta University. Johnson taught school, served as a high school principal, and founded the Daily American (1895, the first black daily in America). Later he became active in the NAACP, served as consul to Venezuela and to Nicaragua, and taught creative writing at Fisk University. On the day of his death, in an automobile accident, he was appointed to teach African-American literature at New York University.

Johnson wrote dialect poems as well as poems in standard English.

To America [1917]

How would you have us, as we are?
Or sinking 'neath the load we bear?
Our eyes fixed forward on a star?
Or gazing empty at despair?
Rising or falling? Men or things?
With dragging pace or footsteps fleet?
Strong, willing sinews in your wings?
Or tightening chains about your feet?

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

William Carlos Williams (1883–1963) was the son of an English traveling salesman and a Basque-Jewish woman. The couple met in Puerto Rico and settled in Rutherford, New Jersey, where William was born. He spent his life there, practicing as a pediatrician and writing poems in the moments between seeing patients who visited his office.

Spring and All [1923]

By the road to the contagious hospital under the surge of the blue mottled clouds driven from the northeast—a cold wind. Beyond, the waste of broad, muddy fields brown with dried weeds, standing and fallen patches of standing water

the scattering of tall trees
All along the road the reddish purplish, forked, upstanding, twiggy stuff of bushes and small trees with dead, brown leaves under them leafless vines—
Lifeless in appearance, sluggish dazed spring approaches—
They enter the new world naked, cold, uncertain of all save that they enter. All about them the cold, familiar wind—
Now the grass, tomorrow
the stiff curl of wildcarrot leaf
One by one objects are defined—
It quickens: clarity, outline of leaf
But now the stark dignity of entrance—Still, the profound change has come upon them: rooted, they grip down and begin to awaken

Ezra Pound

Ezra Pound (1885–1972), born in Hailey, Idaho, and raised in Philadelphia, was one of the most influential American poets of the twentieth century. He prepared to be a teacher of medieval and Renaissance Spanish, Italian, and French literature, but his career as an academician ended abruptly when he was fired from Wabash College for having a woman in his room overnight. Pound went to Venice, where he did odd jobs, and then to London, where he met T. S. Eliot and played a large role in editing Eliot's long poem, The Waste Land. Among the other poets whom he assisted was Robert Frost, who was then living in England. In 1924 Pound settled in Italy. He espoused Mussolini's cause, was arrested by the American forces in 1944, and (having been declared insane and therefore not fit to be tried for treason) was confined in a mental institution in Washington, D.C. Released in 1958, he spent the remainder of his life in Italy.

In a Station of the Metro* [1916]

The apparition of these faces in the crowd;

Petals on a wet, black bough.

H. D.

H. D. was the pen name of Hilda Doolittle (1886–1961). Doolittle, born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, of a socially prominent family, met Ezra Pound (see the preceding poem) when she was 15 and he was 16. Their relationship was complicated—Doolittle was sexually attracted to women as well as to men—and met with opposition from her family. She further distressed her family when she dropped out of Bryn Mawr College. In 1911 H. D. and a female friend who had once loved Doolittle and now loved Pound followed Pound to England, where Doolittle was active in various literary movements.

We print a poem about a Greek mythological figure, Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of the Greek city-state of Sparta. Paris, a Trojan prince, abducted her and thereby initiated the Trojan War. Poets—ever since the days of ancient Greece—have been interested in this story, but H. D. had an especially strong interest in classical Greece and in psychoanalytic and feminist interpretations of mythology.

Helen [1924]

All Greece hates

the still eyes in the white face,

the lustre as of olives

where she stands,

and the white hands.

All Greece reviles

the wan face when she smiles, hating it deeper still when it grows wan and white, remembering past enchantments
and past ills.
Greece sees unmoved,
God's daughter, born of love,
the beauty of cool feet
and slenderest knees,
could love indeed the maid,
only if she were laid,
white ash amid funereal cypresses.

T. S. Eliot

Thomas Stearns Eliot (1888–1965) was born into a New England family that had moved to St. Louis. He attended a preparatory school in Massachusetts, then graduated from Harvard and did further study in literature and philosophy in France, Germany, and England. In 1914 he began working for Lloyd's Bank in London, and three years later he published his first book of poems (it included "Prufrock"). In 1925 he joined a publishing firm, and in 1927 he became a British citizen and a member of the Church of England. Much of his later poetry, unlike "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," is highly religious. In 1948 Eliot received the Nobel Prize for Literature.

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock [1917]

S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse
A persona che mai tornasse al mondo,
Questa fiamma staria senza più scosse.
Ma perciocchè giammai di questo fondo
Non torno vivo alcun, s' i' odo il vero,
*Senza tema d'infamia ti rispondo.

Let us go then, you and I,

When the evening is spread out against the sky

Like a patient etherised upon a table;

Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,

The muttering retreats

Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels

And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells;

Streets that follow like a tedious argument

Of insidious intent

To lead you to an overwhelming question . . .

Oh, do not ask, “What is it?”

Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go

Talking of Michelangelo.

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window panes,

The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window panes

Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,

Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,

Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys,

Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,

And seeing that it was a soft October night,

Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time

For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,

Rubbing its back upon the window-panes;

There will be time, there will be time

To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;

There will be time to murder and create,

And time for all the works and days of hands

That lift and drop a question on your plate;
Time for you and time for me,
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.
In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.
And indeed there will be time
To wonder, “Do I dare?” and, “Do I dare?”—
Time to turn back and descend the stair,
With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
(They will say: “How his hair is growing thin!”)
My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
(They will say: “But how his arms and legs are thin!”)
Do I dare
Disturb the universe?
In a minute there is time
For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.
For I have known them all already, known them all:—
Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons,
I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
I know the voices dying with a dying fall
Beneath the music from a farther room.
So how should I presume?
And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase.
And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,

When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,

Then how should I begin

To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?

And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all—

Arms that are braceleted and white and bare

(But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!)

Is it perfume from a dress

That makes me so digress?

Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.

And should I then presume?

And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets

And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes

Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .

I should have been a pair of ragged claws

Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!

Smoothed by long fingers,

Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,

Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.

Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,

Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis?

But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed,

Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,

I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;

I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,

And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,

And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,

After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,

Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,

Would it have been worth while,

To have bitten off the matter with a smile,

To have squeezed the universe into a ball

To roll it toward some overwhelming question,

To say: “I am Lazarus, come from the dead,

Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all”—

If one, settling a pillow by her head,

Should say: “That is not what I meant at all;

That is not it, at all.”

And would it have been worth it, after all,

Would it have been worth while,

After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,

After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—

And this, and so much more?—

It is impossible to say just what I mean!

But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen:

Would it have been worth while

If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,

And turning toward the window, should say:

“That is not it at all,

That is not what I meant, at all.”

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be;

Am an attendant lord, one that will do

To swell a progress, start a scene or two,

Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,

Deferential, glad to be of use,

Politic, cautious, and meticulous;

Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse;

At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—

Almost, at times, the Fool.

I grow old . . . I grow old . . .

I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?

I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.

I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.

I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves

Combing the white hair of the waves blown back

When the wind blows the water white and black.

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea

By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown,

Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

Archibald MacLeish (1892–1982) was educated at Harvard and at Yale Law School. His early poetry (say, to about 1930), including "Ars Poetica," often is condensed and allusive, though his later poems and his plays are readily accessible. Under Franklin Delano Roosevelt, MacLeish served as Librarian of Congress (1939–1944) and as assistant secretary of state (1944–1945). He then taught at Harvard and at Amherst until he retired in 1967.

Ars Poetica [1926]

A poem should be palpable and mute

As a globed fruit,

Dumb

As old medallions to the thumb,

Silent as the sleeve-worn stone

Of casement ledges where the moss has grown—

A poem should be wordless

As the flight of birds.

A poem should be motionless in time

As the moon climbs,

Leaving, as the moon releases

Twig by twig the night-entangled trees,

Leaving, as the moon behind the winter leaves,

Memory by memory the mind—

A poem should be motionless in time

As the moon climbs.

A poem should be equal to:

Not true.

For all the history of grief

An empty doorway and a maple leaf.

For love

The leaning grasses and two lights above the sea—

A poem should not mean

But be.

ELIZABETH BISHOP

Elizabeth Bishop (1911–1979) was born in Worcester, Massachusetts. Because her father died when she was eight months old and her mother was confined to a sanitarium four years later, Bishop was raised by relatives in New England and Nova Scotia. After graduating from Vassar College in 1934, where she was co-editor of the student literary magazine, she lived (on a small private income) for a while in Key West, France, and Mexico, and then for much of her adult life in Brazil, before returning to the United States to teach at Harvard. Her financial independence enabled her to write without worrying about the sales of her books and without having to devote energy to distracting jobs.

The Fish[1946]

I caught a tremendous fish and held him beside the boat half out of water, with my hook fast in a corner of his mouth.
He didn’t fight.
He hadn’t fought at all.
He hung a grunting weight, battered and venerable and homely. Here and there his brown skin hung in strips like ancient wall-paper, and its pattern of darker brown
was like wall-paper:
shapes like full-blown roses
stained and lost through age.
He was speckled with barnacles,
fine rosettes of lime,
and infested
with tiny white sea-lice, and underneath two or three rages of green weed hung down.
While his gills were breathing in the terrible oxygen
—the frightening gills,

fresh and crisp with blood,
that can cut so badly—
I thought of the coarse white flesh packed in like feathers,
the big bones and the little bones,
the dramatic reds and blacks
of his shiny entrails, and the pink swim-bladder
like a big peony.
I looked into his eyes
which were far larger than mine but shallower, and yellowed, the irises backed and packed with tarnished tinfoil seen through the lenses
of old scratched isinglass.
They shifted a little, but not to return my stare.
—It was more like the tipping of an object toward the light.
I admired his sullen face,
the mechanism of his jaw,
and then I saw that from his lower lip
—if you could call it a lip—grim, wet, and weapon-like,
hung five old pieces of fish-line,
or four and a wire leader with the swivel still attached, with all their five big hooks grown firmly in his mouth.

A green line, frayed at the end
where he broke it, two heavier lines, and a fine black thread
still crimped from the strain and snap when it broke and he got away.
Like medals with their ribbons
frayed and wavering,
a five-haired beard of wisdom
trailing from his aching jaw.
I stared and stared and victory filled up
the little rented boat,
from the pool of bilge
where oil had spread a rainbow around the rusted engine to the bailer rusted orange,
the sun-cracked thwarts,
the oarlocks on their strings,
the gunnels—until everything was rainbow, rainbow, rainbow!
And I let the fish go.

CONTEMPORARY VOICES

GWENDOLYN BROOKS

Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000) was born in Topeka, Kansas, but was raised in Chicago's South Side, where she spent most of her life. Brooks taught in several colleges and universities and wrote a novel (Maud Martha, 1953) and a memoir (Report from Part One, 1972), but she is best known as a poet. In 1950, when she won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, she became the first African-American writer to win a Pulitzer Prize. In 1985 Brooks became Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress.

The subject of Brooks's poem, the civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968), was assassinated at the height of his career.

Martin Luther King Jr. [1970]

A man went forth with gifts.
He was a prose poem.
He was a tragic grace.
He was a warm music.
He tried to heal the vivid volcanoes.
His ashes are reading the world.
His Dream still wishes to anoint
the barricades of faith and of control.
His word still burns the center of the sun, above the thousands and the hundred thousands.
The word was Justice. It was spoken.
So it shall be spoken.
So it shall be done.

ANTHONY HECHT

Anthony Hecht (1923–2004), born in New York City, was educated at Bard College and Columbia University. He taught at several institutions (notably at Georgetown University), and he served as poetry consultant to the Library of Congress.

Like "The Dover Bitch," which assumes a reader's familiarity with Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach"

(page 990), much of Hecht's work glances at earlier literature. The poem is dedicated to a critic and editor.

The Dover Bitch [1967]

A Criticism of Life

For Andrews Wanning

So there stood Matthew Arnold and this girl
With the cliffs of England crumbling away behind them,
And he said to her, "Try to be true to me,
And I'll do the same for you, for things are bad
All over, etc., etc."
Well now, I knew this girl. It's true she had read Sophocles in a fairly good translation
And caught that bitter allusion to the sea,
But all the time he was talking she had in mind
The notion of what his whiskers would feel like
On the back of her neck. She told me later on That after a while she got to looking out
At the lights across the channel, and really felt sad,
Thinking of all the wine and enormous beds
And blandishments in French and the perfumes.
And then she got really angry. To have been brought
All the way down from London, and then be addressed
As sort of a mournful cosmic last resort
Is really tough on a girl, and she was pretty,
Anyway, she watched him pace the room
And finger his watch-chain and seem to sweat a bit,
And then she said one or two unprintable things.
But you mustn't judge her by that. What I mean to say is,

She's really all right. I still see her once in a while

And she always treats me right.

We have a drink

And I give her a good time, and perhaps it's a year

Before I see her again, but there she is.

Running to fat, but dependable as they come.

And sometimes I bring her a bottle of Nuit d'Amour.

ROBERT BLY

Robert Bly, born in 1926 in Madison, Minnesota, is one of the few poets who has been able to support himself by writing and by giving readings, rather than by teaching. In 1990 his Iron John, a book about male identity, became a bestseller.

Driving to Town Late to Mail a Letter [1962]

It is a cold and snowy night. The main street is deserted.

The only things moving are swirls of snow.

As I lift the mailbox door, I feel its cold iron.

There is a privacy I love in this snowy night.

Driving around, I will waste more time.

ALLEN GINSBERG

Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997) was born in Newark, New Jersey, and graduated from Columbia University in 1948. After eight months in Columbia Psychiatric Institute—Ginsberg had pleaded insanity to avoid prosecution when the police discovered that a friend stored stolen goods in Ginsberg's apartment—he worked at odd jobs and finally left the nine-to-five world for a freer life in San Francisco. In the 1950s he established a reputation as an uninhibited declamatory poet whose chief theme was a celebration of those who were alienated from a repressive America.

A Supermarket in California [1956]

What thoughts I have of you tonight, Walt Whitman, for I walked down the sidestreets under the trees with a headache self-conscious looking at the full moon.

In my hungry fatigue, and shopping for images, I went into the neon fruit supermarket, dreaming of your enumerations!

What peaches and what penumbras! Whole families shopping at night! Aisles full of husbands! Wives in the avocados, babies in the tomatoes!—and you, García Lorca,° what were you doing down by the watermelons?

I saw you, Walt Whitman, childless, lonely old grubber, poking among the meats in the refrigerator and eyeing the grocery boys.

I heard you asking questions of each: Who killed the pork chops?

What price bananas? Are you my Angel? 5

I wandered in and out of the brilliant stacks of cans following you, and followed in my imagination by the store detective.

We strode down the open corridors together in our solitary fancy tasting artichokes, possessing every frozen delicacy, and never passing the cashier.

Where are we going, Walt Whitman? The doors close in an hour. Which way does your beard point tonight?

(I touch your book and dream of our odyssey in the supermarket and feel absurd.)

Will we walk all night through solitary streets? The trees add shade to shade, lights out in the houses, we'll both be lonely. 10

Will we stroll dreaming of the lost America of love past blue automobiles in driveways, home to our silent cottage?

Ah, dear father, graybeard, lonely old courage-teacher, what America did you have when Charon quit poling his ferry and you got out on a smoking bank and stood watching the boat disappear on the black water of Lethe?°

ANNE SEXTON

Anne Sexton (1928–1974) was born in Newton, Massachusetts. She was a member of a well-educated New England family but did not attend college. After the birth of her second child she suffered a mental breakdown, and for much of the rest of her life she was under psychiatric care. Indeed, a psychiatrist encouraged her to write poetry, and she was soon able to publish in national journals such as The New Yorker. Despite her success, she continued to suffer mentally, and in 1974 she took her life.

Her Kind [1960]

I have gone out, a possessed witch, haunting the black air, braver at night;
dreaming evil, I have done my hitch over the plain houses, light by light;
lonely thing, twelve-fingered, out of mind.
A woman like that is not a woman, quite.
I have been her kind.
I have found the warm caves in the woods, filled them with skillets, carvings, shelves,
closets, silks, innumerable goods;
fixed the suppers for the worms and the elves:
whining, rearranging the disaligned.
A woman like that is misunderstood.
I have been her kind.
I have ridden in your cart, driver, waved my nude arms at villages going by,
learning the last bright routes, survivor where your flames still bite my thigh and my ribs crack where your wheels wind.
A woman like that is not ashamed to die.
I have been her kind.

ADRIENNE RICH

Adrienne Rich's most recent books of poetry are The School Among the Ruins: Poems 2000–2004, and Fox: Poems 1998–2000 (Norton). A selection of her essays, Arts of the Possible: Essays and Conversations, was published in 2001. A new edition of What is Found There: Notebooks on Poetry and Politics, appeared in 2003. She is a recipient of the Lannan Foundation Lifetime Achievement Award, the Lambda Book Award, the Lenore Marshall/Nation Prize, the Wallace Stevens Award, and the Bollingen Prize in Poetry, among other honors. She lives in California.

In line 9 of the first poem, James and Whitehead are William James (1842–1910) and Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947), both of whom taught philosophy at Harvard.

For the Felling of an Elm in the Harvard Yard [1951]

They say the ground precisely swept
No longer feeds with rich decay
The roots enormous in their age
That long and deep beneath have slept.
So the great spire is overthrown,
And sharp saws have gone hurtling through
The rings that three slow centuries wore;
The second oldest elm is down.
The shade where James and Whitehead strolled Becomes a litter on the green.
The young men pause along the paths
To see the axes glinting bold.
Watching the hewn trunk dragged away,
Some turn the symbol to their own,
And some admire the clean dispatch
With which the aged elm came down.

Aunt Jennifer's Tigers [1951]

Aunt Jennifer's tigers prance across a screen,
Bright topaz denizens of a world of green.
They do not fear the men beneath the tree;

They pace in sleek chivalric certainty.
Aunt Jennifer's fingers fluttering through her wool
Find even the ivory needle hard to pull.
The massive weight of Uncle's wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer's hand.
When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
The tigers in the panel that she made
Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.

Living in Sin [1955]

She had thought the studio would keep itself,
no dust upon the furniture of love.
Half heresy, to wish the taps less vocal,
the panes relieved of grime. A plate of pears,
a piano with a Persian shawl, a cat stalking the picturesque amusing mouse had risen at his urging.
Not that at five each separate stair would writhe under the milkman's tramp; that morning light so coldly would delineate the scraps of last night's cheese and three sepulchral bottles;
that on the kitchen shelf among the saucers
a pair of beetle-eyes would fix her own—envoy from some black village in the mouldings . . .
Meanwhile, he, with a yawn,
sounded a dozen notes upon the keyboard, declared it out of tune, shrugged at the mirror, rubbed at his beard, went out for cigarettes;

while she, jeered by the minor demons, pulled back the sheets and made the bed and found a towel to dust the table-top,
and let the coffee-pot boil over on the stove.
By evening she was back in love again,
though not so wholly but throughout the night
she woke sometimes to feel the daylight coming 0like a relentless milkman up the stairs.

X. J. KENNEDY

X. J. Kennedy was born in New Jersey in 1929. He has taught at Tufts University and is the author of several books of poems, books for children, and college textbooks.

The following poem builds on "The Tyger" (page 980) by William Blake, a favorite poet of Allen Ginsberg. Ginsberg, a New Yorker who established his fame in San Francisco, was noted for his declamatory poetry and his celebration of outsiders, especially protestors against the wars in Korea and Vietnam. He often chanted Blake's poems at his own poetry readings. In the following poem X. J. Kennedy pays homage to Ginsberg by adopting the form of one of Ginsberg's favorite poems. Kennedy alludes, in his poem, to Ginsberg's left-wing activities ("Taunter of the ultra right"), his view that his hearers should drop out of a corrupt and repressive society, his interest in Buddhist mantras (syllables laden with mystic power), his antiwar activity ("Mantra-minded flower child"), his homosexuality ("Queer," "Queen"), and his use of finger cymbals in some of his readings. Om (line 10) is a syllable that begins several mantras. Ginsberg often had his audience utter the sound.

For Allen Ginsberg [1998]

Ginsberg, Ginsberg, burning bright,
Taunter of the ultra right,
What blink of the Buddha's eye
Chose the day for you to die?
Queer pied piper, howling wild,

Mantra-minded flower child,

Queen of Maytime, misrule's lord

Bawling, Drop out! All aboard!

Foe of fascist, bane of bomb,

Finger-cymbaled, chanting Om,

Proper poets' thorn-in-side,

Turner of a whole time's tide,

Who can fill your sloppy shoes?

What a catch for Death. We lose

Glee and sweetness, freaky light,

Ginsberg, Ginsberg, burning bright.

MILLER WILLIAMS

Miller Williams, born in 1930, read a poem at President Clinton's second inauguration. A professor of English at the University of Arkansas, Williams is the author, editor, and translator of many books, as well as the director of the university's press.

Listen | 014 [1999]

I threw a snowball across the backyard.

My dog ran after it to bring it back.

It broke as it fell, scattering snow over snow.

She stood confused, seeing and smelling nothing.

She searched in widening circles until I called her.

She looked at me and said as clearly in silence

as if she had spoken,

I know it's here, I'll find it, went back to the center and started the circles again.

I called her two more times before she came slowly, stopping once to look back.

That was this morning. I'm sure that she's forgotten.

I've had some trouble putting it out of my mind.

DEREK WALCOTT

Derek Walcott, born in 1930 on the Caribbean island of St. Lucia, in 1992 was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. Although in the United States he is known chiefly as a poet, Walcott is also an important playwright and director of plays. Much of his work is concerned with his mixed heritage—a black writer from the Caribbean, whose language is English and who lives part of the year in New England, where he teaches at Boston University.

A Far Cry from Africa [1962]

A wind is ruffling the tawny pelt

Of Africa. Kikuyu,° quick as flies,

Batten upon the bloodstreams of the veldt.°
Corpses are scattered through a paradise.
Only the worm, colonel of carrion, cries:
'Waste no compassion on these separate dead!'
Statistics justify and scholars seize
The salients of colonial policy.
What is that to the white child hacked in bed?
To savages, expendable as Jews?
Threshed out by beaters, the long rushes break
In a white dust of ibises whose cries
Have wheeled since civilization's dawn
From the parched river or beast-teeming plain.
The violence of beast on beast is read
As natural law, but upright man

Seeks his divinity by inflicting pain.
Delirious as these worried beasts, his wars
Dance to the tightened carcass of a drum,
While he calls courage still that native dread
Of the white peace contracted by the dead.
Again brutish necessity wipes its hands
Upon the napkins of a dirty cause, again
A waste of our compassion, as with Spain,°
The gorilla wrestles with the superman.
I who am poisoned with the blood of both,
Where shall I turn, divided to the vein?
I who have cursed
The drunken officer of British rule, how choose Between this Africa and the English tongue I love?
Betray them both, or give back what they give?
How can I face such slaughter and be cool?
How can I turn from Africa and live?

Sylvia Plath

Sylvia Plath (1932–1963) was born in Boston, the daughter of German immigrants. While still an undergraduate at Smith College, she published in Seventeen and Mademoiselle, but her years at college, like her later years, were marked by manic-depressive periods. After graduating from college she went to England to study at Cambridge University, where she met the English poet Ted Hughes, whom she married in 1956. The marriage was unsuccessful, and they separated. One day she committed suicide by turning on the kitchen gas.

Daddy [1965]

You do not do, you do not do
Any more, black shoe
In which I have lived like a foot

For thirty years, poor and white,
Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.
Daddy, I have had to kill you.
You died before I had time—
Marble-heavy, a bag full of God,
Ghastly statue with one gray toe
Big as a Frisco seal
And a head in the freakish Atlantic
Where it pours bean green over blue
In the waters off beautiful Nauset.
I used to pray to recover you.
Ach, du.°
In the German tongue, in the Polish town
Scraped flat by the roller
Of wars, wars, wars.
But the name of the town is common.
My Polack friend
Says there are a dozen or two.
So I never could tell where you Put your foot, your root,
I never could talk to you.
The tongue stuck in my jaw.
It stuck in a barb wire snare.
Ich, ich, ich, ich,°
I could hardly speak.
I thought every German was you.
And the language obscene
An engine, an engine

Chuffing me off like a Jew.

A Jew to Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen.°

I began to talk like a Jew.

I think I may well be a Jew.

The snows of the Tyrol, the clear beer of Vienna

Are not very pure or true.

With my gypsy ancestress and my weird luck

And my Taroc pack and my Taroc pack

I may be a bit of a Jew.

I have always been scared of you,

With your Luftwaffe,° your gobbledygoo.

And your neat moustache

And your Aryan eye, bright blue,

Panzer-man,° panzer-man, O You—

Not God but a swastika

So black no sky could squeak through.

Every woman adores a Fascist,

The boot in the face, the brute

Brute heart of a brute like you.

You stand at the blackboard, daddy,

In the picture I have of you,

A cleft in your chin instead of your foot

But no less a devil for that, no not

Any less the black man who

Bit my pretty red heart in two.

I was ten when they buried you.

At twenty I tried to die

And get back, back, back to you.

I thought even the bones would do.
But they pulled me out of the sack,
And they stuck me together with glue,
And then I knew what to do.
I made a model of you,
A man in black with a Meinkampf° look
And a love of the rack and the screw.
And I said I do, I do.
So daddy, I'm finally through.
The black telephone's off at the root,
The voices just can't worm through.
If I've killed one man, I've killed two—
The vampire who said he was you
And drank my blood for a year,
Seven years, if you want to know.
Daddy, you can lie back now.
There's a stake in your fat black heart
And the villagers never liked you.
They are dancing and stamping on you.
They always knew it was you.
Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through.

LINDA PASTAN

Linda Pastan, born in New York City in 1932, is the author of numerous books of poetry and the winner of significant literary prizes. Another of her poems appears on page 717.

Love Poem [1988]

I want to write you
a love poem as headlong

as our creek

after thaw

when we stand on its dangerous

banks and watch it carry with it every twig

every dry leaf and branch

in its path

every scruple

when we see it

so swollen with runoff

that even as we watch

we must grab

each other and step back

we must grab each other or get our shoes

soaked we must grab each other

AMIRI BARAKA

Amiri Baraka (b. 1934) in his early years was Everett LeRoi (or LeRoy) Jones, but with an increasing awareness of his African heritage he altered his name, first to Imamu ("spiritual leader") Ameer ("blessed") Baraka ("prince") and then to Amiri Baraka. Baraka was educated at Howard University, Columbia University, and the New School for Social Research.

After serving in the United States Air Force, Baraka settled in Greenwich Village, in New York City, and became part of the (chiefly white) literary scene; he and his wife published a journal that included works by Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, and others. The assassination of Malcolm X in 1965 had a profound effect on Baraka, and in this year he left his white wife and the artistic life of Greenwich Village and moved to Harlem, where he established the Black Arts Repertory Theater/School. In 1966 he returned to Newark, where he founded a similar school and, perhaps because of his heightened socialism, dropped Imamu from his name. The author of many plays and books of poetry, he is an emeritus professor at the State University of New York, Stony Brook.

Malcolm X (1925–1965), the subject of the following poem, was a militant black leader who rose to prominence in the Black Muslims. When in 1963 Elijah Muhammad suspended him, Malcolm formed his own organization, the Muslim Mosque. In 1964 he converted to orthodox Islam, and he proclaimed the brotherhood of blacks and whites, although he continued to support black nationalism. In February 1965 he was shot to death by an unidentified assassin.

A Poem for Black Hearts [1965]

For Malcolm's eyes, when they broke the face of some dumb white man, For Malcolm's hands raised to bless us all black and strong in his image of ourselves, For Malcolm's words fire darts, the victor's tireless thrusts, words hung above the world change as it may, he said it, and for this he was killed, for saying, and feeling, and being / change, all collected hot in his heart, For Malcolm's heart, raising us above our filthy cities, for his stride, and his beat, and his address to the gray monsters of the world, For Malcolm's pleas for your dignity, black men, for your life,

black man, for the filling of your minds with righteousness, For all of him dead and gone and vanished from us, and all of him which clings to our speech black god of our time.
For all of him, and all of yourself, look up,
black man, quit stuttering and shuffling, look up,
black man, quit whining and stooping, for all of him,
For Great Malcolm a prince of the earth, let nothing in us rest until we avenge ourselves for his death, stupid animals that killed him, let us never breathe a pure breath if we fail and white men call us faggots till the end of the earth.

Lucille Clifton

Lucille Clifton (née Sayles) was born in New York State in 1936 and was educated at Howard University and Fredonia State Teachers College. In addition to publishing seven books of poetry, she has written fifteen children's books. Clifton has received numerous awards, including a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. She served as poet laureate of Maryland from 1979 to 1982.

in the inner city [1969]

in the inner city
or like we call it home
we think a lot about uptown and the silent nights and the houses straight as dead men
and the pastel lights and we hang on to our no place

happy to be alive

and in the inner city

or home

JOSEPH BRODSKY

The poet and critic Joseph Brodsky (1940–1996) was born in St. Petersburg (then Leningrad), Russia, in 1940. Because of his resistance to Soviet authority, he was sentenced in the 1960s to a labor camp and later, in 1972, was expelled from the country. He immigrated to the United States, and taught and lectured at a number of colleges and universities. He received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1987 and was named poet laureate by the Library of Congress in 1991. His books include a collection of poems, To Urania (1988), and Less Than One: Selected Essays (1986).

Love Song [1996]

If you were drowning, I'd come to the rescue, wrap you in my blanket and pour hot tea.
If I were a sheriff, I'd arrest you and keep you in the cell under lock and key.
If you were a bird, I'd cut a record and listen all night long to your high-pitched trill.
If I were a sergeant, you'd be my recruit,
and boy I can assure you you'd love the drill.
If you were Chinese, I'd learn the language,
burn a lot of incense, wear funny clothes.
If you were a mirror, I'd storm the Ladies,
give you my red lipstick and puff your nose.
If you loved volcanoes, I'd be lava relentlessly erupting from my hidden source.

And if you were my wife, I'd be your lover because the church is firmly against divorce.

BOB DYLAN

Bob Dylan, born Robert Zimmerman in 1941 in Duluth, Minnesota, played the guitar as a child and learned the harmonica when he was 15. Among his chief models were Huddie Ledbetter (better known as Leadbelly), an African-American folk singer and guitarist, and Woody Guthrie, a white folk singer, guitarist, and harmonica player. Dylan's music ranges from folk to folk-rock to country blues, but perhaps his most influential songs were those of social protest, such as "Blowin' in the Wind" and "The Times They Are A-Changin'."

The Times They Are A-Changin' [1963]

Come gather 'round people

Wherever you roam

And admit that the waters

Around you have grown

And accept it that soon

You'll be drenched to the bone.

If your time to you

Is worth savin'

Then you better start swimmin'

Or you'll sink like a stone

For the times they are a-changin'.

Come writers and critics

Who prophesize with your pen

And keep your eyes wide

The chance won't come again

And don't speak too soon

For the wheel's still in spin

And there’s no tellin’ who

That it’s namin’.

For the loser now

Will be later to win

For the times they are a-changin’.

Come senators, congressmen

Please heed the call

Don’t stand in the doorway

Don’t block up the hall

For he that gets hurt

Will be he who has stalled

There’s a battle outside

And it is ragin’.

It’ll soon shake your windows

And rattle your walls

For the times they are a-changin’.

Come mothers and fathers

Throughout the land

And don’t criticize

What you can’t understand

Your sons and your daughters

Are beyond your command

Your old road is Rapidly agin’.

Please get out of the new one

If you can’t lend your hand

For the times they are a-changin’.

0The line it is drawn

The curse it is cast

The slow one now

Will later be fast

As the present now

Will later be past

The order is Rapidly fadin'.

And the first one now

Will later be last

For the times they are a-changin'.

PAT MORA

Pat Mora, after graduating from Texas Western College, earned a master's degree at the University of Texas at El Paso. She is best known for her poems, but she has also published essays on Chicano culture.

Sonrisas [1986]*

I live in a doorway between two rooms. I hear quiet clicks, cups of black coffee, click, click like facts budgets, tenure, curriculum, from careful women in crisp beige suits, quick beige smiles

that seldom sneak into their eyes.

I peek

in the other room señoras

in faded dresses stir sweet milk coffee, laughter whirls with steam from fresh tamales

sh, sh, mucho ruido,°

they scold one another,

press their lips, trap smiles

0in their dark, Mexican eyes.

Illegal Alien [1984]

Socorro, you free me to sit in my yellow kitchen waiting for a poem

while you scrub and iron.

Today you stand before me

holding cleanser and sponge and say you can’t sleep at night.

“My husband’s fury is a fire.

His fist can burn.

We don’t fight with words on that side of the Rio Grande.”

Your eyes fill. I want to comfort you, but my arms

feel heavy, unaccustomed to healing grown-up bodies.

I offer foolish questions

when I should hug you hard,

when I should dry your eyes, my sister,

sister because we are both women,

both married, both warmed
by Mexican blood.

It is not cool words you need but soothing hands.

My plastic band-aid doesn't fit your hurt.
0I am the alien here.

Ellen Bryant Voigt was born in Virginia in 1943 and educated at Converse College and the University of Iowa. She is the author of several books of poems and has taught writing at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and at Warren Wilson College.

Quarrel [1983]

Since morning they have been quarreling—

the sun pouring its implacable white bath over the birches, each one undressing

slyly, from the top down—and they hammer

at each other with their knives, nailfiles, graters of complaint as the day unwinds,

the plush clouds lowering a gray matte° for the red barn. Lunch, the soup like batting in their mouths, last week, last year, they're moving on to always and never, their shrill pitiful children crowd around but they see the top of this particular mountain, its glacial headwall, the pitch is terrific all through dinner,

and they are committed, the sun long gone,
the two of them back to back in the blank constricting bed, like marbles on aluminum—
Of this fierce love that needs to reproduce in one another wounds inflicted by the world.

Carol Muske

Carol Muske was born in 1945 in St. Paul, Minnesota, and educated at Creighton University and San Francisco State University. She has taught creative writing at several universities and was the founder and director of Free Space (a creative writing program) at the Women's House of Detention, Riker's Island, New York. She has written several books of poetry (and a novel, Dear Digby [1989], published under her married name, Carol Muske-Dukes) and has been awarded distinguished fellowships, including a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Chivalry [1997]

In Benares°
the holiest city on earth
I saw an old man
toiling up the stone steps to the ghat°
his dead wife in his arms shrunken to the size of a child—

lashed to a stretcher.
The sky filled with crows.
He held her up for a moment then placed her
in the flames.
In my time on earth
I have seen few acts of true chivalry, man's reverence
for woman.
But the memory of him
with her in the cradle of his arms placing her just so in the fire
so she would burn faster
so the kindling of the stretcher would catch—
is enough for me now,
will suffice
for what remains on this earth
a gesture of bereavement

Three Thousand Dollar Death Song[1980]

Nineteen American Indian Skeletons from Nevada . . . valued at $3000 . . .

—Museum invoice, 1975

Is it in cold hard cash? the kind that dusts the insides of men's pockets lying silver-polished surface along the cloth.
Or in bills? papering the wallets of they who thread the night with dark words. Or checks? paper promises weighing the same as words spoken once on the other side of the grown grass and damned rivers of history. However it goes, it goes Through my body it goes assessing each nerve, running its edges along my arteries, planning ahead for whose hands will rip me into pieces of dusty red paper, whose hands will smooth or smatter me into traces of rubble. Invoiced now, it's official how our bones are valued that stretch out pointing to sunrise or are flexed into one last foetal bend, that are removed and tossed about, catalogued, numbered with black ink
on newly-white foreheads.
As we were formed to the white soldier's voice,
so we explode under white students' hands.
Death is a long trail of days
in our fleshless prison.
0From this distant point we watch our bones auctioned with our careful beadwork, our quilled medicine bundles, even the bridles of our shot-down horses. You: who have priced us, you who have removed us: at what cost?

What price the pits where our bones share a single bit of memory, how one century turns our dead into specimens, our history into dust, our survivors into clowns.
Our memory might be catching, you know;
picture the mortars, the arrowheads, the labrets° shaking off their labels like bears suddenly awake to find the seasons have ended while they slept. Watch them touch each other, measure reality, march out the museum door!
Watch as they lift their faces and smell about for us; watch our bones rise to meet them and mount the horses once again!
The cost, then, will be paid for our sweetgrass-smelling having-been in clam shell beads and steatite,° dentalia° and woodpecker scalp, turquoise and copper, blood and oil, coal and uranium, children, a universe of stolen things.

DIANE ACKERMAN

The poet, essayist, and naturalist Diane Ackerman was born in Waukegan, Illinois, in 1948. She graduated from Pennsylvania State University and later received an M.F.A. and a Ph.D. from Cornell University. She is the author of six volumes of verse, including Jaguar of Sweet Laughter: New and Selected Poems (1991) and, most recently, I Praise My Destroyer (1998). She has also written nonfiction, and is especially admired for A Natural History of the Senses (1990). She lives in Ithaca, New York.

She lives in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Her chief books are The Last Song, What Moon Drove Me to This, She Had Some Horses, and Secrets from the Center of the World.

Vision [1983]

The rainbow touched down
"somewhere in the Rio Grande,"
we said. And saw the light of it from your mother's house in Isleta.°
How it curved down between earth and the deepest sky to give us horses of color
horses that were within us all of this time but we didn't see them because we wait for the easiest vision to save us.
In Isleta the rainbow was a crack in the universe. We saw the barest of all life that is possible.
Bright horses rolled over and over the dusking sky.
I heard the thunder of their beating hearts. Their lungs hit air and sang. All the colors of horses formed the rainbow, and formed us
0watching them.

Judith Ortiz Cofer

Born in Puerto Rico in 1952 of a Puerto Rican mother and a United States mainland father who served in the Navy, Judith Ortiz Cofer was educated both in Puerto Rico and on the mainland. After earning a bachelor's and a master's degree in English, she did further graduate work at Oxford and then taught English in Florida. The author of poems, essays, and a novel, she is now the Director of the Creative Writing Program at the University of Georgia.

My Father in the Navy [1987]

A Childhood Memory
Stiff and immaculate in the white cloth of his uniform and a round cap on his head like a halo, he was an apparition on leave from a shadow-world and only flesh and blood when he rose from below
the waterline where he kept watch over the engines and dials making sure the ship parted the waters on a straight course.
Mother, brother and I kept vigil
on the nights and dawns of his arrivals, watching the corner beyond the neon sign of a quasar
for the flash of white our father like an angel heralding a new day.
His homecomings were the verses
we composed over the years making up the siren's song that kept him coming back from the bellies of iron whales and into our nights
like the evening prayer.

But because no one ever returned from this depth, if what I hear is true, without fear of infamy, I answer you."

Explanations of allusions in the poem may be helpful. "Works and days" (line 29) is the title of a poem on farm life by Hesiod (eighth century BCE); "dying fall" (line 52) echoes Twelfth Night I.i.4; lines 81–83 allude to John the Baptist (see Matthew 14.1–11); line 92 echoes lines 41–42 of Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress" (see page 737); for "Lazarus" (line 94) see Luke 16 and John 11; lines 112–117 allude to Polonius and perhaps to other figures in Hamlet; "full of high sentence" (line 117) comes from Chaucer's description of the Clerk of Oxford in the Canterbury Tales.

PART

DRAMA CHAPTER

29

How to Read a Play

THINKING ABOUT THE LANGUAGE OF DRAMA

The earlier parts of this book have dealt with fiction and poetry. A third chief literary type is drama, texts written to be performed.

A play is written to be seen and to be heard. We go to see a play in a theater (theater is derived from a Greek word meaning “to watch”), but in the theater we also hear it because we become an audience (audience is derived from a Latin word meaning “to hear”). Hamlet was speaking the ordinary language of his day when he said, “We’ll hear a play tomorrow.” When we read a play rather than see and hear it in a theater, we lose a good deal. We must see it in the mind’s eye and hear it in the mind’s ear.

In reading a play it’s not enough mentally to hear the lines. We must try to see the characters, costumed and moving within a specified setting, and we must try to hear not only their words but their tone, their joy or hypocrisy or tentativeness or aggression. Our job is much easier when we are in the theater and we have only to pay attention to the performers; as readers on our own, however, we must do what we can to perform the play in the theater of our minds.

If as a reader you develop the following principles into habits, you will get far more out of a play than if you read it as though it were a novel consisting only of dialogue.

1. -Pay attention to the list of characters and carefully read whatever descriptions the playwright has provided. Early dramatists, such as Shakespeare, did not provide much in the way of description ("Othello, the Moor" or "Ariel, an airy spirit" is about as much as we find in Elizabethan texts), but later playwrights often are very forthcoming. Here, for instance, is Tennessee Williams introducing us to Amanda Wingfield in The Glass Menagerie. (We give only the beginning of his longish description.)

> Amanda Wingfield, the mother. A little woman of great but confused vitality clinging frantically to another time and place.

And here is Susan Glaspell introducing us to all the characters in her one-act play, Trifles:

> . . .the Sheriff comes in, followed by the County Attorney and Hale. The Sheriff and Hale are men in middle life, the County Attorney is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the Sheriff's Wife, [Mrs. Peters] first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. Mrs. Hale is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly and stand close together near the door.

Glaspell's description of her characters is not nearly so explicit as Tennessee Williams's, but Glaspell does reveal much to a reader. What do we know about the men? They differ in age, they are bundled up, and they "go at once to the stove." What do we know about the women? Mrs. Peters is slight, and she has a "nervous face"; Mrs. Hale is "larger" but she too is "disturbed." The women enter "slowly," and they "stand close together near the door." In short, the men, who take over the warmest part of the room, are more confident than the women, who nervously huddle together near the door. It's a man's world.

2. -Pay attention to gestures and costumes that are specified in stage directions or are implied by the dialogue. We have just seen how Glaspell distinguishes between the men and the women by what they do—the men take over the warm part of the room, the women stand insecurely near the door. Most dramatists from the late nineteenth century to the present have been fairly generous with their stage directions, but when we read the works of earlier dramatists we often have to deduce the gestures from the speeches. For instance, although the texts of Shakespeare's day have an occasional direction, such as "Enter Hamlet reading on a book," "Leaps in the grave," and "in scuffling, they change rapiers," such directions are rare. In reading Shakespeare, we must, again, see the action in the mind's eye (a phrase from Hamlet, by the way) Here, for instance, are Horatio's words (1.1.130–31) when he sees the Ghost:

> But soft, behold! Lo, where it comes again!
> I'll cross it, though it blast me. [It spreads his arms.] Stay, illusion!

As a footnote indicates, the "his" in the stage direction is the Ghost's; today we would say "its." There is no doubt about what the Ghost does, but what does Horatio do when he says "I'll cross it"? Conceivably "I'll cross it" means "I'll confront it; I'll stand in its path," and Horatio then walks up to the Ghost. Or perhaps the words mean "I'll make the sign of the cross, to protect myself from this creature from another world." If so, does Horatio make the sign of the cross with his hand, or does he perhaps hold up his sword, an object that by virtue of the sword guard at right angles to the blade is itself a cross? The words "Stay, illusion" similarly must be accompanied by a gesture; perhaps Horatio reaches out, to try to take hold of the Ghost.

Or consider the first reunion of Hamlet and Horatio, in the second scene (1.2.160–61) of the play:

> HORATIO. Hail to your lordship!
>
> HAMLET. I am glad to see you well.
> Horatio!—or I do forget myself.

One cannot be positive, but it seems that the melancholy Hamlet, hearing a greeting ("Hail to your lordship"), at first replies with routine politeness ("I am glad to see you well") and, when an instant later he recognizes that this greeting comes from an old friend whom he has not seen for a while, he responds with an enthusiastic "Horatio!" and perhaps with an embrace.

In addition to thinking about gestures, don't forget the costumes that the characters wear. Costumes identify the characters as soldiers or kings or farmers or whatever, and changes of costume can be especially symbolic.

Costumes are always important, because they tell us something about the people who wear them. As even the fatuous Polonius knows, "the apparel oft proclaims the man." In Hamlet, the use of symbolic costume is evident; Hamlet is dressed in black (we hear of his "nighted color" and his "inky cloak"), a color that sets him apart from the courtiers, who presumably are dressed in colorful robes. Later in the play, when, having escaped from a sea journey that was supposed to end in his death, Hamlet is seen in the graveyard, perhaps he wears the "sea gown" that he mentions, and we feel that he is now a more energetic character, freed from his constricting suit of mourning.

3. -Keep in mind the kind of theater for which the play was written. The plays in this book were written for various kinds of theaters. Sophocles, author of Antigone and King Oedipus, wrote for the ancient Greek theater, essentially a space where performers acted in front of an audience seated on a hillside. (See the photo on page 1098.) This theater was open to the heavens, with a structure representing a palace or temple behind the actors, in itself a kind of image of a society governed by the laws of the state and the laws of the gods. Moreover, the chorus entered the playing space by marching down the side aisles, close to the audience, thus helping to unite the world of the audience and of the players. On the other hand, the audience in most modern theaters sits in a darkened area and looks through a proscenium arch at performers who move in a boxlike setting. The box set of the late nineteenth century and the twentieth century is, it often seems, an appropriate image of the confined lives of the unheroic characters of the play.

4. -If the playwright describes a set, try to envision the set clearly. Glaspell, for instance, tells us a good deal about the set. We quote only the first part.

> The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of John Wright, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order. . . .

These details about a gloomy and disordered kitchen may seem to be mere realism—after all, the play has to take place somewhere—but it turns out that the disorder and, for that matter, the gloominess are extremely important. You'll have to read the play to find out why.

Another example of a setting that provides important information is Arthur Miller's in Death of a Salesman. Again we quote only the beginning of the description.

> Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry glow of orange.

If we read older drama, we find that playwrights do not give us much help, but by paying attention to the words we can to some degree visualize the locale. For instance, the first stage direction in Hamlet ("Enter Bernardo and Francisco, two sentinels"), along with the opening dialogue ("Who's there?"; "Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold yourself"), indicates that we are in some sort of public place where anyone may suddenly appear. Elizabethan plays were staged in daylight, and there was no way of darkening the stage, so if the scene is a night scene the playwright has to convey this information. In this instance, the audience understands that the meeting takes place at night because the characters can hear but cannot see each other; to make certain, however, a few lines later Shakespeare has Bernardo say, "'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco."

5. -Pay attention to whatever sound effects are specified in the play. In Hamlet (1.2.125), when the king (called "Denmark" in the speech we quote) drinks, he does so to the rather vulgar accompaniment of a cannonade:

> No jocund health that Denmark drinks today
> But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,
> And the King's rouse the heaven shall bruit again,
> Respeaking earthly thunder.

The point is made again several times, but these salutes to King Claudius are finally displaced by a military salute to Hamlet; "a peal of ordnance is shot off," we are told, when his body is carried off the stage at the end of the play. Thus, the last sound that we hear in Hamlet is a validation of Hamlet as a hero.

In Death of a Salesman, before the curtain goes up, "A melody is heard, played upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon." Then the curtain rises, revealing the Salesman's house, with "towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides." Obviously the sound of the flute is meant to tell us of the world that the Salesman is shut off from.

A sound effect, however, need not be so evidently symbolic to be important in a play. In Glaspell's Trifles, almost at the very end of the play we hear the "sound of a knob turning in the other room." The sound has an electrifying effect on the audience, as it does on the two women on the stage, and it precedes a decisive action.

6. -Pay attention to what the characters say, and keep in mind that (like real people) dramatic characters are not always to be trusted. An obvious case is Shakespeare's Iago, an utterly unscrupulous villain who knows that he is a liar. But a character may be self-deceived, or, to put it a bit differently, characters may say what they honestly think but may not know what they are talking about.

Plot and Character

Although plot is sometimes equated with the gist of the narrative—the story—it is sometimes reserved to denote the writer's arrangement of the happenings in the story. Thus, all plays about the assassination of Julius Caesar have pretty much the same story, but by beginning with a scene of workmen enjoying a holiday (and thereby introducing the motif of the fickleness of the mob), Shakespeare's play has a plot different from a play that omits such a scene.

Handbooks on drama often suggest that a plot (arrangement of happenings) should have a rising action, a climax, and a falling action. This sort of plot can be diagrammed as a pyramid, the tension rising through complications, or crises, to a climax, at which point the fate of the protagonist (chief character) is firmly established; the climax is the apex, and the tension allegedly slackens as we witness the dénouement (unknotting). Shakespeare sometimes used a pyramidal structure, placing his climax neatly in the middle of what seems to us to be the third of five acts.* Roughly the first half of Julius Caesar shows Brutus rising, reaching his height in 3.1 with the death of Caesar; but later in this scene he gives Marc Antony permission to speak at Caesar's funeral and thus he sets in motion his own fall, which occupies the second half of the play. In Macbeth (3.4.137–39), the protagonist attains his height in 3.1 ("Thou hast it now: King"), but he soon perceives that he is going downhill:

> I am in blood
>
> Stepped in so far, that, should I wade no more,
>
> Returning were as tedious as go o'er.

Of course, no law demands such a structure, and a hunt for the pyramid usually causes the hunter to overlook all the crises but the middle one. William Butler Yeats once suggestively diagrammed a good plot not as a pyramid but as a line moving diagonally upward, punctuated by several crises. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that a good plot has its moments of tension, but the location of these will vary with the play. They are the product of conflict, but not all conflict produces tension; there is conflict but little tension in a ball game when the score is 10–0 in the ninth inning with two out and no one on base.

Regardless of how a plot is diagrammed, the exposition is that part that tells the audience what it has to know about the past, the antecedent action. When two gossiping servants tell each other that after a year away in Paris the young master is coming home tomorrow with a new wife, they are giving the audience the exposition by introducing characters and establishing relationships. The Elizabethans and the Greeks sometimes tossed out all pretense at dialogue and began with a prologue, like the one spoken by the Chorus at the outset of Romeo and Juliet:

Two households, both alike in dignity
In fair Verona, where we lay our scene,
From ancient grudge break to new mutiny,
Where civil blood makes civil hands unclean.
From forth the fatal loins of these two foes
A pair of star-crossed lovers take their life. . . .

And in Tennessee Williams's The Glass Menagerie, Tom's first speech is a sort of prologue. However, the exposition also may extend far into the play so that the audience keeps getting bits of information that both clarify the present and build suspense about the future. Occasionally the soliloquy (speech of a character alone on the stage, revealing his or her thoughts) or the aside (speech in the presence of others but unheard by them) is used to do the job of putting the audience in possession of the essential facts. The soliloquy and the aside are not limited to exposition; they are used to reveal the private thoughts of characters who, like people in real life, do not always tell others what their inner thoughts are. The soliloquy is especially used for meditation, where we might say the character is interacting not with another character but with himself or herself.

Because a play is not simply words but words spoken with accompanying gestures by performers who are usually costumed and in a particular setting, it may be argued that to read a play (rather than to see and hear it) is to falsify it. Drama is not literature, some people hold, but theater. However, there are replies: a play can be literature as well as theater, and readers of a play can perhaps enact in the theater of their mind a more effective play than the one put on by imperfect actors. After all, as Shakespeare's Duke Theseus, in A Midsummer Night's Dream, says of actors, "The best in this kind are but shadows." In any case, we need not wait for actors to present a play; we can do much on our own.

SUSAN GLASPELL

Susan Glaspell (1882–1948) was born in Davenport, Iowa, and educated at Drake University in Des Moines. In 1903 she married George Cram Cook and, with Cook and other writers, actors, and artists, in 1915 founded the Provincetown Players, a group that remained vital until 1929. Glaspell wrote Trifles (1916) for the Provincetown Players, but she also wrote stories, novels, and a biography of her husband. In 1931 she won a Pulitzer Prize for Alison's House, a play about the family of a deceased poet who in some ways resembles Emily Dickinson.

Trifles [1916]

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of John Wright, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—unwashed pans under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the breadbox, a dish towel on the table—other signs of incompleted work. At the rear the outer door opens, and the Sheriff comes in, followed by the County Attorney and Hale. The Sheriff and Hale are men in middle life, the County Attorney is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the Sheriff's Wife first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. Mrs. Hale is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly and stand close together near the door.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (rubbing his hands). This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

MRS. PETERS (after taking a step forward). I'm not—cold.

SHERIFF (unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to the beginning of official business). Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

SHERIFF (looking about). It's just the same. When it dropped below zero last night, I thought I'd better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on; but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Somebody should have been left here yesterday.

SHERIFF. Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today, and as long as I went over everything here myself—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

HALE. Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes. We came along the road from my place; and as I got here, I said, "I'm going to see if I can't get John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone." I spoke to Wright about it once before, and he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn't know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Let's talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

HALE. I didn't hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o'clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, "Come in." I wasn't sure, I'm not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door (indicating the door by which the two women are still standing), and there in that rocker—(pointing to it) sat Mrs. Wright. (They all look at the rocker.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY. What—was she doing?

HALE. She was rockin' back and forth. She had her apron in her hand and was kind of—pleating it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. And how did she—look?

HALE. Well, she looked queer.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. How do you mean—queer?

HALE. Well, as if she didn't know what she was going to do next. And kind of done up.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. How did she seem to feel about your coming?

HALE. Why, I don't think she minded—one way or other. She didn't pay much attention. I said, "How do, Mrs. Wright, it's cold, ain't it?" And she said, "Is it?"—and went on kind of pleating at her apron. Well, I was surprised; she didn't ask me to come up to the stove, or to set down, but just sat there, not even looking at me, so I said, "I want to see John." And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh. I thought of Harry and the team outside, so I said a little sharp: “Can’t I see John?” “No,” she says, kind o’ dull like. “Ain’t he home?” says I. “Yes,” says she, “he’s home.” “Then why can’t I see him?” I asked her, out of patience. “’Cause he’s dead,” says she. “Dead?” says I. She just nodded her head, not getting a bit excited, but rockin’ back and forth. “Why—where is he?” says I, not knowing what to say. She just pointed upstairs—like that (himself pointing to the room above). I got up, with the idea of going up there. I walked from there to here—then I says, “Why, what did he die of?” “He died of a rope around his neck,” says she, and just went on pleatin’ at her apron. Well, I went out and called Harry. I thought I might—need help. We went upstairs, and there he was lyin’—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. I think I’d rather have you go into that upstairs, where you can point it all out. Just go on now with the rest of the story.

HALE. Well, my first thought was to get that rope off. I looked . . .(Stops, his face twitches.) . . .but Harry, he went up to him, and he said, “No, he’s dead all right, and we’d better not touch anything.” So we went back downstairs. She was still sitting that same way. “Has anybody been notified?” I asked. “No,” says she, unconcerned. “Who did this, Mrs. Wright?” said Harry. He said it business-like—and she stopped pleatin’ of her apron. “I don’t know,” she says. “You don’t know?” says Harry. “No,” says she. “Weren’t you sleepin’ in the bed with him?” says Harry. “Yes,” says she, “but I was on the inside.” “Somebody slipped a rope round his neck and strangled him, and you didn’t wake up?” says Harry. “I didn’t wake up,” she said after him. We must ’a looked as if we didn’t see how that could be, for after a minute she said, “I sleep sound.” Harry was going to ask her more questions, but I said maybe we ought to let her tell her story first to the coroner, or the sheriff, so Harry went fast as he could to Rivers’ place, where there’s a telephone.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. And what did Mrs. Wright do when she knew that you had gone for the coroner?

HALE. She moved from that chair to this over here . . .(Pointing to a small chair in the corner.). . .and just sat there with her hands held together and looking down. I got a feeling that I ought to make some conversation, so I said I had come in to see if John wanted to put in a telephone, and at that she started to laugh, and then she stopped and looked at me—scared. (The County Attorney, who has had his notebook out, makes a note.) I dunno, maybe it wasn't scared. I wouldn't like to say it was. Soon Harry got back, and then Dr. Lloyd came, and you, Mr. Peters, and so I guess that's all I know that you don't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (looking around). I guess we'll go upstairs first—and then out to the barn and around there. (To the Sheriff.) You're convinced that there was nothing important here—nothing that would point to any motive?

SHERIFF. Nothing here but kitchen things.

(The County Attorney, after again looking around the kitchen, opens the door of a cupboard closet. He gets up on a chair and looks on a shelf. Pulls his hand away, sticky.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Here's a nice mess.

(The women draw nearer.)

MRS. PETERS (to the other woman). Oh, her fruit; it did freeze. (To the Lawyer.) She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire'd go out and her jars would break.

SHERIFF. Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin' about her preserves.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. I guess before we're through she may have something more serious than preserves to worry about.

HALE. Well, women are used to worrying over trifles.

(The two women move a little closer together.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (with the gallantry of a young politician). And yet, for all their worries, what would we do without the ladies? (The women do not unbend. He goes to the sink, takes a dipperful of water from the pail and, pouring it into a basin, washes his hands. Starts to wipe them on the roller towel, turns it for a cleaner place.) Dirty towels! (Kicks his foot against the pans under the sink.) Not much of a housekeeper, would you say, ladies?

MRS. HALE (stiffly). There's a great deal of work to be done on a farm.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. To be sure. And yet . . .(With a little bow to her.) . . .I know there are some Dickson county farmhouses which do not have such roller towels. (He gives it a pull to expose its full length again.)

MRS. HALE. Those towels get dirty awful quick. Men's hands aren't always as clean as they might be.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Ah, loyal to your sex, I see. But you and Mrs. Wright were neighbors. I suppose you were friends, too.

MRS. HALE (shaking her head). I've not seen much of her of late years. I've not been in this house—it's more than a year.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. And why was that? You didn't like her?

MRS. HALE. I liked her all well enough. Farmers' wives have their hands full, Mr. Henderson. And then—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Yes—?

MRS. HALE (looking about). It never seemed a very cheerful place.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. No—it's not cheerful. I shouldn't say she had the homemaking instinct.

MRS. HALE. Well, I don't know as Wright had, either.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. You mean that they didn't get on very well?

MRS. HALE. No, I don't mean anything. But I don't think a place'd be any cheerfuler for John Wright's being in it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. I'd like to talk more of that a little later. I want to get the lay of things upstairs now. (He goes to the left, where three steps lead to a stair door.)

SHERIFF. I suppose anything Mrs. Peters does'll be all right. She was to take in some clothes for her, you know, and a few little things. We left in such a hurry yesterday.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Yes, but I would like to see what you take, Mrs. Peters, and keep an eye out for anything that might be of use to us.

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mr. Henderson.

(The women listen to the men's steps on the stairs, then look about the kitchen.)

MRS. HALE. I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. (She arranges the pans under sink which the Lawyer had shoved out of place.)

MRS. PETERS. Of course it's no more than their duty.

MRS. HALE. Duty's all right, but I guess that deputy sheriff that came out to make the fire might have got a little of this on. (Gives the roller towel a pull.) Wish I'd thought of that sooner. Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up when she had to come away in such a hurry.

MRS. PETERS (who has gone to a small table in the left rear corner of the room, and lifted one end of a towel that covers a pan). She had bread set. (Stands still.)

MRS. HALE (eyes fixed on a loaf of bread beside the breadbox, which is on a low shelf at the other side of the room. Moves slowly toward it). She was going to put this in there. (Picks up loaf, then abruptly drops it. In a manner of returning to familiar things.) It's a shame about her fruit. I wonder if it's all gone. (Gets up on the chair and looks.) I think there's some here that's all right, Mrs. Peters. Yes—here; (Holding it toward the window.) this is cherries, too. (Looking again.) I declare I believe that's the only one. (Gets down, bottle in her hand. Goes to the sink and wipes it off on the outside.) She'll feel awful bad after all her hard work in the hot weather. I remember the afternoon I put up my cherries last summer. (She puts the bottle on the big kitchen table, center of the room, front table. With a sigh, is about to sit down in the rocking chair. Before she is seated realizes what chair it is; with a slow look at it, steps back. The chair, which she has touched, rocks back and forth.)

MRS. PETERS. Well, I must get those things from the front room closet. (She goes to the door at the right, but after looking into the other room steps back.) You coming with me, Mrs. Hale? You could help me carry them. (They go into the other room; reappear, Mrs. Peters carrying a dress and skirt, Mrs. Hale following with a pair of shoes.)

MRS. PETERS. My, it's cold in there. (She puts the cloth on the big table, and hurries to the stove.)

MRS. HALE (examining the skirt). Wright was close. I think maybe that's why she kept so much to herself. She didn't even belong to the Ladies' Aid. I suppose she felt she couldn't do her part, and then you don't enjoy things when you feel shabby. She used to wear pretty clothes and be lively, when she was Minnie Foster, one of the town girls singing in the choir. But that—oh, that was thirty years ago. This all you was to take in?

MRS. PETERS. She said she wanted an apron. Funny thing to want, for there isn't much to get you dirty in jail, goodness knows. But I suppose just to make her feel more natural. She said they was in the top drawer in this cupboard. Yes, here. And then her little shawl that always hung behind the door. (Opens stair door and looks.) Yes, here it is. (Quickly shuts door leading upstairs.)

MRS. HALE (abruptly moving toward her). Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE. Do you think she did it?

MRS. PETERS (in a frightened voice). Oh, I don't know.

MRS. HALE. Well, I don't think she did. Asking for an apron and her little shawl. Worrying about her fruit.

MRS. PETERS (starts to speak, glances up, where footsteps are heard in the room above. In a low voice). Mr. Peters says it looks bad for her. Mr. Henderson is awful sarcastic in speech, and he'll make fun of her sayin' she didn't wake up.

MRS. HALE. Well, I guess John Wright didn't wake when they was slipping that rope under his neck.

MRS. PETERS. No, it's strange. It must have been done awful crafty and still. They say it was such a—funny way to kill a man, rigging it all up like that.

MRS. HALE. That's just what Mr. Hale said. There was a gun in the house. He says that's what he can't understand.

MRS. PETERS. Mr. Henderson said coming out that what was needed for the case was a motive; something to show anger, or—sudden feeling.

MRS. HALE (who is standing by the table). Well, I don't see any signs of anger around here. (She puts her hand on the dish towel which lies on the table, stands looking down at the table, one half of which is clean, the other half messy). It's wiped here. (Makes a move as if to finish work, then turns and looks at loaf of bread outside the breadbox. Drops towel. In that voice of coming back to familiar things.) Wonder how they are finding things upstairs? I hope she had it a little more red-up there. You know, it seems kind of sneaking. Locking her up in town and then coming out here and trying to get her own house to turn against her!

MRS. PETERS. But, Mrs. Hale, the law is the law.

MRS. HALE. I s'pose 'tis. (Unbuttoning her coat.) Better loosen up your things, Mrs. Peters. You won't feel them when you go out.

(Mrs. Peters takes off her fur tippet, goes to hang it on hook at the back of room, stands looking at the under part of the small corner table.)

MRS. PETERS. She was piecing a quilt. (She brings the large sewing basket, and they look at the bright pieces.)

MRS. HALE. It's log cabin pattern. Pretty, isn't it? I wonder if she was goin' to quilt or just knot it?

(Footsteps have been heard coming down the stairs. The Sheriff enters, followed by Hale and the County Attorney.)

SHERIFF. They wonder if she was going to quilt it or just knot it. (The men laugh, the women look abashed.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (rubbing his hands over the stove). Frank's fire didn't do much up there, did it? Well, let's go out to the barn and get that cleared up.

(The men go outside.)

MRS. HALE (resentfully). I don't know as there's anything so strange, our takin' up our time with little things while we're waiting for them to get the evidence. (She sits down at the big table, smoothing out a block with decision.) I don't see as it's anything to laugh about.

MRS. PETERS (apologetically). Of course they've got awful important things on their minds. (Pulls up a chair and joins Mrs. Hale at the table.)

MRS. HALE (examining another block). Mrs. Peters, look at this one. Here, this is the one she was working on, and look at the sewing! All the rest of it has been so nice and even. And look at this! It's all over the place! Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about! (After she has said this, they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant Mrs. Hale has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing.)

MRS. PETERS. Oh, what are you doing, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE (mildly). Just pulling out a stitch or two that's not sewed very good. (Threading a needle.) Bad sewing always made me fidgety.

MRS. PETERS (nervously). I don't think we ought to touch things.

MRS. HALE. I'll just finish up this end. (Suddenly stopping and leaning forward.) Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE. What do you suppose she was so nervous about?

MRS. PETERS. Oh—I don't know. I don't know as she was nervous. I sometimes sew awful queer when I'm just tired. (Mrs. Hale starts to say something, looks at Mrs. Peters, then goes on sewing.)

Well, I must get these things wrapped up. They may be through sooner than we think. (Putting apron and other things together.) I wonder where I can find a piece of paper, and string.

MRS. HALE. In that cupboard, maybe.

MRS. PETERS (looking in cupboard). Why, here's a birdcage. (Holds it up). Did she have a bird, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE. Why, I don't know whether she did or not—I've not been here for so long. There was a man around last year selling canaries cheap, but I don't know as she took one; maybe she did. She used to sing real pretty herself.

MRS. PETERS (glancing around). Seems funny to think of a bird here. But she must have had one, or why should she have a cage? I wonder what happened to it?

MRS. HALE. I s'pose maybe the cat got it.

MRS. PETERS. No, she didn't have a cat. She's got that feeling some people have about cats—being afraid of them. My cat got in her room, and she was real upset and asked me to take it out.

MRS. HALE. My sister Bessie was like that. Queer, ain't it?

MRS. PETERS (examining the cage). Why, look at this door. It's broke. One hinge is pulled apart.

MRS. HALE (looking, too). Looks as if someone must have been rough with it.

MRS. PETERS. Why, yes. (She brings the cage forward and puts it on the table.)

MRS. HALE. I wish if they're going to find any evidence they'd be about it. I don't like this place.

MRS. PETERS. But I'm awful glad you came with me, Mrs. Hale. It would be lonesome for me sitting here alone.

MRS. HALE. It would, wouldn't it? (Dropping her sewing.) But I tell you what I do wish, Mrs. Peters. I wish I had come over sometimes when she was here. I—(Looking around the room.)—wish I had.

MRS. PETERS. But of course you were awful busy, Mrs. Hale—your house and your children.

MRS. HALE. I could've come. I stayed away because it weren't cheerful—and that's why I ought to have come. I—I've never liked this place. Maybe because it's down in a hollow, and you don't see the road. I dunno what it is, but it's a lonesome place and always was. I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now—(Shakes her head.)

MRS. PETERS. Well, you mustn't reproach yourself, Mrs. Hale. Somehow we just don't see how it is with other folks until—something comes up.

MRS. HALE. Not having children makes less work—but it makes a quiet house, and Wright out to work all day, and no company when he did come in. Did you know John Wright, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Not to know him; I've seen him in town. They say he was a good man.

MRS. HALE. Yes—good; he didn't drink, and kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts. But he was a hard man, Mrs. Peters. Just to pass the time of day with him. (Shivers.) Like a raw wind that gets to the bone. (Pauses, her eye falling on the cage.) I should think she would 'a wanted a bird. But what do you suppose went with it?

MRS. PETERS. I don't know, unless it got sick and died. (She reaches over and swings the broken door, swings it again; both women watch it.)

MRS. HALE. You weren't raised round here, were you? (Mrs. Peters shakes her head.) You didn't know—her?

MRS. PETERS. Not till they brought her yesterday.

MRS. HALE. She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery. How—she—did—change. (Silence; then as if struck by a happy thought and relieved to get back to everyday things.) Tell you what, Mrs. Peters, why don't you take the quilt in with you? It might take up her mind.

MRS. PETERS. Why, I think that's a real nice idea, Mrs. Hale. There couldn't possibly be any objection to it, could there? Now, just what would I take? I wonder if her patches are in here—and her things. (They look in the sewing basket.)

MRS. HALE. Here's some red. I expect this has got sewing things in it. (Brings out a fancy box.) What a pretty box. Looks like something somebody would give you. Maybe her scissors are in here. (Opens box. Suddenly puts her hand to her nose.) Why—(Mrs. Peters bends nearer, then turns her face away.) There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk.

MRS. PETERS. Why, this isn't her scissors.

MRS. HALE (lifting the silk). Oh, Mrs. Peters—it's—(Mrs. Peters bends closer.)

MRS. PETERS. It's the bird.

MRS. HALE (jumping up). But, Mrs. Peters—look at it. Its neck! Look at its neck! It's all—other side to.

MRS. PETERS. Somebody—wrung—its neck.

(Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension of horror. Steps are heard outside. Mrs. Hale slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter Sheriff and County Attorney. Mrs. Peters rises.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (as one turning from serious things to little pleasantries). Well, ladies, have you decided whether she was going to quilt it or knot it?

MRS. PETERS. We think she was going to—knot it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Well, that's interesting, I'm sure. (Seeing the birdcage.) Has the bird flown?

MRS. HALE (putting more quilt pieces over the box). We think the—cat got it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (preoccupied). Is there a cat?

(Mrs. Hale glances in a quick covert way at Mrs. Peters.)

MRS. PETERS. Well, not now. They're superstitious, you know. They leave.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (to Sheriff Peters, continuing an interrupted conversation). No sign at all of anyone having come from the outside. Their own rope. Now let's go up again and go over it piece by piece. (They start upstairs.) It would have to have been someone who knew just the—

(Mrs. Peters sits down. The two women sit there not looking at one another, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they talk now, it is the manner of feeling their way over strange ground, as if afraid of what they are saying, but as if they cannot help saying it.)

MRS. HALE. She liked the bird. She was going to bury it in that pretty box.

MRS. PETERS (in a whisper). When I was a girl—my kitten—there was a boy took a hatchet, and before my eyes—and before I could get there—(Covers her face an instant.) If they hadn't held me back, I would have—(Catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are heard, falters weakly.)—hurt him.

MRS. HALE (with a slow look around her). I wonder how it would seem never to have had any children around. (Pause.) No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too.

MRS. PETERS (moving uneasily). We don't know who killed the bird.

MRS. HALE. I knew John Wright.

MRS. PETERS. It was an awful thing was done in this house that night, Mrs. Hale. Killing a man while he slept, slipping a rope around his neck that choked the life out of him.

MRS. HALE. His neck. Choked the life out of him.

(Her hand goes out and rests on the birdcage.)

MRS. PETERS (with a rising voice). We don't know who killed him. We don't know.

MRS. HALE (her own feeling not interrupted). If there'd been years and years of nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still, after the bird was still.

MRS. PETERS (something within her speaking). I know what stillness is. When we homesteaded in Dakota, and my first baby died—after he was two years old, and me with no other then—

MRS. HALE (moving). How soon do you suppose they'll be through, looking for evidence?

MRS. PETERS. I know what stillness is. (Pulling herself back.) The law has got to punish crime, Mrs. Hale.

MRS. HALE (not as if answering that). I wish you'd seen Minnie Foster when she wore a white dress with blue ribbons and stood up there in the choir and sang. (A look around the room.) Oh, I wish I'd come over here once in a while! That was a crime! That was a crime! Who's going to punish that?

MRS. PETERS (looking upstairs). We mustn't—take on.

MRS. HALE. I might have known she needed help! I know how things can be—for women. I tell you, it's queer, Mrs. Peters. We live close together and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it's all just a different kind of the same thing. (Brushes her eyes, noticing the bottle of fruit, reaches out for it.) If I was you, I wouldn't tell her her fruit was gone. Tell her it ain't. Tell her it's all right. Take this in to prove it to her. She—she may never know whether it was broke or not.

MRS. PETERS (takes the bottle, looks about for something to wrap it in; takes petticoat from the clothes brought from the other room, very nervously begins winding this around the bottle. In a false voice). My, it's a good thing the men couldn't hear us. Wouldn't they just laugh! Getting all stirred up over a little thing like a—dead canary. As if that could have anything to do with—with—wouldn't they laugh!

(The men are heard coming downstairs.)

MRS. HALE (under her breath). Maybe they would—maybe they wouldn't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. No, Peters, it's all perfectly clear except a reason for doing it. But you know juries when it comes to women. If there was some definite thing. Something to show—something to make a story about—a thing that would connect up with this strange way of doing it.

(The women's eyes meet for an instant. Enter Hale from outer door.)

HALE. Well, I've got the team around. Pretty cold out there.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. I'm going to stay here awhile by myself. (To the Sheriff.) You can send Frank out for me, can't you? I want to go over everything. I'm not satisfied that we can't do better.

SHERIFF. Do you want to see what Mrs. Peters is going to take in?

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Oh I guess they're not very dangerous things the ladies have picked up. (Moves a few things about, disturbing the quilt pieces which cover the box. Steps back.) No, Mrs. Peters doesn't need supervising. For that matter, a sheriff's wife is married to the law. Ever think of it that way, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Not—just that way.

SHERIFF (chuckling). Married to the law. (Moves toward the other room.) I just want you to come in here a minute, George. We ought to take a look at these windows.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (scoffingly). Oh, windows!

SHERIFF. We'll be right out, Mr. Hale.

(Hale goes outside. The Sheriff follows the County Attorney into the other room. Then Mrs. Hale rises, hands tight together, looking intensely at Mrs. Peters, whose eyes take a slow turn, finally meeting Mrs. Hale's. A moment Mrs. Hale holds her, then her own eyes point the way to where the box is concealed. Suddenly Mrs. Peters throws back quilt pieces and tries to put the box in the bag she is wearing. It is too big. She opens box, starts to take the bird out, cannot touch it, goes to pieces, stands there helpless. Sound of a knob turning in the other room. Mrs. Hale snatches the box and puts it in the pocket of her big coat. Enter County Attorney and Sheriff.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (facetiously). Well, Henry, at least we found out that she was not going to quilt it. She was going to—what is it you call it, ladies?

MRS. HALE (her hand against her pocket). We call it—knot it, Mr. Henderson.

CURTAIN

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. -How would you characterize Mr. Henderson, the county attorney?

2. -In what way or ways are Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale different from each other?

3. -On page 1040, when Mrs. Peters tells of the boy who killed her cat, she says, "If they hadn't held me back, I would have—(catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are heard, falters weakly.)—hurt him." What do you think she was about to say before she faltered? Why do you suppose Glaspell included this speech about Mrs. Peters's girlhood?

4. -We never see Mrs. Wright on stage. Nevertheless, by the end of Trifles we know a great deal about her. Explain both what we know about her—physical characteristics, habits, interests, personality, life before her marriage and after—and how we know these things.

5. -The title of the play is ironic—the "trifles" are important. What other ironies do you find in the play. (On irony, see the Glossary.)

6. -Do you think the play is immoral? Explain.

7. -Assume that the canary has been found, thereby revealing a possible motive, and that Minnie is indicted for murder. You are the defense attorney. In 500 words set forth your defense. (Take any position you wish. For instance, you may want to argue that she committed justifiable homicide or that—on the basis of her behavior as reported by Mr. Hale—she is innocent by reason of insanity.)

8. -Assume that the canary had been found and Minnie Wright convicted. Compose the speech you think she might have delivered before the sentence was given.

The Play on the Stage

9. -Briefly describe the setting, indicating what it "says" and what atmosphere it evokes.

10. -Several times the men "laugh" or "chuckle." In their contexts, what do these expressions of amusement convey?

11. -On page 1044, "the women's eyes meet for an instant." What do you think this bit of action "says"? What do you understand by the exchange of glances?

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

Tennessee Williams (1914–1983) was born Thomas Lanier Williams in Columbus, Mississippi. During his childhood his family moved to St. Louis, where his father had accepted a job as manager of a shoe company. Williams has written that neither he nor his sister Rose could adjust to the change from the South to the Midwest, but the children had already been deeply troubled. Nevertheless, at the age of 16 he achieved some distinction as a writer when his prize-winning essay in a nationwide contest was published. After high school he attended the University of Missouri but flunked ROTC and was therefore withdrawn from school by his father. He worked in a shoe factory for a while, then attended Washington University, where he wrote several plays. He finally graduated from the University of Iowa with a major in playwrighting. After graduation he continued to write, supporting himself with odd jobs such as waiting on tables and running elevators. His first commercial success was The Glass Menagerie (produced in Chicago in 1944, and in New York in 1945); among his other plays are A Streetcar Named Desire (1947), Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955), and Suddenly Last Summer (1958).

LIST OF CHARACTERS

AMANDA WINGFIELD, the mother. A little woman of great but confused vitality clinging frantically to another time and place. Her characterization must be carefully created, not copied from type. She is not paranoiac, but her life is paranoia. There is much to admire in Amanda, and as much to love and pity as there is to laugh at. Certainly she has endurance and a kind of heroism, and though her foolishness makes her unwittingly cruel at times, there is tenderness in her slight person.

LAURA WINGFIELD, her daughter. Amanda, having failed to establish contact with reality, continues to live vitally in her illusions, but Laura's situation is even graver. A childhood illness has left her crippled, one leg slightly shorter than the other, and held in a brace. This defect need not be more than suggested on the stage. Stemming from this, Laura's separation increases till she is like a piece of her own glass collection, too exquisitely fragile to move from the shelf.

TOM WINGFIELD, her son. And the narrator of the play. A poet with a job in a warehouse. His nature is not remorseless, but to escape from a trap he has to act without pity.

JIM O'CONNOR, the gentleman caller. A nice, ordinary, young man.

SCENE. An alley in St. Louis.*

PART I. Preparation for a Gentleman Caller.*

PART II. The Gentleman Calls.*

TIME. Now and the Past.*

Scene I

The Wingfield apartment is in the rear of the building, one of those vast hive-like conglomerations of cellular living-units that flower as warty growths in overcrowded urban centers of lower middle-class population and are symptomatic of the impulse of this largest and fundamentally enslaved section of American society to avoid fluidity and differentiation and to exist and function as one interfused mass of automatism.

The apartment faces an alley and is entered by a fire-escape, a structure whose name is a touch of accidental poetic truth, for all of these huge buildings are always burning with the slow and implacable fires of human desperation. The fire-escape is included in the set—that is, the landing of it and steps descending from it.

The scene is memory and is therefore nonrealistic. Memory takes a lot of poetic license. It omits some details; others are exaggerated, according to the emotional value of the articles it touches, for memory is seated predominantly in the heart. The interior is therefore rather dim and poetic.

At the rise of the curtain, the audience is faced with the dark, grim rear wall of the Wingfield tenement. This building, which runs parallel to the footlights, is flanked on both sides by dark, narrow alleys which run into murky canyons of tangled clotheslines, garbage cans and the sinister latticework of neighboring fire-escapes. It is up and down these side alleys that exterior entrances and exits are made, during the play. At the end of TOM'S opening commentary, the dark tenement wall slowly reveals (by means of a transparency) the interior of the ground floor Wingfield apartment.

Downstage is the living room, which also serves as a sleeping room for LAURA*, the sofa unfolding to make her bed. Upstage, center, and divided by a wide arch or second proscenium with transparent faded portieres (or second curtain), is the dining room. In an old-fashioned what-not in the living room are seen scores of transparent glass animals. A blown-up photograph of the father hangs on the wall of the living room, facing the audience, to the left of the archway. It is the face of a very handsome young man in a doughboy's First World War cap. He is gallantly smiling, ineluctably smiling, as if to say, "I will be smiling forever."*

The audience hears and sees the opening scene in the dining room through both the transparent fourth wall of the building and the transparent gauze portieres of the dining-room arch. It is during this revealing scene that the fourth wall slowly ascends, out of sight.

This transparent exterior wall is not brought down again until the very end of the play, during TOM'S final speech.

The narrator is an undisguised convention of the play. He takes whatever license with dramatic convention as is convenient to his purposes.

TOM enters dressed as a merchant sailor from alley, stage left, and strolls across the front of the stage to the fire-escape. There he stops and lights a cigarette. He addresses the audience.

TOM. Yes, I have tricks in my pocket, I have things up my sleeve. But I am the opposite of a stage magician. He gives you illusion that has the appearance of truth. I give you truth in the pleasant disguise of illusion. To begin with, I turn back time. I reverse it to that quaint period, the thirties, when the huge middle class of America was matriculating in a school for the blind. Their eyes had failed them, or they had failed their eyes, and so they were having their fingers pressed forcibly down on the fiery Braille alphabet of a dissolving economy. In Spain there was revolution. Here there was only shouting and confusion. In Spain there was Guernica. Here there were disturbances of labor, sometimes pretty violent, in otherwise peaceful cities such as Chicago, Cleveland, Saint Louis. . . . This is the social background of the play.

(Music.)

The play is memory. Being a memory play, it is dimly lighted, it is sentimental, it is not realistic.

In memory everything seems to happen to music. That explains the fiddle in the wings. I am the narrator of the play, and also a character in it. The other characters are my mother, Amanda, my sister, Laura, and a gentleman caller who appears in the final scenes. He is the most realistic character in the play, being an emissary from a world of reality that we were somehow set apart from. But since I have a poet's weakness for symbols, I am using this character also as a symbol; he is the long delayed but always expected something that we live for. There is a fifth character in the play who doesn't appear except in this larger-than-life photograph over the mantel. This is our father who left us a long time ago. He was a telephone man who fell in love with long distances; he gave up his job with the telephone company and skipped the light fantastic out of town. . . . The last we heard of him was a picture post-card from Mazatlan, on the Pacific coast of Mexico, containing a message of two words—"Hello—Goodbye!" and no address. I think the rest of the play will explain itself. . . .

AMANDA'S voice becomes audible through the portieres.

(Legend on Screen: "Où Sont les Neiges?")

He divides the portieres and enters the upstage area.

AMANDA and LAURA are seated at a drop-leaf table. Eating is indicated by gestures without food or utensils. AMANDA faces the audience. TOM and LAURA are seated in profile.

The interior has lit up softly and through the scrim we see AMANDA and LAURA seated at the table in the upstage area.

AMANDA (calling). Tom?

TOM. Yes, Mother.

AMANDA. We can't say grace until you come to the table!

TOM. Coming, Mother. (He bows slightly and withdraws, reappearing a few moments later in his place at the table.)

AMANDA (to her son). Honey, don't push with your fingers. If you have to push with something, the thing to push with is a crust of bread. And chew—chew! Animals have sections in their stomachs which enable them to digest food without mastication, but human beings are supposed to chew their food before they swallow it down. Eat food leisurely, son, and really enjoy it. A well-cooked meal has lots of delicate flavors that have to be held in the mouth for appreciation. So chew your food and give your salivary glands a chance to function!

TOM deliberately lays his imaginary fork down and pushes his chair back from the table.

TOM. I haven't enjoyed one bite of this dinner because of your constant directions on how to eat it. It's you that makes me rush through meals with your hawk-like attention to every bite I take. Sickening—spoils my appetite—all this discussion of animals' secretion—salivary glands—mastication!

AMANDA (lightly). Temperament like a Metropolitan star! (He rises and crosses downstage.) You're not excused from the table.

TOM. I am getting a cigarette.

AMANDA. You smoke too much.

LAURA rises.

LAURA. I'll bring in the blanc mange.

He remains standing with his cigarette by the portieres during the following.

AMANDA (rising.) No, sister, no, sister—you be the lady this time and I'll be the darky.

LAURA. I'm already up.

AMANDA. Resume your seat, little sister—I want you to stay fresh and pretty—for gentlemen callers!

LAURA. I'm not expecting any gentlemen callers.

AMANDA (crossing out to kitchenette. Airily). Sometimes they come when they are least expected! Why, I remember one Sunday afternoon in Blue Mountain—(Enters kitchenette.)

TOM. I know what's coming!

LAURA. Yes. But let her tell it.

TOM. Again?

LAURA. She loves to tell it.

AMANDA returns with bowl of dessert.

AMANDA. One Sunday afternoon in Blue Mountain—your mother received—seventeen!—gentlemen callers! Why, sometimes there weren't chairs enough to accommodate them all. We had to send the nigger over to bring in folding chairs from the parish house.

TOM (remaining at portieres). How did you entertain those gentlemen callers?

AMANDA. I understood the art of conversation!

TOM. I bet you could talk.

AMANDA. Girls in those days knew how to talk, I can tell you.

TOM. Yes?

(Image: AMANDA as a Girl on a Porch Greeting Callers.)

AMANDA. They knew how to entertain their gentlemen callers. It wasn't enough for a girl to be possessed of a pretty face and a graceful figure—although I wasn't slighted in either respect. She also needed to have a nimble wit and a tongue to meet all occasions.

TOM. What did you talk about?

AMANDA. Things of importance going on in the world! Never anything coarse or common or vulgar. (She addresses TOM as though he were seated in the vacant chair at the table though he remains by portieres. He plays this scene as though he held the book.) My callers were gentlemen—all! Among my callers were some of the most prominent young planters of the Mississippi Delta—planters and sons of planters!

TOM motions for music and a spot of light on AMANDA.

Her eyes lift, her face glows, her voice becomes rich and elegiac.

(Screen Legend: "Où Sont les Neiges?")

There was young Champ Laughlin who later became vice-president of the Delta Planters Bank. Hadley Stevenson who was drowned in Moon Lake and left his widow one hundred and fifty thousand in Government bonds. There were the Cutrere brothers, Wesley and Bates. Bates was one of my bright particular beaux! He got in a quarrel with that wild Wainright boy. They shot it out on the floor of Moon Lake Casino. Bates was shot through the stomach. Died in the ambulance on his way to Memphis. His widow was also well-provided for, came into eight or ten thousand acres, that's all. She married him on the rebound—never loved her—carried my picture on him the night he died! And there was that boy that every girl in Delta had set her cap for! That beautiful, brilliant young Fitzhugh boy from Green County!

TOM. What did he leave his widow?

AMANDA. He never married! Gracious, you talk as though all of my old admirers had turned up their toes to the daisies!

TOM. Isn't this the first you mentioned that still survives?

AMANDA. That Fitzhugh boy went North and made a fortune—came to be known as the Wolf of Wall Street! He had the Midas touch, whatever he touched turned to gold! And I could have been Mrs. Duncan J. Fitzhugh, mind you! But—I picked your father!

LAURA (rising). Mother, let me clear the table.

AMANDA. No dear, you go in front and study your typewriter chart. Or practice your shorthand a little. Stay fresh and pretty!—It's almost time for our gentlemen callers to start arriving. (She flounces girlishly toward the kitchenette.) How many do you suppose we're going to entertain this afternoon?

TOM throws down the paper and jumps up with a groan.

LAURA (alone in the dining room). I don't believe we're going to receive any, Mother.

AMANDA (reappearing, airily). What? No one—not one? You must be joking! (LAURA nervously echoes her laugh. She slips in a fugitive manner through the half-open portieres and draws them gently behind her. A shaft of very clear light is thrown on her face against the faded tapestry of the curtains.) (Music: "The Glass Menagerie" Under Faintly.) (Lightly.) Not one gentleman caller? It can't be true! There must be a flood, there must have been a tornado!

LAURA. It isn't a flood, it's not a tornado, Mother. I'm just not popular like you were in Blue Mountain. . . . (TOM utters another groan. LAURA glances at him with a faint, apologetic smile. Her voice catching a little.) Mother's afraid I'm going to be an old maid.

(The Scene Dims Out with "Glass Menagerie" Music.)

Scene II

"Laura, Haven't You Ever Liked Some Boy?"

On the dark stage the screen is lighted with the image of blue roses.

LAURA is seated in the delicate ivory chair at the small clawfoot table.

She wears a dress of soft violet material for a kimono—her hair tied back from her forehead with a ribbon.

She is washing and polishing her collection of glass.

AMANDA appears on the fire-escape steps. At the sound of her ascent, LAURA catches her breath, thrusts the bowl of ornaments away and seats herself stiffly before the diagram of the typewriter keyboard as though it held her spellbound. Something has happened to AMANDA. It is written in her face as she climbs to the landing: a look that is grim and hopeless and a little absurd.

She has on one of those cheap or imitation velvety-looking cloth coats with imitation fur collar. Her hat is five or six years old, one of those dreadful cloche hats that were worn in the late twenties, and she is clasping an enormous black patent-leather pocketbook with nickel clasp and initials. This is her full-dress outfit, the one she usually wears to the D.A.R.

Before entering she looks through the door.

She purses her lips, opens her eyes wide, rolls them upward and shakes her head.

Then she slowly lets herself in the door. Seeing her mother's expression LAURA touches her lips with a nervous gesture.

LAURA. Hello, Mother, I was—(She makes a nervous gesture toward the chart on the wall. AMANDA leans against the shut door and stares at LAURA with a martyred look.)

AMANDA. Deception? Deception? (She slowly removes her hat and gloves, continuing the swift suffering stare. She lets the hat and gloves fall on the floor—a bit of acting.)

LAURA (shakily.) How was the D.A.R. meeting? (AMANDA slowly opens her purse and removes a dainty white handkerchief which she shakes out delicately and delicately touches to her lips and nostrils.) Didn't you go to the D.A.R. meeting, Mother?

AMANDA (faintly, almost inaudibly). —No.—No. (Then more forcibly.) I did not have the strength—to go to the D.A.R. In fact, I did not have the courage! I wanted to find a hole in the ground and hide myself in it forever! (She crosses slowly to the wall and removes the diagram of the typewriter keyboard. She holds it in front of her for a second, staring at it sweetly and sorrowfully—then bites her lips and tears it in two pieces.)

LAURA (faintly). Why did you do that, Mother? (AMANDA repeats the same procedure with the chart of the Gregg Alphabet.) Why are you—

AMANDA. Why? Why? How old are you, Laura?

LAURA. Mother, you know my age.

AMANDA. I thought that you were an adult; it seems that I was mistaken. (She crosses slowly to the sofa and sinks down and stares at LAURA.)

LAURA. Please don't stare at me, Mother.

AMANDA closes her eyes and lowers her head. Count ten.

AMANDA. What are we going to do, what is going to become of us, what is the future?

Count ten.

LAURA. Has something happened, Mother? (AMANDA draws a long breath and takes out the handkerchief again. Dabbing process.) Mother, has—something happened?

AMANDA. I'll be all right in a minute. I'm just bewildered—(count five)—by life. . . .

LAURA. Mother, I wish that you would tell me what's happened.

AMANDA. As you know, I was supposed to be inducted into my office at the D.A.R. this afternoon. (Image: A Swarm of Typewriters.) But I stopped off at Rubicam's Business College to speak to your teachers about your having a cold and ask them what progress they thought you were making down there.

LAURA. Oh. . . .

AMANDA. I went to the typing instructor and introduced myself as your mother. She didn't know who you were. Wingfield, she said. We don't have any such student enrolled at the school! I assured her she did, that you had been going to classes since early in January. "I wonder," she said, "if you could be talking about that terribly shy little girl who dropped out of school after only a few days' attendance?" "No," I said, "Laura, my daughter, has been going to school every day for the past six weeks!" "Excuse me," she said. She took the attendance book out and there was your name, unmistakably printed, and all the dates you were absent until they decided that you had dropped out of school. I still said, "No, there must have been some mistake! There must have been some mix-up in the records!" And she said, "No—I remember her perfectly now. Her hand shook so that she couldn't hit the right keys! The first time we gave a speed-test, she broke down completely—was sick at the stomach and almost had to be carried into the wash-room! After that morning she never showed up any more. We phoned the house but never got any answer"—while I was working at Famous and Barr, I suppose, demonstrating those—Oh! I felt so weak I could barely keep on my feet. I had to sit down while they got me a glass of water! Fifty dollars' tuition, all of our plans—my hopes and ambitions for you—just gone up the spout, just gone up the spout like that. (LAURA draws a long breath and gets awkwardly to her feet. She crosses to the victrola and winds it up.) What are you doing?

LAURA. Oh! (She releases the handle and returns to her seat.)

AMANDA. Laura, where have you been going when you've gone out pretending that you were going to business college?

LAURA. I've just been going out walking.

AMANDA. That's not true.

LAURA. It is. I just went walking.

AMANDA. Walking? Walking? In winter? Deliberately courting pneumonia in that light coat? Where did you walk to, Laura?

LAURA. It was the lesser of two evils, Mother. (Image: Winter Scene in Park.) I couldn't go back up. I—threw up—on the floor!

AMANDA. From half past seven till after five every day you mean to tell me you walked around in the park, because you wanted to make me think that you were still going to Rubicam's Business College?

LAURA. It wasn't as bad as it sounds. I went inside places to get warmed up.

AMANDA. Inside where?

LAURA. I went in the art museum and the bird-houses at the Zoo. I visited the penguins every day! Sometimes I did without lunch and went to the movies. Lately I've been spending most of my afternoons in the Jewel-box, that big glass house where they raise the tropical flowers.

AMANDA. You did all this to deceive me, just for the deception? (LAURA looks down.) Why?

LAURA. Mother, when you're disappointed, you get that awful suffering look on your face, like the picture of Jesus' mother in the museum!

AMANDA. Hush!

LAURA. I couldn't face it.

Pause. A whisper of strings.

(Legend: "The Crust of Humility.")

AMANDA (hopelessly fingering the huge pocketbook). So what are we going to do the rest of our lives? Stay home and watch the parades go by? Amuse ourselves with the glass menagerie, darling? Eternally play those worn-out phonograph records your father left as a painful reminder of him? We won't have a business career—we've given that up because it gave us nervous indigestion! (Laughs wearily.) What is there left but dependency all our lives? I know so well what becomes of unmarried women who aren't prepared to occupy a position. I've seen such pitiful cases in the South—barely tolerated spinsters living upon the grudging patronage of sister's husband or brother's wife!—stuck away in some little mousetrap of a room—encouraged by one in-law to visit another—little birdlike women without any nest—eating the crust of humility all their life! Is that the future that we've mapped out for ourselves? I swear it's the only alternative I can think of! It isn't a very pleasant alternative, is it? Of course—some girls do marry. (LAURA twists her hands nervously.) Haven't you ever liked some boy?

LAURA. Yes. I liked one once. (Rises.) I came across his picture a while ago.

AMANDA (with some interest). He gave you his picture?

LAURA. No, it's in the year-book.

AMANDA (disappointed). Oh—a high-school boy.

(Screen Image: JIM as a High-School Hero Bearing a Silver Cup.)

LAURA. Yes. His name was Jim. (LAURA lifts the heavy annual from the clawfoot table.) Here he is in The Pirates of Penzance.

AMANDA (absently). The what?

LAURA. The operetta the senior class put on. He had a wonderful voice and we sat across the aisle from each other Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays in the Aud. Here he is with the silver cup for debating! See his grin?

AMANDA (absently). He must have had a jolly disposition.

LAURA. He used to call me—Blue Roses.

(Image: Blue Roses.)

AMANDA. Why did he call you such a name as that?

LAURA. When I had that attack of pleurosis—he asked me what was the matter when I came back. I said pleurosis—he thought that I said Blue Roses! So that's what he always called me after that. Whenever he saw me, he'd holler, "Hello, Blue Roses!" I didn't care for the girl that he went out with. Emily Meisenbach. Emily was the best-dressed girl at Soldan. She never struck me, though, as being sincere. . . . It says in the Personal Section—they're engaged. That's—six years ago! They must be married by now.

AMANDA. Girls that aren't cut out for business careers usually wind up married to some nice man. (Gets up with a spark of revival.) Sister, that's what you'll do!

LAURA utters a startled, doubtful laugh. She reaches quickly for a piece of glass.

LAURA. But, Mother—

AMANDA. Yes? (Crossing to photograph.)

LAURA (in a tone of frightened apology). I'm—crippled!

(Image: Screen.)

AMANDA. Nonsense! Laura, I've told you never, never to use that word. Why, you're not crippled, you just have a little defect—hardly noticeable, even! When people have some slight disadvantage like that, they cultivate other things to make up for it—develop charm—and vivacity—and—charm! That's all you have to do! (She turns again to the photograph.) One thing your father had plenty of—was charm!

TOM motions to the fiddle in the wings.

(The Scene Fades Out with Music.)

Scene III

(Legend on the Screen: "After the Fiasco—")

TOM speaks from the fire-escape landing.

TOM. After the fiasco at Rubicam's Business College, the idea of getting a gentleman caller for Laura began to play a more important part in Mother's calculations. It became an obsession. Like some archetype of the universal unconscious, the image of the gentleman caller haunted our small apartment. . . . (Image: Young Man at Door with Flowers.) An evening at home rarely passed without some allusion to this image, this specter, this hope. . . . Even when he wasn't mentioned, his presence hung in Mother's preoccupied look and in my sister's frightened, apologetic manner—hung like a sentence passed upon the Wingfields! Mother was a woman of action as well as words. She began to take logical steps in the planned direction. Late that winter and in the early spring—realizing that extra money would be needed to properly feather the nest and plume the bird—she conducted a vigorous campaign on the telephone, roping in subscribers to one of those magazines for matrons called The Home-maker's Companion, the type of journal that features the serialized sublimations of ladies of letters who think in terms of delicate cuplike breasts, slim, tapering waists, rich, creamy thighs, eyes like wood-smoke in autumn, fingers that soothe and caress like strains of music, bodies as powerful as Etruscan sculpture.

(Screen Image: Glamor Magazine Cover.)

AMANDA enters with phone on long extension cord. She is spotted in the dim stage.

AMANDA. Ida Scott? This is Amanda Wingfield! We missed you at the D.A.R. last Monday! I said to myself: She's probably suffering with that sinus condition! How is that sinus condition? Horrors! Heaven have mercy!—You're a Christian martyr, yes, that's what you are, a Christian martyr! Well, I just now happened to notice that your subscription to the Companion's about to expire! Yes, it expires with the next issue, honey!—just when that wonderful new serial by Bessie Mae Hopper is getting off to such an exciting start. Oh, honey, it's something that you can't miss! You remember how Gone With the Wind took everybody by storm? You simply couldn't go out if you hadn't read it. All everybody talked was Scarlett O'Hara. Well, this is a book that critics already compare to Gone With the Wind. It's the Gone With the Wind of the post–World War generation!—What?—Burning?—Oh, honey, don't let them burn, go take a look in the oven and I'll hold the wire! Heavens—I think she's hung up!

(Dim Out.)

(Legend on Screen: "You Think I'm in Love with Continental Shoemakers?")

Before the stage is lighted, the violent voices of TOM and AMANDA are heard. They are quarreling behind the portieres. In front of them stands LAURA with clenched hands and panicky expression.

A clear pool of light on her figure throughout this scene.

TOM. What in Christ's name am I—

AMANDA (shrilly). Don't you use that—

TOM. Supposed to do!

AMANDA. Expression! Not in my—

TOM. Ohhh!

AMANDA. Presence! Have you gone out of your senses?

TOM. I have, that's true, driven out!

AMANDA. What is the matter with you, you—big—big—IDIOT!

TOM. Look—I've got no thing, no single thing—

AMANDA. Lower your voice!

TOM. In my life here that I can call my OWN! Everything is—

AMANDA. Stop that shouting!

TOM. Yesterday you confiscated my books! You had the nerve to—

AMANDA. I took that horrible novel back to the library—yes! That hideous book by that insane Mr. Lawrence. (TOM laughs wildly.) I cannot control the output of diseased minds or people who cater to them—(TOM laughs still more wildly.) BUT I WON'T ALLOW SUCH FILTH BROUGHT INTO MY HOUSE! No, no, no, no, no!

TOM. House, house! Who pays rent on it, who makes a slave of himself to—

AMANDA (fairly screeching). Don't you DARE to—

TOM. No, no, I musn't say things! I've got to just—

AMANDA. Let me tell you—

TOM. I don't want to hear any more! (He tears the portieres open. The upstage area is lit with a turgid smoky red glow.)

AMANDA's hair is in metal curlers and she wears a very old bathrobe, much too large for her slight figure, a relic of the faithless MR. WINGFIELD.

An upright typewriter and a wild disarray of manuscripts are on the dropleaf table. The quarrel was probably precipitated by AMANDA'S interruption of his creative labor. A chair lying overthrown on the floor.

Their gesticulating shadows are cast on the ceiling by the fiery glow.

AMANDA. You will hear more, you—

TOM. No, I won't hear more, I'm going out!

AMANDA. You come right back in—

TOM. Out, out, out! Because I'm—

AMANDA. Come back here, Tom Wingfield! I'm not through talking to you!

TOM. Oh, go—

LAURA (desperately). Tom!

AMANDA. You're going to listen, and no more insolence from you! I'm at the end of my patience! (He comes back toward her.)

TOM. What do you think I'm at? Aren't I supposed to have any patience to reach the end of, Mother? I know, I know. It seems unimportant to you, what I'm doing—what I want to do—having a little difference between them! You don't think that—

AMANDA. I think you've been doing things that you're ashamed of. That's why you act like this. I don't believe that you go every night to the movies. Nobody goes to the movies night after night. Nobody in their right minds goes to the movies as often as you pretend to. People don't go to the movies at nearly midnight, and movies don't let out at two A.M. Come in stumbling. Muttering to yourself like a maniac! You get three hours' sleep and then go to work. Oh, I can picture the way you're doing down there. Moping, doping, because you're in no condition.

TOM (wildly). No, I'm in no condition!

AMANDA. What right have you got to jeopardize your job? Jeopardize the security of us all? How do you think we'd manage if you were—

TOM. Listen! You think I'm crazy about the warehouse? (He bends fiercely toward her slight figure.) You think I'm in love with the Continental Shoemakers? You think I want to spend fifty-five years down there in that—celotex interior! with—fluorescent—tubes! Look! I'd rather somebody picked up a crowbar and battered out my brains—than go back mornings! I go! Every time you come in yelling that God damn "Rise and Shine!" "Rise and Shine!" I say to myself "How lucky dead people are!" But I get up. I go! For sixty-five dollars a month I give up all that I dream of doing and being ever! And you say self—self's all I ever think of. Why, listen, if self is what I thought of, Mother, I'd be where he is—GONE! (Pointing to father's picture.) As far as the system of transportation reaches! (He starts past her. She grabs his arm.) Don't grab at me, Mother!

AMANDA. Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going to the movies!

AMANDA. I don't believe that lie!

TOM (crouching toward her, overtowering her tiny figure. She backs away, gasping). I'm going to opium dens! Yes, opium dens, dens of vice and criminals' hang-outs, Mother. I've joined the Hogan gang, I'm a hired assassin, I carry a tommy-gun in a violin case! I run a string of cat-houses in the Valley! They call me Killer, Killer Wingfield, I'm leading a double-life, a simple, honest warehouse worker by day, by night a dynamic czar of the underworld, Mother. I go to gambling casinos, I spin away fortunes on the roulette table! I wear a patch over one eye and a false mustache, sometimes I put on green whiskers. On those occasions they call me—El Diablo! Oh, I could tell you things to make you sleepless! My enemies plan to dynamite this place. They're going to blow us all sky-high some night! I'll be glad, very happy, and so will you! You'll go up, up on a broomstick, over Blue Mountain with seventeen gentlemen callers! You ugly—babbling old—witch. . . . (He goes through a series of violent, clumsy movements, seizing his overcoat, lunging to the door, pulling it fiercely open. The women watch him, aghast. His arm catches in the sleeve of the coat as he struggles to pull it on. For a moment he is pinioned by the bulky garment. With an outraged groan he tears the coat off again, splitting the shoulders of it, and hurls it across the room. It strikes against the shelf of Laura's glass collection, there is a tinkle of shattering glass. LAURA cries out as if wounded.)

(Music Legend: "The Glass Menagerie.")

LAURA (shrilly). My glass!—menagerie. . . . (She covers her face and turns away.)

But AMANDA is still stunned and stupefied by the "ugly witch" so that she barely notices this occurrence. Now she recovers her speech.

AMANDA (in an awful voice). I won't speak to you—until you apologize! (She crosses through portieres and draws them together behind her. TOM is left with LAURA. LAURA clings weakly to the mantel with her face averted. TOM stares at her stupidly for a moment. Then he crosses to shelf. Drops awkwardly to his knees to collect the fallen glass, glancing at LAURA as if he would speak but couldn't.)

"The Glass Menagerie" steals in as

(The Scene Dims Out.)

Scene IV

The interior is dark. Faint light in the alley.

A deep-voiced bell in a church is tolling the hour of five as the scene commences.

TOM appears at the top of the alley. After each solemn boom of the bell in the tower, he shakes a little noise-maker or rattle as if to express the tiny spasm of man in contrast to the sustained power and dignity of the Almighty. This and the unsteadiness of his advance make it evident that he has been drinking.

As he climbs the few steps to the fire-escape landing light steals up inside. LAURA appears in night-dress, observing TOM'S empty bed in the front room.

TOM fishes in his pockets for the door-key, removing a motley assortment of articles in the search, including a perfect shower of movie-ticket stubs and an empty bottle. At last he finds the key, but just as he is about to insert it, it slips from his fingers. He strikes a match and crouches below the door.

TOM (bitterly). One crack—and it falls through!

LAURA opens the door.

LAURA. Tom! Tom, what are you doing?

TOM. Looking for a door-key.

LAURA. Where have you been all this time?

TOM. I have been to the movies.

LAURA. All this time at the movies?

TOM. There was a very long program. There was a Garbo picture and a Mickey Mouse and a travelogue and a newsreel and a preview of coming attractions. And there was an organ solo and a collection for the milk-fund—simultaneously—which ended up in a terrible fight between a fat lady and an usher!

LAURA (innocently). Did you have to stay through everything?

TOM. Of course! And, oh, I forgot! There was a big stage show! The headliner on this stage show was Malvolio the Magician. He performed wonderful tricks, many of them, such as pouring water back and forth between pitchers. First it turned to wine and then it turned to beer and then it turned to whiskey. I know it was whiskey it finally turned into because he needed somebody to come up out of the audience to help him, and I came up—both shows! It was Kentucky Straight Bourbon. A very generous fellow, he gave souvenirs. (He pulls from his back pocket a shimmering rainbow-colored scarf.) He gave me this. This is his magic scarf. You can have it, Laura. You wave it over a canary cage and you get a bowl of gold-fish. You wave it over the gold-fish bowl and they fly away canaries. . . . But the wonderfullest trick of all was the coffin trick. We nailed him into a coffin and he got out of the coffin without removing one nail. (He has come inside.) There is a trick that would come in handy for me—get me out of this 2 by 4 situation! (Flops onto bed and starts removing shoes.)

LAURA. Tom—Shhh!

TOM. What you shushing me for?

LAURA. You'll wake up Mother.

TOM. Goody, goody! Pay 'er back for all those "Rise an' Shines." (Lies down, groaning.) You know it don't take much intelligence to get yourself into a nailed-up coffin, Laura. But who in hell ever got himself out of one without removing one nail?

As if in answer, the father's grinning photograph lights up.

(Scene Dims Out.)

Immediately following: The church bell is heard striking six. At the sixth stroke the alarm clock goes off in AMANDA'S room, and after a few moments we hear her calling: "Rise and Shine! Rise and Shine! LAURA, go tell your brother to rise and shine!"

TOM (sitting up slowly). I'll rise—but I won't shine.

The light increases.

AMANDA. Laura, tell your brother his coffee is ready.

LAURA slips into front room.

LAURA. Tom! It's nearly seven. Don't make Mother nervous. (He stares at her stupidly. Beseechingly.) Tom, speak to Mother this morning. Make up with her, apologize, speak to her!

TOM. She won't to me. It's her that started not speaking.

LAURA. If you just say you're sorry she'll start speaking.

TOM. Her not speaking—is that such a tragedy?

LAURA. Please—please!

AMANDA (calling from kitchenette). Laura, are you going to do what I asked you to do, or do I have to get dressed and go out myself?

LAURA. Going, going—soon as I get on my coat! (She pulls on a shapeless felt hat with nervous, jerky movement, pleadingly glancing at TOM. Rushes awkwardly for coat. The coat is one of AMANDA'S, inaccurately made-over, the sleeves too short for LAURA.) Butter and what else?

AMANDA (entering upstage). Just butter. Tell them to charge it.

LAURA. Mother, they make such faces when I do that.

AMANDA. Sticks and stones may break my bones, but the expression on Mr. Garfinkel's face won't harm us! Tell your brother his coffee is getting cold.

LAURA (at door). Do what I asked you, will you, will you, Tom?

He looks sullenly away.

AMANDA. Laura, go now or just don't go at all!

LAURA (rushing out). Going—going! (A second later she cries out. TOM springs up and crosses to the door. AMANDA rushes anxiously in. TOM opens the door.)

TOM. Laura?

LAURA. I'm all right. I slipped, but I'm all right.

AMANDA (peering anxiously after her). If anyone breaks a leg on those fire-escape steps, the landlord ought to be sued for every cent he possesses! (She shuts door. Remembers she isn't speaking and returns to other room.)

As TOM enters listlessly for his coffee, she turns her back to him and stands rigidly facing the window on the gloomy gray vault of the areaway. Its light on her face with its aged but childish features is cruelly sharp, satirical as a Daumier print.

(Music Under: "Ave Maria.")

TOM glances sheepishly but sullenly at her averted figure and slumps at the table. The coffee is scalding hot; he sips it and gasps and spits it back in the cup. At his gasp, AMANDA catches her breath and half turns. Then catches herself and turns back to window.

TOM blows on his coffee, glancing sidewise at his mother. She clears her throat. TOM clears his. He starts to rise. Sinks back down again, scratches his head, clears his throat again. AMANDA coughs. TOM raises his cup in both hands to blow on it, his eyes staring over the rim of it at his mother for several moments. Then he slowly sets the cup down and awkwardly and hesitantly rises from the chair.

TOM (hoarsely). Mother. I—I apologize. Mother. (AMANDA draws a quick, shuddering breath. Her face works grotesquely. She breaks into childlike tears.) I'm sorry for what I said, for everything that I said, I didn't mean it.

AMANDA (sobbingly). My devotion has made me a witch and so I make myself hateful to my children!

TOM. No you don't.

AMANDA. I worry so much, don't sleep, it makes me nervous!

TOM (gently). I understand that.

AMANDA. I've had to put up a solitary battle all these years. But you're my right-hand bower! Don't fall down, don't fail!

TOM (gently). I try, Mother.

AMANDA (with great enthusiasm). Try and you will SUCCEED! (The notion makes her breathless.) Why, you—you're just full of natural endowments! Both of my children—they're unusual children! Don't you think I know it? I'm so—proud! Happy and—feel I've—so much to be thankful for but—Promise me one thing, son!

TOM. What, Mother?

AMANDA. Promise, son, you'll—never be a drunkard!

TOM (turns to her grinning). I will never be a drunkard, Mother.

AMANDA. That's what frightened me so, that you'd be drinking! Eat a bowl of Purina!

TOM. Just coffee, Mother.

AMANDA. Shredded wheat biscuit?

TOM. No. No, Mother, just coffee.

AMANDA. You can't put in a day's work on an empty stomach. You've got ten minutes—don't gulp! Drinking too-hot liquids makes cancer of the stomach. . . . Put cream in.

TOM. No, thank you.

AMANDA. To cool it.

TOM. No! No, thank you, I want it black.

AMANDA. I know, but it's not good for you. We have to do all that we can to build ourselves up. In these trying times we live in, all that we have to cling to is—each other. . . . That's why it's so important to—Tom, I—I sent out your sister so I could discuss something with you. If you hadn't spoken I would have spoken to you. (Sits down.)

TOM (gently). What is it, Mother, that you want to discuss?

AMANDA. Laura!

TOM puts his cup down slowly.

(Legend on Screen: "LAURA.")

(Music: "The Glass Menagerie.")

TOM. —Oh.—Laura . . .

AMANDA (touching his sleeve). You know how Laura is. So quiet but—still water runs deep! She notices things and I think she—broods about them. (TOM looks up.) A few days ago I came in and she was crying.

TOM. What about?

AMANDA. You.

TOM. Me?

AMANDA. She has an idea that you're not happy here.

TOM. What gave her that idea?

AMANDA. What gives her any idea? However, you do act strangely. I—I'm not criticizing, understand that! I know your ambitions do not lie in the warehouse, that like everybody in the whole wide world—you've had to—make sacrifices, but—Tom—Tom—life's not easy, it calls for—Spartan endurance! There's so many things in my heart that I cannot describe to you! I've never told you but I—loved your father. . . .

TOM (gently). I know that, Mother.

AMANDA. And you—when I see you taking after his ways! Staying out late—and—well, you had been drinking the night you were in that—terrifying condition! Laura says that you hate the apartment and that you go out nights to get away from it! Is that true, Tom?

TOM. No. You say there's so much in your heart that you can't describe to me. That's true of me, too. There's so much in my heart that I can't describe to you! So let's respect each other's—

AMANDA. But, why—why, Tom—are you always so restless? Where do you go to, nights?

TOM. I—go to the movies.

AMANDA. Why do you go to the movies so much, Tom?

TOM. I go to the movies because—I like adventure. Adventure is something I don't have much of at work, so I go to the movies.

AMANDA. But, Tom, you go to the movies entirely too much!

TOM. I like a lot of adventure.

AMANDA looks baffled, then hurt. As the familiar inquisition resumes he becomes hard and impatient again. AMANDA slips back into her querulous attitude toward him.

(Image on Screen: Sailing Vessel with Jolly Roger.)

AMANDA. Most young men find adventure in their careers.

TOM. Then most young men are not employed in a warehouse.

AMANDA. The world is full of young men employed in warehouses and offices and factories.

TOM. Do all of them find adventure in their careers?

AMANDA. They do or they do without it! Not everybody has a craze for adventure.

TOM. Man is by instinct a lover, a hunter, a fighter, and none of those instincts are given much play at the warehouse!

AMANDA. Man is by instinct! Don't quote instinct to me! Instinct is something that people have got away from! It belongs to animals! Christian adults don't want it!

TOM. What do Christian adults want, then, Mother?

AMANDA. Superior things! Things of the mind and the spirit! Only animals have to satisfy instincts! Surely your aims are somewhat higher than theirs! Than monkeys—pigs—

TOM. I reckon they're not.

AMANDA. You're joking. However, that isn't what I wanted to discuss.

TOM (rising). I haven't much time.

AMANDA (pushing his shoulders). Sit down.

TOM. You want me to punch in red at the warehouse, Mother?

AMANDA. You have five minutes. I want to talk about Laura.

(Legend: "Plans and Provisions.")

TOM. All right! What about Laura?

AMANDA. We have to be making plans and provisions for her. She's older than you, two years, and nothing has happened. She just drifts along doing nothing. It frightens me terribly how she just drifts along.

TOM. I guess she's the type that people call home girls.

AMANDA. There's no such type, and if there is, it's a pity! That is unless the home is hers, with a husband!

TOM. What?

AMANDA. Oh, I can see the handwriting on the wall as plain as I see the nose in the front of my face! It's terrifying! More and more you remind me of your father! He was out all hours without explanation—Then left! Goodbye! And me with the bag to hold. I saw that letter you got from the Merchant Marine. I know what you're dreaming of. I'm not standing here blindfolded. Very well, then. Then do it! But not till there's somebody to take your place.

TOM. What do you mean?

AMANDA. I mean that as soon as Laura has got somebody to take care of her, married, a home of her own, independent—why, then you'll be free to go wherever you please, on land, on sea, whichever way the wind blows! But until that time you've got to look out for your sister. I don't say me because I'm old and don't matter! I say for your sister because she's young and dependent. I put her in business college—a dismal failure! Frightened her so it made her sick to her stomach. I took her over to the Young People's League at the church. Another fiasco. She spoke to nobody, nobody spoke to her. Now all she does is fool with those pieces of glass and play those worn-out records. What kind of a life is that for a girl to lead!

TOM. What can I do about it?

AMANDA. Overcome selfishness! Self, self, self is all that you ever think of! (TOM springs up and crosses to get his coat. It is ugly and bulky. He pulls on a cap with earmuffs.) Where is your muffler? Put your wool muffler on! (He snatches it angrily from the closet and tosses it around his neck and pulls both ends tight.) Tom! I haven't said what I had in mind to ask you.

TOM. I'm too late to—

AMANDA (catching his arms—very importunately. Then shyly). Down at the warehouse, aren't there some—nice young men?

TOM. No!

AMANDA. There must be—some.

TOM. Mother—

Gesture.

AMANDA. Find out one that's clean-living—doesn't drink and—ask him out for sister!

TOM. What?

AMANDA. For sister! To meet! Get acquainted!

TOM (stamping to door). Oh, my go-osh!

AMANDA. Will you? (He opens door. Imploringly.) Will you? (He starts down.) Will you? Will you dear?

TOM (calling back). YES!

AMANDA closes the door hesitantly and with a troubled but faintly hopeful expression.

(Screen Image: Glamor Magazine Cover.)

Spot AMANDA at phone.

AMANDA. Ella Cartwright? This is Amanda Wingfield! How are you honey? How is that kidney condition? (Count five.) Horrors! (Count five.) You're a Christian martyr, yes, honey, that's what you are, a Christian martyr! Well, I just happened to notice in my little red book that your subscription to the Companion has just run out! I knew that you wouldn't want to miss out on the wonderful serial starting in this new issue. It's by Bessie Mae Hopper, the first thing she's written since Honeymoon for Three. Wasn't that a strange and interesting story? Well, this one is even lovelier, I believe. It has a sophisticated society background. It's all about the horsey set on Long Island!

(Fade Out.)

Scene V

(Legend on Screen: "Annunciation.") Fade with music.

It is early dusk of a spring evening. Supper has just been finished at the Wingfield apartment. AMANDA and LAURA in light-colored dresses are removing dishes from the table, in the upstage area, which is shadowy, their movements formalized almost as a dance or ritual, their moving forms as pale and silent as moths.

TOM, in white shirt and trousers, rises from the table and crosses toward the fire-escape.

AMANDA (as he passes her). Son, will you do me a favor?

TOM. What?

AMANDA. Comb your hair! You look so pretty when your hair is combed! (TOM slouches on sofa with evening paper. Enormous caption "Franco Triumphs.") There is only one respect in which I would like you to emulate your father.

TOM. What respect is that?

AMANDA. The care he always took of his appearance. He never allowed himself to look untidy. (He throws down the paper and crosses to fire-escape.) Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going out to smoke.

AMANDA. You smoke too much. A pack a day at fifteen cents a pack. How much would that amount to in a month? Thirty times fifteen is how much, Tom? Figure it out and you will be astounded at what you could save. Enough to give you a night-school course in accounting at Washington U! Just think what a wonderful thing that would be for you, son!

TOM is unmoved by the thought.

TOM. I'd rather smoke. (He steps out on landing, letting the screen door slam.)

AMANDA (sharply). I know! That's the tragedy of it. . . . (Alone, she turns to look at her husband's picture.)

(Dance Music: "All the World Is Waiting for the Sunrise!")

TOM (to the audience). Across the alley from us was the Paradise Dance Hall. On evenings in spring the windows and doors were open and the music came outdoors. Sometimes the lights were turned out except for a large glass sphere that hung from the ceiling. It would turn slowly about and filter the dusk with delicate rainbow colors. Then the orchestra played a waltz or a tango, something that had a slow and sensuous rhythm. Couples would come outside, to the relative privacy of the alley. You could see them kissing behind ashpits and telephone poles. This was the compensation for lives that passed like mine, without any change or adventure. Adventure and change were imminent in this year. They were waiting around the corner for all these kids. Suspended in the mist over Berchtesgaden, caught in the folds of Chamberlain's umbrella—In Spain there was Guernica! But here there was only hot swing music and liquor, dance halls, bars, and movies, and sex that hung in the gloom like a chandelier and flooded the world with brief, deceptive rainbows. . . . All the world was waiting for bombardments!

AMANDA turns from the picture and comes outside.

AMANDA (sighing). A fire-escape landing's a poor excuse for a porch. (She spreads a newspaper on a step and sits down, gracefully and demurely as if she were settling into a swing on a Mississippi veranda.) What are you looking at?

TOM. The moon.

AMANDA. Is there a moon this evening?

TOM. It's rising over Garfinkel's Delicatessen.

AMANDA. So it is! A little silver slipper of a moon. Have you made a wish on it yet?

TOM. Um-hum.

AMANDA. What did you wish for?

TOM. That's a secret.

AMANDA. A secret, huh? Well, I won't tell mine either. I will be just as mysterious as you.

TOM. I bet I can guess what yours is.

AMANDA. Is my head so transparent?

TOM. You're not a sphinx.

AMANDA. No, I don't have secrets. I'll tell you what I wished for on the moon. Success and happiness for my precious children! I wish for that whenever there's a moon, and when there isn't a moon, I wish for it, too.

TOM. I thought perhaps you wished for a gentleman caller.

AMANDA. Why do you say that?

TOM. Don't you remember asking me to fetch one?

AMANDA. I remember suggesting that it would be nice for your sister if you brought some nice young man from the warehouse. I think I've made that suggestion more than once.

TOM. Yes, you have made it repeatedly.

AMANDA. Well?

TOM. We are going to have one.

AMANDA. What?

TOM. A gentleman caller!

(The Annunciation Is Celebrated with Music.)

AMANDA rises.

(Image on Screen: Caller with Bouquet.)

AMANDA. You mean you have asked some nice young man to come over?

TOM. Yep. I've asked him to dinner.

AMANDA. You really did?

TOM. I did!

AMANDA. You did, and did he—accept?

TOM. He did!

AMANDA. Well, well—well, well! That's—lovely!

TOM. I thought that you would be pleased.

AMANDA. It's definite, then?

TOM. Very definite.

AMANDA. Soon?

TOM. Very soon.

AMANDA. For heaven's sake, stop putting on and tell me some things, will you?

TOM. What things do you want me to tell you?

AMANDA. Naturally I would like to know when he's coming!

TOM. He's coming tomorrow.

AMANDA. Tomorrow?

TOM. Yep. Tomorrow.

AMANDA. But, Tom!

TOM. Yes, Mother?

AMANDA. Tomorrow gives me no time!

TOM. Time for what?

AMANDA. Preparations! Why didn't you phone me at once, as soon as you asked him, the minute that he accepted? Then, don't you see, I could have been getting ready!

TOM. You don't have to make any fuss.

AMANDA. Oh, Tom, Tom, Tom, of course I have to make a fuss! I want things nice, not sloppy! Not thrown together. I'll certainly have to do some fast thinking, won't I?

TOM. I don't see why you have to think at all.

AMANDA. You just don't know. We can't have a gentleman caller in a pigsty! All my wedding silver has to be polished, the monogrammed table linen ought to be laundered! The windows have to be washed and fresh curtains put up. And how about clothes? We have to wear something, don't we?

TOM. Mother, this boy is no one to make a fuss over!

AMANDA. Do you realize he's the first young man we've introduced to your sister? It's terrible, dreadful, disgraceful that poor little sister has never received a single gentleman caller! Tom, come inside! (She opens the screen door.)

TOM. What for?

AMANDA. I want to ask you some things.

TOM. If you're going to make such a fuss, I'll call it off, I'll tell him not to come.

AMANDA. You certainly won't do anything of the kind. Nothing offends people worse than broken engagements. It simply means I'll have to work like a Turk! We won't be brilliant, but we'll pass inspection. Come on inside. (TOM follows, groaning.) Sit down.

TOM. Any particular place you would like me to sit?

AMANDA. Thank heavens I've got that new sofa! I'm also making payments on a floor lamp I'll have sent out! And put the chintz covers on, they'll brighten things up! Of course I'd hoped to have these walls repapered. . . . What is the young man's name?

TOM. His name is O'Connor.

AMANDA. That, of course, means fish—tomorrow is Friday! I'll have that salmon loaf—with Durkee's dressing! What does he do? He works at the warehouse?

TOM. Of course! How else would I—

AMANDA. Tom, he—doesn't drink?

TOM. Why do you ask me that?

AMANDA. Your father did!

TOM. Don't get started on that!

AMANDA. He does drink, then?

TOM. Not that I know of!

AMANDA. Make sure, be certain! The last thing I want for my daughter's a boy who drinks!

TOM. Aren't you being a little premature? Mr. O'Connor has not yet appeared on the scene!

AMANDA. But will tomorrow. To meet your sister, and what do I know about his character? Nothing! Old maids are better off than wives of drunkards!

TOM. Oh, my God!

AMANDA. Be still!

TOM (leaning forward to whisper). Lots of fellows meet girls whom they don't marry!

AMANDA. Oh, talk sensibly, Tom—and don't be sarcastic! (She has gotten a hairbrush.)

TOM. What are you doing?

AMANDA. I'm brushing that cow-lick down! What is this young man's position at the warehouse?

TOM (submitting grimly to the brush and the interrogation). This young man's position is that of a shipping clerk, Mother.

AMANDA. Sounds to me like a fairly responsible job, the sort of a job you would be in if you just had more get-up. What is his salary? Have you got any idea?

TOM. I would judge it to be approximately eighty-five dollars a month.

AMANDA. Well—not princely, but—

TOM. Twenty more than I make.

AMANDA. Yes, how well I know! But for a family man, eighty-five dollars a month is not much more than you can just get by on. . . .

TOM. Yes, but Mr. O'Connor is not a family man.

AMANDA. He might be, mightn't he? Some time in the future?

TOM. I see. Plans and provisions.

AMANDA. You are the only man that I know of who ignores the fact that the future becomes the present, the present the past, and the past turns into everlasting regret if you don't plan for it!

TOM. I will think that over and see what I can make of it.

AMANDA. Don't be supercilious with your mother! Tell me some more about this—what do you call him?

TOM. James D. O'Connor. The D. is for Delaney.

AMANDA. Irish on both sides! Gracious! And doesn't drink?

TOM. Shall I call him up and ask him right this minute?

AMANDA. The only way to find out about those things is to make discreet inquiries at the proper moment. When I was a girl in Blue Mountain and it was suspected that a young man drank, the girl whose attentions he had been receiving, if any girl was, would sometimes speak to the minister of his church, or rather her father would if her father was living, and sort of feel him out on the young man's character. That is the way such things are discreetly handled to keep a young woman from making a tragic mistake!

TOM. Then how did you happen to make a tragic mistake?

AMANDA. That innocent look of your father's had everyone fooled! He smiled—the world was enchanted! No girl can do worse than put herself at the mercy of a handsome appearance! I hope that Mr. O'Connor is not too good-looking.

TOM. No, he's not too good-looking. He's covered with freckles and hasn't too much of a nose.

AMANDA. He's not right-down homely, though?

TOM. Not right-down homely. Just medium homely, I'd say.

AMANDA. Character's what to look for in a man.

TOM. That's what I've always said, Mother.

AMANDA. You've never said anything of the kind and I suspect you would never give it a thought.

TOM. Don't be suspicious of me.

AMANDA. At least I hope he's the type that's up and coming.

TOM. I think he really goes in for self-improvement.

AMANDA. What reason have you to think so?

TOM. He goes to night school.

AMANDA (beaming). Splendid! What does he do, I mean study?

TOM. Radio engineering and public speaking!

AMANDA. Then he has visions of being advanced in the world! Any young man who studies public speaking is aiming to have an executive job some day! And radio engineering? A thing for the future! Both of these facts are very illuminating. Those are the sort of things that a mother should know concerning any young man who comes to call on her daughter. Seriously or—not.

TOM. One little warning. He doesn't know about Laura. I didn't let on that we had dark ulterior motives. I just said, why don't you come have dinner with us? He said okay and that was the whole conversation.

AMANDA. I bet it was! You're eloquent as an oyster. However, he'll know about Laura when he gets here. When he sees how lovely and sweet and pretty she is, he'll thank his lucky stars he was asked to dinner.

TOM. Mother, you mustn't expect too much of Laura.

AMANDA. What do you mean?

TOM. Laura seems all those things to you and me because she's ours and we love her. We don't even notice she's crippled any more.

AMANDA. Don't say crippled! You know that I never allow that word to be used!

TOM. But face facts, Mother. She is and—that's not all—

AMANDA. What do you mean "not all"?

TOM. Laura is very different from other girls.

AMANDA. I think the difference is all to her advantage.

TOM. Not quite all—in the eyes of others—strangers—she's terribly shy and lives in a world of her own and those things make her seem a little peculiar to people outside the house.

AMANDA. Don't say peculiar.

TOM. Face the facts. She is.

(The Dance-Hall Music Changes to a Tango that Has a Minor and Somewhat Ominous Tone.)

AMANDA. In what way is she peculiar—may I ask?

TOM (gently). She lives in a world of her own—a world of—little glass ornaments, Mother. . . . (Gets up. AMANDA remains holding brush, looking at him, troubled.) She plays old phonograph records and—that's about all—(He glances at himself in the mirror and crosses to door.)

AMANDA (sharply). Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going to the movies. (Out screen door.)

AMANDA. Not to the movies, every night to the movies! (Follows quickly to screen door.) I don't believe you always go to the movies! (He is gone. AMANDA looks worriedly after him for a moment. Then vitality and optimism return and she turns from the door. Crossing to portieres.) Laura! Laura! (LAURA answers from kitchenette.)

LAURA. Yes, Mother.

AMANDA. Let those dishes go and come in front! (LAURA appears with dish towel. Gaily.) Laura, come here and make a wish on the moon!

LAURA (entering). Moon—moon?

AMANDA. A little silver slipper of a moon. Look over your left shoulder, Laura, and make a wish! (LAURA looks faintly puzzled as if called out of sleep. AMANDA seizes her shoulders and turns her at an angle by the door.) Now! Now, darling, wish!

LAURA. What shall I wish for, Mother?

AMANDA (her voice trembling and her eyes suddenly filling with tears). Happiness! Good Fortune!

The violin rises and the stage dims out.

Scene VI

(Image: High School Hero.)

TOM. And so the following evening I brought Jim home to dinner. I had known Jim slightly in high school. In high school Jim was a hero. He had tremendous Irish good nature and vitality with the scrubbed and polished look of white chinaware. He seemed to move in a continual spotlight. He was a star in basketball, captain of the debating club, president of the senior class and the glee club and he sang the male lead in the annual light operas. He was always running or bounding, never just walking. He seemed always at the point of defeating the law of gravity. He was shooting with such velocity through his adolescence that you would logically expect him to arrive at nothing short of the White House by the time he was thirty. But Jim apparently ran into more interference after his graduation from Soldan. His speed had definitely slowed. Six years after he left high school he was holding a job that wasn't much better than mine.

(Image: Clerk.)

He was the only one at the warehouse with whom I was on friendly terms. I was valuable to him as someone who could remember his former glory, who had seen him win basketball games and the silver cup in debating. He knew of my secret practice of retiring to a cabinet of the washroom to work on poems when business was slack in the warehouse. He called me Shakespeare. And while the other boys in the warehouse regarded me with suspicious hostility, Jim took a humorous attitude toward me. Gradually his attitude affected the others, their hostility wore off and they also began to smile at me as people smile at an oddly fashioned dog who trots across their path at some distance.

I knew that Jim and Laura had known each other at Soldan, and I had heard Laura speak admiringly of his voice. I didn't know if Jim remembered her or not. In high school Laura had been as unobtrusive as Jim had been astonishing. If he did remember Laura, it was not as my sister, for when I asked him to dinner, he grinned and said, "You know, Shakespeare, I never thought of you as having folks!"

He was about to discover that I did. . . .

(Light up Stage.)

(Legend on Screen: "The Accent of a Coming Foot.")

Friday evening. It is about five o'clock of a late spring evening which comes "scattering poems in the sky."

A delicate lemony light is in the Wingfield apartment.

AMANDA has worked like a Turk in preparation for the gentleman caller. The results are astonishing. The new floor lamp with its rose-silk shade is in place, a colored paper lantern conceals the broken light fixture in the ceiling, new billowing white curtains are at the windows, chintz covers are on chairs and sofa, a pair of new sofa pillows make their initial appearance.

Open boxes and tissue paper are scattered on the floor.

LAURA stands in the middle with lifted arms while AMANDA crouches before her, adjusting the hem of the new dress, devout and ritualistic. The dress is colored and designed by memory. The arrangement of LAURA's hair is changed; it is softer and more becoming. A fragile, unearthly prettiness has come out in LAURA: she is like a piece of translucent glass touched by light, given a momentary radiance, not actual, not lasting.

AMANDA (impatiently). Why are you trembling?

LAURA. Mother, you've made me so nervous!

AMANDA. How have I made you nervous?

LAURA. By all this fuss! You make it seem so important!

AMANDA. I don't understand you, Laura. You couldn't be satisfied with just sitting home, and yet whenever I try to arrange something for you, you seem to resist it. (She gets up.) Now take a look at yourself. No, wait! Wait just a moment—I have an idea!

LAURA. What is it now?

AMANDA produces two powder puffs which she wraps in handkerchiefs and stuffs in LAURA'S bosom.

LAURA. Mother, what are you doing?

AMANDA. They call them “Gay Deceivers”!

LAURA. I won’t wear them!

AMANDA. You will!

LAURA. Why should I?

AMANDA. Because, to be painfully honest, your chest is flat.

LAURA. You make it seem like we were setting a trap.

AMANDA. All pretty girls are a trap, a pretty trap, and men expect them to be. (Legend: “A Pretty Trap.”) Now look at yourself, young lady. This is the prettiest you will ever be! I’ve got to fix myself now! You’re going to be surprised by your mother’s appearance! (She crosses through portieres, humming gaily.)

Laura moves slowly to the long mirror and stares solemnly at herself.

A wind blows the white curtains inward in a slow, graceful motion and with a faint, sorrowful sighing.

AMANDA (off stage). It isn’t dark enough yet. (She turns slowly before the mirror with a troubled look.) (Legend on Screen: “This Is My Sister: Celebrate Her with Strings!” Music.)

AMANDA (laughing, off). I’m going to show you something. I’m going to make a spectacular appearance!

LAURA. What is it, Mother?

AMANDA. Possess your soul in patience—you will see! Something I’ve resurrected from that old trunk! Styles haven’t changed so terribly much after all. . . . (She parts the portieres.) Now just look at your mother! (She wears a girlish frock of yellowed voile with a blue silk sash. She carries a bunch of jonquils—the legend of her youth is nearly revived. Feverishly.) This is the dress in which I led the cotillion. Won the cakewalk twice at Sunset Hill, wore one spring to the Governor’s ball in Jackson! See how I sashayed around the ballroom, Laura? (She raises her skirt and does a mincing step around the room.) I wore it on Sundays for my gentlemen callers! I had it on the day I met your father—I had malaria fever all that spring. The change of climate from East Tennessee to the Delta—weakened resistance—I had a little temperature all the time—not enough to be serious—just enough to make me restless and giddy! Invitations poured in—parties all over the Delta!—"stay in bed," said Mother, "you have fever!"—but I just wouldn't.—I took quinine but kept on going, going!—Evenings, dances!—Afternoons, long, long rides! Picnics—lovely!—So lovely, that country in May.—All lacy with dogwood, literally flooded with jonquils!—That was the spring I had the craze for jonquils. Jonquils became an absolute obsession. Mother said, "Honey, there's no more room for jonquils." And still I kept bringing in more jonquils. Whenever, wherever I saw them, I'd say, "Stop! Stop! I see jonquils!" I made the young men help me gather the jonquils! It was a joke, Amanda and her jonquils! Finally there were no more vases to hold them, every available space was filled with jonquils. No vases to hold them? All right, I'll hold them myself! And then I—(She stops in front of the picture.) (Music.) met your father! Malaria fever and jonquils and then—this—boy. . . . (She switches on the rose-colored lamp.) I hope they get here before it starts to rain. (She crosses upstage and places the jonquils in bowl on table.) I gave your brother a little extra change so he and Mr. O'Connor could take the service car home.

LAURA (with altered look). What did you say his name was?

AMANDA. O'Connor.

LAURA. What is his first name?

AMANDA. I don't remember. Oh, yes, I do. It was—Jim!

LAURA sways slightly and catches hold of a chair.

(Legend on Screen: "Not Jim!")

LAURA (faintly). Not—Jim!

AMANDA. Yes, that was it, it was Jim! I've never known a Jim that wasn't nice!

(Music: Ominous.)

LAURA. Are you sure his name is Jim O'Connor?

AMANDA. Yes. Why?

LAURA. Is he the one that Tom used to know in high school?

AMANDA. He didn't say so. I think he just got to know him at the warehouse.

LAURA. There was a Jim O'Connor we both knew in high school—(Then, with effort.) If that is the one that Tom is bringing to dinner—you'll have to excuse me, I won't come to the table.

AMANDA. What sort of nonsense is this?

LAURA. You asked me once if I'd ever liked a boy. Don't you remember I showed you this boy's picture?

AMANDA. You mean the boy you showed me in the year-book?

LAURA. Yes, that boy.

AMANDA. Laura, Laura, were you in love with that boy?

LAURA. I don't know, Mother. All I know is I couldn't sit at the table if it was him!

AMANDA. It won't be him! It isn't the least bit likely. But whether it is or not, you will come to the table. You will not be excused.

LAURA. I'll have to be, Mother.

AMANDA. I don't intend to humor your silliness, Laura. I've had too much from you and your brother, both! So just sit down and compose yourself till they come. Tom has forgotten his key so you'll have to let them in, when they arrive.

LAURA (panicky). Oh, Mother—you answer the door!

AMANDA (lightly). I'll be in the kitchen—busy!

LAURA. Oh, Mother, please answer the door, don't make me do it!

AMANDA (crossing into kitchenette). I've got to fix the dressing for the salmon. Fuss, fuss—silliness!—over a gentleman caller!

Door swings shut. LAURA is left alone.

(Legend: "Terror!")

She utters a low moan and turns off the lamp—sits stiffly on the edge of the sofa, knotting her fingers together.

(Legend on Screen: "The Opening of a Door!")

TOM and JIM appear on the fire-escape steps and climb to landing. Hearing their approach, LAURA rises with a panicky gesture. She retreats to the portieres.

The doorbell. LAURA catches her breath and touches her throat. Low drums.

AMANDA (calling). Laura, sweetheart! The door!

LAURA stares at it without moving.

JIM. I think we just beat the rain.

TOM. Uh-huh. (He rings again, nervously. JIM whistles and fishes for a cigarette.)

AMANDA (very, very gaily). Laura, that is your brother and Mr. O'Connor! Will you let them in, darling?

LAURA crosses toward kitchenette door.

LAURA (breathlessly). Mother—you go to the door!

AMANDA steps out of kitchenette and stares furiously at LAURA. She points imperiously at the door.

LAURA. Please, please!

AMANDA (in a fierce whisper). What is the matter with you, you silly thing?

LAURA (desperately). Please, you answer it, please!

AMANDA. I told you I wasn't going to humor you, Laura. Why have you chosen this moment to lose your mind?

LAURA. Please, please, please, you go!

AMANDA. You'll have to go to the door because I can't!

LAURA (despairingly). I can't either!

AMANDA. Why?

LAURA. I'm sick!

AMANDA. I'm sick, too—of your nonsense! Why can't you and your brother be normal people? Fantastic whims and behavior! (TOM gives a long ring.) Preposterous goings on! Can you give me one reason—(Calls out lyrically.) COMING! JUST ONE SECOND!—why should you be afraid to open a door? Now you answer it, Laura!

LAURA. Oh, oh, oh . . . (She returns through the portieres. Darts to the victrola and winds it frantically and turns it on.)

AMANDA. Laura Wingfield, you march right to that door!

LAURA. Yes—yes, Mother!

A faraway, scratchy rendition of "dardanella" softens the air and gives her strength to move through it. She slips to the door and draws it cautiously open.

TOM enters with caller, JIM O'CONNOR.

TOM. Laura, this is Jim. Jim, this is my sister, Laura.

JIM (stepping inside). I didn't know that Shakespeare had a sister!

LAURA (retreating stiff and trembling from the door). How—how do you do?

JIM (heartily extending his hand). Okay!

LAURA touches it hesitantly with hers.

JIM. Your hand's cold, Laura!

LAURA. Yes, well—I've been playing the victrola. . . .

JIM. Must have been playing classical music on it! You ought to play a little hot swing music to warm you up!

LAURA. Excuse me—I haven't finished playing the victrola. . . .

She turns awkwardly and hurries into the front room. She pauses a second by the victrola. Then catches her breath and darts through the portieres like a frightened deer.

JIM (grinning). What was the matter?

TOM. Oh—with Laura? Laura is—terribly shy.

JIM. Shy, huh? It's unusual to meet a shy girl nowadays. I don't believe you ever mentioned you had a sister.

TOM. Well, now you know. I have one. Here is the Post Dispatch. You want a piece of it?

JIM. Uh-huh.

TOM. What piece? The comics?

JIM. Sports! (Glances at it.) Ole Dizzy Dean is on his bad behavior.

TOM (disinterest). Yeah? (Lights cigarette and crosses back to fire-escape door.)

JIM. Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going out on the terrace.

JIM (goes after him). You know, Shakespeare—I'm going to sell you a bill of goods!

TOM. What goods?

JIM. A course I'm taking.

TOM. Huh?

JIM. In public speaking! You and me, we're not the warehouse type.

TOM. Thanks—that's good news. But what has public speaking got to do with it?

JIM. It fits you for—executive positions!

TOM. Awww.

JIM. I tell you it's done a helluva lot for me.

(Image: Executive at Desk.)

TOM. In what respect?

JIM. In every! Ask yourself what is the difference between you an' me and men in the office down front? Brains?—No!—Ability?—No! Then what? Just one little thing—

TOM. What is that one little thing?

JIM. Primarily it amounts to—social poise! Being able to square up to people and hold your own on any social level!

AMANDA (off stage). Tom?

TOM. Yes, Mother?

AMANDA. Is that you and Mr. O'Connor?

TOM. Yes, Mother.

AMANDA. Well, you just make yourselves comfortable in there.

TOM. Yes, Mother.

AMANDA. Ask Mr. O'Connor if he would like to wash his hands.

JIM. Aw—no—no—thank you—I took care of that at the warehouse. Tom—

TOM. Yes?

JIM. Mr. Mendoza was speaking to me about you.

TOM. Favorably?

JIM. What do you think?

TOM. Well—

JIM. You're going to be out of a job if you don't wake up.

TOM. I am waking up—

JIM. You show no signs.

TOM. The signs are interior.

(Image on Screen: The Sailing Vessel with Jolly Roger Again.)

TOM. I'm planning to change. (He leans over the rail speaking with quiet exhilaration. The incandescent marquees and signs of the first-run movie houses light his face from across the alley. He looks like a voyager.) I'm right at the point of committing myself to a future that doesn't include the warehouse and Mr. Mendoza or even a night-school course in public speaking.

JIM. What are you gassing about?

TOM. I'm tired of the movies.

JIM. Movies!

TOM. Yes, movies! Look at them—(a wave toward the marvels of Grand Avenue.) All of those glamorous people—having adventures—hogging it all, gobbling the whole thing up! You know what happens? People go to the movies instead of moving! Hollywood characters are supposed to have all the adventures for everybody in America, while everybody in America sits in a dark room and watches them have them! Yes, until there's a war. That's when adventure becomes available to the masses! Everyone's dish, not only Gable's! Then the people in the dark room come out of the dark room to have some adventures themselves—Goody, goody—It's our turn now, to go to the South Sea Island—to make a safari—to be exotic, far-off—But I'm not patient. I don't want to wait till then. I'm tired of the movies and I am about to move!

JIM (incredulously). Move?

TOM. Yes.

JIM. When?

TOM. Soon!

JIM. Where? Where?

(Theme Three: Music Seems to Answer the Question, while TOM Thinks it Over. He Searches among his Pockets.)

TOM. I'm starting to boil inside. I know I seem dreamy, but inside—well, I'm boiling! Whenever I pick up a shoe, I shudder a little thinking how short life is and what I am doing!—Whatever that means. I know it doesn't mean shoes—except as something to wear on a traveler's feet! (Finds paper.) Look—

JIM. What?

TOM. I'm a member.

JIM (reading). The Union of Merchant Seamen.

TOM. I paid my dues this month, instead of the light bill.

JIM. You will regret it when they turn the lights off.

TOM. I won't be here.

JIM. How about your mother?

TOM. I'm like my father. The bastard son of a bastard! See how he grins? And he's been absent going on sixteen years!

JIM. You're just talking, you drip. How does your mother feel about it?

TOM. Shhh—Here comes Mother! Mother is not acquainted with my plans!

AMANDA (enters portieres). Where are you all?

TOM. On the terrace, Mother.

They start inside. She advances to them. TOM is distinctly shocked at her appearance. Even JIM blinks a little. He is making his first contact with girlish Southern vivacity and in spite of the night-school course in public speaking is somewhat thrown off the beam by the unexpected outlay of social charm.

Certain responses are attempted by JIM but are swept aside by AMANDA'S gay laughter and chatter. TOM is embarrassed but after the first shock JIM reacts very warmly. Grins and chuckles, is altogether won over.

(Image: AMANDA as a Girl.)

AMANDA (coyly smiling, shaking her girlish ringlets). Well, well, well, so this is Mr. O'Connor. Introductions entirely unnecessary. I've heard so much about you from my boy. I finally said to him, Tom—good gracious!—why don't you bring this paragon to supper? I'd like to meet this nice young man at the warehouse!—Instead of just hearing him sing your praises so much! I don't know why my son is so standoffish—that's not Southern behavior! Let's sit down and—I think we could stand a little more air in here! Tom, leave the door open. I felt a nice fresh breeze a moment ago. Where has it gone? Mmm, so warm already! And not quite summer, even. We're going to burn up when summer really gets started. However, we're having—we're having a very light supper. I think light things are better fo' this time of year. The same as light clothes are. Light clothes an' light food are what warm weather calls fo'. You know our blood gets so thick during th' winter—it takes a while fo' us to adjust ou'selves!—when the season changes. . . . It's come so quick this year. I wasn't prepared. All of a sudden—heavens! Already summer!—I ran to the trunk an' pulled out this light dress—Terribly old! Historical almost! But feels so good—so good an' co-ol, y'know. . . .

TOM. Mother—

AMANDA. Yes, honey?

TOM. How about—supper?

AMANDA. Honey, you go ask Sister if supper is ready! You know that Sister is in full charge of supper! Tell her you hungry boys are waiting for it. (To JIM.) Have you met Laura?

JIM. She—

AMANDA. Let you in? Oh, good, you've met already! It's rare for a girl as sweet an' pretty as Laura to be domestic! But Laura is, thank heavens, not only pretty but also very domestic. I'm not at all. I never was a bit. I never could make a thing but angel-food cake. Well, in the South we had so many servants. Gone, gone, gone. All vestiges of gracious living! Gone completely! I wasn't prepared for what the future brought me. All of my gentlemen callers were sons of planters and so of course I assumed that I would be married to one and raise my family on a large piece of land with plenty of servants. But man proposes—and woman accepts the proposal!—To vary that old, old saying a little bit—I married no planter! I married a man who worked for the telephone company!—that gallantly smiling gentleman over there! [Points to the picture.] A telephone man who—fell in love with long distance!—Now he travels and I don't even know where!—But what am I going on for about my—tribulations! Tell me yours—I hope you don't have any! Tom?

TOM (returning). Yes, Mother?

AMANDA. Is supper nearly ready?

TOM. It looks to me like supper is on the table.

AMANDA. Let me look—(She rises prettily and looks through portieres.) Oh, lovely—But where is Sister?

TOM. Laura is not feeling well and she says that she thinks she'd better not come to the table.

AMANDA. What?—Nonsense!—Laura? Oh, Laura!

LAURA (off stage, faintly). Yes, Mother.

AMANDA. You really must come to the table. We won't be seated until you come to the table! Come in, Mr. O'Connor. You sit over there and I'll—Laura? Laura Wingfield! You're keeping us waiting, honey! We can't say grace until you come to the table!

The back door is pushed weakly open and LAURA comes in. She is obviously quite faint, her lips trembling, her eyes wide and staring. She moves unsteadily toward the table.

(Legend: "Terror!")

Outside a summer storm is coming abruptly. The white curtains billow inward at the windows and there is a sorrowful murmur and deep blue dusk.

LAURA suddenly stumbles—She catches a chair with a faint moan.

TOM. Laura!

AMANDA. Laura! (There is a clap of thunder.) (Legend: "Ah!") (Despairingly.) Why, Laura, you are sick, darling! Tom, help your sister into the living room, dear! Sit in the living room, Laura—rest on the sofa. Well! (To the gentleman caller.) Standing over the hot stove made her ill!—I told her that it was just too warm this evening, but—(TOM comes back in. LAURA is on the sofa.) Is Laura all right now?

TOM. Yes.

AMANDA. What is that? Rain? A nice cool rain has come up! (She gives the gentleman caller a frightened look.) I think we may—have grace—now . . . (TOM looks at her stupidly.) Tom, honey—you say grace!

TOM. Oh . . . "For these and all thy mercies—" (They bow their heads, AMANDA stealing a nervous glance at JIM. In the living room LAURA, stretched on the sofa, clenches her hand to her lips, to hold back a shuddering sob.) God's Holy Name be praised—

(The Scene Dims Out.)

Scene VII

A Souvenir

Half an hour later. Dinner is just being finished in the upstage area which is concealed by the drawn portieres.

As the curtain rises LAURA is still huddled upon the sofa, her feet drawn under her, her head resting on a pale blue pillow, her eyes wide and mysteriously watchful. The new floor lamp with its shade of rose-colored silk gives a soft, becoming light to her face, bringing out the fragile, unearthly prettiness which usually escapes attention. There is a steady murmur of rain, but it is slackening and stops soon after the scene begins; the air outside becomes pale and luminous as the moon breaks out.

A moment after the curtain rises, the lights in both rooms flicker and go out.

JIM. Hey, there, Mr. Light Bulb!

AMANDA laughs nervously.

(Legend: "Suspension of a Public Service.")

AMANDA. Where was Moses when the lights went out? Ha-ha. Do you know the answer to that one, Mr. O'Connor?

JIM. No, Ma'am, what's the answer?

AMANDA. In the dark! (JIM laughs appreciatively.) Everybody sit still. I'll light the candles. Isn't it lucky we have them on the table? Where's a match? Which of you gentlemen can provide a match?

JIM. Here.

AMANDA. Thank you, sir.

JIM. Not at all, Ma'am!

AMANDA. I guess the fuse has burnt out. Mr. O'Connor, can you tell a burnt-out fuse? I know I can't and Tom is a total loss when it comes to mechanics. (Sound: Getting Up: Voices Recede a Little to Kitchenette.) Oh, be careful you don't bump into something. We don't want our gentleman caller to break his neck. Now wouldn't that be a fine howdy-do?

JIM. Ha-ha! Where is the fuse-box?

AMANDA. Right here next to the stove. Can you see anything?

JIM. Just a minute.

AMANDA. Isn't electricity a mysterious thing? Wasn't it Benjamin Franklin who tied a key to a kite? We live in such a mysterious universe, don't we? Some people say that science clears up all the mysteries for us. In my opinion it only creates more! Have you found it yet?

JIM. No, Ma'am. All these fuses look okay to me.

AMANDA. Tom!

TOM. Yes, Mother?

AMANDA. That light bill I gave you several days ago. The one I told you we got the notices about?

TOM. Oh.—Yeah.

(Legend: "Ha!")

AMANDA. You didn't neglect to pay it by any chance?

TOM. Why, I—

AMANDA. Didn't! I might have known it!

JIM. Shakespeare probably wrote a poem on that light bill, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA. I might have known better than to trust him with it! There's such a high price for negligence in this world!

JIM. Maybe the poem will win a ten-dollar prize.

AMANDA. We'll just have to spend the remainder of the evening in the nineteenth century, before Mr. Edison made the Mazda lamp!

JIM. Candlelight is my favorite kind of light.

AMANDA. That shows you're romantic! But that's no excuse for Tom. Well, we got through dinner. Very considerate of them to let us get through dinner before they plunged us into everlasting darkness, wasn't it, Mr. O'Connor?

JIM. Ha-ha!

AMANDA. Tom, as a penalty for your carelessness you can help me with the dishes.

JIM. Let me give you a hand.

AMANDA. Indeed you will not!

JIM. I ought to be good for something.

AMANDA. Good for something? (Her tone is rhapsodic.) You? Why, Mr. O'Connor, nobody, nobody's given me this much entertainment in years—as you have!

JIM. Aw, now, Mrs. Wingfield!

AMANDA. I'm not exaggerating, not one bit! But Sister is all by her lonesome. You go keep her company in the parlor! I'll give you this lovely old candelabrum that used to be on the altar at the church of the Heavenly Rest. It was melted a little out of shape when the church burnt down. Lightning struck it one spring. Gypsy Jones was holding a revival at the time and he intimated that the church was destroyed because the Episcopalians gave card parties.

JIM. Ha-ha.

AMANDA. And how about coaxing Sister to drink a little wine? I think it would be good for her! Can you carry both at once?

JIM. Sure. I'm Superman!

AMANDA. Now, Thomas, get into this apron!

The door of kitchenette swings closed on AMANDA'S gay laughter; the flickering light approaches the portieres.

LAURA sits up nervously as he enters. Her speech at first is low and breathless from the almost intolerable strain of being alone with a stranger.

(Legend: "I Don't Suppose You Remember Me at All!")

In her first speeches in this scene, before JIM'S warmth overcomes her paralyzing shyness, LAURA'S voice is thin and breathless as though she has run up a steep flight of stairs.

JIM'S attitude is gently humorous. In playing this scene it should be stressed that while the incident is apparently unimportant, it is to LAURA the climax of her secret life.

JIM. Hello, there, Laura.

LAURA (faintly). Hello. (She clears her throat.)

JIM. How are you feeling now? Better?

LAURA. Yes. Yes, thank you.

JIM. This is for you. A little dandelion wine. (He extends it toward her with extravagant gallantry.)

LAURA. Thank you.

JIM. Drink it—but don't get drunk! (He laughs heartily. LAURA takes the glass uncertainly; laughs shyly.) Where shall I set the candles?

LAURA. Oh—oh, anywhere . . .

JIM. How about here on the floor? Any objections?

LAURA. No.

JIM. I'll spread a newspaper under to catch the drippings. I like to sit on the floor. Mind if I do?

LAURA. Oh, no.

JIM. Give me a pillow?

LAURA. What?

JIM. A pillow!

LAURA. Oh . . . (Hands him one quickly.)

JIM. How about you? Don't you like to sit on the floor?

LAURA. Oh—yes.

JIM. Why don't you, then?

LAURA. I—will.

JIM. Take a pillow! (LAURA does. Sits on the other side of the candelabrum. JIM crosses his legs and smiles engagingly at her.) I can't hardly see you sitting way over there.

LAURA. I can—see you.

JIM. I know, but that's not fair, I'm in the limelight. (LAURA moves her pillow closer.) Good! Now I can see you! Comfortable?

LAURA. Yes.

JIM. So am I. Comfortable as a cow. Will you have some gum?

LAURA. No, thank you.

JIM. I think that I will indulge, with your permission. (Musingly unwraps it and holds it up.) Think of the fortune made by the guy that invented the first piece of chewing gum. Amazing, huh? The Wrigley Building is one of the sights of Chicago.—I saw it summer before last when I went up to the Century of Progress. Did you take in the Century of Progress?

LAURA. No, I didn't.

JIM. Well, it was quite a wonderful exposition. What impressed me most was the Hall of Science. Gives you an idea of what the future will be in America, even more wonderful than the present time is! (Pause. Smiling at her.) Your brother tells me you're shy. Is that right, Laura?

LAURA. I—don't know.

JIM. I judge you to be an old-fashioned type of girl. Well, I think that's a pretty good type to be. Hope you don't think I'm being too personal—do you?

LAURA (hastily, out of embarrassment). I believe I will take a piece of gum, if you—don't mind. (Clearing her throat.) Mr. O'Connor, have you—kept up with your singing?

JIM. Singing? Me?

LAURA. Yes. I remember what a beautiful voice you had.

JIM. When did you hear me sing?

(Voice Offstage in the Pause.)

VOICE (offstage).

O blow, ye winds, heigh-ho.

A-roving I will go!

I'm off to my love

With a boxing glove—

Ten thousand miles away!

JIM. You say you've heard me sing?

LAURA. Oh, yes! Yes, very often . . . I—don't suppose you remember me—at all?

JIM (smiling doubtfully). You know I have an idea I've seen you before. I had that idea soon as you opened the door. It seemed almost like I was about to remember your name. But the name that I started to call you—wasn't a name! And so I stopped myself before I said it.

LAURA. Wasn't it—Blue Roses?

JIM (springs up, grinning). Blue Roses! My gosh, yes—Blue Roses! That's what I had on my tongue when you opened the door! Isn't it funny what tricks your memory plays? I didn't connect you with the high school somehow or other. But that's where it was; it was high school. I didn't even know you were Shakespeare's sister! Gosh, I'm sorry.

LAURA. I didn't expect you to. You—barely knew me!

JIM. But we did have a speaking acquaintance, huh?

LAURA. Yes, we—spoke to each other.

JIM. When did you recognize me?

LAURA. Oh, right away!

JIM. Soon as I came in the door?

LAURA. When I heard your name I thought it was probably you. I knew that Tom used to know you a little in high school. So when you came in the door—Well, then I was—sure.

JIM. Why didn't you say something, then?

LAURA (breathlessly). I didn't know what to say, I was—too surprised!

JIM. For goodness' sakes! You know, this sure is funny!

LAURA. Yes! Yes, isn't it, though. . . .

JIM. Didn't we have a class in something together?

LAURA. Yes, we did.

JIM. What class was that?

LAURA. It was—singing—Chorus!

JIM. Aw!

LAURA. I sat across the aisle from you in the Aud.

JIM. Aw.

LAURA. Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

JIM. Now I remember—you always came in late.

LAURA. Yes, it was so hard for me, getting upstairs. I had a brace on my leg—it clumped so loud!

JIM. I never heard any clumping.

LAURA (wincing at the recollection). To me it sounded like—thunder!

JIM. Well, well, well. I never even noticed.

LAURA. And everybody was seated before I came in. I had to walk in front of all those people. My seat was in the back row. I had to go clumping all the way up the aisle with everyone watching!

JIM. You shouldn't have been self-conscious.

LAURA. I know, but I was. It was always such a relief when the singing started.

JIM. Aw, yes, I've placed you now! I used to call you Blue Roses. How was it that I got started calling you that?

LAURA. I was out of school a little while with pleurosis. When I came back you asked me what was the matter. I said I had pleurosis—you thought I said Blue Roses. That's what you always called me after that!

JIM. I hope you didn't mind.

LAURA. Oh, no—I liked it. You see, I wasn't acquainted with many—people. . . .

JIM. As I remember you sort of stuck by yourself.

LAURA. I—I—never had much luck at—making friends.

JIM. I don't see why you wouldn't.

LAURA. Well, I—started out badly.

JIM. You mean being—

LAURA. Yes, it sort of—stood between me—

JIM. You shouldn't have let it!

LAURA. I know, but it did, and—

JIM. You were shy with people!

LAURA. I tried not to be but never could—

JIM. Overcome it?

LAURA. No, I—I never could!

JIM. I guess being shy is something you have to work out of kind of gradually.

LAURA (sorrowfully). Yes—I guess it—

JIM. Takes time!

LAURA. Yes—

JIM. People are not so dreadful when you know them. That's what you have to remember! And everybody has problems, not just you, but practically everybody has got some problems. You think of yourself as having the only problems, as being the only one who is disappointed. But just look around you and you will see lots of people as disappointed as you are. For instance, I hoped when I was going to high school that I would be further along at this time, six years after, than I am now—You remember that wonderful write-up I had in The Torch?

LAURA. Yes! (She rises and crosses to table.)

JIM. It said I was bound to succeed in anything I went into! (Laura returns with the annual.) Holy Jeez! The Torch! (He accepts it reverently. They smile across it with mutual wonder. LAURA crouches beside him and they begin to turn through it. LAURA'S shyness is dissolving in his warmth.)

LAURA. Here you are in Pirates of Penzance!

JIM (wistfully). I sang the baritone lead in that operetta.

LAURA (rapidly). So—beautifully!

JIM (protesting). Aw—

LAURA. Yes, yes—beautifully—beautifully!

JIM. You heard me?

LAURA. All three times!

JIM. No!

LAURA. Yes!

JIM. All three performances?

LAURA (looking down). Yes.

JIM. Why?

LAURA. I—wanted to ask you to—autograph my program.

JIM. Why didn't you ask me to?

LAURA. You were always surrounded by your own friends so much that I never had a chance to.

JIM. You should have just—

LAURA. Well, I—thought you might think I was—

JIM. Thought I might think you was—what?

LAURA. Oh—

JIM (with reflective relish). I was beleaguered by females in those days.

LAURA. You were terribly popular!

JIM. Yeah—

LAURA. You had such a—friendly way—

JIM. I was spoiled in high school.

LAURA. Everybody—liked you!

JIM. Including you?

LAURA. I—yes, I—I did, too—(She gently closes the book in her lap.)

JIM. Well, well, well!—Give me that program, Laura. (She hands it to him. He signs it with a flourish.) There you are—better late than never!

LAURA. Oh, I—what a—surprise!

JIM. My signature isn't worth very much right now. But some day—maybe—it will increase in value! Being disappointed is one thing and being discouraged is something else. I am disappointed but I'm not discouraged. I'm twenty-three years old. How old are you?

LAURA. I'll be twenty-four in June.

JIM. That's not old age!

LAURA. No, but—

JIM. You finished high school?

LAURA (with difficulty). I didn't go back.

JIM. You mean you dropped out?

LAURA. I made bad grades in my final examinations. (She rises and replaces the book and the program. Her voice strained.) How is—Emily Meisenbach getting along?

JIM. Oh, that kraut-head!

LAURA. Why do you call her that?

JIM. That's what she was.

LAURA. You're not still—going with her?

JIM. I never see her.

LAURA. It said in the Personal Section that you were—engaged!

JIM. I know, but I wasn't impressed by that—propaganda!

LAURA. It wasn't—the truth?

JIM. Only in Emily's optimistic opinion!

LAURA. Oh—

(Legend: "What Have You Done since High School?")

JIM lights a cigarette and leans indolently back on his elbows smiling at LAURA with a warmth and charm which light her inwardly with altar candles. She remains by the table and turns in her hands a piece of glass to cover her tumult.

JIM (after several reflective puffs on a cigarette). What have you done since high school? (She seems not to hear him.) Huh? (LAURA looks up.) I said what have you done since high school, Laura?

LAURA. Nothing much.

JIM. You must have been doing something these six long years.

LAURA. Yes.

JIM. Well, then, such as what?

LAURA. I took a business course at business college—

JIM. How did that work out?

LAURA. Well, not very—well—I had to drop out, it gave me—indigestion—

JIM laughs gently.

JIM. What are you doing now?

LAURA. I don't do anything—much. Oh, please don't think I sit around doing nothing! My glass collection takes up a good deal of my time. Glass is something you have to take good care of.

JIM. What did you say—about glass?

LAURA. Collection I said—I have one—(She clears her throat and turns away again, acutely shy.)

JIM (abruptly). You know what I judge to be the trouble with you? Inferiority complex! Know what that is? That's what they call it when someone low-rates himself! I understand it because I had it, too. Although my case was not so aggravated as yours seems to be. I had it until I took up public speaking, developed my voice, and learned that I had an aptitude for science. Before that time I never thought of myself as being outstanding in any way whatsoever! Now I've never made a regular study of it, but I have a friend who says I can analyze people better than doctors that make a profession of it. I don't claim that to be necessarily true, but I can sure guess a person's psychology, Laura! (Takes out his gum.) Excuse me, Laura. I always take it out when the flavor is gone. I'll use this scrap of paper to wrap it in. I know how it is to get it stuck on a shoe. Yep—that's what I judge to be your principal trouble. A lack of confidence in yourself as a person. You don't have the proper amount of faith in yourself. I'm basing that fact on a number of your remarks and also on certain observations I've made. For instance that clumping you thought was so awful in high school. You say that you even dreaded to walk into class. You see what you did? You dropped out of school, you gave up an education because of a clump, which as far as I know was practically nonexistent! A little physical defect is what you have. Hardly noticeable even! Magnified thousands of times by imagination! You know what my strong advice to you is? Think of yourself as superior in some way!

LAURA. In what way would I think?

JIM. Why, man alive, Laura! Just look about you a little. What do you see? A world full of common people! All of 'em born and all of 'em going to die! Which of them has one-tenth of your good points! Or mine! Or anyone else's, as far as that goes—Gosh! Everybody excels in some one thing. Some in many! (Unconsciously glances at himself in the mirror.) All you've got to do is discover in what! Take me, for instance. (He adjusts his tie at the mirror.) My interest happens to lie in electrodynamics. I'm taking a course in radio engineering at night school, Laura, on top of a fairly responsible job at the warehouse. I'm taking that course and studying public speaking.

LAURA. Ohhhh.

JIM. Because I believe in the future of television! (Turning back to her.) I wish to be ready to go up right along with it. Therefore I'm planning to get in on the ground floor. In fact, I've already made the right connections and all that remains is for the industry itself to get under way! Full steam—(His eyes are starry.) Knowledge—Zzzzzp! Money—Zzzzzzp!—Power! That's the cycle democracy is built on! (His attitude is convincingly dynamic. LAURA stares at him, even her shyness eclipsed in her absolute wonder. He suddenly grins.) I guess you think I think a lot of myself!

LAURA. No—o-o-o, I—

JIM. Now how about you? Isn't there something you take more interest in than anything else?

LAURA. Well, I do—as I said—have my—glass collection—

A peal of girlish laughter from the kitchen.

JIM. I'm not right sure I know what you're talking about. What kind of glass is it?

LAURA. Little articles of it, they're ornaments mostly! Most of them are little animals made out of glass, the tiniest little animals in the world. Mother calls them a glass menagerie! Here's an example of one, if you'd like to see it! This one is one of the oldest. It's nearly thirteen. (He stretches out his hand.) (Music: "The Glass Menagerie.") Oh, be careful—if you breathe, it breaks!

JIM. I'd better not take it. I'm pretty clumsy with things.

LAURA. Go on, I trust you with him! (Places it in his palm.) There now—you're holding him gently! Hold him over the light, he loves the light! You see how the light shines through him?

JIM. It sure does shine!

LAURA. I shouldn't be partial, but he is my favorite one.

JIM. What kind of a thing is this one supposed to be?

LAURA. Haven't you noticed the single horn on his forehead?

JIM. A unicorn, huh?

LAURA. Mmm-hmmm!

JIM. Unicorns, aren't they extinct in the modern world?

LAURA. I know!

JIM. Poor little fellow, he must feel sort of lonesome.

LAURA (smiling). Well, if he does he doesn't complain about it. He stays on a shelf with some horses that don't have horns and all of them seem to get along nicely together.

JIM. How do you know?

LAURA (lightly). I haven't heard any arguments among them!

JIM (grinning). No arguments, huh? Well, that's a pretty good sign! Where shall I set him?

LAURA. Put him on the table. They all like a change of scenery once in a while!

JIM (stretching). Well, well, well, well—Look how big my shadow is when I stretch!

LAURA. Oh, oh, yes—it stretches across the ceiling!

JIM (crossing to door). I think it's stopped raining. (Opens fire-escape door.) Where does the music come from?

LAURA. From the Paradise Dance Hall across the alley.

JIM. How about cutting the rug a little, Miss Wingfield?

LAURA. Oh, I—

JIM. Or is your program filled up? Let me have a look at it. (Grasps imaginary card.) Why, every dance is taken! I'll just have to scratch some out. (Waltz Music: "La Golondrina.") Ahhh, a waltz! (He executes some sweeping turns by himself then holds his arms toward LAURA.)

LAURA (breathlessly). I—can't dance!

JIM. There you go, that inferiority stuff!

LAURA. I've never danced in my life!

JIM. Come on, try!

LAURA. Oh, but I'd step on you!

JIM. I'm not made out of glass.

LAURA. How—how—how do we start?

JIM. Just leave it to me. You hold your arms out a little.

LAURA. Like this?

JIM. A little bit higher. Right. Now don't tighten up, that's the main thing about it—relax.

LAURA (laughing breathlessly). It's hard not to.

JIM. Okay.

LAURA. I'm afraid you can't budge me.

JIM. What do you bet I can't? (He swings her into motion.)

LAURA. Goodness, yes, you can!

JIM. Let yourself go, now, Laura, just let yourself go.

LAURA. I'm—

JIM. Come on!

LAURA. Trying!

JIM. Not so stiff—Easy does it!

LAURA. I know but I'm—

JIM. Loosen th' backbone! There now, that's a lot better.

LAURA. Am I?

JIM. Lots, lots better! (He moves her about the room in a clumsy waltz.)

LAURA. Oh, my!

JIM. Ha-ha!

LAURA. Oh, my goodness!

JIM. Ha-ha-ha! (They suddenly bump into the table. JIM stops.) What did we hit on?

LAURA. Table.

JIM. Did something fall off it? I think—

LAURA. Yes.

JIM. I hope that it wasn't the little glass horse with the horn!

LAURA. Yes.

JIM. Aw, aw, aw. Is it broken?

LAURA. Now it is just like all the other horses.

JIM. It's lost its—

LAURA. Horn! It doesn't matter. Maybe it's a blessing in disguise.

JIM. You'll never forgive me. I bet that that was your favorite piece of glass.

LAURA. I don't have favorites much. It's no tragedy, Freckles. Glass breaks so easily. No matter how careful you are. The traffic jars the shelves and things fall off them.

JIM. Still I'm awfully sorry that I was the cause.

LAURA (smiling). I'll just imagine he had an operation. The horn was removed to make him feel less—freakish! (They both laugh.) Now he will feel more at home with the other horses, the ones that don't have horns . . .

JIM. Ha-ha, that's very funny! (Suddenly serious.) I'm glad to see that you have a sense of humor. You know—you're—well—very different! Surprisingly different from anyone else I know! (His voice becomes soft and hesitant with a genuine feeling.) Do you mind me telling you that? (LAURA is abashed beyond speech.) You make me feel sort of—I don't know how to put it! I'm usually pretty good at expressing things, but—This is something that I don't know how to say! (LAURA touches her throat and clears it—turns the broken unicorn in her hands.) (Even softer.) Has anyone ever told you that you were pretty? (Pause: Music.) (LAURA looks up slowly, with wonder, and shakes her head.) Well, you are! In a very different way from anyone else. And all the nicer because of the difference, too. (His voice becomes low and husky. LAURA turns away, nearly faint with the novelty of her emotions.) I wish that you were my sister. I'd teach you to have some confidence in yourself. The different people are not like other people, but being different is nothing to be ashamed of. Because other people are not such wonderful people. They're one hundred times one thousand. You're one times one! They walk all over the earth. You just stay here. They're common as—weeds, but—you—well, you're Blue Roses!

(Image on Screen: Blue Roses.)

(Music Changes.)

LAURA. But blue is wrong for—roses . . .

JIM. It's right for you—You're—pretty!

LAURA. In what respect am I pretty?

JIM. In all respects—believe me! Your eyes—your hair—are pretty! Your hands are pretty! (He catches hold of her hand.) You think I'm making this up because I'm invited to dinner and have to be nice. Oh, I could do that! I could put on an act for you, Laura, and say lots of things without being very sincere. But this time I am. I'm talking to you sincerely. I happened to notice you had this inferiority complex that keeps you from feeling comfortable with people. Somebody needs to build your confidence up and make you proud instead of shy and turning away and—blushing—Somebody ought to—ought to—kiss you. Laura! (His hand slips slowly up her arm to her shoulder.) (Music Swells Tumultuously.) (He suddenly turns her about and kisses her on the lips. When he releases her LAURA sinks on the sofa with a bright, dazed look. JIM backs away and fishes in his pocket for a cigarette.) (Legend on Screen: "Souvenir.") Stumble-john! (He lights the cigarette, avoiding her look. There is a peal of girlish laughter from AMANDA in the kitchen.

LAURA slowly raises and opens her hand. It still contains the little broken glass animal. She looks at it with a tender, bewildered expression.) Stumble-john! I shouldn't have done that—That was way off the beam. You don't smoke, do you? (She looks up, smiling, not hearing the question. He sits beside her a little gingerly. She looks at him speechlessly—waiting. He coughs decorously and moves a little farther aside as he considers the situation and senses her feelings, dimly, with perturbation. Gently.) Would you—care for a—mint? (She doesn't seem to hear him but her look grows brighter even.) Peppermint—Life Saver? My pocket's a regular drug store—wherever I go . . . (He pops a mint in his mouth. Then gulps and decides to make a clean breast of it. He speaks slowly and gingerly.) Laura, you know, if I had a sister like you, I'd do the same thing as Tom. I'd bring out fellows—introduce her to them. The right type of boys—of a type to—appreciate her. Only—well—he made a mistake about me. Maybe I've got no call to be saying this. That may not have been the idea in having me over. But what if it was? There's nothing wrong about that. The only trouble is that in my case—I'm not in a situation to—do the right thing. I can't take down your number and say I'll phone. I can't call up next week and—ask for a date. I thought I had better explain the situation in case you misunderstood it and—hurt your feelings. . . . (Pause. Slowly, very slowly, LAURA'S look changes, her eyes returning slowly from his to the ornament in her palm.)

AMANDA utters another gay laugh in the kitchen.

LAURA (faintly). You—won't—call again?

JIM. No, Laura, I can't. (He rises from the sofa.) As I was just explaining, I've—got strings on me, Laura, I've—been going steady! I go out all the time with a girl named Betty. She's a home-girl like you, and Catholic, and Irish, and in a great many ways we—get along fine. I met her last summer on a moonlight boat trip up the river to Alton, on the Majestic. Well—right away from the start it was—love! (Legend: Love!) (LAURA sways slightly forward and grips the arm of the sofa. He fails to notice, now enrapt in his own comfortable being.) Being in love has made a new man of me! (Leaning stiffly forward, clutching the arm of the sofa, LAURA struggles visibly with her storm. But JIM is oblivious, she is a long way off.) The power of love is really pretty tremendous! Love is something that—changes the whole world, Laura! (The storm abates a little and LAURA leans back. He notices her again.) It happened that Betty's aunt took sick, she got a wire and had to go to Centralia. So Tom—when he asked me to dinner—I naturally just accepted the invitation, not knowing that you—that he—that I—(He stops awkwardly.) Huh—I'm a stumble-john! (He flops back on the sofa. The holy candles in the altar of LAURA'S face have been snuffed out! There is a look of almost infinite desolation. JIM glances at her uneasily.) I wish that you would—say something. (She bites her lip which was trembling and then bravely smiles. She opens her hand again on the broken glass ornament. Then she gently takes his hand and raises it level with her own. She carefully places the unicorn in the palm of his hand, then pushes his fingers closed upon it.) What are you—doing that for? You want me to have him?—Laura? (She nods.) What for?

LAURA. A—souvenir . . .

She rises unsteadily and crouches beside the victrola to wind it up.

(Legend on Screen: "Things Have a Way of Turning Out So Badly.")

(Or Image: "Gentleman Caller Waving Good-Bye!—Gaily.")

At this moment AMANDA rushes brightly back in the front room. She bears a pitcher of fruit punch in an old-fashioned cut-glass pitcher and a plate of macaroons. The plate has a gold border and poppies painted on it.

AMANDA. Well, well, well! Isn't the air delightful after the shower? I've made you children a little liquid refreshment. (Turns gaily to the gentleman caller.) Jim, do you know that song about lemonade?

"Lemonade, lemonade

Made in the shade and stirred with a spade—

Good enough for any old maid!"

JIM (uneasily). Ha-ha! No—I never heard it.

AMANDA. Why, Laura! You look so serious!

JIM. We were having a serious conversation.

AMANDA. Good! Now you're better acquainted!

JIM (uncertainly). Ha-ha! Yes.

AMANDA. You modern young people are much more serious-minded than my generation. I was so gay as a girl!

JIM. You haven't changed, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA. Tonight I'm rejuvenated! The gaiety of the occasion, Mr. O'Connor! (She tosses her head with a peal of laughter. Spills lemonade.) Oooo! I'm baptizing myself!

JIM. Here—let me—

AMANDA (setting the pitcher down). There now. I discovered we had some maraschino cherries. I dumped them in, juice and all!

JIM. You shouldn't have gone to that trouble, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA. Trouble, trouble? Why it was loads of fun! Didn't you hear me cutting up in the kitchen? I bet your ears were burning! I told Tom how outdone with him I was for keeping you to himself so long a time! He should have brought you over much, much sooner! Well, now that you've found your way, I want you to be a very frequent caller! Not just occasional but all the time. Oh, we're going to have a lot of gay times together! I see them coming! Mmm, just breathe that air! So fresh, and the moon's so pretty! I'll skip back out—I know where my place is when young folks are having a—serious conversation!

JIM. Oh, don't go out, Mrs. Wingfield. The fact of the matter is I've got to be going.

AMANDA. Going, now? You're joking! Why, it's only the shank of the evening, Mr. O'Connor!

JIM. Well, you know how it is.

AMANDA. You mean you're a young workingman and have to keep workingmen's hours. We'll let you off early tonight. But only on the condition that next time you stay later. What's the best night for you? Isn't Saturday night the best night for you workingmen?

JIM. I have a couple of time-clocks to punch, Mrs. Wingfield. One at morning, another one at night!

AMANDA. My, but you are ambitious! You work at night, too?

JIM. No, Ma'am, not work but—Betty! (He crosses deliberately to pick up his hat. The band at the Paradise Dance Hall goes into a tender waltz.)

AMANDA. Betty? Betty? Who's—Betty! (There is an ominous cracking sound in the sky.)

JIM. Oh, just a girl. The girl I go steady with! (He smiles charmingly. The sky falls.)

(Legend: "The Sky Falls.")

AMANDA (a long-drawn exhalation). Ohhhh . . . Is it a serious romance, Mr. O'Connor?

JIM. We're going to be married the second Sunday in June.

AMANDA. Ohhhh—how nice! Tom didn't mention that you were engaged to be married.

JIM. The cat's not out of the bag at the warehouse yet. You know how they are. They call you Romeo and stuff like that. (He stops at the oval mirror to put on his hat. He carefully shapes the brim and the crown to give a discreetly dashing effect.) It's been a wonderful evening, Mrs. Wingfield. I guess this is what they mean by Southern hospitality.

AMANDA. It really wasn't anything at all.

JIM. I hope it don't seem like I'm rushing off. But I promised Betty I'd pick her up at the Wabash depot, an' by the time I get my jalopy down there her train'll be in. Some women are pretty upset if you keep 'em waiting.

AMANDA. Yes, I know—The tyranny of women! (Extends her hand.) Goodbye, Mr. O'Connor. I wish you luck—and happiness—and success! All three of them, and so does Laura!—Don't you, Laura?

LAURA. Yes!

JIM (taking her hand). Goodbye, Laura. I'm certainly going to treasure that souvenir. And don't you forget the good advice I gave you. (Raises his voice to a cheery shout.) So long, Shakespeare! Thanks again, ladies—good night!

He grins and ducks jauntily out.

Still bravely grimacing, AMANDA closes the door on the gentleman caller. Then she turns back to the room with a puzzled expression. She and LAURA don't dare to face each other. LAURA crouches beside the victrola to wind it.

AMANDA (faintly). Things have a way of turning out so badly. I don't believe that I would play the victrola. Well, well—well—Our gentleman caller was engaged to be married! Tom!

TOM (from back). Yes, Mother?

AMANDA. Come in here a minute. I want to tell you something awfully funny.

TOM (enters with macaroon and a glass of the lemonade). Has the gentleman caller gotten away already?

AMANDA. The gentleman caller has made an early departure. What a wonderful joke you played on us!

TOM. How do you mean?

AMANDA. You didn't mention that he was engaged to be married.

TOM. Jim? Engaged?

AMANDA. That's what he just informed us.

TOM. I'll be jiggered! I didn't know about that.

AMANDA. That seems very peculiar.

TOM. What's peculiar about it?

AMANDA. Didn't you call him your best friend down at the warehouse?

TOM. He is, but how did I know?

AMANDA. It seems extremely peculiar that you wouldn't know your best friend was going to be married!

TOM. The warehouse is where I work, not where I know things about people!

AMANDA. You don't know things anywhere! You live in a dream; you manufacture illusions! (He crosses to door.) Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going to the movies.

AMANDA. That's right, now that you've had us make such fools of ourselves. The effort, the preparations, all the expense! The new floor lamp, the rug, the clothes for Laura! All for what? To entertain some other girl's fiancé! Go to the movies, go! Don't think about us, a mother deserted, an unmarried sister who's crippled and has no job! Don't let anything interfere with your selfish pleasure! Just go, go, go—to the movies!

TOM. All right, I will! The more you shout about my selfishness to me the quicker I'll go, and I won't go to the movies!

AMANDA. Go, then! Then go to the moon—you selfish dreamer!

TOM smashes his glass on the floor. He plunges out on the fire-escape, slamming the door. LAURA screams—cut by door.

Dance-hall music up. TOM goes to the rail and grips it desperately, lifting his face in the chill white moonlight penetrating the narrow abyss of the alley.

(Legend on Screen: "And So Good-Bye . . . ")

TOM'S closing speech is timed with the interior pantomime. The interior scene is played as though viewed through sound-proof glass. AMANDA appears to be making a comforting speech to LAURA w*ho is huddled upon the sofa. Now that we cannot hear the mother's speech, her silliness is gone and she has dignity and tragic beauty.* LAURA'S dark hair hides her face until at the end of the speech she lifts it to smile at her mother. AMANDA'S gestures are slow and graceful, almost dancelike, as she comforts the daughter. At the end of her speech she glances a moment at the father's picture—then withdraws through the portieres. At close of TOM'S speech, LAURA blows out the candles, ending the play.

TOM. I didn't go to the moon, I went much further—for time is the longest distance between two places—Not long after that I was fired for writing a poem on the lid of a shoe-box. I left Saint Louis. I descended the steps of this fire-escape for a last time and followed, from then on, in my father's footsteps, attempting to find in motion what was lost in space—I traveled around a great deal. The cities swept about me like dead leaves, leaves that were brightly colored but torn away from the branches. I would have stopped, but I was pursued by something. It always came upon me unawares, taking me altogether by surprise. Perhaps it was a familiar bit of music. Perhaps it was only a piece of transparent glass—Perhaps I am walking along a street at night, in some strange city, before I have found companions. I pass the lighted window of a shop where perfume is sold. The window is filled with pieces of colored glass, tiny transparent bottles in delicate colors, like bits of a shattered rainbow. Then all at once my sister touches my shoulder. I turn around and look into her eyes . . . Oh, Laura, Laura, I tried to leave you behind me, but I am more faithful than I intended to be! I reach for a cigarette, I cross the street, I run into the movies or a bar, I buy a drink, I speak to the nearest stranger—anything that can blow your candles out! (LAURA bends over the candles.)—for nowadays the world is lit by lightning! Blow out your candles, Laura—and so goodbye . . .

She blows the candles out.

A CONTEXT FOR THE GLASS MENAGERIE

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

Production Notes [1944]

Being a "memory play," The Glass Menagerie can be presented with unusual freedom of convention. Because of its considerably delicate or tenuous material, atmospheric touches and subtleties of direction play a particularly important part. Expressionism and all other unconventional techniques in drama have only one valid aim, and that is a closer approach to truth. When a play employs unconventional techniques, it is not, or certainly shouldn't be, trying to escape its responsibility of dealing with reality, or interpreting experience, but is actually or should be attempting to find a closer approach, a more penetrating and vivid expression of things as they are. The straight realistic play with its genuine frigidaire and authentic ice cubes, its characters that speak exactly as its audience speaks, corresponds to the academic landscape and has the same virtue of a photographic likeness. Everyone should know nowadays the unimportance of the photographic in art: that truth, life, or reality is an organic thing which the poetic imagination can represent or suggest, in essence, only through transformation, through changing into other forms than those which were merely present in appearance.

These remarks are not meant as comments only on this particular play. They have to do with a conception of a new, plastic theater which must take the place of the exhausted theater of realistic conventions if the theater is to resume vitality as a part of our culture.

The Screen Device

There is only one important difference between the original and acting version of the play and that is the omission in the latter of the device which I tentatively included in my original script. This device was the use of a screen on which were projected magic-lantern slides bearing images or titles. I do not regret the omission of this device from the . . . Broadway production. The extraordinary power of Miss Taylor's performance made it suitable to have the utmost simplicity in the physical production. But I think it may be interesting to some readers to see how this device was conceived. So I am putting it into the published manuscript. These images and legends, projected from behind, were cast on a section of wall between the front-room and dining-room areas, which should be indistinguishable from the rest when not in use.

The purpose of this will probably be apparent. It is to give accent to certain values in each scene. Each scene contains a particular point (or several) which is structurally the most important. In an episodic play, such as this, the basic structure or narrative line may be obscured from the audience; the effect may seem fragmentary rather than architectural. This may not be the fault of the play so much as a lack of attention in the audience. The legend or image upon the screen will strengthen the effect of what is merely allusion in the writing and allow the primary point to be made more simply and lightly than if the entire responsibility were on the spoken lines. Aside from this structural value, I think the screen will have a definite emotional appeal, less definable but just as important. An imaginative producer or director may invent many other uses for this device than those indicated in the present script. In fact the possibilities of the device seem much larger to me than the instance of this play can possibly utilize.

The Music

Another extra-literary accent in this play is provided by the use of music. A single recurring tune, "The Glass Menagerie," is used to give emotional emphasis to suitable passages. This tune is like circus music, not when you are on the grounds or in the immediate vicinity of the parade, but when you are at some distance and very likely thinking of something else. It seems under those circumstances to continue almost interminably and it weaves in and out of your preoccupied consciousness; then it is the lightest, most delicate music in the world and perhaps the saddest. It expresses the surface vivacity of life with the underlying strain of immutable and inexpressible sorrow. When you look at a piece of delicately spun glass you think of two things: how beautiful it is and how easily it can be broken. Both of those ideas should be woven into the recurring tune, which dips in and out of the play as if it were carried on a wind that changes. It serves as a thread of connection and allusion between the narrator with his separate point in time and space and the subject of his story. Between each episode it returns as reference to the emotion, nostalgia, which is the first condition of the play. It is primarily Laura's music and therefore comes out most clearly when the play focuses upon her and the lovely fragility of glass which is her image.

The Lighting

The lighting in the play is not realistic. In keeping with the atmosphere of memory, the stage is dim. Shafts of light are focused on selected areas or actors, sometimes in contradistinction to what is the apparent center. For instance, in the quarrel scene between Tom and Amanda, in which Laura has no active part, the clearest pool of light is on her figure. This is also true of the supper scene. The light upon Laura should be distinct from the others, having a peculiar pristine clarity such as light used in early religious portraits of female saints or madonnas. A certain correspondence to light in religious paintings, such as El Greco's, where the figures are radiant in atmosphere that is relatively dusky, could be effectively used throughout the play. (It will also permit a more effective use of the screen.) A free, imaginative use of light can be of enormous value in giving a mobile, plastic quality to plays of a more or less static nature.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. -What does the victrola offer to Laura? Why is the typewriter a better symbol (for the purposes of the play) than, for example, a piano? After all, Laura could have been taking piano lessons.
2. -What do you understand of Laura's glass menagerie? Why is it especially significant that the unicorn is Laura's favorite? How do you interpret the loss of the unicorn's horn? What is Laura saying to Jim in the gesture of giving him the unicorn?
3. -Laura escapes to her glass menagerie. To what do Tom and Amanda escape? How complete do you think Tom's escape is at the end of the play?
4. -Jim is described as "a nice, ordinary young man." To what extent can it be said that he, like the Wingfields, lives in a dream world? Tom says (speaking of the time of the play, 1939) that "The huge middle class was matriculating in a school for the blind." Does the play suggest that Jim, apparently a spokesperson for the American dream, is one of the pupils in this school?
5. -There is an implication that had Jim not been going steady he might have rescued Laura, but Jim also seems to represent (for example, in his lines about money and power) the corrupt outside world that no longer values humanity. Is this a slip on Williams's part, or is it an interesting complexity?

6. -How do you interpret the episode at the end when Laura blows out the candles? Is she blowing out illusions? her own life? both? Explain.

7. -Some readers have seen great importance in the religious references in the play. To cite only a few examples: Scene 5 is called (on the screen) “Annunciation”; Amanda is associated with the music “Ave Maria”; Laura’s candelabrum, from the altar of the Church of Heavenly Rest, was melted out of shape when the church burned down. Do you think these references add up to anything? If so, to what?

8. -On page 1089, Williams says, in a stage direction, “Now that we cannot hear the mother’s speech, her silliness is gone and she has dignity and tragic beauty.” Is Williams simply dragging in the word “tragic” because of its prestige, or is it legitimate? Tragedy is often distinguished from pathos: in tragedy, suffering is experienced by persons who act and are in some measure responsible for their suffering; in pathos, suffering is experienced by the passive and the innocent. For example, in discussion The Suppliants, a play by the ancient Greek dramatist Aeschylus, H. D. F. Kitto (in Greek Tragedy) says, “The Suppliants are not only pathetic, as the victims of outrage, but also tragic, as the victims of their own misconceptions.” Given this distinction, to what extent are Amanda and Laura tragic? pathetic? You might take into account the following quote from an interview with Williams, reprinted in Conversations with Tennessee Williams (ed. Albert J. Devlin): “The mother’s valor is the core of The Glass Menagerie. . . . She’s confused, pathetic, even stupid, but everything has got to be all right. She fights to make it that way in the only way she knows how.”

9. -Before writing The Glass Menagerie, Williams wrote a short story with the same plot, “Portrait of a Girl in Glass” (later published in his Collected Stories). You may want to compare the two works, noticing especially the ways in which Williams has turned a story into a play.

The Play on the Stage

10. -In what ways is the setting relevant to the issues raised in the play?

11. -In his Production Notes (page 1090) Williams called for the use of a “screen device.” Over the years, some productions have incorporated it and some have not. If you were involved in producing The Glass Menagerie, would you use this device? Explain your reasons.

12. -As director, would you want the actress playing Laura to limp? Give reasons for your decision, and provide additional comments on the ways in which you would ask an actress to portray the role.

13. -List the various emotions that you find for Amanda in Scenes 2 and 3. If you were advising an actress playing this role, how would you suggest she convey these different feelings? Following are some questions to consider: In what ways does she reveal her own sadnesses? Should her speeches to Tom be delivered differently from her speeches to Laura? When she looks at Laura's yearbook, should there be any physical contact between the two women? What effect would you wish to achieve at the close of Scene 3?

14. -At the end of Scene 5, after an exasperated exchange between Tom and Amanda, Laura and her mother make a wish on the new moon. Three students can memorize this brief section and present it to the group. Then examine each speech, and discuss its emotion. Offer suggestions to the three actors—for instance, changes in emphasis, a slight difference in tone, a certain stance for the mother and daughter—and repeat the scene.

Drama usually tells an intense story by means of a fairly small number of characters. It can thus be contrasted with both the novel and with poetry. The novel tends to use a large number of characters and to cover a substantial period of time, thereby in some measure showing a picture of a society as well as of individuals; poetry, at the other extreme, tends to reveal the thoughts and emotions of individuals. Drama usually gives us a heightened sense of life as we experience it daily—that is, of one character impinging on another, of actions having consequences, and of lives as comically or tragically interconnected. To quote Alfred Hitchcock, "Drama is life with the dull bits cut out."

Admittedly, some playwrights have used the stage as a platform for exploring ideas rather than as a way of showing intense representations of lives interacting, and Arthur Miller is among the playwrights who are sometimes said to be intellectuals. He indeed commented abundantly on the nature of society, both in essays and within the plays themselves (e.g., in All My Sons Chris Keller tells his mother, "There's a universe of people outside, and you're responsible to it"), but the fact remains that Miller is especially valued not for Big Ideas but because he gives us, through passionate characters, a sense that we are witnessing lives and human relationships in their most essential forms. Miller wished to make us think, but chiefly he makes us feel, and that is perhaps enough for a playwright to do. He cared deeply about social issues but one of the wisest things he said is not about any social issue but about the nature of drama itself: "The theater is above all else an instrument of passion."

Arthur Miller (1915–2005) was born in New York, the son of Jewish immigrants from Austria. Miller went to the University of Michigan, where he first majored in journalism but then switched to English. As an undergraduate he won an award for playwrighting—one of the judges was Susan Glaspell, author of Trifles (see page 1033)—and after graduation (1938) he returned to New York, where he wrote some radio plays and some unsuccessful stage plays. A novel, Focus (1945), was well received, and with All My Sons (1947), Death of a Salesman (1949) and The Crucible (1953), his reputation as a playwright was firmly established. His leftist views, however, caused difficulty: Subjected to questioning by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, in the 1950s he was convicted of contempt of Congress, but the conviction was overturned in 1958. Miller is widely regarded, in England and the rest of Europe as well as in the United States, as American's most important dramatist.

Plot and Character

*An act is a main division in a drama or opera. Act divisions probably stem from Roman theory and derive ultimately from the Greek practice of separating episodes in a play by choral interludes; but Greek (and probably Roman) plays were performed without interruption, for the choral interludes were part of the plays themselves. Elizabethan plays, too, may have been performed without breaks; the division of Elizabethan plays into five acts is usually the work of editors rather than of authors. Frequently an act division today (commonly indicated by lowering the curtain and turning up the houselights) denotes change in locale and lapse of time. A scene is a smaller unit, either (1) a division with no change of locale or abrupt shift of time, or (2) a division consisting of an actor or group of actors on the stage; according to the second definition, the departure or entrance of an actor changes the composition of the group and thus introduces a new scene. (In an entirely different sense, the scene is the locale where a work is set.)

CHAPTER

Tragedy

The Greek philosopher Aristotle defined "tragedy" as a dramatization of a serious happening—not necessarily one ending with the death of the protagonist—and his definition remains among the best. But many plays have been written since Aristotle defined tragedy. When we think of Shakespeare's tragedies, we cannot resist narrowing Aristotle's definition by adding something like "showing a struggle that rends the protagonist's whole being": and when we think of the "problem plays" of the last hundred years—the serious treatments of such sociological problems as alcoholism and race prejudice—we might be inclined to exclude some of them by adding to the definition something about the need for universal appeal.

The question remains: Is there a single quality present in all works that we call tragedy and absent from works not called tragedy? If there is, no one has yet pointed it out to general satisfaction. But this failure does not mean that there is no such classification as "tragedy." We sense that tragedies resemble each other as members of the same family resemble each other: two children have the mother's coloring and eyes, a third child has the mother's coloring but the father's eyes, a fourth child has the mother's eyes but the father's coloring.

In the next few pages we will examine three comments on tragedy, none of which is entirely acceptable, but each of which seems to have some degree of truth, and each of which can help us detect resemblances and differences among tragedies. The first comment is by Cyril Tourneur, a tragic dramatist of the early seventeenth century:

When the bad bleed, then is the tragedy good.

We think of Macbeth ("usurper," "butcher"). Macbeth is much more than a usurper and butcher, but it is undeniable that he is an offender against the moral order. Whatever the merits of Tourneur's statement, however, if we think of Romeo and Juliet (to consider only one play), we realize its inadequacy. Tourneur so stresses the guilt of the protagonist that his or her suffering becomes mere retributive justice. But we cannot plausibly say, for example, that Romeo and Juliet deserved to die because they married without their parents' consent; it is much too simple to call them "bad." Romeo and Juliet are young, in love, nobler in spirit than their parents.

Tourneur's view is probably derived ultimately from an influential passage in Aristotle's Poetics in which Aristotle speaks of hamartia, sometimes literally translated as "missing the target," sometimes as "vice" or "flaw" or "weakness," but perhaps best translated as "mistake." Aristotle seems to imply that the hero is undone because of some mistake he or she commits, but this mistake need not be the result of a moral fault; it may be simply a miscalculation—for example, failure to foresee the consequences of a deed. Brutus makes a strategic mistake when he lets Marc Antony speak at Caesar's funeral, but we can hardly call it a vice.

Because Aristotle's hamartia includes mistakes of this sort, the common translation "tragic flaw" is erroneous. In many Greek tragedies the hero's hamartia is hubris (or hybris), usually translated as "overweening pride." The hero forgets that he or she is fallible, acts as though he or she has the power and wisdom of the gods, and is later humbled for this arrogance. But one can argue that this self-assertiveness is not a vice but a virtue, not a weakness but a strength; if the hero is destroyed for self-assertion, he or she is nevertheless greater than the surrounding people, just as the person who tries to stem a lynch mob is greater than the mob, although that person also may be lynched for his or her virtue. Or a hero may be undone by a high-mindedness that makes him or her vulnerable. Hamlet is vulnerable because he is, as his enemy says, "most generous and free from all contriving"; because Hamlet is high-minded, he will not suspect that the proposed fencing match is a murderous plot. Othello can be tricked into murdering Desdemona not simply because he is jealous but because he is (in the words of the villainous Iago) "of a free and open nature / That thinks men honest but seem so." Iago knows, too, that out of Desdemona's "goodness" he can "make the net / That shall enmesh them all."

Next, here is a statement more or less the reverse of Tourneur's, by a Russian critic, L. I. Temofeev:

> Tragedy in Soviet literature arouses a feeling of pride for the man who has accomplished a great deed for the people's happiness; it calls for continued struggle against the things which brought about the hero's death.

The distortions in Soviet criticism are often amusing: Hamlet is seen as an incipient Communist, undone by the decadent aristocracy; or Romeo and Juliet as young people of the future, undone by bourgeois parents. Soviet drama in the third quarter of the twentieth century so consistently showed the triumph of the worker that Western visitors to Russia commented on the absence of contemporary tragic plays. Still, there is much in the idea that the tragic hero accomplishes "a great deed," and perhaps we do resent "the things which brought about the hero's death." The stubbornness of the Montagues and Capulets, the fury of the mob that turns against Brutus, the crimes of Claudius in Hamlet—all these would seem to call for our indignation.

The third comment is by Arthur Miller:

> If it is true to say that in essence the tragic hero is intent upon claiming his whole due as a personality, and if this struggle must be total and without reservation, then it automatically demonstrates the indestructible will of man to achieve his humanity. . . . It is curious, although edifying, that the plays we revere, century after century, are the tragedies. In them, and in them alone, lies the belief—optimistic, if you will—in the perfectibility of man.

There is much in Miller's suggestions that the tragic hero makes a large and total claim and that the audience often senses triumph rather than despair in tragedies. We often feel that we have witnessed human greatness—that the hero, despite profound suffering, has lived according to his or her ideals. We may feel that we have achieved new insight into human greatness. But the perfectibility of man? Do we feel that Julius Caesar or Macbeth or Hamlet have to do with human perfectibility? Don't these plays suggest rather that people, whatever their nobility, have within them the seeds of their own destruction? Without overemphasizing the guilt of the protagonists, don't we feel that in part the plays dramatize the imperfectibility of human beings? In much tragedy, after all, the destruction comes from within, not from without:

> In tragic life, God wot,
> No villain need be! Passions spin the plot:
> We are betrayed by what is false within.

—George Meredith

What we are talking about is tragic irony, the contrast between what is believed to be so and what is so, or between expectations and accomplishments.* Several examples from Macbeth illustrate something of the range of tragic irony within a single play. In the first act, King Duncan bestows on Macbeth the title of Thane of Cawdor. By his kindness Duncan seals his own doom, for Macbeth, having achieved this rank, will next want to achieve a higher one. In the third act, Macbeth, knowing that Banquo will soon be murdered, hypocritically urges Banquo to "fail not our feast." But Macbeth's hollow request is ironically fulfilled: the ghost of Banquo terrorizes Macbeth during the feast. The most pervasive irony of all, of course, is that Macbeth aims at happiness when he kills Duncan and takes the throne, but he wins only sorrow.

Aristotle's discussion of peripeteia (reversal) and anagnorisis (recognition) may be a way of getting at this sort of irony. He may simply have meant a reversal of fortune (for example, good luck ceases) and a recognition of who is who (for example, the pauper is really the prince), but more likely he meant profounder things. One can say that the reversal in Macbeth lies in the sorrow that Macbeth's increased power brings. The recognition comes when he realizes the consequences of his deeds:

> I have lived long enough: my way of life
> Is fall'n into the sere, the yellow leaf;
> And what which should accompany old age,
> As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
> I must not look to have; but, in their stead,
> Curses, not loud but deep, mouth-honor, breath
> Which the poor heart would fain deny, and dare not.

That our deeds often undo us, that we can aim at our good and produce our ruin, was not, of course, a discovery of the tragic dramatists. The archetype is the story of Adam and Eve: these two aimed at becoming like God, and as a consequence, they brought upon themselves corruption, death, the loss of their earthly paradise. The Bible is filled with stories of tragic irony. A brief quotation from Ecclesiastes (10.8–9) can stand as an epitome of these stories:

> He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him.
>
> Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby.

"He that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby." Activity involves danger. To be inactive is, often, to be ignoble, but to be active is necessarily to imperil oneself. Perhaps we can attempt a summary of tragic figures: they act, and they suffer, usually as a consequence of their action. The question is not of the action's being particularly bad (Tourneur's view) or particularly good (Timofeev's view); the action is often both good and bad, a sign of courage and also of arrogance, a sign of greatness and also of limitations.

Finally, a brief consideration of the pleasure of tragedy: Why do we enjoy plays about suffering? Aristotle has some obscure comments on catharsis (purgation) that are often interpreted as saying that tragedy arouses in us both pity and fear and then purges us of these emotions. The idea, perhaps, is that just as we can (it is said) harmlessly discharge our aggressive impulses by witnessing a prizefight or by shouting at an umpire, so we can harmlessly discharge our impulses to pity and to fear by witnessing the dramatization of a person's destruction. The theater in this view is an outlet for emotions that elsewhere would be harmful. But, it must be repeated, Aristotle's comments on catharsis are obscure; perhaps, too, they are wrong.

Most later theories on the pleasure of tragedy are footnotes to Aristotle's words on catharsis. Some say that our pleasure is sadistic (we enjoy the sight of suffering); some, that our pleasure is masochistic (we enjoy lacerating ourselves); some, that it lies in sympathy (we enjoy extending pity and benevolence to the wretched); some, that it lies in self-congratulation (we are reminded, when we see suffering, of our own good fortune); some, that we take pleasure in tragedy because the tragic hero acts out our secret desires, and we rejoice in his or her aggression, expiating our guilt in his or her suffering; and so on.

But this is uncertain psychology, and it mostly neglects the distinction between real suffering and dramatized suffering. In the latter, surely, part of the pleasure is in the contemplation of an aesthetic object, an object that is unified and complete. The chaos of real life seems, for a few moments in drama, to be ordered: the protagonist's action, his or her subsequent suffering, and the total cosmos seem somehow related. Tragedy has no use for the passerby who is killed by a falling brick. The events (the person's walk, the brick's fall) have no meaningful relation. But suppose a person chooses to climb a mountain, and in making the ascent sets in motion an avalanche that destroys that person. Here we find (however simple the illustration) something closer to tragedy. We do not say that people should avoid mountains, or that mountain climbers deserve to die by avalanches. But we feel that the event is unified, as the accidental conjunction of brick and passerby is not.

Tragedy thus presents some sort of ordered action; tragic drama itself is orderly. As we see or read it, we feel it cannot be otherwise; word begets word, deed begets deed, and every moment is exquisitely appropriate. Whatever the relevance on sadism, masochism, sympathy, and the rest, the pleasure of tragedy surely comes in part from the artistic shaping of the material.

A NOTE ON GREEK TRAGEDY

Little or nothing is known for certain of the origin of Greek tragedy. The most common hypothesis holds that it developed from improvised speeches during choral dances honoring Dionysus, a Greek nature god associated with spring, fertility, and wine. Thespis (who perhaps never existed) is said to have introduced an actor into these choral performances in the sixth century bce Aeschylus (525–456 bce), Greece's first great writer of tragedies, added the second actor, and Sophocles (495?–406 bce) added the third actor and fixed the size of the chorus at fifteen. (Because the chorus leader often functioned as an additional actor, and because the actors sometimes doubled in their parts, a Greek tragedy could have more characters than might at first be thought.)

All the extant great Greek tragedy is of the fifth century bce It was performed at religious festivals in the winter and early spring, in large outdoor amphitheaters built on hillsides. Some of these theaters were enormous; the one at Epidaurus held about fifteen thousand people. The audience sat in tiers, looking down on the orchestra (a dancing place), with the acting area behind it and the skene (the scene building) yet farther back. The scene building served as dressing room, background (suggesting a palace or temple), and place for occasional entrances and exits. Furthermore, this building helped to provide good acoustics, for speech travels well if there is a solid barrier behind the speakers and a hard, smooth surface in front of them, and if the audience sits in tiers. The wall of the scene building provided the barrier; the orchestra provided the surface in front of the actors; and the seats on the hillside fulfilled the third requirement. Moreover, the acoustics were somewhat improved by slightly elevating the actors above the orchestra, but it is not known exactly when this platform was first constructed in front of the scene building.

A tragedy commonly begins with a prologos (prologue), during which the exposition is given. Next comes the p‡rodos, the chorus's ode of entrance, sung while the chorus marches into the theater through the side aisles and onto the orchestra. The epeisodion (episode) is the ensuing scene; it is followed by a stasimon (choral song, ode). Usually there are four or five epeisodia, alternating with stasima. Each of these choral odes has a strophe (lines presumably sung while the chorus dances in one direction) and an antistrophe (lines presumably sung while the chorus retraces its steps). Sometimes a third part, an epode, concludes an ode. (In addition to odes that are stasima, there can be odes within episodes; the fourth episode of Antigon contains an ode complete with epode.) After the last part of the last ode comes the exodos, the epilogue or final scene.

The actors (all male) wore masks, and they seem to have chanted much of the play. Perhaps the total result of combining speech with music and dancing was a sort of music-drama roughly akin to opera with some spoken dialogue, such as Mozart's The Magic Flute (1791).

TWO PLAYS BY SOPHOCLES

SOPHOCLES

One of the three great writers of tragedies in ancient Greece, Sophocles (496?–406 bce) was born in Colonus, near Athens, into a well-to-do family. Well educated, he first won public acclaim as a tragic poet at the age of 27, in 468 bce when he defeated Aeschylus in a competition for writing a tragic play. He is said to have written some 120 plays, but only seven tragedies are extant: among them are Oedipus Rex, Antigone, and Oedipus at Colonus. He died, much honored, in his ninetieth year, in Athens, where he had lived his entire life.

[TIME AND SCENE: The royal house of Thebes. Double doors dominate the fa ade; a stone altar stands at the center of the stage.

Many years have passed since oedipus solved the riddle of the Sphinx and ascended the throne of Thebes, and now a plague has struck the city. A procession of priests enters; suppliants, broken and despondent, they carry branches wound in wool and lay them on the altar.

The doors open. guards assemble. oedipus comes forward, majestic but for a telltale limp, and slowly views the condition of his people.]

oedipus. Oh my children, the new blood of ancient Thebes, why are you here? Huddling at my altar, praying before me, your branches wound in wool.¡

Our city reeks with the smoke of burning incense, rings with cries for the Healer¡ and wailing for the dead.

I thought it wrong, my children, to hear the truth from others, messengers. Here I am myself—you all know me, the world knows my fame:

I am Oedipus.

[Helping a priest to his feet.]

Speak up, old man. Your years, your dignity—you should speak for the others.

Why here and kneeling, what preys upon you so?

Some sudden fear? some strong desire?

You can trust me. I am ready to help,

I'll do anything. I would be blind to misery not to pity my people kneeling at my feet.

priest. Oh Oedipus, king of the land, our greatest power!

You see us before you now, men of all ages clinging to your altars. Here are boys, still too weak to fly from the nest,

and here the old, bowed down with the years,

the holy ones—a priest of Zeus¡ myself—and here

the picked, unmarried men, the young hope of Thebes.

And all the rest, your great family gathers now, branches wreathed, massing in the squares,

kneeling before the two temples of queen Athena¡ or the river-shrine where the embers glow and die and Apollo sees the future in the ashes.¡

Our city—

look around you, see with your own eyes—

our ship pitches wildly, cannot lift her head from the depths, the red waves of death . . .

Thebes is dying. A blight on the fresh crops and the rich pastures, cattle sicken and die, and the women die in labor, children stillborn,

and the plague, the fiery god of fever hurls down on the city, his lightning slashing through us—raging plague in all its vengeance, devastating the house of Cadmus!¡ And black Death luxuriates in the raw, wailing miseries of Thebes.
Now we pray to you. You cannot equal the gods, your children know that, bending at your altar.
But we do rate you first of men,
both in the common crises of our lives and face-to-face encounters with the gods.
You freed us from the Sphinx,¡ you came to Thebes and cut us loose from the bloody tribute¡ we had paid that harsh, brutal singer. We taught you nothing, no skill, no extra knowledge, still you triumphed.
A god was with you, so they say, and we believe it—
you lifted up our lives.

So now again,

Oedipus, king, we bend to you, your power—
we implore you, all of us on our knees:
find us strength, rescue! Perhaps you've heard the voice of a god or something from other men, Oedipus . . . what do you know?
The man of experience—you see it every day—
his plans will work in a crisis, his first of all.
Act now—we beg you, best of men, raise up our city!
Act, defend yourself, your former glory!
Your country calls you savior now for your zeal, your action years ago.

Never let us remember of your reign:
you helped us stand, only to fall once more.
Oh raise up our city, set us on our feet.
The omens were good that day you brought us joy—
be the same man today!
Rule our land, you know you have the power,
but rule a land of the living, not a wasteland.
Ship and towered city are nothing, stripped of men alive within it, living all as one.

oedipus. My children,
I pity you. I see—how could I fail to see what longings bring you here? Well I know you are sick to death, all of you,
but sick as you are, not one is sick as I.
Your pain strikes each of you alone, each in the confines of himself, no other. But my spirit grieves for the city, for myself and all of you.
I wasn't asleep, dreaming. You haven't wakened me—
I've wept through the nights, you must know that, groping, laboring over many paths of thought.
After a painful search I found one cure:
I acted at once. I sent Creon, my wife's own brother, to Delphi¡— Apollo the Prophet's oracle—to learn what I might do or say to save our city.
Today's the day. When I count the days gone by it torments me . . . what is he doing?
Strange, he's late, he's gone too long.

But once he returns, then, then I'll be a traitor

if I do not do all the god makes clear.

priest. Timely words. The men over there are signaling—Creon's just arriving.

oedipus. [Sighting creon, then turning to the altar.]

Lord Apollo,

let him come with a lucky word of rescue,

shining like his eyes!

priest. Welcome news, I think—he's crowned, look,

and the laurel wreath is bright with berries.

oedipus. We'll soon see. He's close enough to hear—

[Enter creon from the side; his face is shaded with a wreath.]

Creon, prince, my kinsman, what do you bring us?

What message from the god?

creon. Good news.

I tell you even the hardest things to bear,

if they should turn out well, all would be well.

oedipus. Of course, but what were the god's words? There's no hope and nothing to fear in what you've said so far.

creon. If you want my report in the presence of these . . .

[Pointing to the priests while drawing oedipus toward the palace.]

I'm ready now, or we might go inside.

oedipus. Speak out,

speak to us all. I grieve for these, my people, far more than I fear for my own life.

creon. Very well,

I will tell you what I heard from the god.

Apollo commands us—he was quite clear—

"Drive the corruption from the land,

don't harbor it any longer, past all cure,

don't nurse it in your soil—root it out!"

oedipus. How can we cleanse ourselves—what rites?

What's the source of the trouble?

creon. Banish the man, or pay back blood with blood.

Murder sets the plague-storm on the city.

oedipus. Whose murder?

Whose fate does Apollo bring to light?

creon. Our leader,

my lord, was once a man named Laius,

before you came and put us straight on course.

oedipus. I know—

or so I've heard. I never saw the man myself.

creon. Well, he was killed, and Apollo commands us now—

he could not be more clear,

"Pay the killers back—whoever is responsible."

oedipus. Where on earth are they? Where to find it now, the trail of the ancient guilt so hard to trace?

creon. "Here in Thebes," he said.

Whatever is sought for can be caught, you know, whatever is neglected slips away.

oedipus. But where,

in the palace, the fields or foreign soil,

where did Laius meet his bloody death?

creon. He went to consult an oracle, Apollo said, and he set out and never came home again.

oedipus. No messenger, no fellow-traveler saw what happened?

Someone to cross-examine?

creon. No,

they were all killed but one. He escaped, terrified, he could tell us nothing clearly,

nothing of what he saw—just one thing.

oedipus. What's that?

one thing could hold the key to it all,

a small beginning give us grounds for hope.

creon. He said thieves attacked them—a whole band, not single-handed, cut King Laius down.

oedipus. A thief, so daring, so wild, he'd kill a king? Impossible, unless conspirators paid him off in Thebes.

creon. We suspected as much. But with Laius dead no leader appeared to help us in our troubles.

oedipus. Trouble? Your king was murdered—royal blood!

What stopped you from tracking down the killer

then and there?

creon. The singing, riddling Sphinx.

She . . . persuaded us to let the mystery go and concentrate on what lay at our feet.

oedipus. No,

I'll start again—I'll bring it all to light myself!

Apollo is right, and so are you, Creon, to turn our attention back to the murdered man.

Now you have me to fight for you, you'll see:

I am the land's avenger by all rights,

and Apollo's champion too.

But not to assist some distant kinsman, no,

for my own sake I'll rid us of this corruption.

Whoever killed the king may decide to kill me too,

with the same violent hand—by avenging Laius

I defend myself.

[To the priests.]

Quickly, my children.

Up from the steps, take up your branches now.

[To the guards.]

One of you summon the city here before us, tell them I'll do everything. God help us,

we will see our triumph—or our fall.

[oedipus and creon enter the palace, followed by the guards.]

priest. Rise, my sons. The kindness we came for Oedipus volunteers himself.

Apollo has sent his word, his oracle—

Come down, Apollo, save us, stop the plague.

[The priests rise, remove their branches and exit to the side. Enter a chorus, the citizens of Thebes, who have not heard the news that creon brings. They march around the altar, chanting.]

chrous. Zeus!

Great welcome voice of Zeus,¡ what do you bring?

What word from the gold vaults of Delphi comes to brilliant Thebes? Racked with terror—terror shakes my heart and I cry your wild cries, Apollo, Healer of Delos¡

I worship you in dread . . . what now, what is your price?

some new sacrifice? some ancient rite from the past come round again each spring?—

what will you bring to birth?

Tell me, child of golden Hope warm voice that never dies!

You are the first I call, daughter of Zeus deathless Athena—I call your sister Artemis,¡ heart of the market place enthroned in glory,

guardian of our earth—

I call Apollo, Archer astride the thunderheads of heaven—

O triple shield against death, shine before me now!

If ever, once in the past, you stopped some ruin launched against our walls

you hurled the flame of pain far, far from Thebes—you gods come now, come down once more!

No, no

the miseries numberless, grief on grief, no end—

too much to bear, we are all dying

O my people . . .

Thebes like a great army dying and there is no sword of thought to save us, no

and the fruits of our famous earth, they will not ripen

no and the women cannot scream their pangs to birth—screams for the Healer, children dead in the womb and life on life goes down

you can watch them go

like seabirds winging west, outracing the day's fire down the horizon, irresistibly

streaking on to the shores of Evening

Death

so many deaths, numberless deaths on deaths, no end—

Thebes is dying, look, her children stripped of pity . . .

generations strewn on the ground

unburied, unwept, the dead spreading death and the young wives and gray-haired mothers with them

cling to the altars, trailing in from all over the city—

Thebes, city of death, one long cortege and the suffering rises

wails for mercy rise and the wild hymn for the Healer blazes out clashing with our sobs our cries of mourning—

O golden daughter of god,¡ send rescue radiant as the kindness in your eyes!

Drive him back!—the fever, the god of death

that raging god of war

not armored in bronze, not shielded now, he burns me, battle cries in the onslaught burning on—

O rout him from our borders!

Sail him, blast him out to the Sea-queen’s chamber the black Atlantic gulfs or the northern harbor, death to all

where the Thracian surf comes crashing.

Now what the night spares he comes by day and kills—the god of death.

O lord of the stormcloud,

you who twirl the lightning, Zeus, Father, thunder Death to nothing!

Apollo, lord of the light, I beg you—whip your longbow's golden cord showering arrows on our enemies—shafts of power champions strong before us rushing on!

Artemis, Huntress,

torches flaring over the eastern ridges—

ride Death down in pain!

God of the headdress gleaming gold, I cry to you—your name and ours are one, Dionysus¡— come with your face aflame with wine

your raving women's cries

your army on the march! Come with the lightning come with torches blazing, eyes ablaze with glory!

Burn that god of death that all gods hate!

[oedipus enters from the palace to address the chorus, as if addressing the entire city of Thebes.]

oedipus. You pray to the gods? Let me grant your prayers.

Come, listen to me—do what the plague demands:

you'll find relief and lift your head from the depths.

I will speak out now as a stranger to the story,

a stranger to the crime. If I'd been present then,

there would have been no mystery, no long hunt without a clue in hand. So now, counted

a native Theban years after the murder,

to all of Thebes I make this proclamation:

if any one of you knows who murdered Laius,

the son of Labdacus, I order him to reveal the whole truth to me. Nothing to fear, even if he must denounce himself,
let him speak up
and so escape the brunt of the charge—
he will suffer no unbearable punishment, nothing worse than exile, totally unharmed.
[oedipus pauses, waiting for a reply.]
Next,
if anyone knows the murderer is a stranger,
a man from alien soil, come, speak up.
I will give him a handsome reward, and lay up gratitude in my heart for him besides.
[Silence again, no reply.]
But if you keep silent, if anyone panicking, trying to shield himself or friend or kin,
rejects my offer, then hear what I will do.
I order you, every citizen of the state where I hold throne and power: banish this man—whoever he may be—never shelter him, never speak a word to him, never make him partner to your prayers, your victims burned to the gods.
Never let the holy water touch his hands
Drive him out, each of you, from every home.
He is the plague, the heart of our corruption,
as Apollo's oracle has just revealed to me.
So I honor my obligations:
I fight for the god and for the murdered man.

Now my curse on the murderer. Whoever he is,
a lone man unknown in his crime or one among many, let that man drag out his life in agony, step by painful step—
I curse myself as well . . . if by any chance he proves to be an intimate of our house, here at my hearth, with my full knowledge,
may the curse I just called down on him strike me!
These are your orders: perform them to the last.
I command you, for my sake, for Apollo's, for this country blasted root and branch by the angry heavens.
Even if god had never urged you on to act,
how could you leave the crime uncleansed so long?
A man so noble—your king, brought down in blood—you should have searched. But I am the king now,
I hold the throne that he held then, possess his bed and a wife who shares our seed . . . why, our seed might be the same, children born of the same mother might have created blood-bonds between us if his hope of offspring hadn't met disaster—
but fate swooped at his head and cut him short.
So I will fight for him as if he were my father, stop at nothing, search the world to lay my hands on the man who shed his blood,
the son of Labdacus descended of Polydorus, Cadmus of old and Agenor, founder of the line:
their power and mine are one.

Oh dear gods,

my curse on those who disobey these orders!
Let no crops grow out of the earth for them—
shrivel their women, kill their sons, burn them to nothing in this plague that hits us now, or something even worse.
But you, loyal men of Thebes who approve my actions, may our champion, Justice, may all the gods be with us, fight beside us to the end!

leader. In the grip of your curse, my king, I swear
I'm not the murderer, I cannot point him out.
As for the search, Apollo pressed it on us—
he should name the killer.

oedipus. Quite right, but to force the gods to act against their will—
no man has the power.

leader. Then if I might mention the next best thing . . .

oedipus. The third best too—
don't hold back, say it.

leader. I still believe . . .
Lord Tiresias¡ sees with the eyes of Lord Apollo.
Anyone searching for the truth, my king, might learn it from the prophet, clear as day.

oedipus. I've not been slow with that. On Creon's cue
I sent the escorts, twice, within the hour.
I'm surprised he isn't here.

leader. We need him—
without him we have nothing but old, useless rumors.

oedipus. Which rumors? I'll search out every word.

leader. Laius was killed, they say, by certain travelers.

oedipus. I know—but no one can find the murderer.

leader. If the man has a trace of fear in him

he won't stay silent long,

not with your curses ringing in his ears.

oedipus. He didn't flinch at murder, he'll never flinch at words.

[Enter tiresias, the blind prophet, led by a boy with escorts in attendance. He remains at a distance.]

leader. Here is the one who will convict him, look, they bring him on at last, the seer, the man of god.

The truth lives inside him, him alone.

oedipus. O Tiresias,

master of all the mysteries of our life,

all you teach and all you dare not tell,

signs in the heavens, signs that walk the earth!

Blind as you are, you can feel all the more what sickness haunts our city. You, my lord, are the one shield, the one savior we can find.

We asked Apollo—perhaps the messengers haven't told you—he sent his answer back:

"Relief from the plague can only come one way.

Uncover the murderers of Laius, put them to death or drive them into exile."

So I beg you, grudge us nothing now, no voice,

no message plucked from the birds, the embers or the other mantic ways within your grasp.

Rescue yourself, your city, rescue me—
rescue everything infected by the dead.
We are in your hands. For a man to help others with all his gifts and native strength:
that is the noblest work.

tiresias. How terrible—to see the truth when the truth is only pain to him who sees!
I knew it well, but I put it from my mind,
else I never would have come.

oedipus. What's this? Why so grim, so dire?

tiresias. Just send me home. You bear your burdens, I'll bear mine. It's better that way, please believe me.

oedipus. Strange response . . . unlawful, unfriendly too to the state that bred and reared you—
you withhold the word of god.

tiresias. I fail to see that your own words are so well-timed.
I'd rather not have the same thing said of me . . .

oedipus. For the love of god, don't turn away, not if you know something. We beg you,
all of us on our knees.

tiresias. None of you knows—and I will never reveal my dreadful secrets, not to say your own.

oedipus. What? You know and you won't tell?
You're bent on betraying us, destroying Thebes?

tiresias. I'd rather not cause pain for you or me.

So why this . . . useless interrogation?

You'll get nothing from me.

oedipus. Nothing! You,

you scum of the earth, you'd enrage a heart of stone!

You won't talk? Nothing moves you?

Out with it, once and for all!

tiresias. You criticize my temper . . . unaware of the one you live with, you revile me.

oedipus. Who could restrain his anger hearing you?

What outrage—you spurn the city!

tiresias. What will come will come.

Even if I shroud it all in silence.

oedipus. What will come? You're bound to tell me that.

tiresias. I'll say no more. Do as you like, build your anger to whatever pitch you please, rage your worst—oedipus. Oh I'll let loose, I have such fury in me—now I see it all. You helped hatch the plot, you did the work, yes, short of killing him with your own hands—and given eyes I'd say you did the killing single-handed!

tiresias. Is that so!

I charge you, then, submit to that decree

you just laid down: from this day onward speak to no one, not these citizens, not myself.

You are the curse, the corruption of the land!

oedipus. You, shameless—

aren't you appalled to start up such a story?

You think you can get away with this?

tiresias. I have already.

The truth with all its power lives inside me.

oedipus. Who primed you for this? Not your prophet's trade.

tiresias. You did, you forced me, twisted it out of me.

oedipus. What? Say it again—I'll understand it better.

tiresias. Didn't you understand, just now?

Or are you tempting me to talk?

oedipus. No, I can't say I grasped your meaning.

Out with it, again!

tiresias. I say you are the murderer you hunt.

oedipus. That obscenity, twice—by god, you'll pay.

tiresias. Shall I say more, so you can really rage?

oedipus. Much as you want. Your words are nothing—futile.

tiresias. You cannot imagine . . . I tell you,

you and your loved ones live together in infamy,

you cannot see how far you've gone in guilt.

oedipus. You think you can keep this up and never suffer?

tiresias. Indeed, if the truth has any power.

oedipus. It does

but not for you, old man. You've lost your power, stone-blind, stone-deaf—senses, eyes blind as stone!

tiresias. I pity you, flinging at me the very insults each man here will fling at you so soon.

oedipus. Blind,

lost in the night, endless night that cursed you!

You can't hurt me or anyone else who sees the light—

you can never touch me.

tiresias. True, it is not your fate to fall at my hands. Apollo is quite enough, and he will take some pains to work this out.

oedipus. Creon! Is this conspiracy his or yours?

tiresias. Creon is not your downfall, no, you are your own.

oedipus. O power—

wealth and empire, skill outstripping skill

in the heady rivalries of life, what envy lurks inside you! Just for this,

the crown the city gave me—I never sought it,

they laid it in my hands—for this alone, Creon,

the soul of trust, my loyal friend from the start steals against me . . . so hungry to overthrow me

he sets this wizard on me, this scheming quack,

this fortune-teller peddling lies, eyes peeled for his own profit—seer blind in his craft!

Come here, you pious fraud. Tell me, when did you ever prove yourself a prophet?

When the Sphinx, that chanting Fury kept her deathwatch here, why silent then, not a word to set our people free?

There was a riddle, not for some passer-by to solve—it cried out for a prophet. Where were you?

Did you rise to the crisis? Not a word,

you and your birds, your gods—nothing.

No, but I came by, Oedipus the ignorant,

I stopped the Sphinx! With no help from the birds,

the flight of my own intelligence hit the mark.

And this is the man you'd try to overthrow?

You think you'll stand by Creon when he's king?

You and the great mastermind—

you'll pay in tears, I promise you, for this,

this witch-hunt. If you didn't look so senile

the lash would teach you what your scheming means!

leader. I would suggest his words were spoken in anger,

Oedipus . . . yours too, and it isn't what we need.

The best solution to the oracle, the riddle posed by god—we should look for that.

tiresias. You are the king no doubt, but in one respect, at least, I am your equal: the right to reply.

I claim that privilege too.

I am not your slave. I serve Apollo.

I don't need Creon to speak for me in public.

So,

you mock my blindness? Let me tell you this.

You with your precious eyes,

you're blind to the corruption of your life, to the house you live in, those you live with—

who are your parents? Do you know? All unknowing you are the scourge of your own flesh and blood,

the dead below the earth and the living here above, and the double lash of your mother and your father's curse will whip you from this land one day, their footfall treading you down in terror, darkness shrouding your eyes that now can see the light!

Soon, soon

you'll scream aloud—what haven won't reverberate?

What rock of Cithaeron¡ won't scream back in echo?

That day you learn the truth about your marriage,

the wedding-march that sang you into your halls,

the lusty voyage home to the fatal harbor!

And a crowd of other horrors you'd never dream will level you with yourself and all your children.

There. Now smear us with insults—Creon, myself, and every word I've said. No man will ever be rooted from the earth as brutally as you.

oedipus. Enough! Such filth from him? Insufferable—what, still alive? Get out—faster, back where you came from—vanish!

tiresias. I would never have come if you hadn't called me here.

oedipus. If I thought you would blurt out such absurdities, you'd have died waiting before I'd had you summoned.

tiresias. Absurd, am I! To you, not to your parents:

the ones who bore you found me sane enough.

oedipus. Parents—who? Wait . . . who is my father?

tiresias. This day will bring your birth and your destruction.

oedipus. Riddles—all you can say are riddles, murk and darkness.

tiresias. Ah, but aren't you the best man alive at solving riddles?

oedipus. Mock me for that, go on, and you'll reveal my greatness.

tiresias. Your great good fortune, true, it was your ruin.

oedipus. Not if I saved the city—what do I care?

tiresias. Well then, I'll be going.

[To his attendant.]

Take me home, boy.

oedipus. Yes, take him away. You're a nuisance here.

Out of the way, the irritation's gone.

[Turning his back on tiresias, moving toward the palace.]

tiresias. I will go,

once I have said what I came here to say.

I'll never shrink from the anger in your eyes—

you can't destroy me. Listen to me closely:

the man you've sought so long, proclaiming, cursing up and down, the murderer of Laius—

he is here. A stranger.

you may think, who lives among you,

he soon will be revealed a native Theban

but he will take no joy in the revelation.

Blind who now has eyes, beggar who now is rich,

he will grope his way toward a foreign soil,

a stick tapping before him step by step.

[oedipus enters the palace.]

Revealed at last, brother and father both to the children he embraces; to his mother son and husband both—he sowed the loins

his father sowed, he spilled his father's blood!

Go in and reflect on that, solve that.

And if you find I've lied

from this day onward call the prophet blind.

[tiresias and the boy exit to the side.]

chorus. Who—

who is the man the voice of god denounces resounding out of the rocky gorge of Delphi?

The horror too dark to tell,

whose ruthless bloody hands have done the work?

His time has come to fly to outrace the stallions of the storm

his feet a streak of speed—

Cased in armor, Apollo son of the Father lunges on him, lightning-bolts afire!

And the grim unerring Furies¡ closing for the kill.

Look,

the word of god has just come blazing flashing off Parnassus'¡ snowy heights!

That man who left no trace—

after him, hunt him down with all our strength!

Now under bristling timber up through rocks and caves he stalks

like the wild mountain bull—

cut off from men, each step an agony, frenzied, racing blind

but he cannot outrace the dread voices of Delphi ringing out of the heart of Earth,

the dark wings beating around him shrieking doom

the doom that never dies, the terror—

The skilled prophet scans the birds and shatters me with terror!

I can't accept him, can't deny him, don't know what to say,

I'm lost, and the wings of dark foreboding beating—

I cannot see what's come, what's still to come . . .

and what could breed a blood feud between

Laius' house and the son of Polybus?¡

I know of nothing, not in the past and not now,

no charge to bring against our king, no cause to attack his fame that rings throughout Thebes—not without proof—not for the ghost of Laius, not to avenge a murder gone without a trace.

Zeus and Apollo know, they know, the great masters of all the dark and depth of human life.
But whether a mere man can know the truth, whether a seer can fathom more than I—there is no test, no certain proof though matching skill for skill a man can outstrip a rival. No, not till I see these charges proved will I side with his accusers.
We saw him then, when the she-hawk¡ swept against him, saw with our own eyes his skill, his brilliant triumph—
there was the test—he was the joy of Thebes!
Never will I convict my king, never in my heart.

[Enter creon from the side.]

creon. My fellow-citizens, I hear King Oedipus levels terrible charges at me. I had to come.
I resent it deeply. If, in the present crisis
he thinks he suffers any abuse from me, anything I've done or said that offers him
the slightest injury, why, I've no desire to linger out this life, my reputation in ruins.
The damage I'd face from such an accusation is nothing simple. No, there's nothing worse:
branded a traitor in the city, a traitor to all of you and my good friends.

leader. True,

but a slur might have been forced out of him,

by anger perhaps, not any firm conviction.

creon. The charge was made in public, wasn't it?

I put the prophet up to spreading lies?

leader. Such things were said . . .

I don't know with what intent, if any.

creon. Was his glance steady, his mind right when the charge was brought against me?

leader. I really couldn't say. I never look to judge the ones in power.

[The doors open. oedipus enters.]

Wait,

here's Oedipus now.

oedipus. You—here? You have the gall to show your face before the palace gates?

You, plotting to kill me, kill the king—

I see it all, the marauding thief himself scheming to steal my crown and power!

Tell me,

in god's name, what did you take me for,

coward or fool, when you spun out your plot?

Your treachery—you think I'd never detect it creeping against me in the dark? Or sensing it, not defend myself? Aren't you the fool,

you and your high adventure. Lacking numbers, powerful friends, out for the big game of empire—

you need riches, armies to bring that quarry down!

creon. Are you quite finished? It's your turn to listen for just as long as you've . . . instructed me.

Hear me out, then judge me on the facts.

oedipus. You've a wicked way with words, Creon, but I'll be slow to learn—from you.

I find you a menace, a great burden to me.

creon. Just one thing, hear me out in this.

oedipus. Just one thing,

don't tell me you're not the enemy, the traitor.

creon. Look, if you think crude, mindless stubbornness such a gift, you've lost your sense of balance.

oedipus. If you think you can abuse a kinsman, then escape the penalty, you're insane.

creon. Fair enough, I grant you. But this injury you say I've done you, what is it?

oedipus. Did you induce me, yes or no,

to send for that sanctimonious prophet?

creon. I did. And I'd do the same again.

oedipus. All right then, tell me, how long is it now since Laius . . .

creon. Laius—what did he do?

oedipus. Vanished,

swept from sight, murdered in his tracks.

creon. The count of the years would run you far back . . .

oedipus. And that far back, was the prophet at his trade?

creon. Skilled as he is today, and just as honored.

oedipus. Did he ever refer to me then, at that time?

creon. No,

never, at least, when I was in his presence.

oedipus. But you did investigate the murder, didn't you?

creon. We did our best, of course, discovered nothing.

oedipus. But the great seer never accused me then—why not?

creon. I don't know. And when I don't, I keep quiet.

oedipus. You do know this, you'd tell it too—
if you had a shred of decency.

creon. What?
If I know, I won't hold back.

oedipus. Simply this:
if the two of you had never put heads together,
we would never have heard about my killing Laius.

creon. If that's what he says . . . well, you know best.
But now I have a right to learn from you as you just learned from me.

oedipus. Learn your fill,
you never will convict me of the murder.

creon. Tell me, you're married to my sister, aren't you?

oedipus. A genuine discovery—there's no denying that.

creon. And you rule the land with her, with equal power?

oedipus. She receives from me whatever she desires.

creon. And I am the third, all of us are equals?

oedipus. Yes, and it's there you show your stripes—you betray a kinsman.

creon. Not at all.
Not if you see things calmly, rationally, as I do. Look at it this way first:
who in his right mind would rather rule and live in anxiety than sleep in peace?

Particularly if he enjoys the same authority.
Not I, I'm not the man to yearn for kingship, not with a king's power in my hands. Who would?
Now, as it is, you offer me all I need, not a fear in the world. But if I wore the crown . . .
there'd be many painful duties to perform,
hardly to my taste.
How could kingship
please me more than influence, power without a qualm? I'm not that deluded yet, to reach for anything but privilege outright, profit free and clear.
Now all men sing my praises, all salute me,
now all who request your favors curry mine.
I am their best hope: success rests in me.
Why give up that, I ask you, and borrow trouble?
A man of sense, someone who sees things clearly would never resort to treason.
No, I've no lust for conspiracy in me,
nor could I ever suffer one who does.
Do you want proof? Go to Delphi yourself, examine the oracle and see if I've reported the message word-for-word. This too:
if you detect that I and the clairvoyant have plotted anything in common, arrest me, execute me. Not on the strength of one vote,
two in this case, mine as well as yours.
But don't convict me on sheer unverified surmise.

How wrong it is to take the good for bad,

purely at random, or take the bad for good.

But reject a friend, a kinsman? I would as soon tear out the life within us, priceless life itself.

You'll learn this well, without fail, in time.

Time alone can bring the just man to light—

the criminal you can spot in one short day.

leader. Good advice,

my lord, for anyone who wants to avoid disaster.

Those who jump to conclusions may go wrong.

oedipus. When my enemy moves against me quickly, plots in secret, I move quickly too, I must,

I plot and pay him back. Relax my guard a moment, waiting his next move—he wins his objective,

I lose mine.

creon. What do you want?

You want me banished?

oedipus. No, I want you dead.

creon. Just to show how ugly a grudge can . . .

oedipus. So,

still stubborn? you don't think I'm serious?

creon. I think you're insane.

oedipus. Quite sane—in my behalf.

creon. Not just as much in mine?

oedipus. You—my mortal enemy?

creon. What if you're wholly wrong?

oedipus. No matter—I must rule.

creon. Not if you rule unjustly.

oedipus. Hear him, Thebes, my city!

creon. My city too, not yours alone!

leader. Please, my lords.

[Enter jocasta from the palace.]

Look, Jocasta's coming, and just in time too. With her help you must put this fighting of yours to rest.

jocasta. Have you no sense? Poor misguided men, such shouting—why this public outburst?

Aren't you ashamed, with the land so sick,

to stir up private quarrels?

[To oedipus.]

Into the palace now. And Creon, you go home.

Why make such a furor over nothing?

creon. My sister, it's dreadful . . . Oedipus, your husband, he's bent on a choice of punishments for me, banishment from the fatherland or death.

oedipus. Precisely. I caught him in the act, Jocasta, plotting, about to stab me in the back.

creon. Never—curse me, let me die and be damned

if I've done you any wrong you charge me with.

jocasta. Oh god, believe it, Oedipus, honor the solemn oath he swears to heaven.

Do it for me, for the sake of all your people.

[The chorus begins to chant.]

chorus. Believe it, be sensible give way, my king, I beg you!

oedipus. What do you want from me, concessions?

chorus. Respect him—he's been no fool in the past and now he's strong with the oath he swears to god.
oedipus. You know what you're asking?
chorus. I do.
oedipus. Then out with it!
chorus. The man's your friend, your kin, he's under oath—don't cast him out, disgraced branded with guilt on the strength of hearsay only.
oedipus. Know full well, if that is what you want you want me dead or banished from the land.
chorus. Never—
no, by the blazing Sun, first god of the heavens!
Stripped of the gods, stripped of loved ones,
let me die by inches if that ever crossed my mind.
But the heart inside me sickens, dies as the land dies and now on top of the old griefs you pile this, your fury—both of you!
oedipus. Then let him go,
even if it does lead to my ruin, my death or my disgrace, driven from Thebes for life.
It's you, not him I pity—your words move me.
He, wherever he goes, my hate goes with him.
creon. Look at you, sullen in yielding, brutal in your rage—you'll go too far. It's perfect justice:
natures like yours are hardest on themselves.
oedipus. Then leave me alone—get out!
creon. I'm going.
You're wrong, so wrong. These men know I'm right.

[Exit to the side. The chorus turns to jocasta.]

chorus. Why do you hesitate, my lady why not help him in?

jocasta. Tell me what's happened first.

chorus. Loose, ignorant talk started dark suspicions and a sense of injustice cut deeply too.

jocasta. On both sides?

chorus. Oh yes.

jocasta. What did they say?

chorus. Enough, please, enough! The land's so racked already or so it seems to me . . .
End the trouble here, just where they left it.

oedipus. You see what comes of your good intentions now?
And all because you tried to blunt my anger.

chorus. My king,
I've said it once, I'll say it time and again—
I'd be insane, you know it, senseless, ever to turn my back on you.
You who set our beloved land—storm-tossed, shattered—straight on course. Now again, good helmsman, steer us through the storm!

[The chorus draws away, leaving oedipus and jocasta side by side.]

jocasta. For the love of god,
Oedipus, tell me too, what is it?
Why this rage? You're so unbending.

oedipus. I will tell you. I respect you, Jocasta, much more than these . . .

[Glancing at the chorus.]

Creon's to blame, Creon schemes against me.

jocasta. Tell me clearly, how did the quarrel start?

oedipus. He says I murdered Laius—I am guilty.

jocasta. How does he know? Some secret knowledge or simple hearsay?

oedipus. Oh, he sent his prophet in to do his dirty work. You know Creon,

Creon keeps his own lips clean.

jocasta. A prophet?

Well then, free yourself of every charge!

Listen to me and learn some peace of mind:

no skill in the world,

nothing human can penetrate the future.

Here is proof, quick and to the point.

An oracle came to Laius one fine day

(I won't say from Apollo himself but his underlings, his priests) and it said that doom would strike him down at the hands of a son, our son, to be born of our own flesh and blood. But Laius, so the report goes at least, was killed by strangers, thieves, at a place where three roads meet . . . my son—

he wasn't three days old and the boy's father fastened his ankles, had a henchman fling him away on a barren, trackless mountain.

There, you see?

Apollo brought neither thing to pass. My baby no more murdered his father than Laius suffered—his wildest fear—death at his own son's hands.

That's how the seers and all their revelations mapped out the future. Brush them from your mind.

Whatever the god needs and seeks he'll bring to light himself, with ease.

oedipus. Strange,

hearing you just now . . . my mind wandered,

my thoughts racing back and forth.

jocasta. What do you mean? Why so anxious, startled?

oedipus. I thought I heard you say that Laius was cut down at a place where three roads meet.

jocasta. That was the story. It hasn't died out yet.

oedipus. Where did this thing happen? Be precise.

jocasta. A place called Phocis, where two branching roads, one from Daulia, one from Delphi, come together—a crossroads.

oedipus. When? How long ago?

jocasta. The heralds no sooner reported Laius dead than you appeared and they hailed you king of Thebes.

oedipus. My god, my god—what have you planned to do to me?

jocasta. What, Oedipus? What haunts you so?

oedipus. Not yet.

Laius—how did he look? Describe him.

Had he reached his prime?

jocasta. He was swarthy, and the gray had just begun to streak his temples, and his build . . . wasn't far from yours.

oedipus. Oh no no,

I think I've just called down a dreadful curse upon myself—I simply didn't know!

jocasta. What are you saying? I shudder to look at you.

oedipus. I have a terrible fear the blind seer can see.

I'll know in a moment. One thing more—jocasta. Anything, afraid as I am—ask, I'll answer, all I can.

oedipus. Did he go with a light or heavy escort, several men-at-arms, like a lord, a king?

jocasta. There were five in the party, a herald among them, and a single wagon carrying Laius.

oedipus. Ai—

now I can see it all, clear as day.

Who told you all this at the time, Jocasta?

jocasta. A servant who reached home, the lone survivor.

oedipus. So, could he still be in the palace—even now?

jocasta. No indeed. Soon as he returned from the scene and saw you on the throne with Laius dead and gone,

he knelt and clutched my hand, pleading with me to send him into the hinterlands, to pasture, far as possible, out of sight of Thebes.

I sent him away. Slave though he was, he'd earned that favor—and much more.

oedipus. Can we bring him back, quickly?

jocasta. Easily. Why do you want him so?

oedipus. I'm afraid,

Jocasta, I have said too much already.

That man—I've got to see him.

jocasta. Then he'll come.

But even I have a right, I'd like to think,
to know what's torturing you, my lord.

oedipus. And so you shall—I can hold nothing back from you, now I've reached this pitch of dark foreboding.
Who means more to me than you? Tell me, whom would I turn toward but you
as I go through all this?
My father was Polybus, king of Corinth.
My mother, a Dorian, Merope. And I was held the prince of the realm among the people there, till something struck me out of nowhere, something strange . . . worth remarking perhaps,
hardly worth the anxiety I gave it.
Some man at a banquet who had drunk too much shouted out—he was far gone, mind you—that I am not my father's son. Fighting words!
I barely restrained myself that day
but early the next I went to mother and father, questioned them closely, and they were enraged
at the accusation and the fool who let it fly.
So as for my parents I was satisfied,
but still this thing kept gnawing at me,
the slander spread—I had to make my move.
And so,
unknown to mother and father I set out for Delphi, and the god Apollo spurned me, sent me away denied the facts I came for,
but first he flashed before my eyes a future

great with pain, terror, disaster—I can hear him cry,
"You are fated to couple with your mother, you will bring a breed of children into the light no man can bear to see—you will kill your father, the one who gave you life!"
I heard all that and ran. I abandoned Corinth, from that day on I gauged its landfall only by the stars, running, always running toward some place where I would never see the shame of all those oracles come true.
And as I fled I reached that very spot where the great king, you say, met his death.
Now, Jocasta, I will tell you all.
Making my way toward this triple crossroad
I began to see a herald, then a brace of colts drawing a wagon, and mounted on the bench . . . a man,
just as you've described him, coming face-to-face,
and the one in the lead and the old man himself were about to thrust me off the road—brute force—and the one shouldering me aside, the driver,
I strike him in anger!—and the old man, watching me coming up along his wheels—he brings down his prod, two prongs straight at my head!
I paid him back with interest!
Short work, by god—with one blow of the staff in this right hand I knock him out of his high seat, roll him out of the wagon, sprawling headlong—
I killed them all—every mother's son!
Oh, but if there is any blood-tie between Laius and this stranger . . .

what man alive more miserable than I?

More hated by the gods? I am the man

no alien, no citizen welcomes to his house,

law forbids it—not a word to me in public,

driven out of every hearth and home.

And all these curses I—no one but I brought down these piling curses on myself!

And you, his wife, I've touched your body with these,

the hands that killed your husband cover you with blood.

Wasn't I born for torment? Look me in the eyes!

I am abomination—heart and soul!

I must be exiled, and even in exile never see my parents, never set foot on native ground again. Else I am doomed to couple with my mother and cut my father down . . .

Polybus who reared me, gave me life.

But why, why?

Wouldn't a man of judgment say—and wouldn't he be right—

some savage power has brought this down upon my head?

Oh no, not that, you pure and awesome gods, never let me see that day! Let me slip from the world of men, vanish without a trace before I see myself stained with such corruption, stained to the heart.

leader. My lord, you fill our hearts with fear.

But at least until you question the witness,

do take hope.

oedipus. Exactly. He is my last hope—

I am waiting for the shepherd. He is crucial.

jocasta. And once he appears, what then? Why so urgent?

oedipus. I will tell you. If it turns out that his story matches yours, I've escaped the worst.

jocasta. What did I say? What struck you so?

oedipus. You said thieves—

he told you a whole band of them murdered Laius.

So, if he still holds to the same number,

I cannot be the killer. One can't equal many.

But if he refers to one man, one alone,

clearly the scales come down on me:

I am guilty.

jocasta. Impossible. Trust me,

I told you precisely what he said,

and he can't retract it now;

the whole city heard it, not just I.

And even if he should vary his first report

by one man more or less, still, my lord,

he could never make the murder of Laius truly fit the prophecy. Apollo was explicit:

my son was doomed to kill my husband . . . my son,

poor defenseless thing, he never had a chance to kill his father. They destroyed him first.

So much for prophecy. It's neither here nor there.

From this day on, I wouldn't look right or left.

oedipus. True, true. Still, that shepherd, someone fetch him—now!

jocasta. I'll send at once. But do let's go inside.

I'd never displease you, least of all in this.

[oedipus and jocasta enter the palace.]

chorus. Destiny guide me always Destiny find me filled with reverence pure in word and deed.

Great laws tower above us, reared on high born for the brilliant vault of heaven—

Olympian Sky their only father, nothing mortal, no man gave them birth,

their memory deathless, never lost in sleep:

within them lives a mighty god, the god does not grow old.

Pride breeds the tyrant violent pride, gorging, crammed to bursting with all that is overripe and rich with ruin—clawing up to the heights, headlong pride crashes down the abyss—sheer doom!

No footing helps, all foothold lost and gone.

But the healthy strife that makes the city strong—

I pray that god will never end that wrestling:

god, my champion, I will never let you go.

But if any man comes striding, high and mighty in all he says and does,

no fear of justice, no reverence for the temples of the gods—

let a rough doom tear him down, repay his pride, breakneck, ruinous pride!

If he cannot reap his profits fairly cannot restrain himself from outrage—

mad, laying hands on the holy things untouchable!

Can such a man, so desperate, still boast

he can save his life from the flashing bolts of god?

If all such violence goes with honor now

why join the sacred dance?

Never again will I go reverent to Delphi,

the inviolate heart of Earth or Apollo's ancient oracle at Abae or Olympia of the fires—

unless these prophecies all come true for all mankind to point toward in wonder.

King of kings, if you deserve your titles

Zeus, remember, never forget!

You and your deathless, everlasting reign.

They are dying, the old oracles sent to Laius,

now our masters strike them off the rolls.

Nowhere Apollo's golden glory now—

the gods, the gods go down.

[Enter jocasta from the palace, carrying a suppliant's branch wound in wool.]

jocasta. Lords of the realm, it occurred to me, just now, to visit the temples of the gods,

so I have my branch in my hand and incense too.

Oedipus is beside himself. Racked with anguish, no longer a man of sense, he won't admit the latest prophecies are hollow as the old—

he's at the mercy of every passing voice

if the voice tells of terror.

I urge him gently, nothing seems to help,

so I turn to you, Apollo, you are nearest.

[Placing her branch on the altar, while an old herdsman enters from the side, not the one just summoned by the King but an unexpected messenger from Corinth.]

I come with prayers and offerings . . . I beg you, cleanse us, set us free of defilement!

Look at us, passengers in the grip of fear, watching the pilot of the vessel go to pieces.

messenger. [Approaching jocasta and the chorus.]

Strangers, please, I wonder if you could lead us to the palace of the king . . . I think it's Oedipus.

Better, the man himself—you know where he is?

leader. This is his palace, stranger. He's inside.

But here is his queen, his wife and mother of his children.

messenger. Blessings on you, noble queen, queen of Oedipus crowned with all your family—blessings on you always!

jocasta. And the same to you, stranger, you deserve it . . .

such a greeting. But what have you come for?

Have you brought us news?

messenger. Wonderful news—

for the house, my lady, for your husband too.

jocasta. Really, what? Who sent you?

messenger. Corinth.

I'll give you the message in a moment.

You'll be glad of it—how could you help it?—

though it costs a little sorrow in the bargain.

jocasta. What can it be, with such a double edge?

messenger. The people there, they want to make your Oedipus king of Corinth, so they're saying now.

jocasta. Why? Isn't old Polybus still in power?

messenger. No more. Death has got him in the tomb.

jocasta. What are you saying? Polybus, dead?—dead?

messenger. If not,
if I'm not telling the truth, strike me dead too.

jocasta. [To a servant.]
Quickly, go to your master, tell him this!
You prophecies of the gods, where are you now?
This is the man that Oedipus feared for years,
he fled him, not to kill him—and now he's dead,
quite by chance, a normal, natural death,
not murdered by his son.

oedipus. [Emerging from the palace.]
Dearest,
what now? Why call me from the palace?

jocasta. [Bringing the messenger closer.] Listen to him, see for yourself what all those awful prophecies of god have come to.

oedipus. And who is he? What can he have for me?

jocasta. He's from Corinth, he's come to tell you your father is no more—Polybus—he's dead!

oedipus. [Wheeling on the messenger.]
What? Let me have it from your lips.

messenger. Well,
if that's what you want first, then here it is:

make no mistake, Polybus is dead and gone.

oedipus. How—murder? sickness?—what? what killed him?

messenger. A light tip of the scales put old bones to rest.

oedipus. Sickness then—poor man, it wore him down.

messenger. That,

and the long count of years he'd measured out.

oedipus. So!

Jocasta, why, why look to the Prophet's hearth,

the fires of the future? Why scan the birds that scream above our heads? They winged me on to the murder of my father, did they? That was my doom?

Well look, he's dead and buried, hidden under the earth, and here I am in Thebes, I never put hand to sword—

unless some longing for me wasted him away,

then in a sense you'd say I caused his death.

But now, all those prophecies I feared—Polybus packs them off to sleep with him in hell!

They're nothing, worthless.

jocasta. There.

Didn't I tell you from the start?

oedipus. So you did. I was lost in fear.

jocasta. No more, sweep it from your mind forever.

oedipus. But my mother's bed, surely I must fear—jocasta. Fear?

What should a man fear? It's all chance, chance rules our lives. Not a man on earth can see a day ahead, groping through the dark.

Better to live at random, best we can.

And as for this marriage with your mother—

have no fear. Many a man before you, in his dreams, has shared his mother's bed.

Take such things for shadows, nothing at all—

Live, Oedipus,

as if there's no tomorrow!

oedipus. Brave words, and you'd persuade me if mother weren't alive.

But mother lives, so for all your reassurances

I live in fear, I must.

jocasta. But your father's death, that, at least, is a great blessing, joy to the eyes!

oedipus. Great, I know . . . but I fear her—she's still alive.

messenger. Wait, who is this woman, makes you so afraid?

oedipus. Merope, old man. The wife of Polybus.

messenger. The queen? What's there to fear in her?

oedipus. A dreadful prophecy, stranger, sent by the gods.

messenger. Tell me, could you? Unless it's forbidden other ears to hear.

oedipus. Not at all.

Apollo told me once—it is my fate—

I must make love with my own mother, shed my father's blood with my own hands.

So for years I've given Corinth a wide berth, and it's been my good fortune too. But still,

to see one's parents and look into their eyes

is the greatest joy I know.

messenger. You're afraid of that?

That kept you out of Corinth?

oedipus. My father, old man—

so I wouldn't kill my father.

messenger. So that's it.

Well then, seeing I came with such good will, my king,

why don't I rid you of that old worry now?

oedipus. What a rich reward you'd have for that!

messenger. What do you think I came for, majesty?

So you'd come home and I'd be better off.

oedipus. Never, I will never go near my parents.

messenger. My boy, it's clear, you don't know what you're doing.

oedipus. What do you mean, old man? For god's sake, explain.

messenger. If you ran from them, always dodging home . . .

oedipus. Always, terrified Apollo's oracle might come true—messenger. And you'd be covered with guilt, from both your parents.

oedipus. That's right, old man, that fear is always with me.

messenger. Don't you know? You've really nothing to fear.

oedipus. But why? If I'm their son—Merope, Polybus?

messenger. Polybus was nothing to you, that's why, not in blood.

oedipus. What are you saying—Polybus was not my father?

messenger. No more than I am. He and I are equals.

oedipus. My father—

how can my father equal nothing? You're nothing to me!

messenger. Neither was he, no more your father than I am.

oedipus. Then why did he call me his son?

messenger. You were a gift, years ago—know for a fact he took you from my hands.

oedipus. No, from another's hands?

Then how could he love me so? He loved me, deeply . . .

messenger. True, and his early years without a child made him love you all the more.

oedipus. And you, did you . . .

buy me? find me by accident?

messenger. I stumbled on you, down the woody flanks of Mount Cithaeron.

oedipus. So close,

what were you doing here, just passing through?

messenger. Watching over my flocks, grazing them on the slopes.

oedipus. A herdsman, were you? A vagabond, scraping for wages?

messenger. Your savior too, my son, in your worst hour.

oedipus. Oh—

when you picked me up, was I in pain? What exactly?

messenger. Your ankles . . . they tell the story. Look at them.

oedipus. Why remind me of that, that old affliction?

messenger. Your ankles were pinned together. I set you free.

oedipus. That dreadful mark—I've had it from the cradle.

messenger. And you got your name¡ from that misfortune too, the name's still with you.

oedipus. Dear god, who did it?—

mother? father? Tell me.

messenger. I don't know.

The one who gave you to me, he'd know more.

oedipus. What? You took me from someone else?

You didn't find me yourself?

messenger. No sir,

another shepherd passed you on to me.

oedipus. Who? Do you know? Describe him.

messenger. He called himself a servant of . . .

if I remember rightly—Laius.

[jocasta turns sharply.]

oedipus. The king of the land who ruled here long ago?

messenger. That's the one. That herdsman was his man.

oedipus. Is he still alive? Can I see him?

messenger. They'd know best, the people of these parts.

[oedipus and the messenger turn to the chorus.]

oedipus. Does anyone know that herdsman, the one he mentioned? Anyone seen him in the fields, in the city? Out with it!

The time has come to reveal this once for all.

leader. I think he's the very shepherd you wanted to see, a moment ago. But the queen, Jocasta, she's the one to say.

oedipus. Jocasta,

you remember the man we just sent for?

Is that the one he means?

jocasta. That man . . .

why ask? Old shepherd, talk, empty nonsense, don't give it another thought, don't even think—oedipus. What—give up now, with a clue like this?

Fail to solve the mystery of my birth?

Not for all the world!

jocasta. Stop—in the name of god,

if you love your own life, call off this search!

My suffering is enough.

oedipus. Courage!

Even if my mother turns out to be a slave,

and I a slave, three generations back,

you would not seem common.

jocasta. Oh no,

listen to me, I beg you, don't do this.

oedipus. Listen to you? No more. I must know it all, must see the truth at last.

jocasta. No, please—for your sake—I want the best for you!

oedipus. Your best is more than I can bear.

jocasta. You're doomed—

may you never fathom who you are!

oedipus. [To a servant.] Hurry, fetch me the herdsman, now!

Leave her to glory in her royal birth.

jocasta. Aieeeeee—

man of agony—

that is the only name I have for you,

that, no other—ever, ever, ever!

[Flinging through the palace doors. A long, tense silence follows.]

leader. Where's she gone, Oedipus?

Rushing off, such wild grief . . .

I'm afraid that from this silence something monstrous may come bursting forth.

oedipus. Let it burst! Whatever will, whatever must!

I must know my birth, no matter how common

it may be—I must see my origins face-to-face.

She perhaps, she with her woman's pride may well be mortified by my birth, but I, I count myself the son of Chance,
the great goddess, giver of all good things—
I'll never see myself disgraced. She is my mother!
And the moons have marked me out, my blood-brothers,
one moon on the wane, the next moon great with power.
That is my blood, my nature—I will never betray it,
never fail to search and learn my birth!

chorus. Yes—if I am a true prophet
if I can grasp the truth,
by the boundless skies of Olympus,
at the full moon of tomorrow, Mount Cithaeron
you will know how Oedipus glories in you—you, his birthplace, nurse, his mountain-mother!
And we will sing you, dancing out your praise—
you lift our monarch's heart!
Apollo, Apollo, god of the wild cry may our dancing please you!

Oedipus—

son, dear child, who bore you?
Who of the nymphs who seem to live forever
mated with Pan,¡ the mountain-striding Father?
Who was your mother? who, some bride of Apollo
the god who loves the pastures spreading toward the sun?
Or was it Hermes, king of the lightning ridges?
Or Dionysus, lord of frenzy, lord of the barren peaks—did he seize you in his hands, dearest of all his lucky finds?—

found by the nymphs, their warm eyes dancing, gift to the lord who loves them dancing out his joy!

[oedipus strains to see a figure coming from the distance. Attended by palace guards, an old shepherd enters slowly, reluctant to approach the king.]

oedipus. I never met the man, my friends . . . still,

if I had to guess, I'd say that's the shepherd,

the very one we've looked for all along.

Brothers in old age, two of a kind,

he and our guest here. At any rate the ones who bring him in are my own men,

I recognize them.

[Turning to the leader.]

But you know more than I,

you should, you've seen the man before.

leader. I know him, definitely. One of Laius' men, a trusty shepherd, if there ever was one.

oedipus. You, I ask you first, stranger, you from Corinth—is this the one you mean?

messenger. You're looking at him. He's your man.

oedipus. [To the shepherd.]

You, old man, come over here—

look at me. Answer all my questions.

Did you ever serve King Laius?

shepherd. So I did . . .

a slave, not bought on the block though,

born and reared in the palace.

oedipus. Your duties, your kind of work?

shepherd. Herding the flocks, the better part of my life.

oedipus. Where, mostly? Where did you do your grazing?

shepherd. Well,

Cithaeron sometimes, or the foothills round about.

oedipus. This man—you know him? ever see him there?

shepherd. [Confused, glancing from the messenger to the king.]

Doing what?—what man do you mean?

oedipus. [Pointing to the messenger.]

This one here—ever have dealings with him?

shepherd. Not so I could say, but give me a chance, my memory's bad . . .

messenger. No wonder he doesn't know me, master.

But let me refresh his memory for him.

I'm sure he recalls old times we had on the slopes of Mount Cithaeron;

he and I, grazing our flocks, he with two and I with one—we both struck up together,

three whole seasons, six months at a stretch from spring to the rising of Arcturus¡ in the fall,

then with winter coming on I'd drive my herds to my own pens, and back he'd go with his to Laius' folds.

[To the shepherd.]

Now that's how it was,

wasn't it—yes or no?

shepherd. Yes, I suppose . . .

it's all so long ago.

messenger. Come, tell me,

you gave me a child back then, a boy, remember?

A little fellow to rear, my very own.

shepherd. What? Why rake up that again?

messenger. Look, here he is, my fine old friend—

the same man who was just a baby then.

shepherd. Damn you, shut your mouth—quiet!

oedipus. Don't lash out at him, old man—you need lashing more than he does.

shepherd. Why,

master, majesty—what have I done wrong?

oedipus. You won't answer his question about the boy.

shepherd. He's talking nonsense, wasting his breath.

oedipus. So, you won't talk willingly—then you'll talk with pain.

[The guards seize the shepherd.]

shepherd. No, dear god, don't torture an old man!

oedipus. Twist his arms back, quickly!

shepherd. God help us, why?—

what more do you need to know?

oedipus. Did you give him that child? He's asking.

shepherd. I did . . . I wish to god I'd died that day.

oedipus. You've got your wish if you don't tell the truth.

shepherd. The more I tell, the worse the death I'll die.

oedipus. Our friend here wants to stretch things out, does he?

[Motioning to his men for torture.]

shepherd. No, no, I gave it to him—I just said so.

oedipus. Where did you get it? Your house? Someone else's?

shepherd. It wasn't mine, no. I got it from . . . someone.

oedipus. Which one of them?

[Looking at the citizens.]

Whose house?

shepherd. No—

god's sake, master, no more questions!

oedipus. You're a dead man if I have to ask again.

shepherd. Then—the child came from the house . . . of Laius.

oedipus. A slave? or born of his own blood?

shepherd. Oh no,

I'm right at the edge, the horrible truth—I've got to say it!

oedipus. And I'm at the edge of hearing horrors, yes, but I must hear!

shepherd. All right! His son, they said it was—his son!

But the one inside, your wife, she'd tell it best.

oedipus. My wife—

she gave it to you?

shepherd. Yes, yes, my king.

oedipus. Why, what for?

shepherd. To kill it.

oedipus. Her own child,

how could she?

shepherd. She was afraid—frightening prophecies.

oedipus. What?

shepherd. They said—

he'd kill his parents.

oedipus. But you gave him to this old man—why?

shepherd. I pitied the little baby, master, hoped he'd take him off to his own country,

far away, but he saved him for this, his fate.

If you are the man he says you are, believe me,

you were born for pain.

oedipus. O god—

all come true, all burst to light!

O light—now let me look my last on you!

I stand revealed at last—cursed in my birth, cursed in marriage, cursed in the lives I cut down with these hands!

[Rushing through the doors with a great cry. The Corinthian messenger, the shepherd and attendants exit slowly to the side.]

chorus. O the generations of men

the dying generations—adding the total of all your lives I find they come to nothing . . .

does there exist, is there a man on earth who seizes more joy than just a dream, a vision?

And the vision no sooner dawns than dies blazing into oblivion.

You are my great example, you, your life

your destiny, Oedipus, man of misery—

I count no man blest.

You outranged all men!

Bending your bow to the breaking-point

you captured priceless glory, O dear god, and the Sphinx came crashing down,

the virgin, claws hooked

like a bird of omen singing, shrieking death—

like a fortress reared in the face of death

you rose and saved our land.

From that day on we called you king

we crowned you with honors, Oedipus, towering over all—mighty king of the seven gates of Thebes.

But now to hear your story—is there a man more agonized?

More wed to pain and frenzy? Not a man on earth, the joy of your life ground down to nothing

O Oedipus, name for the ages—

one and the same wide harbor served you son and father both son and father came to rest in the same bridal chamber.

How, how could the furrows your father plowed bear you, your agony, harrowing on in silence O so long?

But now for all your power

Time, all-seeing Time has dragged you to the light, judged your marriage monstrous from the start—the son and the father tangling, both one—

O child of Laius, would to god

I'd never seen you, never never!

Now I weep like a man who wails the dead and the dirge comes pouring forth with all my heart!

I tell you the truth, you gave me life

my breath leapt up in you and now you bring down the night upon my eyes.

[Enter a messenger from the palace.]

messenger. Men of Thebes, always first in honor, what horrors you will hear, what you will see,

what a heavy weight of sorrow you will shoulder . . .
if you are true to your birth, if you still have some feeling for the royal house of Thebes.
I tell you neither the waters of the Danube nor the Nile can wash this palace clean.
Such things it hides, it soon will bring to light—terrible things, and none done blindly now, all done with a will. The pains we inflict upon ourselves hurt most of all.

leader. God knows we have pains enough already.
What can you add to them?

messenger. The queen is dead.

leader. Poor lady—how?

messenger. By her own hand. But you are spared the worst, you never had to watch . . . I saw it all,
and with all the memory that's in me
you will learn what that poor woman suffered.
Once she'd broken in through the gates,
dashing past us, frantic, whipped to fury, ripping her hair out with both hands—straight to her rooms she rushed, flinging herself across the bridal-bed, doors slamming behind her—once inside, she wailed for Laius, dead so long, remembering how she bore his child long ago,
the life that rose up to destroy him, leaving its mother to mother living creatures with the very son she'd borne.
Oh how she wept, mourning the marriage-bed where she let loose that double brood—monsters—husband by her husband, children by her child.

And then—
but how she died is more than I can say. Suddenly Oedipus burst in, screaming, he stunned us so we couldn't watch her agony to the end, our eyes were fixed on him. Circling like a maddened beast, stalking, here, there, crying out to us—
Give him a sword! His wife, no wife, his mother, where can he find the mother earth that cropped two crops at once, himself and all his children?
He was raging—one of the dark powers pointing the way,
none of us mortals crowding around him, no, with a great shattering cry—someone, something leading him on—he hurled at the twin doors and bending the bolts back out of their sockets, crashed through the chamber.
And there we saw the woman hanging by the neck,
cradled high in a woven noose, spinning, swinging back and forth. And when he saw her,
giving a low, wrenching sob that broke our hearts,
slipping the halter from her throat, he eased her down,
in a slow embrace he laid her down, poor thing . . .
then, what came next, what horror we beheld!
He rips off her brooches, the long gold pins holding her robes—and lifting them high, looking straight up into the points,
he digs them down the sockets of his eyes, crying, "You, you'll see no more the pain I suffered, all the pain I caused!

Too long you looked on the ones you never should have seen, blind to the ones you longed to see, to know! Blind from this hour on! Blind in the darkness—blind!"
His voice like a dirge, rising, over and over raising the pins, raking them down his eyes.
And at each stroke blood spurts from the roots, splashing his beard, a swirl of it, nerves and clots—
black hail of blood pulsing, gushing down.
These are the griefs that burst upon them both,
coupling man and woman. The joy they had so lately, the fortune of their old ancestral house was deep joy indeed. Now, in this one day, wailing, madness and doom, death, disgrace,
all the griefs in the world that you can name,
all are theirs forever.

leader. Oh poor man, the misery—has he any rest from pain now?
[A voice within, in torment.]

messenger. He's shouting,
"Loose the bolts, someone, show me to all of Thebes!
My father's murderer, my mother's—"
No, I can't repeat it, it's unholy.
Now he'll tear himself from his native earth,
not linger, curse the house with his own curse.
But he needs strength, and a guide to lead him on.
This is sickness more than he can bear.
[The palace doors open.]

Look,

he'll show you himself. The great doors are opening—you are about to see a sight, a horror

even his mortal enemy would pity.

[Enter oedipus, blinded, led by a boy. He stands at the palace steps, as if surveying his people once again.]

chorus. O the terror—

the suffering, for all the world to see,

the worst terror that ever met my eyes.

What madness swept over you? What god, what dark power leapt beyond all bounds,

beyond belief, to crush your wretched life?—

godforsaken, cursed by the gods!

I pity you but I can't bear to look.

I've much to ask, so much to learn,

so much fascinates my eyes,

but you . . . I shudder at the sight.

oedipus. Oh, Ohh—

the agony! I am agony—

where am I going? where on earth?

where does all this agony hurl me?

where's my voice?—

winging, swept away on a dark tide—

My destiny, my dark power, what a leap you made!

chorus. To the depths of terror, too dark to hear, to see.

oedipus. Dark, horror of darkness

my darkness, drowning, swirling around me crashing wave on wave—unspeakable, irresistible headwind, fatal harbor! Oh again, the misery, all at once, over and over the stabbing daggers, stab of memory raking me insane.

chorus. No wonder you suffer twice over, the pain of your wounds,

the lasting grief of pain.

oedipus. Dear friend, still here?

Standing by me, still with a care for me,

the blind man? Such compassion, loyal to the last. Oh it's you,

I know you're here, dark as it is

I'd know you anywhere, your voice—

it's yours, clearly yours.

chorus. Dreadful, what you've done . . .

how could you bear it, gouging out your eyes?

What superhuman power drove you on?

oedipus. Apollo, friends, Apollo—

he ordained my agonies—these, my pains on pains!

But the hand that struck my eyes was mine,

mine alone—no one else—

I did it all myself!

What good were eyes to me?

Nothing I could see could bring me joy.

chorus. No, no, exactly as you say.

oedipus. What can I ever see?

What love, what call of the heart can touch my ears with joy? Nothing, friends.

Take me away, far, far from Thebes, quickly, cast me away, my friends—

this great murderous ruin, this man cursed to heaven,

the man the deathless gods hate most of all!

chorus. Pitiful, you suffer so, you understand so much . . .

I wish you'd never known.

oedipus. Die, die—

whoever he was that day in the wilds who cut my ankles free of the ruthless pins,

he pulled me clear of death, he saved my life

for this, this kindness—

Curse him, kill him!

If I'd died then, I'd never have dragged myself,

my loved ones through such hell.

chorus. Oh if only . . . would to god.

oedipus. I'd never have come to this,

my father's murderer—never been branded mother's husband, all men see me now! Now, loathed by the gods, son of the mother I defiled

coupling in my father's bed, spawning lives in the loins that spawned my wretched life. What grief can crown this grief?

It's mine alone, my destiny—I am Oedipus!

chorus. How can I say you've chosen for the best?

Better to die than be alive and blind.

oedipus. What I did was best—don't lecture me, no more advice. I, with my eyes,

how could I look my father in the eyes

when I go down to death? Or mother, so abused . . .

I have done such things to the two of them,

crimes too huge for hanging.

Worse yet,

the sight of my children, born as they were born,

how could I long to look into their eyes?

No, not with these eyes of mine, never.

Not this city either, her high towers,

the sacred glittering images of her gods—

I am misery! I, her best son, reared as no other son of Thebes was ever reared,

I've stripped myself, I gave the command myself.

All men must cast away the great blasphemer,

the curse now brought to light by the gods,

the son of Laius—I, my father's son!

Now I've exposed my guilt, horrendous guilt,

could I train a level glance on you, my countrymen?

Impossible! No, if I could just block off my ears,

the springs of hearing, I would stop at nothing—

I'd wall up my loathsome body like a prison, blind to the sound of life, not just the sight:

Oblivion—what a blessing . . .

for the mind to dwell a world away from pain.

O Cithaeron, why did you give me shelter?

Why didn't you take me, crush my life out on the spot?

I'd never have revealed my birth to all mankind.

O Polybus, Corinth, the old house of my fathers,

so I believed—what a handsome prince you raised—under the skin, what sickness to the core.

Look at me! Born of outrage, outrage to the core.
O triple roads—it all comes back, the secret, dark ravine, and the oaks closing in where the three roads join . . .
You drank my father's blood, my own blood spilled by my own hands—you still remember me?
What things you saw me do? Then I came here and did them all once more!
Marriages! O marriage, you gave me birth, and once you brought me into the world
you brought my sperm rising back, springing to light fathers, brothers, sons—one murderous breed—brides, wives, mothers. The blackest things a man can do, I have done them all!
No more—
it's wrong to name what's wrong to do. Quickly, for the love of god, hide me somewhere, kill me, hurl me into the sea
where you can never look on me again.
[Beckoning to the chorus as they shrink away.]
Closer,
it's all right. Touch the man of grief.
Do. Don't be afraid. My troubles are mine and I am the only man alive who can sustain them.
[Enter creon from the palace, attended by palace guards.]
leader. Put your requests to Creon. Here he is, just when we need him. He'll have a plan, he'll act.
Now that he's the sole defense of the country in your place.

oedipus. Oh no, what can I say to him?

How can I ever hope to win his trust?

I wronged him so, just now, in every way.

You must see that—I was so wrong, so wrong.

creon. I haven't come to mock you, Oedipus, or to criticize your former failings.

[Turning to the guards.]

You there,

have you lost all respect for human feelings?

At least revere the Sun, the holy fire that keeps us all alive. Never expose a thing of guilt and holy dread so great it appalls

the earth, the rain from heaven, the light of day!

Get him into the halls—quickly as you can.

Piety demands no less. Kindred alone should see a kinsman's shame. This is obscene.

oedipus. Please, in god's name . . . you wipe my fears away, coming so generously to me, the worst of men.

Do one thing more, for your sake, not mine.

creon. What do you want? Why so insistent?

oedipus. Drive me out of the land at once, far from sight, where I can never hear a human voice.

creon. I'd have done that already, I promise you.

First I wanted the god to clarify my duties.

oedipus. The god? His command was clear, every word:

death for the father-killer, the curse—

he said destroy me!

creon. So he did. Still, in such a crisis

it's better to ask precisely what to do.

oedipus. So miserable—

you'd consult the god about a man like me?

creon. By all means. And this time, I assume, even you will obey the god's decrees.

oedipus. I will,

I will. And you, I command you—I beg you . . .

the woman inside, bury her as you see fit.

It's the only decent thing,

to give your own the last rites. As for me, never condemn the city of my fathers to house my body, not while I'm alive, no,

let me live on the mountains, on Cithaeron,

my favorite haunt, I have made it famous.

Mother and father marked out that rock to be my everlasting tomb—buried alive.

Let me die there, where they tried to kill me.

Oh but this I know: no sickness can destroy me, nothing can. I would never have been saved from death—I have been saved for something great and terrible, something strange.

Well let my destiny come and take me on its way!

About my children, Creon, the boys at least,

don't burden yourself. They're men, wherever they go, they'll find the means to live.

But my two daughters, my poor helpless girls, clustering at our table, never without me hovering near them . . . whatever I touched,

they always had their share. Take care of them,

I beg you. Wait, better—permit me, would you?

Just to touch them with my hands and take our fill of tears. Please . . . my king.

Grant it, with all your noble heart.

If I could hold them, just once, I'd think

I had them with me, like the early days

when I could see their eyes.

[antigone and ismene, two small children, are led in from the palace by a nurse.]

What's that

O god! Do I really hear you sobbing?—

my two children. Creon, you've pitied me?

Sent me my darling girls, my own flesh and blood!

Am I right?

creon. Yes, it's my doing.

I know the joy they gave you all these years,

the joy you must feel now.

oedipus. Bless you, Creon!

May god watch over you for this kindness, better than he ever guarded me.

Children, where are you?

Here, come quickly—

[Groping for antigone and ismene, who approach their father cautiously, then embrace him.]

Come to these hands of mine, your brother's hands, your own father's hands that served his once bright eyes so well—that made them blind. Seeing nothing, children, knowing nothing, I became your father,

I fathered you in the soil that gave me life.
How I weep for you—I cannot see you now . . .
just thinking of all your days to come, the bitterness,
the life that rough mankind will thrust upon you.
Where are the public gatherings you can join,
the banquets of the clans? Home you'll come,
in tears, cut off from the sight of it all,
the brilliant rites unfinished.
And when you reach perfection, ripe for marriage, who will he be, my dear ones? Risking all to shoulder the curse that weighs down my parents,
yes and you too—that wounds us all together.
What more misery could you want?
Your father killed his father, sowed his mother,
one, one and the selfsame womb sprang you—
he cropped the very roots of his existence.
Such disgrace, and you must bear it all!
Who will marry you then? Not a man on earth.
Your doom is clear: you'll wither away to nothing,
single, without a child.
[Turning to creon.]
Oh Creon,
you are the only father they have now . . .
we who brought them into the world are gone, both gone at a stroke—
Don't let them go begging, abandoned, women without men. Your own flesh and blood!

Never bring them down to the level of my pains.

Pity them. Look at them, so young, so vulnerable, shorn of everything—you're their only hope.

Promise me, noble Creon, touch my hand!

[Reaching toward creon, who draws back.]

You, little ones, if you were old enough to understand, there is much I'd tell you.

Now, as it is, I'd have you say a prayer.

Pray for life, my children,

live where you are free to grow and season.

Pray god you find a better life than mine,

the father who begot you.

creon. Enough.

You've wept enough. Into the palace now.

oedipus. I must, but I find it very hard.

creon. Time is the great healer, you will see.

oedipus. I am going—you know on what condition?

creon. Tell me. I'm listening.

oedipus. Drive me out of Thebes, in exile.

creon. Not I. Only the gods can give you that.

oedipus. Surely the gods hate me so much—creon. You'll get your wish at once.

oedipus. You consent?

creon. I try to say what I mean; it's my habit.

oedipus. Then take me away. It's time.

creon. Come along, let go of the children.

oedipus. No—

don't take them away from me, not now! No no no!

[Clutching his daughters as the guards wrench them loose and take them through the palace doors.]

creon. Still the king, the master of all things?

No more: here your power ends.

None of your power follows you through life.

[Exit oedipus and creon to the palace. The chorus comes forward to address the audience directly.]

chorus. People of Thebes, my countrymen, look on Oedipus.

He solved the famous riddle with his brilliance,

he rose to power, a man beyond all power.

Who could behold his greatness without envy?

Now what a black sea of terror has overwhelmed him.

Now as we keep our watch and wait the final day, count no man happy till he dies, free of pain at last.

[Exit in procession.]

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

The Play on the Page

1. -On the basis of lines 1–149, characterize Oedipus. Does he seem an effective leader? What additional traits are revealed in lines 205–491?
2. -In your opinion, how fair is it to say that Oedipus is morally guilty? Does he argue that he is morally innocent because he did not intend to do immoral deeds? Can it be said that he is guilty of hybris but that hybris (see page 1095) has nothing to do with his fall?
3. -Oedipus says that he blinds himself in order not to look upon people he should not. What further reasons can be given? Why does he not (like Jocasta) commit suicide?
4. -Does the play show the futility of human effots to act intelligently?
5. -In Oedipus, do you find the gods evil?
6. -Are the choral odes lyrical interludes that serve to separate the scenes, or do they advance the dramatic action?

7. -Matthew Arnold said that Sophocles saw life steadily and saw it whole. But in this play is Sophocles facing the facts of life? Or, on the contrary, is he avoiding what we think of as normal life, and presenting a series of unnatural and outrageous coincidences? In either case, do you think the play is relevant today?

8. -Can you describe your emotions at the end of the play? Do they include pity for Oedipus? Pity for all human beings, including yourself? Fear that you might be punished for some unintended transgression? Awe, engendered by a perception of the interrelatedness of things? Relief that the story is only a story? Exhilaration? Explain your reaction.

The Play on the Stage

9. -During your first consideration of the play, start with a reading of lines 1–149. Choose someone from the group to stand on a chair (Oedipus), two other readers to stand nearby (the Priest and Creon), and several others to kneel or lie on the floor (Theban citizens). After this rough enactment, ask the readers how they felt about their roles. Then discuss the ways a modern staging could create a powerful opening for the play. Some questions to consider: Do the Thebans ever touch Oedipus? Should the actor playing Oedipus make eye contact with anyone on the stage?

10. -Originally the Greek chorus chanted and danced. What are your recommendations for a director today? Choose a particular passage from the play to illustrate your ideas.

11. -Imagine that you are directing a production of Oedipus. Propose a cast for the principal roles, using well-known actors or people from your own circle. Explain the reasons for your choices.

12. -What might be gained or lost by performing the play in modern dress? Or is there some period other than ancient Greece—let's say the Victorian period—in which you think the play might be effectively set?

13. -Alan MacVey, who directed a production at the University of Iowa, used classical costumes but afterward said that he wished he had used a conference table as the set and had costumed the royalty in "power suits." What is your response to this idea?

[TIME AND SCENE: The royal house of Thebes. It is still night, and the invading armies of Argos have just been driven from the city. Fighting on opposite sides, the sons of oedipus, eteocles and polynices, have killed each other in combat. Their uncle, creon, is now king of Thebes.

Enter antigone, slipping through the central doors of the palace. She motions to her sister, ismene, who follows her cautiously toward an altar at the center of the stage.]

antigone. My own flesh and blood—dear sister, dear Ismene, how many griefs our father Oedipus¡ handed down!

Do you know one, I ask you, one grief that Zeus¡ will not perfect for the two of us while we still live and breathe! There's nothing, no pain—our lives are pain—no private shame,

no public disgrace, nothing I haven't seen in your griefs and mine. And now this:

an emergency decree, they say, the Commander has just declared for all of Thebes.

What, haven't you heard? Don't you see?

The doom reserved for enemies marches on the ones we love the most.

ismene. Not I, I haven't heard a word, Antigone.

Nothing of loved ones,

no joy or pain has come my way, not since the two of us were robbed of our two brothers, both gone in a day, a double blow—

not since the armies of Argos vanished, just this very night. I know nothing more,

whether our luck's improved or ruin's still to come.

antigone. I thought so. That's why I brought you out here, past the gates, so you could hear in private.

ismene. What's the matter? Trouble, clearly . . .

you sound so dark, so grim.

antigone. Why not? Our own brothers' burial!

Hasn't Creon graced one with all the rites, disgraced the other? Eteocles, they say,

has been given full military honors,

rightly so—Creon's laid him in the earth and he goes with glory down among the dead.

But the body of Polynices, who died miserably—

why, a city-wide proclamation, rumor has it, forbids anyone to bury him, even mourn him.

He's to be left unwept, unburied, a lovely treasure for birds that scan the field and feast to their heart's content.

Such, I hear, is the martial law our good Creon lays down for you and me—yes, me, I tell you—and he's coming here to alert the uninformed

in no uncertain terms, and he won't treat the matter lightly. Whoever disobeys in the least will die, his doom is sealed:

stoning to death inside the city walls!

There you have it. You'll soon show what you are, worth your breeding, Ismene, or a coward—

for all your royal blood.

ismene. My poor sister, if things have come to this,

who am I to make or mend them, tell me, what good am I to you?

antigone. Decide.

Will you share the labor, share the work?

ismene. What work, what's the risk? What do you mean?

antigone. [Raising her hands.] Will you lift up his body with these bare hands

and lower it with me?

ismene. What? You'd bury him—when a law forbids the city?

antigone. Yes!

He is my brother and—deny it as you will—your brother too.

No one will ever convict me for a traitor.

ismene. So desperate, and Creon has expressly—

antigone. No,

he has no right to keep me from my own.

ismene. Oh my sister, think—think how our own father died, hated, his reputation in ruins, driven on by the crimes he brought to light himself to gouge out his eyes with his own hands—then mother . . . his mother and wife, both in one, mutilating her life in the twisted noose—

and last, our two brothers dead in a single day, both shedding their own blood, poor suffering boys,
battling out their common destiny hand-to-hand.
Now look at the two of us, left so alone . . .
think what a death we'll die, the worst of all
if we violate the laws and override the fixed decree of the throne, its power—we must be sensible. Remember we are women, we're not born to contend with men. Then too,
we're underlings, ruled by much stronger hands,
so we must submit in this, and things still worse.
I, for one, I'll beg the dead to forgive me—
I'm forced, I have no choice—I must obey the ones who stand in power. Why rush to extremes?
It's madness, madness.

antigone. I won't insist,
no, even if you should have a change of heart,
I'd never welcome you in the labor, not with me.
So, do as you like, whatever suits you best—
I'll bury him myself.
And even if I die in the act, that death will be a glory.
I'll lie with the one I love and loved by him—an outrage sacred to the gods! I have longer to please the dead than please the living here:

in the kingdom down below I'll lie forever.

Do as you like, dishonor the laws

the gods hold in honor.

ismene. I'd do them no dishonor . . .

but defy the city? I have no strength for that.

antigone. You have your excuses. I am on my way,

I'll raise a mound for him, for my dear brother.

ismene. Oh Antigone, you're so rash—I'm so afraid for you!

antigone. Don't fear for me. Set your own life in order.

ismene. Then don't, at least, blurt this out to anyone.

Keep it a secret. I'll join you in that, I promise.

antigone. Dear god, shout it from the rooftops. I'll hate you all the more for silence—tell the world!

ismene. So fiery—and it ought to chill your heart.

antigone. I know I please where I must please the most.

ismene. Yes, if you can, but you're in love with impossibility.

antigone. Very well then, once my strength gives out

I will be done at last.

ismene. You're wrong from the start, you're off on a hopeless quest.

antigone. If you say so, you will make me hate you, and the hatred of the dead, by all rights,

will haunt you night and day.

But leave me to my own absurdity, leave me to suffer this—dreadful thing. I'll suffer nothing as great as death without glory. [Exit to the side.]

ismene. Then go if you must, but rest assured, wild, irrational as you are, my sister,

you are truly dear to the ones who love you.

[Withdrawing to the palace. Enter a chorus, the old citizens of Thebes, chanting as the sun begins to rise.]

chorus. Glory!—great beam of sun, brightest of all that ever rose on the seven gates of Thebes, you burn through night at last!
Great eye of the golden day, mounting the Dirce's banks¡ you throw him back—the enemy out of Argos, the white shield, the man of bronze—he's flying headlong now
the bridle of fate stampeding him with pain!
And he had driven against our borders, launched by the warring claims of Polynices—like an eagle screaming, winging havoc over the land, wings of armor shielded white as snow,
a huge army massing,
crested helmets bristling for assault.
He hovered above our roofs, his vast maw gaping closing down around our seven gates, his spears thirsting for the kill but now he's gone, look,
before he could glut his jaws with Theban blood or the god of fire put our crown of towers to the torch.
He grappled the Dragon none can master—Thebes—
the clang of our arms like thunder at his back!
Zeus hates with a vengeance all bravado,
the mighty boasts of men. He watched them coming on in a rising flood, the pride of their golden armor ringing shrill—and brandishing his lightning blasted the fighter just at the goal, rushing to shout his triumph from our walls.

Down from the heights he crashed, pounding down on the earth!
And a moment ago, blazing torch in hand—
mad for attack, ecstatic
he breathed his rage, the storm of his fury hurling at our heads!
But now his high hopes have laid him low and down the enemy ranks the iron god of war deals his rewards, his stunning blows—Ares¡ rapture of battle, our right arm in the crisis.
Seven captains marshaled at seven gates seven against their equals, gave their brazen trophies up to Zeus, god of the breaking rout of battle,
all but two: those blood brothers,
one father, one mother—matched in rage, spears matched for the twin conquest—
clashed and won the common prize of death.
But now for Victory! Glorious in the morning, joy in her eyes to meet our joy
she is winging down to Thebes, our fleets of chariots wheeling in her wake—
Now let us win oblivion from the wars, thronging the temples of the gods

in singing, dancing choirs through the night!

Lord Dionysus,¡ god of the dance that shakes the land of Thebes, now lead the way!

[Enter creon from the palace, attended by his guard.]

But look, the king of the realm is coming,

Creon, the new man for the new day, whatever the gods are sending now . . .

what new plan will he launch?

Why this, this special session?

Why this sudden call to the old men summoned at one command?

creon. My countrymen,

the ship of state is safe. The gods who rocked her,

after a long, merciless pounding in the storm,

have righted her once more.

Out of the whole city

I have called you here alone. Well I know, first, your undeviating respect for the throne and royal power of King Laius.

Next, while Oedipus steered the land of Thebes,

and even after he died, your loyalty was unshakable, you still stood by their children. Now then,

since the two sons are dead—two blows of fate

in the same day, cut down by each other's hands,

both killers, both brothers stained with blood—

as I am next in kin to the dead,

I now possess the throne and all its powers.

Of course you cannot know a man completely,

his character, his principles, sense of judgment,
not till he's shown his colors, ruling the people, making laws. Experience, there's the test.
As I see it, whoever assumes the task,
the awesome task of setting the city's course,
and refuses to adopt the soundest policies
but fearing someone, keeps his lips locked tight, he's utterly worthless. So I rate him now,
I always have. And whoever places a friend above the good of his own country, he is nothing:
I have no use for him. Zeus my witness,
Zeus who sees all things, always—
I could never stand by silent, watching destruction march against our city, putting safety to rout, nor could I ever make that man a friend of mine who menaces our country. Remember this:
our country is our safety.
Only while she voyages true on course can we establish friendships, truer than blood itself.
Such are my standards. They make our city great.
Closely akin to them I have proclaimed, just now, the following decree to our people concerning the two sons of Oedipus.
Eteocles, who died fighting for Thebes, excelling all in arms: he shall be buried, crowned with a hero's honors, the cups we pour to soak the earth and reach the famous dead.
But as for his blood brother, Polynices, who returned from exile, home to his father-city and the gods of his race, consumed with one desire—to burn them roof to roots—who thirsted to drink his kinsmen's blood and sell the rest to slavery:

that man—a proclamation has forbidden the city to dignify him with burial, mourn him at all.
No, he must be left unburied, his corpse carrion for the birds and dogs to tear, an obscenity for the citizens to behold!
These are my principles. Never at my hands will the traitor be honored above the patriot.
But whoever proves his loyalty to the state:
I'll prize that man in death as well as life.

leader. If this is your pleasure, Creon, treating our city's enemy and our friend this way . . .
The power is yours, I suppose, to enforce it with the laws, both for the dead and all of us, the living.

creon. Follow my orders closely then,
be on your guard.

leader. We're too old.
Lay that burden on younger shoulders.

creon. No, no,
I don't mean the body—I've posted guards already.

leader. What commands for us then? What other service?

creon. See that you never side with those who break my orders.

leader. Never. Only a fool could be in love with death.

creon. Death is the price—you're right. But all too often the mere hope of money has ruined many men.

[A sentry enters from the side.]

sentry. My lord,

I can't say I'm winded from running, or set out with any spring in my legs either—no sir,

I was lost in thought, and it made me stop, often,

dead in my tracks, wheeling, turning back,

and all the time a voice inside me muttering,

"Idiot, why? You're going straight to your death."

Then muttering, "Stopped again, poor fool?

If somebody gets the news to Creon first,

what's to save your neck?"

And so,

mulling it over, on I trudged, dragging my feet,

you can make a short road take forever . . .

but at last, look, common sense won out,

I'm here, and I'm all yours,

and even though I come empty-handed

I'll tell my story just the same, because

I've come with a good grip on one hope,

what will come will come, whatever fate—

creon. Come to the point!

What's wrong—why so afraid?

sentry. First, myself, I've got to tell you,

I didn't do it, didn't see who did—

Be fair, don't take it out on me.

creon. You're playing it safe, soldier, barricading yourself from any trouble.

It's obvious, you've something strange to tell.

sentry. Dangerous too, and danger makes you delay for all you're worth.

creon. Out with it—then dismiss!

sentry. All right, here it comes. The body—someone's just buried it, then run off . . .

sprinkled some dry dust on the flesh,

given it proper rites.

creon. What?

What man alive would dare—sentry. I've no idea, I swear it.

There was no mark of a spade, no pickaxe there,

no earth turned up, the ground packed hard and dry,

unbroken, no tracks, no wheelruts, nothing,

the workman left no trace. Just at sunup

the first watch of the day points it out—it was a wonder! We were stunned . . .

a terrific burden too, for all of us, listen:

you can't see the corpse, not that it's buried, really, just a light cover of road-dust on it,

as if someone meant to lay the dead to rest and keep from getting cursed.

Not a sign in sight that dogs or wild beasts had worried the body, even torn the skin.

But what came next! Rough talk flew thick and fast, guard grilling guard—we'd have come to blows

at last, nothing to stop it; each man for himself and each the culprit, no one caught red-handed,

all of us pleading ignorance, dodging the charges,
ready to take up red-hot iron in our fists,
go through fire, swear oaths to the gods—
"I didn't do it, I had no hand in it either, not in the plotting, not in the work itself!"
Finally, after all this wrangling came to nothing,
one man spoke out and made us stare at the ground, hanging our heads in fear. No way to counter him, no way to take his advice and come through safe and sound. Here's what he said:
"Look, we've got to report the facts to Creon,
we can't keep this hidden." Well, that won out,
and the lot fell on me, condemned me, unlucky as ever, I got the prize. So here I am, against my will and yours too, well I know—
no one wants the man who brings bad news.

leader. My king,
ever since he began I've been debating in my mind,
could this possibly be the work of the gods?

creon. Stop—
before you make me choke with anger—the gods!
You, you're senile, must you be insane?
You say—why it's intolerable—say the gods could have the slightest concern for that corpse?
Tell me, was it for meritorious service they proceeded to bury him, prized him so? The hero who came to burn their temples ringed with pillars, their golden treasures—scorch their hallowed earth and fling their laws to the winds.

Exactly when did you last see the gods celebrating traitors? Inconceivable!
No, from the first there were certain citizens who could hardly stand the spirit of my regime, grumbling against me in the dark, heads together, tossing wildly, never keeping their necks beneath the yoke, loyally submitting to their king.
These are the instigators, I'm convinced—they've perverted my own guard, bribed them to do their work.
Money! Nothing worse
in our lives, so current, rampant, so corrupting.
Money—you demolish cities, root men from their homes, you train and twist good minds and set them on to the most atrocious schemes. No limit, you make them adept at every kind of outrage,
every godless crime—money!
Everyone—
the whole crew bribed to commit this crime, they've made one thing sure at least:
sooner or later they will pay the price.
[Wheeling on the sentry.]
You—
I swear to Zeus as I still believe in Zeus,
if you don't find the man who buried that corpse,
the very man, and produce him before my eyes,
simple death won't be enough for you,

not till we string you up alive and wring the immortality out of you.

Then you can steal the rest of your days,

better informed about where to make a killing.

You'll have learned, at last, it doesn't pay to itch for rewards from every hand that beckons.

Filthy profits wreck most men, you'll see—they'll never save your life.

sentry. Please,

may I say a word or two, or just turn and go?

creon. Can't you tell? Everything you say offends me.

sentry. Where does it hurt you, in the ears or in the heart?

creon. And who are you to pinpoint my displeasure?

sentry. The culprit grates on your feelings,

I just annoy your ears.

creon. Still talking?

You talk too much! A born nuisance—sentry. Maybe so,

but I never did this thing, so help me!

creon. Yes you did—

what's more, you squandered your life for silver!

sentry. Oh it's terrible when the one who does the judging judges things all wrong.

creon. Well now,

you just be clever about your judgments—

if you fail to produce the criminals for me, you'll swear your dirty money brought you pain.

[Turning sharply, reentering the palace.]

sentry. I hope he's found. Best thing by far.

But caught or not, that's in the lap of fortune;

I'll never come back, you've seen the last of me.

I'm saved, even now, and I never thought,

I never hoped—

dear gods, I owe you all my thanks! [Rushing out.]

chorus. Numberless wonders terrible wonders walk the world but none the match for man—that great wonder crossing the heaving gray sea, driven on by the blast of winter on through breakers crashing left and right, holds his steady course

and the oldest of the gods he wears away—

the Earth, the immortal, the inexhaustible—

as his plows go back and forth, year in, year out with the breed of stallions turning up the furrows.

And the blithe, lightheaded race of birds he snares,

the tribes of savage beasts, the life that swarms the depths—

with one fling of his nets woven and coiled tight, he takes them all,

man the skilled, the brilliant!

He conquers all, taming with his techniques

the prey that roams the cliffs and wild lairs, training the stallion, clamping the yoke across his shaggy neck, and the tireless mountain bull.

And speech and thought, quick as the wind and the mood and mind for law that rules the city—

all these he has taught himself and shelter from the arrows of the frost when there's rough lodging under the cold clear sky and the shafts of lashing rain—ready, resourceful man!

Never without resources never an impasse as he marches on the future—only Death, from Death alone he will find no rescue but from desperate plagues he has plotted his escapes.
Man the master, ingenious past all measure past all dreams, the skills within his grasp—he forges on, now to destruction now again to greatness. When he weaves in the laws of the land, and the justice of the gods that binds his oaths together he and his city rise high—but the city casts out that man who weds himself to inhumanity thanks to reckless daring. Never share my hearth never think my thoughts, whoever does such things.
[Enter antigone from the side, accompanied by the sentry.]
Here is a dark sign from the gods—what to make of this? I know her, how can I deny it? That young girl's Antigone!
Wretched, child of a wretched father,
Oedipus. Look, is it possible?
They bring you in like a prisoner—
why? did you break the king's laws?
Did they take you in some act of mad defiance?

sentry. She's the one, she did it single-handed—we caught her burying the body. Where's Creon?

[Enter creon from the palace.]

leader. Back again, just in time when you need him.

creon. In time for what? What is it?

sentry. My king,
there's nothing you can swear you'll never do—second thoughts make liars of us all.
I could have sworn I wouldn't hurry back (what with your threats, the buffeting I just took),
but a stroke of luck beyond our wildest hopes,
what a joy, there's nothing like it. So,
back I've come, breaking my oath, who cares?
I'm bringing in our prisoner—this young girl—
we took her giving the dead the last rites.
But no casting lots this time, this is my luck,
my prize, no one else's.
Now, my lord,
here she is. Take her, question her,
cross-examine her to your heart's content.
But set me free, it's only right—
I'm rid of this dreadful business once for all.

creon. Prisoner! Her? You took her—where, doing what?

sentry. Burying the man. That's the whole story.

creon. What?
You mean what you say, you're telling me the truth?

sentry. She's the one. With my own eyes I saw her bury the body, just what you've forbidden.

There. Is that plain and clear?

creon. What did you see? Did you catch her in the act?

sentry. Here's what happened. We went back to our post, those threats of yours breathing down our necks—

we brushed the corpse clean of the dust that covered it, stripped it bare . . . it was slimy, going soft,

and we took to high ground, backs to the wind

so the stink of him couldn't hit us;

jostling, baiting each other to keep awake,

shouting back and forth—no napping on the job, not this time. And so the hours dragged by until the sun stood dead above our heads,

a huge white ball in the noon sky, beating, blazing down, and then it happened—

suddenly, a whirlwind!

Twisting a great dust-storm up from the earth,

a black plague of the heavens, filling the plain,

ripping the leaves off every tree in sight, choking the air and sky. We squinted hard and took our whipping from the gods.

And after the storm passed—it seemed endless—

there, we saw the girl!

And she cried out a sharp, piercing cry,

like a bird come back to an empty nest,

peering into its bed, and all the babies gone . . .

Just so, when she sees the corpse bare

she bursts into a long, shattering wail and calls down withering curses on the heads of all who did the work. And she scoops up dry dust, handfuls, quickly, and lifting a fine bronze urn, lifting it high and pouring, she crowns the dead

with three full libations.
Soon as we saw
we rushed her, closed on the kill like hunters, and she, she didn't flinch. We interrogated her, charging her with offenses past and present—
she stood up to it all, denied nothing. I tell you, it made me ache and laugh in the same breath.
It's pure joy to escape the worst yourself,
it hurts a man to bring down his friends.
But all that, I'm afraid, means less to me than my own skin. That's the way I'm made.

creon. [Wheeling on antigone.] You,
with your eyes fixed on the ground—speak up.
Do you deny you did this, yes or no?

antigone. I did it. I don't deny a thing.

creon. [To the sentry.] You, get out, wherever you please—you're clear of a very heavy charge.
[He leaves; creon turns back to antigone.]
You, tell me briefly, no long speeches—were you aware a decree had forbidden this?

antigone. Well aware. How could I avoid it? It was public.

creon. And still you had the gall to break this law?

antigone. Of course I did. It wasn't Zeus, not in the least,
who made this proclamation—not to me.
Nor did that Justice, dwelling with the gods

beneath the earth, ordain such laws for men.
Nor did I think your edict had such force that you, a mere mortal, could override the gods,
the great unwritten, unshakable traditions.
They are alive, not just today or yesterday:
they live forever, from the first of time,
and no one knows when they first saw the light.
These laws—I was not about to break them,
not out of fear of some man's wounded pride,
and face the retribution of the gods.
Die I must, I've known it all my life—how could I keep from knowing?—even without your death-sentence ringing in my ears.
And if I am to die before my time
I consider that a gain. Who on earth, alive in the midst of so much grief as I,
could fail to find his death a rich reward?
So for me, at least, to meet this doom of yours is precious little pain. But if I had allowed my own mother's son to rot, an unburied corpse—that would have been an agony! This is nothing.
And if my present actions strike you as foolish, let's just say I've been accused of folly
by a fool.

leader. Like father like daughter, passionate, wild . . .
she hasn't learned to bend before adversity.

creon. No? Believe me, the stiffest stubborn wills fall the hardest; the toughest iron, tempered strong in the white-hot fire,

you'll see it crack and shatter first of all.
And I've known spirited horses you can break with a light bit—proud, rebellious horses.
There's no room for pride, not in a slave not with the lord and master standing by.
This girl was an old hand at insolence
when she overrode the edicts we made public.
But once she'd done it—the insolence, twice over—to glory in it, laughing,
mocking us to our face with what she'd done.
I'm not the man, not now: she is the man
if this victory goes to her and she goes free.
Never! Sister's child or closer in blood than all my family clustered at my altar worshiping Guardian Zeus—she'll never escape,
she and her blood sister, the most barbaric death.
Yes, I accuse her sister of an equal part in scheming this, this burial.
[To his attendants.]
Bring her here!
I just saw her inside, hysterical, gone to pieces.
It never fails: the mind convicts itself in advance, when scoundrels are up to no good, plotting in the dark. Oh but I hate it more when a traitor, caught red-handed, tries to glorify his crimes.

antigone. Creon, what more do you want than my arrest and execution?
creon. Nothing. Then I have it all.
antigone. Then why delay? Your moralizing repels me, every word you say—pray god it always will.
So naturally all I say repels you too.
Enough.
Give me glory! What greater glory could I win than to give my own brother decent burial?
These citizens here would all agree,
[To the chorus.]
they'd praise me too
if their lips weren't locked in fear.
[Pointing to creon.]
Lucky tyrants—the perquisites of power!
Ruthless power to do and say whatever pleases them.
creon. You alone, of all the people in Thebes, see things that way.
antigone. They see it just that way but defer to you and keep their tongues in leash.
creon. And you, aren't you ashamed to differ so from them?
So disloyal!
antigone. Not ashamed for a moment,
not to honor my brother, my own flesh and blood.
creon. Wasn't Eteocles a brother too—cut down, facing him?
antigone. Brother, yes, by the same mother, the same father.
creon. Then how can you render his enemy such honors, such impieties in his eyes?

antigone. He'll never testify to that,

Eteocles dead and buried.

creon. He will—

if you honor the traitor just as much as him.

antigone. But it was his brother, not some slave that died—creon. Ravaging our country!—

but Eteocles died fighting in our behalf.

antigone. No matter—Death longs for the same rites for all.

creon. Never the same for the patriot and the traitor.

antigone. Who, Creon, who on earth can say the ones below don't find this pure and uncorrupt?

creon. Never. Once an enemy, never a friend, not even after death.

antigone. I was born to join in love, not hate—that is my nature.

creon. Go down below and love, if love you must—love the dead! While I'm alive, no woman is going to lord it over me.

[Enter ismene from the palace, under guard.]

chorus. Look,

Ismene's coming, weeping a sister's tears,

loving sister, under a cloud . . .

her face is flushed, her cheeks streaming.

Sorrow puts her lovely radiance in the dark.

creon. You—

in my house, you viper, slinking undetected, sucking my life-blood! I never knew

I was breeding twin disasters, the two of you rising up against my throne. Come, tell me, will you confess your part in the crime or not?

Answer me. Swear to me.

ismene. I did it, yes—

if only she consents—I share the guilt,

the consequences too.

antigone. No,

Justice will never suffer that—not you,

you were unwilling. I never brought you in.

ismene. But now you face such dangers . . . I'm not ashamed to sail through trouble with you, make your troubles mine.

antigone. Who did the work?

Let the dead and the god of death bear witness!

I've no love for a friend who loves in words alone.

ismene. Oh no, my sister, don't reject me, please, let me die beside you, consecrating

the dead together.

antigone. Never share my dying,

don't lay claim to what you never touched.

My death will be enough.

ismene. What do I care for life, cut off from you?

antigone. Ask Creon. Your concern is all for him.

ismene. Why abuse me so? It doesn't help you now.

antigone. You're right—

if I mock you, I get no pleasure from it, only pain.

ismene. Tell me, dear one,

what can I do to help you, even now?

antigone. Save yourself. I don't grudge you your survival.

ismene. Oh no, no, denied my portion in your death?

antigone. You chose to live, I chose to die.

ismene. Not, at least,

without every kind of caution I could voice.

antigone. Your wisdom appealed to one world—mine, another.

ismene. But look, we're both guilty, both condemned to death.

antigone. Courage! Live your life. I gave myself to death, long ago, so I might serve the dead.

creon. They're both mad, I tell you, the two of them.

One's just shown it, the other's been that way since she was born.

ismene. True, my king,

the sense we were born with cannot last forever . . .

commit cruelty on a person long enough and the mind begins to go.

creon. Yours did,

when you chose to commit your crimes with her.

ismene. How can I live alone, without her?

creon. Her?

Don't even mention her—she no longer exists.

ismene. What? You'd kill your own son's bride?

creon. Absolutely:

there are other fields for him to plow.

ismene. Perhaps,

but never as true, as close a bond as theirs.

creon. A worthless woman for my son? It repels me.

ismene. Dearest Haemon, your father wrongs you so!

creon. Enough, enough—you and your talk of marriage!

ismene. Creon—you're really going to rob your son of Antigone?

creon. Death will do it for me—break their marriage off.

leader. So, it's settled then? Antigone must die?

creon. Settled, yes—we both know that.

[To the guards.]

Stop wasting time. Take them in.

From now on they'll act like women.

Tie them up, no more running loose;

even the bravest will cut and run,

once they see Death coming for their lives.

[The guards escort antigone and ismene into the palace. creon remains while the old citizens form their chorus.]

chorus. Blest, they are truly blest who all their lives have never tasted devastation. For others, once the gods have rocked a house to its foundations the ruin will never cease, cresting on and on from one generation on throughout the race—

like a great mounting tide driven on by savage northern gales, surging over the dead black depths roiling up from the bottom dark heaves of sand and the headlands, taking the storm's onslaught full-force, roar, and the low moaning echoes on and on and now

as in ancient times I see the sorrows of the house, the living heirs of the old ancestral kings, piling on the sorrows of the dead and one generation cannot free the next—some god will bring them crashing down,

the race finds no release.
And now the light, the hope springing up from the late last root in the house of Oedipus, that hope's cut down in turn by the long, bloody knife swung by the gods of death by a senseless word
by fury at the heart.
Zeus,
yours is the power, Zeus, what man on earth can override it, who can hold it back?
Power that neither Sleep, the all-ensnaring no, nor the tireless months of heaven can ever overmaster—young through all time, mighty lord of power, you hold fast
the dazzling crystal mansions of Olympus.
And throughout the future, late and soon
as through the past, your law prevails:
no towering form of greatness enters into the lives of mortals
free and clear of ruin.
True,
our dreams, our high hopes voyaging far and wide bring sheer delight to many, to many others delusion, blithe, mindless lusts and the fraud steals on one slowly . . . unaware till he trips and puts his foot into the fire.

He was a wise old man who coined

the famous saying: "Sooner or later foul is fair, fair is foul to the man the gods will ruin"—

He goes his way for a moment only free of blinding ruin.

[Enter haemon from the palace.]

Here's Haemon now, the last of all your sons.

Does he come in tears for his bride,

his doomed bride, Antigone—bitter at being cheated of their marriage?

creon. We'll soon know, better than seers could tell us.

[Turning to haemon.]

Son, you've heard the final verdict on your bride?

Are you coming now, raving against your father?

Or do you love me, no matter what I do?

haemon. Father, I'm your son . . .you in your wisdom set my bearings for me—I obey you.

No marriage could ever mean more to me than you, whatever good direction you may offer.

creon. Fine, Haemon.

That's how you ought to feel within your heart, subordinate to your father's will in every way.

That's what a man prays for: to produce good sons—households full of them, dutiful and attentive,

so they can pay his enemy back with interest and match the respect their father shows his friend.

But the man who rears a brood of useless children,
what has he brought into the world, I ask you?
Nothing but trouble for himself, and mockery from his enemies laughing in his face.
Oh Haemon,
never lose your sense of judgment over a woman.
The warmth, the rush of pleasure, it all goes cold in your arms, I warn you . . . a worthless woman in your house, a misery in your bed.
What wound cuts deeper than a loved one turned against you? Spit her out, like a mortal enemy—let the girl go.
Let her find a husband down among the dead.
Imagine it: I caught her in naked rebellion,
the traitor, the only one in the whole city.
I'm not about to prove myself a liar,
not to my people, no, I'm going to kill her!
That's right—so let her cry for mercy, sing her hymns to Zeus who defends all bonds of kindred blood.
Why, if I bring up my own kin to be rebels, think what I'd suffer from the world at large.
Show me the man who rules his household well:
I'll show you someone fit to rule the state.
That good man, my son,
I have every confidence he and he alone can give commands and take them too. Staunch in the storm of spears he'll stand his ground,

a loyal, unflinching comrade at your side.

But whoever steps out of line, violates the laws or presumes to hand out orders to his superiors, he'll win no praise from me. But that man the city places in authority, his orders must be obeyed, large and small,
right and wrong.

Anarchy—
show me a greater crime in all the earth!
She, she destroys cities, rips up houses,
breaks the ranks of spearmen into headlong rout.
But the ones who last it out, the great mass of them owe their lives to discipline. Therefore we must defend the men who live by law, never let some woman triumph over us.
Better to fall from power, if fall we must,
at the hands of a man—never be rated inferior to a woman, never.

leader. To us,
unless old age has robbed us of our wits,
you seem to say what you have to say with sense.

haemon. Father, only the gods endow a man with reason,
the finest of all their gifts, a treasure.
Far be it from me—I haven't the skill, and certainly no desire, to tell you when,
if ever, you make a slip in speech . . . though someone else might have a good suggestion.
Of course it's not for you,

in the normal run of things, to watch whatever men say or do, or find to criticize.
The man in the street, you know, dreads your glance, he'd never say anything displeasing to your face.
But it's for me to catch the murmurs in the dark,
the way the city mourns for this young girl.
"No woman," they say, "ever deserved death less,
and such a brutal death for such a glorious action.
She, with her own dear brother lying in his blood—
she couldn't bear to leave him dead, unburied,
food for the wild dogs or wheeling vultures.
Death? She deserves a glowing crown of gold!"
So they say, and the rumor spreads in secret, darkly . . .
I rejoice in your success, father—
nothing more precious to me in the world.
What medal of honor brighter to his children than a father's growing glory? Or a child's to his proud father? Now don't, please, be quite so single-minded, self-involved,
or assume the world is wrong and you are right.
Whoever thinks that he alone possesses intelligence,
the gift of eloquence, he and no one else,
and character too . . . such men, I tell you,
spread them open—you will find them empty.
No,
it's no disgrace for a man, even a wise man,
to learn many things and not to be too rigid.

You've seen trees by a raging winter torrent,
how many sway with the flood and salvage every twig,
but not the stubborn—they're ripped out, roots and all.
Bend or break. The same when a man is sailing:
haul your sheets too taut, never give an inch, you'll capsize, go the rest of the voyage keel up and the rowing-benches under.
Oh give way. Relax your anger—change!
I'm young, I know, but let me offer this:
it would be best by far, I admit,
if a man were born infallible, right by nature.
If not—and things don't often go that way, it's best to learn from those with good advice.

leader. You'd do well, my lord, if he's speaking to the point, to learn from him.
[Turning to haemon.]
and you, my boy, from him.
You both are talking sense.

creon. So,
men our age, we're to be lectured, are we?—
schooled by a boy his age?

haemon. Only in what is right. But if I seem young, look less to my years and more to what I do.

creon. Do? Is admiring rebels an achievement?

haemon. I'd never suggest that you admire treason.

creon. Oh?—
isn't that just the sickness that's attacked her?

haemon. The whole city of Thebes denies it, to a man.

creon. And is Thebes about to tell me how to rule?

haemon. Now, you see? Who's talking like a child?

creon. Am I to rule this land for others—or myself?

haemon. It's no city at all, owned by one man alone.

creon. What? The city is the king's—that's the law!

haemon. What a splendid king you'd make of a desert island—you and you alone.

creon. [To the chorus.] This boy, I do believe,
is fighting on her side, the woman's side.

haemon. If you are a woman, yes;
my concern is all for you.

creon. Why, you degenerate—bandying accusations, threatening me with justice, your own father!

haemon. I see my father offending justice—wrong.

creon. Wrong?
To protect my royal rights?

haemon. Protect your rights?
When you trample down the honors of the gods?

creon. You, you soul of corruption, rotten through—woman's accomplice!

haemon. That may be,
but you'll never find me accomplice to a criminal.

creon. That's what she is,
and every word you say is a blatant appeal for her—haemon. And you, and me, and the gods beneath the earth.

creon. You'll never marry her, not while she's alive.

haemon. Then she'll die . . . but her death will kill another.

creon. What, brazen threats? You go too far!

haemon. What threat?

Combating your empty, mindless judgments with a word?

creon. You'll suffer for your sermons, you and your empty wisdom!

haemon. If you weren't my father, I'd say you were insane.

creon. Don't flatter me with Father—you woman's slave!

haemon. You really expect to fling abuse at me and not receive the same?

creon. Is that so!

Now, by heaven, I promise you, you'll pay—taunting, insulting me! Bring her out, that hateful—she'll die now, here, in front of his eyes, beside her groom!

haemon. No, no, she will never die beside me—don't delude yourself. And you will never see me, never set eyes on my face again.

Rage your heart out, rage with friends who can stand the sight of you. [Rushing out.]

leader. Gone, my king, in a burst of anger.

A temper young as his . . . hurt him once,

he may do something violent.

creon. Let him do—

dream up something desperate, past all human limit!

Good riddance. Rest assured, he'll never save those two young girls from death.

leader. Both of them, you really intend to kill them both?

creon. No, not her, the one whose hands are clean;

you're quite right.

leader. But Antigone—

what sort of death do you have in mind for her?

creon. I'll take her down some wild, desolate path never trod by men, and wall her up alive in a rocky vault, and set out short rations, just a gesture of piety
to keep the entire city free of defilement.
There let her pray to the one god she worships:
Death—who knows?—may just reprieve her from death.
Or she may learn at last, better late than never,
what a waste of breath it is to worship Death.
[Exit to the palace.]

chorus. Love, never conquered in battle
Love the plunderer laying waste the rich!
Love standing the night-watch guarding a girl's soft cheek, you range the seas, the shepherds' steadings off in the wilds—not even the deathless gods can flee your onset, nothing human born for a day—
whoever feels your grip is driven mad.
Love
you wrench the minds of the righteous into outrage, swerve them to their ruin—you have ignited this,
this kindred strife, father and son at war and Love alone the victor—warm glance of the bride triumphant, burning with desire!
Throned in power, side-by-side with the mighty laws!
Irresistible Aphrodite,¡ never conquered—
Love, you mock us for your sport.

[antigone is brought from the palace under guard.]

But now, even I'd rebel against the king,
I'd break all bounds when I see this—
I fill with tears, can't hold them back, not any more . . . I see Antigone make her way to the bridal vault where all are laid to rest.

antigone. Look at me, men of my fatherland, setting out on the last road looking into the last light of day the last I'll ever see . . .
the god of death who puts us all to bed takes me down to the banks of Acheron¡ alive—denied my part in the wedding-songs, no wedding-song in the dusk has crowned my marriage—
I go to wed the lord of the dark waters.

chorus. Not crowned with glory, crowned with a dirge, you leave for the deep pit of the dead.
No withering illness laid you low,
no strokes of the sword—a law to yourself, alone, no mortal like you, ever, you go down to the halls of Death alive and breathing.

antigone. But think of Niobe¡—well I know her story—think what a living death she died, Tantalus' daughter, stranger queen from the east:
there on the mountain heights, growing stone binding as ivy, slowly walled her round and the rains will never cease, the legends say the snows will never leave her . . .

wasting away, under her brows the tears showering down her breasting ridge and slopes—
a rocky death like hers puts me to sleep.

chorus. But she was a god, born of gods, and we are only mortals born to die.
And yet, of course, it's a great thing for a dying girl to hear, just hear she shares a destiny equal to the gods, during life and later, once she's dead.

antigone. O you mock me!
Why, in the name of all my fathers' gods
why can't you wait till I am gone—must you abuse me to my face?
O my city, all your fine rich sons!
And you, you springs of the Dirce, holy grove of Thebes where the chariots gather,
you at least, you'll bear me witness, look,
unmourned by friends and forced by such crude laws
I go to my rockbound prison, strange new tomb—always a stranger, O dear god,
I have no home on earth and none below,
not with the living, not with the breathless dead.

chorus. You went too far, the last limits of daring—smashing against the high throne of Justice!
Your life's in ruins, child—I wonder . . .
do you pay for your father's terrible ordeal?

antigone. There—at last you've touched it, the worst pain the worst anguish! Raking up the grief for father three times over, for all the doom

that's struck us down, the brilliant house of Laius.

O mother, your marriage-bed

the coiling horrors, the coupling there—you with your own son, my father—doomstruck mother!

Such, such were my parents, and I their wretched child.

I go to them now, cursed, unwed, to share their home—

I am a stranger! O dear brother, doomed in your marriage—your marriage murders mine, your dying drags me down to death alive!

[Enter creon.]

chorus. Reverence asks some reverence in return—

but attacks on power never go unchecked, not by the man who holds the reins of power.

Your own blind will, your passion has destroyed you.

antigone. No one to weep for me, my friends,

no wedding-song—they take me away

in all my pain . . . the road lies open, waiting.

Never again, the law forbids me to see the sacred eye of day. I am agony!

No tears for the destiny that's mine, no loved one mourns my death.

creon. Can't you see?

If a man could wail his own dirge before he dies,

he'd never finish.

[To the guards.]

Take her away, quickly!

Wall her up in the tomb, you have your orders.

Abandon her there, alone, and let her choose—death or a buried life with a good roof for shelter.
As for myself, my hands are clean. This young girl—dead or alive, she will be stripped of her rights, her stranger's rights, here in the world above.

antigone. O tomb, my bridal-bed—my house, my prison cut in the hollow rock, my everlasting watch!
I'll soon be there, soon embrace my own,
the great growing family of our dead
Persephone¡ has received among her ghosts.

I,

the last of them all, the most reviled by far,
go down before my destined time's run out.
But still I go, cherishing one good hope:
my arrival may be dear to father,
dear to you, my mother,
dear to you, my loving brother, Eteocles—
When you died I washed you with my hands,
I dressed you all, I poured the cups across your tombs. But now, Polynices, because I laid your body out as well,
this, this is my reward. Nevertheless I honored you—the decent will admit it—well and wisely too.
Never, I tell you,
if I had been the mother of children or if my husband died, exposed and rotting—
I'd never have taken this ordeal upon myself, never defied our people's will. What law,

you ask, do I satisfy with what I say?

A husband dead, there might have been another.

A child by another too, if I had lost the first.

But mother and father both lost in the halls of Death,

no brother could ever spring to light again.

For this law alone I held you first in honor.

For this, Creon, the king, judges me a criminal guilty of dreadful outrage, my dear brother!

And now he leads me off, a captive in his hands,

with no part in the bridal-song, the bridal-bed, denied all joy of marriage, raising children—deserted so by loved ones, struck by fate,

I descend alive to the caverns of the dead.

What law of the mighty gods have I transgressed?

Why look to the heavens any more, tormented as I am?

Whom to call, what comrades now? Just think,

my reverence only brands me for irreverence!

Very well: if this is the pleasure of the gods,

once I suffer I will know that I was wrong.

But if these men are wrong, let them suffer nothing worse than they mete out to me—

these masters of injustice!

leader. Still the same rough winds, the wild passion raging through the girl.

creon. [To the guards.] Take her away.

You're wasting time—you'll pay for it too.

antigone. Oh god, the voice of death. It's come, it's here.

creon. True. Not a word of hope—your doom is sealed.

antigone. Land of Thebes, city of all my fathers—

O you gods, the first gods of the race!

They drag me away, now, no more delay.

Look on me, you noble sons of Thebes—

the last of a great line of kings,

I alone, see what I suffer now at the hands of what breed of men—

all for reverence, my reverence for the gods!

[She leaves under guard; the chorus gathers.]

chorus. Dana‘,¡ Dana‘— even she endured a fate like yours,

in all her lovely strength she traded the light of day for the bolted brazen vault—buried within her tomb, her bridal-chamber,

wed to the yoke and broken.

But she was of glorious birth

my child, my child

and treasured the seed of Zeus within her womb,

the cloudburst streaming gold!

The power of fate is a wonder,

dark, terrible wonder—

neither wealth nor armies

towered walls nor ships

black hulls lashed by the salt can save us from that force.

The yoke tamed him too young Lycurgus¡ flaming in anger

king of Edonia, all for his mad taunts Dionysus clamped him down, encased in the chain-mail of rock and there his rage
his terrible flowering rage burst—sobbing, dying away . . . at last that madman came to know his god—
the power he mocked, the power he taunted in all his frenzy trying to stamp out
the women strong with the god—
the torch, the raving sacred cries—enraging the Muses¡ who adore the flute.
And far north where the Black Rocks cut the sea in half and murderous straits split the coast of Thrace
a forbidding city stands
where once, hard by the walls
the savage Ares thrilled to watch a king's new queen, a Fury rearing in rage against his two royal sons—her bloody hands, her dagger-shuttle stabbing out their eyes—cursed, blinding wounds—their eyes blind sockets screaming for revenge!
They wailed in agony, cries echoing cries
the princes doomed at birth . . .
and their mother doomed to chains, walled off in a tomb of stone—

but she traced her own birth back to a proud Athenian line and the high gods and off in caverns half the world away,

born of the wild North Wind

she sprang on her father's gales, racing stallions up the leaping cliffs—

child of the heavens. But even on her the Fates the gray everlasting Fates rode hard

my child, my child.

[Enter tiresias, the blind prophet, led by a boy.]

tiresias. Lords of Thebes,

I and the boy have come together, hand in hand. Two see with the eyes of one . . .

so the blind must go, with a guide to lead the way.

creon. What is it, old Tiresias? What news now?

tiresias. I will teach you. And you obey the seer.

creon. I will,

I've never wavered from your advice before.

tiresias. And so you kept the city straight on course.

creon. I owe you a great deal, I swear to that.

tiresias. Then reflect, my son: you are poised,

once more, on the razor-edge of fate.

creon. What is it? I shudder to hear you.

tiresias. You will learn when you listen to the warnings of my craft.

As I sat in the ancient seat of augury,

in the sanctuary where every bird I know will hover at my hands—suddenly I heard it,

a strange voice in the wingbeats, unintelligible, barbaric, a mad scream! Talons flashing, ripping, they were killing each other—that much I knew—the murderous fury whirring in those wings made that much clear!
I was afraid,
I turned quickly, tested the burnt-sacrifice,
ignited the altar at all points—but no fire,
the god in the fire never blazed.
Not from those offerings . . . over the embers slid a heavy ooze from the long thighbones, smoking, sputtering out, and the bladder puffed and burst—spraying gall into the air—and the fat wrapping the bones slithered off and left them glistening white. No fire!
The rites failed that might have blazed the future with a sign. So I learned from the boy here;
he is my guide, as I am guide to others.
And it's you—
your high resolve that sets this plague on Thebes.
The public altars and sacred hearths are fouled,
one and all, by the birds and dogs with carrion torn from the corpse, the doomstruck son of Oedipus!
And so the gods are deaf to our prayers, they spurn
the offerings in our hands, the flame of holy flesh.
No birds cry out an omen clear and true—
they're gorged with the murdered victim's blood and fat.

Take these things to heart, my son, I warn you.

All men make mistakes, it is only human.

But once the wrong is done, a man can turn his back on folly, misfortune too,

if he tries to make amends, however low he's fallen, and stops his bullnecked ways. Stubbornness brands you for stupidity—pride is a crime.

No, yield to the dead!

Never stab the fighter when he's down.

Where's the glory, killing the dead twice over?

I mean you well. I give you sound advice.

It's best to learn from a good adviser

when he speaks for your own good:

it's pure gain.

CREON. Old man—all of you! So, you shoot your arrows at my head like archers at the target—

I even have him loosed on me, this fortune-teller.

Oh his ilk has tried to sell me short and ship me off for years. Well, drive your bargains, traffic—much as you like—

in the gold of India, silver-gold of Sardis.

You'll never bury that body in the grave,

not even if Zeus's eagles rip the corpse and wing their rotten pickings off to the throne of god!

Never, not even in fear of such defilement will I tolerate his burial, that traitor.

Well I know, we can't defile the gods—

no mortal has the power.

No,

reverend old Tiresias, all men fall,

it’s only human, but the wisest fall obscenely

when they glorify obscene advice with rhetoric—

all for their own gain.

tiresias. Oh god, is there a man alive who knows, who actually believes . . .

creon. What now?

What earth-shattering truth are you about to utter?

tiresias. . . .just how much a sense of judgment, wisdom is the greatest gift we have?

creon. Just as much, I’d say,

as a twisted mind is the worst affliction going.

tiresias. You are the one who’s sick, Creon, sick to death.

creon. I am in no mood to trade insults with a seer.

tiresias. You have already, calling my prophecies a lie.

creon. Why not?

You and the whole breed of seers are mad for money!

tiresias. And the whole race of tyrants lusts to rake it in.

creon. This slander of yours—are you aware you’re speaking to the king?

tiresias. Well aware. Who helped you save the city?

creon. You—

you have your skills, old seer, but you lust for injustice!

tiresias. You will drive me to utter the dreadful secret in my heart.

creon. Spit it out! Just don’t speak it out for profit.

tiresias. Profit? No, not a bit of profit, not for you.

creon. Know full well, you’ll never buy off my resolve.

tiresias. Then know this too, learn this by heart!

The chariot of the sun will not race through so many circuits more, before you have surrendered

one born of your own loins, your own flesh and blood, a corpse for corpses given in return, since you have thrust to the world below a child sprung from the world above, ruthlessly lodged a living soul within the grave—

then you've robbed the gods below the earth, keeping a dead body here in the bright air,

unburied, unsung, unhallowed by the rites.

You, you have no business with the dead,

nor do the gods above—this is violence you have forced upon the heavens.

And so the avengers, the dark destroyers late but true to the mark, now lie in wait for you,

the Furies sent by the gods and the god of death to strike you down with the pains that you perfected!

There. Reflect on that, tell me I've been bribed.

The day comes soon, no long test of time, not now, that wakes the wails for men and women in your halls.

Great hatred rises against you—cities in tumult, all whose mutilated sons

the dogs have graced with burial, or the wild beasts, some wheeling crow that wings the ungodly stench of carrion back to each city, each warrior's heart and home.

These arrows for your heart! Since you've raked me

I loose them like an archer in my anger, arrows deadly true. You'll never escape their burning, searing force.

[Motioning to his escort.]

Come, boy, take me home.

So he can vent his rage on younger men,

and learn to keep a gentler tongue in his head and better sense than what he carries now.

[Exit to the side.]

leader. The old man's gone, my king—terrible prophecies. Well I know, since the hair on his old head went gray,

he's never lied to Thebes.

creon. I know it myself—I'm shaken, torn.

It's a dreadful thing to yield . . . but resist now?

Lay my pride bare to the blows of ruin?

That's dreadful too.

leader. But good advice,

Creon, take it now, you must.

creon. What should I do? Tell me . . . I'll obey.

leader. Go! Free the girl from the rocky vault and raise a mound for the body you exposed.

creon. That's your advice? You think I should give in?

leader. Yes, my king, quickly. Disasters sent by the gods cut short our follies in a flash.

creon. Oh it's hard.

giving up the heart's desire . . . but I will do it—

no more fighting a losing battle with necessity.

leader. Do it now, go, don't leave it to others.

creon. Now—I'm on my way! Come, each of you, take up axes, make for the high ground,

over there, quickly! I and my better judgment have come round to this—I shackled her,

I'll set her free myself. I am afraid . . .

it's best to keep the established laws to the very day we die.

[Rushing out, followed by his entourage. The chorus clusters around the altar.]

chorus. God of a hundred names!

Great Dionysus—

Son and glory of Semele! Pride of Thebes—

Child of Zeus whose thunder rocks the clouds—

Lord of the famous lands of evening—

King of the Mysteries!

King of Eleusis, Demeter's plain¡ her breasting hills that welcome in the world—

Great Dionysus!

Bacchus,¡ living in Thebes

the mother-city of all your frenzied women—

Bacchus

living along the Ismenus'¡ rippling waters

standing over the field sown with the Dragons' teeth!

You—we have seen you through the flaring smoky fires,

your torches blazing over the twin peaks

where nymphs of the hallowed cave climb onward fired with you, your sacred rage—

we have seen you at Castalia's running spring¡ and down from the heights of Nysa¡ crowned with ivy

the greening shore rioting vines and grapes down you come in your storm of wild women ecstatic, mystic cries—

Dionysus—

down to watch and ward the roads of Thebes!

First of all cities, Thebes you honor first you and your mother, bride of the lightning—

come, Dionysus! now your people lie

in the iron grip of plague, come in your racing, healing stride down Parnassus'¡ slopes or across the moaning straits.

Lord of the dancing—dance, dance the constellations breathing fire!

Great master of the voices of the night!

Child of Zeus, God's offspring, come, come forth!

Lord, king, dance with your nymphs, swirling, raving arm-in-arm in frenzy through the night

they dance you, Iacchus¡—

Dance, Dionysus

giver of all good things!

[Enter a messenger from the side.]

messenger. Neighbors, friends of the house of Cadmus and the kings,

there's not a thing in this life of ours

I'd praise or blame as settled once for all.

Fortune lifts and Fortune fells the lucky and unlucky every day. No prophet on earth can tell a man his fate. Take Creon:

there was a man to rouse your envy once,

as I see it. He saved the realm from enemies;

taking power, he alone, the lord of the fatherland,

he set us true on course—flourished like a tree with the noble line of sons he bred and reared . . .

and now it's lost, all gone.

Believe me,

when a man has squandered his true joys,

he's good as dead, I tell you, a living corpse.

Pile up riches in your house, as much as you like—live like a king with a huge show of pomp,

but if real delight is missing from the lot,

I wouldn't give you a wisp of smoke for it,

not compared with joy.

leader. What now?

What new grief do you bring the house of kings?

messenger. Dead, dead—and the living are guilty of their death!

leader. Who's the murderer? Who is dead? Tell us.

messenger. Haemon's gone, his blood spilled by the very hand—leader. His father's or his own?

messenger. His own . . .

raging mad with his father for the death—

leader. Oh great seer, you saw it all, you brought your word to birth!

messenger. Those are the facts. Deal with them as you will.

[As he turns to go, eurydice enters from the palace.]

leader. Look, Eurydice. Poor woman, Creon's wife, so close at hand. By chance perhaps, unless she's heard the news about her son.

eurydice. My countrymen,

all of you—I caught the sound of your words

as I was leaving to do my part,

to appeal to queen Athena¡ with my prayers.

I was just loosing the bolts, opening the doors,

when a voice filled with sorrow, family sorrow, struck my ears, and I fell back, terrified,

into the women's arms—everything went black.

Tell me the news, again, whatever it is . . .

sorrow and I are hardly strangers;

I can bear the worst.

messenger. I—dear lady,

I'll speak as an eye-witness. I was there.

And I won't pass over one word of the truth.

Why should I try to soothe you with a story,

only to prove a liar in a moment?

Truth is always best.

So,

I escorted your lord, I guided him to the edge of the plain where the body lay,

Polynices, torn by the dogs and still unmourned.

And saying a prayer to Hecate of the Crossroads,

Pluto¡ too, to hold their anger and be kind,

we washed the dead in a bath of holy water and plucking some fresh branches, gathering . . .

what was left of him, we burned them all together and raised a high mound of native earth, and then we turned and made for that rocky vault of hers,

the hollow, empty bed of the bride of Death.
And far off, one of us heard a voice,
a long wail rising, echoing out of that unhallowed wedding-chamber;
he ran to alert the master and Creon pressed on,
closer—the strange, inscrutable cry came sharper, throbbing around him now, and he let loose
a cry of his own, enough to wrench the heart, “Oh god, am I the prophet now? going down the darkest road I’ve ever gone? My son—it’s his dear voice, he greets me! Go, men, closer, quickly! Go through the gap,
the rocks are dragged back—right to the tomb’s very mouth—and look,
see if it’s Haemon’s voice I think I hear,
or the gods have robbed me of my senses.”
The king was shattered. We took his orders, went and searched, and there in the deepest,
dark recesses of the tomb we found her . . .
hanged by the neck in a fine linen noose, strangled in her veils—and the boy,
his arms flung around her waist,
clinging to her, wailing for his bride, dead and down below, for his father’s crimes
and the bed of his marriage blighted by misfortune.
When Creon saw him, he gave a deep sob,
he ran in, shouting, crying out to him,

"Oh my child—what have you done? what seized you,
what insanity? what disaster drove you mad?
Come out, my son! I beg you on my knees!"
But the boy gave him a wild burning glance,
spat in his face, not a word in reply,
he drew his sword—his father rushed out, running as Haemon lunged and missed!—
and then, doomed, desperate with himself, suddenly leaning his full weight on the blade,
he buried it in his body, halfway to the hilt.
And still in his senses, pouring his arms around her,
he embraced the girl and breathing hard,
released a quick rush of blood,
bright red on her cheek glistening white.
And there he lies, body enfolding body . . .
he has won his bride at last, poor boy,
not here but in the houses of the dead.
Creon shows the world that of all the ills afflicting men the worst is lack of judgment.
[eurydice turns and reenters the palace.]

leader. What do you make of that? The lady's gone, without a word, good or bad.

messenger. I'm alarmed too
but here's my hope—faced with her son's death,
she finds it unbecoming to mourn in public.
Inside, under her roof, she'll set her women to the task and wail the sorrow of the house.
She's too discreet. She won't do something rash.

leader. I'm not so sure. To me, at least,

a long heavy silence promises danger,

just as much as a lot of empty outcries.

messenger. We'll see if she's holding something back, hiding some passion in her heart.

I'm going in. You may be right—who knows?

Even too much silence has its dangers.

[Exit to the palace. Enter creon from the side, escorted by attendants carrying haemon's body on a bier.]

leader. The king himself! Coming toward us, look, holding the boy's head in his hands.

Clear, damning proof, if it's right to say so—proof of his own madness, no one else's, no, his own blind wrongs.

creon. Ohhh,

so senseless, so insane . . . my crimes,

my stubborn, deadly—

Look at us, the killer, the killed,

father and son, the same blood—the misery!

My plans, my mad fanatic heart,

my son, cut off so young!

Ai, dead, lost to the world,

not through your stupidity, no, my own.

leader. Too late,

too late, you see what justice means.

creon. Oh I've learned through blood and tears! Then, it was then, when the god came down and struck me—a great weight shattering, driving me down that wild savage path, ruining, trampling down my joy. Oh the agony,

the heartbreaking agonies of our lives.

[Enter the messenger from the palace.]

messenger. Master,

what a hoard of grief you have, and you'll have more.

The grief that lies to hand you've brought yourself—

[Pointing to haemon's body.]

the rest, in the house, you'll see it all too soon.

creon. What now? What's worse than this?

messenger. The queen is dead.

The mother of this dead boy . . . mother to the end—

poor thing, her wounds are fresh.

creon. No, no,

harbor of Death, so choked, so hard to cleanse!—

why me? why are you killing me?

Herald of pain, more words, more grief?

I died once, you kill me again and again!

What's the report, boy . . . some news for me?

My wife dead? O dear god!

Slaughter heaped on slaughter?

[The doors open; the body of eurydice is brought out on her bier.]

messenger. See for yourself:

now they bring her body from the palace.

creon. Oh no,

another, a second loss to break the heart.

What next, what fate still waits for me?

I just held my son in my arms and now,

look, a new corpse rising before my eyes—

wretched, helpless mother—O my son!

messenger. She stabbed herself at the altar, then her eyes went dark, after she'd raised a cry for the noble fate of Megareus,¡ the hero killed in the first assault, then for Haemon,

then with her dying breath she called down torments on your head—you killed her sons.

creon. Oh the dread,

I shudder with dread! Why not kill me too?—

run me through with a good sharp sword?

Oh god, the misery, anguish—

I, I'm churning with it, going under.

messenger. Yes, and the dead, the woman lying there, piles the guilt of all their deaths on you.

creon. How did she end her life, what bloody stroke?

messenger. She drove home to the heart with her own hand, once she learned her son was dead . . . that agony.

creon. And the guilt is all mine—can never be fixed on another man, no escape for me. I killed you,

I, god help me, I admit it all!

[To his attendants.]

Take me away, quickly, out of sight.

I don't even exist—I'm no one. Nothing.

leader. Good advice, if there's any good in suffering.

Quickest is best when troubles block the way.

creon.

[Kneeling in prayer.]

Come, let it come!—that best of fates for me that brings the final day, best fate of all.

Oh quickly, now—

so I never have to see another sunrise.

leader. That will come when it comes;

we must deal with all that lies before us.

The future rests with the ones who tend the future.

creon. That prayer—I poured my heart into that prayer!

leader. No more prayers now. For mortal men there is no escape from the doom we must endure.

creon. Take me away, I beg you, out of sight.

A rash, indiscriminate fool!

I murdered you, my son, against my will—you too, my wife . . .

Wailing wreck of a man, whom to look to? where to lean for support?

[Desperately turning from haemon to eurydice on their biers.]

Whatever I touch goes wrong—once more a crushing fate's come down upon my head.

[The messenger and attendants lead creon into the palace.]

chorus. Wisdom is by far the greatest part of joy, and reverence toward the gods must be safeguarded.

The mighty words of the proud are paid in full with mighty blows of fate, and at long last those blows will teach us wisdom.

[The old citizens exit to the side.]

The Play on the Page

1. -If you have read Oedipus, compare and contrast the Creon of Antigone with the Creon of Oedipus.
2. -Although Sophocles called his play Antigone, many critics say that Creon is the real tragic hero, pointing out that Antigone is absent from the last third of the play. Evaluate this view.
3. -In some Greek tragedies, fate plays a great role in bringing about the downfall of the tragic hero. Though there are references to the curse on the House of Oedipus in Antigone, do we feel that Antigone goes to her death as a result of the workings of fate? Do we feel that fate is responsible for Creon's fall? Are both Antigone and Creon the creators of their own tragedy?
4. -Are the words hamartia and hybris (see pages 1094–1095) relevant to Antigone? To Creon?
5. -Why does Creon, contrary to the Chorus's advice (lines 1224–1225), bury the body of Polynices before he releases Antigone? Does his action show a zeal for piety as short-sighted as his earlier zeal for law? Is his action plausible, in view of the facts that Tiresias has dwelt on the wrong done to Polynices and that Antigone has ritual food to sustain her? Or are we not to worry about Creon's motive?
6. -A foil is a character who, by contrast, sets off or helps define another character. To what extent is Ismene a foil to Antigone? Is she entirely without courage?
7. -What function does Eurydice serve? How deeply do we feel about her fate?

The Play on the Stage

8. -Would you use masks for some (or all) of the characters? If so, would they be masks that fully cover the face, Greek-style, or some sort of half-masks? (A full mask enlarges the face, and conceivably the mouthpiece can amplify the voice, but only an exceptionally large theater might require such help. Perhaps half-masks are enough if the aim is chiefly to distance the actors from the audience and from daily reality, and to force the actors to develop resources other than facial gestures. One director, arguing in favor of half-masks, has said that actors who wear even a half-mask learn to act not with the eyes but with the neck.)
9. -How would you costume the players? Would you dress them as the Greeks might have? Why?

One argument sometimes used by those who hold that modern productions of Greek drama should use classical costumes is that Greek drama ought to be remote and ritualistic. Evaluate this view. What sort of modern dress might be effective?

10. -If you were directing a college production of Antigone, how large a chorus would you use? (Sophocles is said to have used a chorus of fifteen.) Would you have the chorus recite (or chant) the odes in unison, or would you assign lines to single speakers? In Sophocles' day, the chorus danced. Would you use dance movements? If not, in what sorts of movements might they engage?

TWO PLAYS BY SHAKESPEARE

A Casebook on Hamlet

This casebook contains (in addition to illustrations of the original texts of Hamlet, the Elizabethan theater, and modern productions) the following material:

1. -A note on the Elizabethan theater
2. -A note on the text of Hamlet (with facsimilies of three versions of Hamlet's "to be or not to be")
3. -The text of Hamlet
4. -A Freudian interpretation by Ernest Jones
5. -Stanley Wells's analysis of the first soliloquy
6. -Elaine Showalter's discussion of Ophelia
7. -Claire Bloom's comments on her performance as Gertrude, in the BBC TV production of Hamlet (1980)
8. -Bernice W. Kliman's review of the BBC TV production of Hamlet (1980)
9. -A review by a student, Will Saretta, of Kenneth Branagh's film version of Hamlet (1996)

A NOTE ON THE ELIZABETHAN THEATER

Shakespeare's theater was wooden, round or polygonal (the Chorus in Henry V calls it a "wooden O"). About eight hundred spectators could stand in the yard in front of—and perhaps along the two sides of—the stage that jutted from the rear wall, and another fifteen hundred or so spectators could sit in the three roofed galleries that ringed the stage.

That portion of the galleries that was above the rear of the stage was sometimes used by actors. For instance, in The Tempest, 3.3, a stage direction following line 17 mentions “Prospero on the top, invisible,” that is, he is imagined to be invisible to the characters in the play.

Entry to the stage was normally gained by doors at the rear, but apparently on rare occasions use was made of a curtained alcove—or perhaps a booth—between the doors, which allowed characters to be “discovered” (revealed) as in the modern proscenium theater, which normally employs a curtain. Such “discovery” scenes are rare.

Although the theater as a whole was unroofed, the stage was protected by a roof, supported by two pillars. These could serve (by an act of imagination) as trees behind which actors might pretend to conceal themselves.

A performance was probably uninterrupted by intermissions or by long pauses for the changing of scenery; a group of characters leaves the stage, another enters, and if the locale has changed the new characters somehow tell us. (Modern editors customarily add indications of locales to help a reader, but it should be remembered that the action on the Elizabethan stage was continuous.)

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) was born in Stratford, England, of middle-class parents. Nothing of interest is known about his early years, but by 1590 he was acting and writing plays in London. By the end of the following decade he had worked in all three Elizabethan dramatic genres—tragedy, comedy, and history. Romeo and Juliet, for example, was written about 1595, the year of Richard II, and in the following year he wrote A Midsummer Night’s Dream. Julius Caesar (1599) probably preceded As You Like It by one year, and Hamlet probably followed As You Like It by less than a year. Among the plays that followed Othello (1603–1604) were King Lear (1605–1606), Macbeth (1605–1606), and several “romances”—plays that have happy endings but that seem more meditative and closer to tragedy than such comedies as A Midsummer Night’s Dream, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night.

A Note on the Texts of Hamlet

Shakespeare’s Hamlet comes to us in three versions. The first, known as the First Quarto (Q1), was published in 1603. It is an illegitimate garbled version, perhaps derived from the memory of the actor who played Marcellus (this part is conspicuously more accurate than the rest of the play) in a short version of the play.

The second printed version (Q2), which appeared in 1604, is almost twice as long as Q1; all in all, it is the best text we have, doubtless published (as Q1 was not) with the permission of Shakespeare's theatrical company.

The third printed version, in the First Folio (the collected edition of Shakespeare's plays, published in 1623), is also legitimate, but it seems to be an acting version, for it lacks some two hundred lines of Q2. On the other hand, the Folio text includes some ninety lines not found in Q2.

Because Q2 is the longest version, giving us more of the play as Shakespeare conceived it than either of the other texts, it serves as the basic version for this text. Unfortunately, the printers of Q2 often worked carelessly: Words and phrases are omitted, there are plain misreadings of what must have been in Shakespeare's manuscript, and speeches are sometimes wrongly assigned. It is therefore necessary to turn to the First Folio for many readings. It has been found useful, also, to divide the play into acts and scenes; these divisions, not found in Q2 (and only a few are found in the Folio), are purely editorial additions, and they are therefore enclosed in square brackets.

We use the text edited by David Bevington.

PORTFOLIO: HAMLET ON THE STAGE

We know that Hamlet was popular during Shakespeare's lifetime, but the earliest illustration (1709) showing a scene from the play was engraved more than a century after the play was written, so we know little about what Hamlet looked like on Shakespeare's stage. Still, we do have at least a little idea. We know, for instance, that at least in the first scene Hamlet wore black (he speaks of his "inky cloak"), and we know that when the Ghost first appears it is dressed in "the very armor he had on / When he the ambitious Norway combatted" (1.1.64–65). We know, too, that when the Ghost appears later, in the Queen's chamber (3.4), he does not wear armor, a sign that his mood is different.

We also have a few tantalizing glimpses of Elizabethan acting. Thus, in the dumb show (pantomime) preceding "The Murder of Gonzago" that the touring players in 3.2 produce for the court, we get this stage direction: "Enter a King and a Queen very lovingly: the Queen embracing him and he her." A little later, when the Queen in this dumb show finds that the King has been poisoned, she “makes passionate action,” but then, when the poisoner woos her, “she seems harsh a while but in the end accepts love.”

We know something, too, of the sound effects. Possibly the play begins with the bell tolling twelve (in 1.1 Bernardo says, “’Tis now struck twelve”), and certainly in the first scene we hear the crowing of a cock, which causes the Ghost to depart. Later we hear the sound of drums, trumpets, and cannon when Claudius drinks toasts, and the play ends with the sound of cannon, when Fortinbras orders the soldiers to pay tribute to the dead Hamlet.

What about costumes? In their own day, Elizabethan plays were staged chiefly in contemporary dress—doublet (close-fitting jacket) and hose (tights) for the men, gowns of various sorts for the women (whose roles were played by boy actors)—though for classical plays such as Julius Caesar some attempt was made in the direction of ancient costume, at least for the major characters. The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, too, staged the plays in the costume of the day, which of course was not Elizabethan, but in much of the nineteenth century, and in the first third of the twentieth, a strong sense that the plays were “Elizabethan” caused producers to use Elizabethan costumes, although these costumes—contemporary when the plays were first performed—now had become historical costume, marking the plays as of an age remote from our own. In 1925 Barry Jackson staged a modern-dress production in London, in an effort to emphasize the play’s contemporary relevance. Today, productions tend to be in modern dress in the sense that they avoid Elizabethan costume; but usually, in an effort to add some color to the stage as well as to add some (but not a great) sense of remoteness, they use costumes of the nineteenth century, which allow for splendid gowns and for military uniforms with sashes.

1.1 Enter bernardo and francisco, two sentinels [meeting].

bernardo. Who’s there?

francisco. Nay, answer me.¡ Stand and unfold yourself.¡

bernardo. Long live the King!

francisco. Bernardo?

bernardo. He.

francisco. You come most carefully upon your hour.

bernardo. 'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.

francisco. For this relief much thanks. 'Tis bitter cold, And I am sick at heart.

bernardo. Have you had quiet guard?

francisco. Not a mouse stirring.

bernardo. Well, good night.

If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,

The rivals¡ of my watch, bid them make haste.

Enter horatio and marcellus.

francisco. I think I hear them.—Stand, ho! Who is there?

horatio. Friends to this ground.¡

marcellus. And liegemen to the Dane.¡

francisco. Give¡ you good night.

marcellus. O, farewell, honest soldier. Who hath relieved you?

francisco. Bernardo hath my place. Give you good night.

Exit francisco.

marcellus. Holla! Bernardo!

bernardo. Say, what, is Horatio there?

horatio. A piece of him.

bernardo. Welcome, Horatio. Welcome, good Marcellus.

horatio. What, has this thing appeared again tonight?

bernardo. I have seen nothing.

marcellus. Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,¡

And will not let belief take hold of him

Touching this dreaded sight twice seen of us.

Therefore I have entreated him along¡

With us to watch¡ the minutes of this night,

That if again this apparition come

He may approve¡ our eyes and speak to it.

horatio. Tush, tush, ’twill not appear.

bernardo. Sit down awhile,

And let us once again assail your ears,

That are so fortified against our story,

What¡ we have two nights seen.

horatio. Well, sit we down,

And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.

bernardo. Last night of all,¡

When yond same star that’s westward from the pole¡

Had made his¡ course t’ illume¡ that part of heaven

Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself,

The bell then beating one—

Enter ghost.

marcellus. Peace, break thee off! Look where it comes again!

bernardo. In the same figure like the King that’s dead.

marcellus. Thou art a scholar.¡ Speak to it, Horatio.

bernardo. Looks ’a¡ not like the King? Mark it, Horatio.

horatio. Most like. It harrows me with fear and wonder.

bernardo. It would be spoke to.¡

marcellus. Speak to it, Horatio.

horatio. What art thou that usurp’st¡ this time of night,

Together with that fair and warlike form

In which the majesty of buried Denmark¡

Did sometime¡ march? By heaven, I charge thee, speak!

marcellus. It is offended.

bernardo. See, it stalks away.

horatio. Stay! Speak, speak! I charge thee, speak!

Exit ghost.

marcellus. 'Tis gone and will not answer.

bernardo. How now, Horatio? You tremble and look pale.

Is not this something more than fantasy?

What think you on 't?¡

horatio. Before my God, I might not this believe

Without the sensible¡ and true avouch¡

Of mine own eyes.

marcellus. Is it not like the King?

horatio. As thou art to thyself.

Such was the very armor he had on

When he the ambitious Norway¡ combated.

So frowned he once when, in an angry parle,¡

He smote the sledded¡ Polacks¡ on the ice.

'Tis strange.

marcellus. Thus twice before, and jump¡ at this dead hour,

With martial stalk¡ hath he gone by our watch.

horatio. In what particular thought to work¡ I know not,

But in the gross and scope¡ of mine opinion

This bodes some strange eruption to our state.

marcellus. Good now,¡ sit down, and tell me, he that knows,

Why this same strict and most observant watch

So nightly toils¡ the subject¡ of the land,

And why such daily cast¡ of brazen cannon

And foreign mart¡ for implements of war,

Why such impress¡ of shipwrights, whose sore task

Does not divide the Sunday from the week.

What might be toward,¡ that this sweaty haste

Doth make the night joint-laborer with the day?

Who is ’t that can inform me?

horatio. That can I;

At least, the whisper goes so. Our last king,

Whose image even but now appeared to us,

Was, as you know, by Fortinbras of Norway,

Thereto pricked on¡ by a most emulate¡ pride,¡

Dared to the combat; in which our valiant Hamlet—

For so this side of our known world¡ esteemed him—

Did slay this Fortinbras; who by a sealed¡ compact

Well ratified by law and heraldry

Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands

Which he stood seized¡ of, to the conqueror;

Against the¡ which a moiety competent¡

Was gag d¡ by our king, which had returned¡

To the inheritance¡ of Fortinbras

Had he been vanquisher, as, by the same cov’nant¡

And carriage of the article designed,¡

His fell to Hamlet. Now, sir, young Fortinbras,

Of unimprov d mettle¡ hot and full,

Hath in the skirts¡ of Norway here and there

Sharked up¡ a list¡ of lawless resolutes¡

For food and diet¡ to some enterprise

That hath a stomach¡ in ’t, which is no other—

As it doth well appear unto our state—

But to recover of us, by strong hand

And terms compulsatory, those foresaid lands

So by his father lost. And this, I take it,

Is the main motive of our preparations,

The source of this our watch, and the chief head¡

Of this posthaste and rummage¡ in the land.

bernardo. I think it be no other but e'en so.

Well may it sort¡ that this portentous figure

Comes arm d through our watch so like the King

That was and is the question¡ of these wars.

horatio. A mote¡ it is to trouble the mind's eye.

In the most high and palmy¡ state of Rome,

A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,

The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted¡ dead

Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets;

As¡ stars with trains¡ of fire and dews of blood,

Disasters¡ in the sun; and the moist star¡

Upon whose influence Neptune's¡ empire stands¡

Was sick almost to doomsday¡ with eclipse.

And even the like precurse¡ of feared events,

As harbingers¡ preceding still¡ the fates

And prologue to the omen¡ coming on,

Have heaven and earth together demonstrated

Unto our climatures¡ and countrymen.

Enter ghost.

But soft,¡ behold! Lo, where it comes again!

I'll cross¡ it, though it blast¡ me. [It spreads his¡ arms.]

Stay, illusion!

If thou hast any sound or use of voice,

Speak to me!

If there be any good thing to be done

That may to thee do ease and grace to me,

Speak to me!

If thou art privy to¡ thy country's fate,

Which happily,¡ foreknowing may avoid,

O, speak!

Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life

Extorted treasure in the womb of earth,

For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death,

Speak of it! [The cock crows.] Stay and speak!—Stop it, Marcellus.

marcellus. Shall I strike at it with my partisan?¡

horatio. Do, if it will not stand. [They strike at it.]

bernardo. 'Tis here!

horatio. 'Tis here! [Exit ghost.]

marcellus. 'Tis gone.

We do it wrong, being so majestical,

To offer it the show of violence,

For it is as the air invulnerable,

And our vain blows malicious mockery.

bernardo. It was about to speak when the cock crew.

horatio. And then it started like a guilty thing

Upon a fearful summons. I have heard

The cock, that is the trumpet¡ to the morn,

Doth with his lofty and shrill-standing throat

Awake the god of day, and at his warning,

Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,

Th' extravagant and erring¡ spirit hies¡

To his confine; and of the truth herein

This present object made probation.¡

marcellus. It faded on the crowing of the cock.

Some say that ever ’gainst¡ that season comes

Wherein our Savior’s birth is celebrated,

This bird of dawning singeth all night long,

And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad;

The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,¡

No fairy takes,¡ nor witch hath power to charm,

So hallowed and so gracious¡ is that time.

horatio. So have I heared and do in part believe it.

But, look, the morn in russet mantle clad

Walks o’er the dew of yon high eastward hill.

Break we our watch up, and by my advice

Let us impart what we have seen tonight

Unto young Hamlet; for upon my life,

This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him.

Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,

As needful in our loves, fitting our duty?

marcellus. Let’s do ’t, I pray, and I this morning know

Where we shall find him most conveniently.

Exeunt.

1.2 Flourish. Enter claudius, King of Denmark, gertrude the Queen, [the] Council, as¡ polonius and his son, laertes, hamlet, cum aliis¡ [including voltimand and cornelius].

king. Though yet of Hamlet our¡ dear brother’s death

The memory be green, and that it us befitted

To bear our hearts in grief and our whole kingdom

To be contracted in one brow of woe,

Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature
That we with wisest sorrow think on him
Together with remembrance of ourselves
Therefore our sometime¡ sister, now our queen,
Th' imperial jointress¡ to this warlike state,
Have we, as 'twere with a defeated joy—
With an auspicious and a dropping eye,¡
With mirth in funeral and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole¡—
Taken to wife: nor have we herein barred
Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone
With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
Now follows that you know¡ young Fortinbras,
Holding a weak supposal¡ of our worth,
Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
Our state to be disjoint and out of frame,
Co-leagu d with¡ this dream of his advantage,¡
He hath not failed to pester us with message
Importing¡ the surrender of those lands
Lost by his father, with all bonds¡ of law,
To our most valiant brother. So much for him.
Now for ourself and for this time of meeting.
Thus much the business is: we have here writ
To Norway, uncle of young Fortinbras—
Who, impotent¡ and bed-rid, scarcely hears
Of this his nephew's purpose—to suppress
His¡ further gait¡ herein, in that the levies,
The lists, and full proportions are all made

Out of his subject,¡ and we here dispatch

You, good Cornelius, and you, Voltimand,

For bearers of this greeting to old Norway,

Giving to you no further personal power

To business with the king more than the scope

Of these dilated¡ articles allow. [He gives a paper.]

Farewell, and let your haste commend your duty.¡

cornelius, voltimand. In that, and all things, will we show our duty.

king. We doubt it nothing.¡ Heartily farewell.

[Exeunt voltimand and cornelius.]

And now, Laertes, what's the news with you?

You told us of some suit; what is 't, Laertes?

You cannot speak of reason to the Dane¡

And lose your voice.¡ What wouldst thou beg, Laertes,

That shall not be my offer, not thy asking?

The head is not more native¡ to the heart,

The hand more instrumental¡ to the mouth,

Than is the throne of Denmark to thy father.

What wouldst thou have, Laertes?

laertes. My dread lord,

Your leave and favor¡ to return to France,

From whence though willingly I came to Denmark

To show my duty in your coronation,

Yet now I must confess, that duty done,

My thoughts and wishes bend again toward France

And bow them to your gracious leave and pardon.¡

king. Have you your father's leave? What says Polonius?

polonius. H'ath,¡ my lord, wrung from me my slow leave

By laborsome petition, and at last
Upon his will I sealed¡ my hard¡ consent.
I do beseech you, give him leave to go.
king. Take thy fair hour,¡ Laertes. Time be thine,
And thy best graces spend it at thy will!¡
But now, my cousin¡ Hamlet, and my son—hamlet. A little more than kin, and less than kind.¡ king. How is it that the clouds still hang on you?
hamlet. Not so, my lord. I am too much in the sun.¡
queen. Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color¡ off,
And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.¡
Do not forever with thy vail d lids¡
Seek for thy noble father in the dust.
Thou know'st 'tis common,¡ all that lives must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.
hamlet. Ay, madam, it is common.
queen. If it be,
Why seems it so particular¡ with thee?
hamlet. Seems, madam? Nay, it is. I know not "seems."
'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good Mother,
Nor customary¡ suits of solemn black,
Nor windy suspiration¡ of forced breath,
No, nor the fruitful¡ river in the eye,
Nor the dejected havior¡ of the visage,
Together with all forms, moods,¡ shapes of grief,
That can denote me truly. These indeed seem,
For they are actions that a man might play.
But I have that within which passes show;

These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

king. 'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,

To give these mourning duties to your father.

But you must know your father lost a father,

That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound

In filial obligation for some term

To do obsequious¡ sorrow. But to persever¡

In obstinate condolement¡ is a course

Of impious stubbornness. 'Tis unmanly grief.

It shows a will most incorrect to heaven,

A heart unfortified,¡ a mind impatient,

An understanding simple¡ and unschooled.

For what we know must be and is as common

As any the most vulgar thing to sense,¡

Why should we in our peevish opposition

Take it to heart? Fie, 'tis a fault to heaven,

A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,

To reason most absurd, whose common theme

Is death of fathers, and who still¡ hath cried,

From the first corpse¡ till he that died today,

"This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth

This unprevailing¡ woe and think of us

As of a father; for let the world take note,

You are the most immediate¡ to our throne,

And with no less nobility of love

Than that which dearest father bears his son

Do I impart toward¡ you. For¡ your intent

In going back to school¡ in Wittenberg,¡

It is most retrograde¡ to our desire,

And we beseech you bend you¡ to remain

Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,

Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.

queen. Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet.

I pray thee, stay with us, go not to Wittenberg.

hamlet. I shall in all my best¡ obey you, madam.

king. Why 'tis a loving and a fair reply.

Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come.

This gentle and unforced accord of Hamlet

Sits smiling to¡ my heart, in grace¡ whereof

No jocund¡ health that Denmark drinks today

But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,

And the King's rouse¡ the heaven shall bruit again,¡

Respeaking earthly thunder.¡ Come away.

Flourish. Exeunt all but hamlet.

hamlet. O, that this too too sullied¡ flesh would melt,

Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!

Or that the Everlasting had not fixed

His canon¡ 'gainst self-slaughter! O God, God,

How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable

Seem to me all the uses¡ of this world!

Fie on 't, ah fie! 'Tis an unweeded garden

That grows to seed. Things rank and gross in nature

Possess it merely.¡ That it should come to this!

But two months dead—nay, not so much, not two.

So excellent a king, that was to¡ this

Hyperion¡ to a satyr,¡ so loving to my mother

That he might not beteem¡ the winds of heaven
Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth,
Must I remember? Why, she would hang on him
As if increase of appetite had grown
By what it fed on, and yet within a month—
Let me not think of 't; frailty, thy name is woman!—
A little month, or ere¡ those shoes were old
With which she followed my poor father's body,
Like Niobe;¡ all tears, why she, even she—
O God, a beast, that wants discourse of reason,¡
Would have mourned longer—married with my uncle,
My father's brother, but no more like my father
Than I to Hercules. Within a month,
Ere yet the sale of most unrighteous tears
Had left the flushing in her gall d¡ eyes,
She married. O, most wicked speed, to post¡
With such dexterity to incestuous¡ sheets!
It is not, nor it cannot come to good.
But break, my heart, for I must hold my tongue.

Enter horatio, marcellus and bernardo.

horatio. Hail to your lordship!

hamlet. I am glad to see you well.
Horatio—or I do forget myself.

horatio. The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.

hamlet. Sir, my good friend; I'll change that name¡ with you.
And what make you from¡ Wittenberg, Horatio?
Marcellus.

marcellus. My good lord.

hamlet. I am very glad to see you. [To bernardo.] Good even, sir.—

But what in faith make you from Wittenberg?

horatio. A truant disposition, good my lord.

hamlet. I would not hear your enemy say so,

Nor shall you do my ear that violence

To make it truster of your own report

Against yourself. I know you are no truant.

But what is your affair in Elsinore?

We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.

horatio. My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.

hamlet. I prithee, do not mock me, fellow student;

I think it was to see my mother's wedding.

horatio. Indeed, my lord, it followed hard¡ upon.

hamlet. Thrift, thrift, Horatio! The funeral baked meats¡

Did coldly¡ furnish forth the marriage tables.

Would I had met my dearest¡ foe in heaven

Or ever¡ I had seen that day, Horatio.

My father—Methinks I see my father.

horatio. Where, my lord?

hamlet. In my mind's eye, Horatio.

horatio. I saw him once. 'A¡ was a goodly king.

hamlet. 'A was a man. Take him for all in all,

I shall not look upon his like again.

horatio. My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.

hamlet. Saw? Who?

horatio. My lord, the King your father.

hamlet. The King my father?

horatio. Season your admiration¡ for a while

With an attent¡ ear till I may deliver,

Upon the witness of these gentlemen,

This marvel to you.

hamlet. For God's love, let me hear!

horatio. Two nights together had these gentlemen,

Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch,

In the dead waste¡ and middle of the night,

Been thus encountered. A figure like your father,

Arm d at point¡ exactly, cap-ˆ-pie,¡

Appears before them, and with solemn march

Goes slow and stately by them. Thrice he walked

By their oppressed and fear-surpris d eyes

Within his truncheon's¡ length, whilst they, distilled¡

Almost to jelly with the act¡ of fear,

Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me

In dreadful¡ secrecy impart they did,

And I with them the third night kept the watch,

Where, as they had delivered, both in time,

Form of the thing, each word made true and good,

The apparition comes. I knew your father;

These hands are not more like.

hamlet. But where was this?

marcellus. My lord, upon the platform where we watch.

hamlet. Did you not speak to it?

horatio. My lord, I did,

But answer made it none. Yet once methought

It lifted up its head and did address

Itself to motion, like as it would speak;¡

But even then¡ the morning cock crew loud,

And at the sound it shrunk in haste away

And vanished from our sight.

hamlet. 'Tis very strange.

horatio. As I do live, my honoured lord, 'tis true,

And we did think it writ down in our duty

To let you know of it.

hamlet. Indeed, indeed, sirs. But this troubles me.

Hold you the watch tonight?

all. We do, my lord.

hamlet. Armed, say you?

all. Armed, my lord.

hamlet. From top to toe?

all. My lord, from head to foot.

hamlet. Then saw you not his face?

horatio. O, yes, my lord, he wore his beaver¡ up.

hamlet. What¡ looked he, frowningly?

horatio. A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

hamlet. Pale or red?

horatio. Nay, very pale.

hamlet. And fixed his eyes upon you?

horatio. Most constantly.

hamlet. I would I had been there.

horatio. It would have much amazed you.

hamlet. Very like, very like. Stayed it long?

horatio. While one with moderate haste might tell¡ a hundred.

marcellus, bernardo. Longer, longer.

horatio. Not when I saw't.

hamlet. His beard was grizzled¡—no?

horatio. It was, as I have seen it in his life,

A sable silvered.¡

hamlet. I will watch tonight.

Perchance ’twill walk again.

horatio. I warrant¡ it will.

hamlet. If it assume my noble father’s person,

I’ll speak to it though hell itself should gape

And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all,

If you have hitherto concealed this sight,

Let it be tenable¡ in your silence still,

And whatsoever else shall hap tonight,

Give it an understanding but no tongue.

I will requite your loves. So, fare you well.

Upon the platform twixt eleven and twelve

I’ll visit you.

all. Our duty to your honor.

hamlet. Your loves, as mine to you. Farewell.

Exeunt [all but hamlet].

My father’s spirit in arms! All is not well.

I doubt¡ some foul play. Would the night were come!

Till then sit still, my soul. Foul deeds will rise,

Though all the earth o’erwhelm them, to men’s eyes.

Exit.

1.3 Enter laertes and ophelia, his sister.

laertes. My necessaries are embarked. Farewell.

And, sister, as the winds give benefit

And convoy is assistant,¡ do not sleep

But let me hear from you.

ophelia. Do you doubt that?

laertes. For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor, Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood,¡
A violet in the youth of primy¡ nature,
Forward,¡ not permanent, sweet, not lasting,
The perfume and suppliance¡ of a minute—
No more.

ophelia. No more but so?

laertes. Think it no more.
For nature crescent¡ does not grow alone
In thews¡ and bulk, but as this temple¡ waxes
The inward service of the mind and soul
Grows wide withal.¡ Perhaps he loves you now,
And now no soil¡ nor cautel¡ doth besmirch
The virtue of his will,¡ but you must fear,
His greatness weighed,¡ his will is not his own.
For he himself is subject to his birth.
He may not, as unvalued persons do,
Carve¡ for himself, for on his choice depends
The safety and health of this whole state,
And therefore must his choice be circumscribed
Unto the voice and yielding¡ of that body
Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
As he in his particular act and place¡
May give his saying deed, which is no further Than the main voice¡ of Denmark goes withal.¡

Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain
If with too credent¡ ear you list¡ his songs,
Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
To his unmastered importunity.
Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
And keep you in the rear of your affection,¡
Out of the shot and danger of desire.
The chariest¡ maid is prodigal enough
If she unmask¡ her beauty to the moon.¡
Virtue itself scapes not calumnious strokes.
The canker galls¡ the infants of the spring
Too oft before their buttons¡ be disclosed,¡
And in the morn and liquid dew¡ of youth
Contagious blastments¡ are most imminent.
Be wary then; best safety lies in fear.
Youth to itself rebels,¡ though none else near.

ophelia. I shall the effect of this good lesson keep
As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
Do not, as some ungracious¡ pastors do,
Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven,
Whiles like a puffed¡ and reckless libertine
Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads,
And recks¡ not his own rede.¡

Enter polonius.

laertes. O, fear me not.¡
I stay too long. But here my father comes.
A double¡ blessing is a double grace;
Occasion smiles upon a second leave.¡

polonius. Yet here, Laertes? Aboard, aboard, for shame!

The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,

And you are stayed for. There—my blessing with thee!

And these few precepts in thy memory

Look¡ thou character.¡ Give thy thoughts no tongue,

Nor any unproportioned¡ thought his¡ act.

Be thou familiar,¡ but by no means vulgar.¡

Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,¡

Grapple them unto thy soul with hoops of steel,

But do not dull thy palm¡ with entertainment

Of each new-hatched, unfledged courage.¡ Beware

Of entrance to a quarrel, but being in,

Bear ’t that¡ th’ oppos d may beware of thee.

Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice;

Take each man’s censure,¡ but reserve thy judgment.

Costly thy habit¡ as thy purse can buy,

But not expressed in fancy;¡ rich, not gaudy,

For the apparel oft proclaims the man,

And they in France of the best rank and station

Are of a most select and generous chief in that.¡

Neither a borrower nor a lender be,

For loan oft loses both itself and friend,

And borrowing dulleth edge of husbandry.¡

This above all: to thine own self be true,

And it must follow, as the night the day,

Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Farewell. My blessing season¡ this in thee!

laertes. Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.

polonius. The time invests¡ you. Go, your servants tend.¡

laertes. Farewell, Ophelia, and remember well

What I have said to you.

ophelia. ’Tis in my memory locked,

And you yourself shall keep the key of it.

laertes. Farewell.

Exit laertes.

polonius. What is ’t, Ophelia, he hath said to you?

ophelia. So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet.

polonius. Marry,¡ well bethought.

’Tis told me he hath very oft of late

Given private time to you, and you yourself

Have of your audience been most free and bounteous.

If it be so—as so ’tis put on¡ me,

And that in way of caution—I must tell you

You do not understand yourself so clearly

As it behooves¡ my daughter and your honor.

What is between you? Give me up the truth.

ophelia. He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders¡

Of his affection to me.

polonius. Affection? Pooh! You speak like a green girl,

Unsifted¡ in such perilous circumstance.

Do you believe his tenders, as you call them?

ophelia. I do not know, my lord, what I should think.

polonius. Marry, I will teach you. Think yourself a baby

That you have ta’en these tenders for true pay

Which are not sterling.¡ Tender¡ yourself more dearly,

Or—not to crack the wind¡ of the poor phrase,

Running it thus—you'll tender me a fool.¡

ophelia. My lord, he hath importuned me with love

In honorable fashion.

polonius. Ay, fashion¡ you may call it. Go to,¡ go to.

ophelia. And hath given countenance¡ to his speech, my lord,

With almost all the holy vows of heaven.

polonius. Ay, springes¡ to catch woodcocks.¡ I do know,

When the blood burns, how prodigal¡ the soul

Lends the tongue vows. These blazes, daughter,

Giving more light than heat, extinct in both

Even in their promise as it¡ is a-making,

You must not take for fire. From this time

Be something¡ scanter of your maiden presence.

Set your entreatments¡ at a higher rate

Than a command to parle.¡ For Lord Hamlet,

Believe so much in him¡ that he is young,

And with a larger tether may he walk

Than may be given you. In few,¡ Ophelia,

Do not believe his vows, for they are brokers,¡

Not of that dye¡ which their investments¡ show,

But mere implorators¡ of unholy suits,

Breathing¡ like sanctified and pious bawds,

The better to beguile. This is for all:¡

I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth

Have you so slander¡ any moment¡ leisure

As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.

Look to 't, I charge you. Come your ways.¡

ophelia. I shall obey, my lord.

Exeunt.

1.4 Enter hamlet, horatio, and marcellus.

hamlet. The air bites shrewdly,¡ it is very cold.

horatio. It is a nipping and eager¡ air.

hamlet. What hour now?

horatio. I think it lacks of¡ twelve.

marcellus. No, it is struck.

horatio. Indeed? I heard it not.

It then draws near the season¡
Wherein the spirit held his wont¡ to walk.

A flourish of trumpets, and two pieces¡ go off [within].

What does this mean, my lord?

hamlet. The King doth wake¡ tonight and takes his rouse,¡ Keeps wassail,¡ and the swaggering upspring¡ reels,¡
And as he drains his drafts of Rhenish¡ down,
The kettledrum and trumpet thus bray out
The triumph of his pledge.¡

horatio. It is a custom?

hamlet. Ay, marry, is’t,
But to my mind, though I am native here
And to my manner¡ born, it is a custom
More honored in the breach than the observance.¡
This heavy-headed revel east and west¡
Makes us traduced and taxed of¡ other nations.
They clepe¡ us drunkards, and with swinish phrase¡
Soil our addition;¡ and indeed it takes
From our achievements, though performed at height,¡
The pith and marrow of our attribute.¡

So, oft it chances in particular men,
That for¡ some vicious mole of nature¡ in them,
As in their birth—wherein they are not guilty,
Since nature cannot choose his¡ origin—
By their o'ergrowth of some complexion,¡
Oft breaking down the pales¡ and forts of reason,
Or by some habit that too much o'erleavens¡
The form of plausive¡ manners, that these men,
Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
Being nature's livery¡ or fortune's star,¡
His virtues else,¡ be they as pure as grace,
As infinite as man may undergo,¡ Shall in the general censure¡ take corruption
From that particular fault. The dram of evil
Doth all the noble substance often dout
To his own scandal.¡
Enter ghost.

horatio. Look, my lord, it comes!

hamlet. Angels and ministers of grace¡ defend us!
Be thou¡ a spirit of health¡ or goblin damned,
Bring¡ with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
Be thy intents¡ wicked or charitable,
Thou com'st in such a questionable¡ shape
That I will speak to thee. I'll call thee Hamlet, King, father, royal Dane. O, answer me!
Let me not burst in ignorance, but tell
Why thy canonized¡ bones, hears d¡ in death,
Have burst their cerements;¡ why the sepulcher

Wherein we saw thee quietly inurned¡

Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws

To cast thee up again. What may this mean,

That thou, dead corpse, again in complete steel,¡

Revisits thus the glimpses of the moon,¡

Making night hideous, and we fools of nature¡

So horridly to shake our disposition¡

With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?

Say, why is this? Wherefore? What should we do?

[The ghost] beckons [hamlet].

horatio. It beckons you to go away with it,

As if it some impartment¡ did desire

To you alone.

marcellus. Look with what courteous action

It wafts you to a more remov d ground.

But do not go with it.

horatio. No, by no means.

hamlet. It will not speak. Then I will follow it.

horatio. Do not, my lord!

hamlet. Why, what should be the fear?

I do not set my life at a pin's fee,¡

And for my soul, what can it do to that,

Being a thing immortal as itself?

It waves me forth again. I'll follow it.

horatio. What if it tempt you toward the flood,¡ my lord,

Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff

That beetles o'er¡ his¡ base into the sea,

And there assume some other horrible form

Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason¡
And draw you into madness? Think of it.
The very place puts toys of desperation,¡
Without more motive, into every brain
That looks so many fathoms to the sea
And hears it roar beneath.

hamlet. It wafts me still.—Go on, I'll follow thee.

marcellus. You shall not go, my lord. [They try to stop him.]

hamlet. Hold off your hands!

horatio. Be ruled. You shall not go.

hamlet. My fate cries out,¡
And makes each petty¡ artery¡ in this body
As hardy as the Nemean lion's¡ nerve.¡
Still am I called. Unhand me, gentlemen.
By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets¡ me!
I say, away!—Go on, I'll follow thee.

Exeunt ghost and hamlet.

horatio. He waxes desperate with imagination.

marcellus. Let's follow. 'Tis not fit thus to obey him.

horatio. Have after.¡ To what issue¡ will this come?

marcellus. Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.

horatio. Heaven will direct it.¡

marcellus. Nay, let's follow him.

Exeunt.

1.5 Enter ghost and hamlet.

hamlet. Whither wilt thou lead me? Speak. I'll go no further.

ghost. Mark me.

hamlet. I will.

ghost. My hour is almost come,

When I to sulfurous and tormenting flames

Must render up myself.

hamlet. Alas, poor ghost!

ghost. Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing

To what I shall unfold.

hamlet. Speak. I am bound¡ to hear.

ghost. So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.

hamlet. What?

ghost. I am thy father's spirit,

Doomed for a certain term to walk the night,

And for the day confined to fast¡ in fires,

Till the foul crimes¡ done in my days of nature¡

Are burnt and purged away. But that¡ I am forbid

To tell the secrets of my prison house,

I could a tale unfold whose lightest word

Would harrow up¡ thy soul, freeze thy young blood,

Make thy two eyes like stars start from their spheres,¡

Thy knotted and combin d locks¡ to part,

And each particular hair to stand on end

Like quills upon the fretful porcupine.

But this eternal blazon¡ must not be

To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list!

If thou didst ever thy dear father love—

hamlet. O God!

ghost. Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder.

hamlet. Murder?

ghost. Murder most foul, as in the best¡ it is,

But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.

hamlet. Haste me to know't, that I, with wings as swift
As meditation or the thoughts of love,
May sweep to my revenge.

ghost. I find thee apt;
And duller shouldst thou be¡ than the fat¡ weed
That roots itself in ease on Lethe¡ wharf, Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear.
'Tis given out that, sleeping in my orchard,¡
A serpent stung me. So the whole ear of Denmark
Is by a forg d process¡ of my death
Rankly abused.¡ But know, thou noble youth,
The serpent that did sting thy father's life
Now wears his crown.

hamlet. O, my prophetic soul! My uncle!

ghost. Ay, that incestuous, that adulterate¡ beast,
With witchcraft of his wit, with traitorous gifts¡—
O wicked wit and gifts, that have the power
So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust
The will of my most seeming-virtuous queen.
O Hamlet, what a falling off was there!
From me, whose love was of that dignity
That it went hand in hand even with the vow¡
I made to her in marriage, and to decline
Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
To¡ those of mine!
But virtue, as it¡ never will be moved,
Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,¡

So lust, though to a radiant angel linked,

Will sate itself in a celestial bed¡

And prey on garbage.

But soft, methinks I scent the morning air.

Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,

My custom always of the afternoon,

Upon my secure¡ hour thy uncle stole,

With juice of curs d hebona¡ in a vial,

And in the porches of my ears¡ did pour

The leprous distillment,¡ whose effect

Holds such an enmity with blood of man

That swift as quicksilver it courses through

The natural gates and alleys of the body,

And with a sudden vigor it doth posset¡

And curd, like eager¡ droppings into milk,

The thin and wholesome blood. So did it mine,

And a most instant tetter¡ barked¡ about,

Most lazar-like,¡ with vile and loathsome crust,

All my smooth body.

Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand

Of life, of crown, of queen at once dispatched,¡

Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,

Unhouseled,¡ disappointed,¡ unaneled,¡

No reckoning¡ made, but sent to my account

With all my imperfections on my head.

O, horrible! O, horrible, most horrible!

If thou hast nature¡ in thee, bear it not.

Let not the royal bed of Denmark be

A couch for luxury¡ and damn d incest.
But, howsoever thou pursues this act,
Taint not thy mind nor let thy soul contrive Against thy mother aught. Leave her to heaven
And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge,
To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once.
The glowworm shows the matin¡ to be near,
And 'gins to pale his¡ uneffectual fire.
Adieu, adieu, adieu! Remember me.

[Exit.]

hamlet. O all you host of heaven! O earth! What else?
And shall I couple¡ hell? O, fie! Hold,¡ hold, my heart,
And you, my sinews, grow not instant¡ old,
But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee?
Ay, thou poor ghost, whiles memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe.¡ Remember thee?
Yea, from the table¡ of my memory
I'll wipe away all trivial fond¡ records,
All saws¡ of books, all forms,¡ all pressures¡ past
That youth and observations copied there,
And thy commandment all alone shall live
Within the book and volume of my brain, Unmixed with baser matter. Yes, by heaven!
O most pernicious woman!
O villain, villain, smiling, damn d villain!
My tables¡—meet it is¡ I set it down
That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain.
At least I am sure it may be so in Denmark.

[Writing.]

So uncle, there you are.¡ Now to my word:

It is “Adieu, adieu! Remember me.”

I have sworn’t.

Enter horatio and marcellus.

horatio. My lord, my lord!

marcellus. Lord Hamlet!

horatio. Heavens secure him!¡

hamlet. So be it.

marcellus. Hilo, ho, ho, my lord!

hamlet. Hillo, ho, ho, boy! Come, bird, come.¡

marcellus. How is’t, my noble lord?

horatio. What news, my lord?

hamlet. O, wonderful!

horatio. Good my lord, tell it.

hamlet. No, you will reveal it.

horatio. Not I, my lord, by heaven.

marcellus. Nor I, my lord.

hamlet. How say you, then, would heart of man once¡ think it?

But you’ll be secret?

horatio, marcellus. Ay, by heaven, my lord.

hamlet. There’s never a villain dwelling in all Denmark

But he’s an arrant¡ knave.

horatio. There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave

To tell us this.

hamlet. Why, right, you are in the right.

And so, without more circumstance¡ at all,

I hold it fit that we shake hands and part,

You as your business and desire shall point you—
For every man hath business and desire,
Such as it is—and for my own poor part,
Look you, I'll go pray,

horatio. These are but wild and whirling words, my lord.

hamlet. I am sorry they offend you, heartily;
Yes, faith, heartily.

horatio. There's no offense, my lord.

hamlet. Yes, but Saint Patrick,¡ but there is, Horatio,
And much offense¡ too. Touching this vision here,
It is an honest ghost,¡ that let me tell you.
For your desire to know what is between us,
O'ermaster't as you may. And now, good friends,
As you are friends, scholars, and soldiers,
Give me one poor request.

horatio. What is't, my lord? We will.

hamlet. Never make known what you have seen tonight.

horatio, marcellus. My lord, we will not.

hamlet. Nay, but swear't.

horatio. In faith, my lord, not I.¡

marcellus. Nor I, my lord, in faith.

hamlet. Upon my sword.¡ [He holds out his sword.]

marcellus. We have sworn, my lord, already.¡

hamlet. Indeed, upon my sword, indeed.

ghost [cries under the stage]. Swear.

hamlet. Ha, ha, boy, sayst thou so? Art thou there, truepenny¡
Come on, you hear this fellow in the cellarage.
Consent to swear.

horatio. Propose the oath, my lord.

hamlet. Never to speak of this that you have seen,

Swear by the sword.

ghost [beneath]. Swear. [They swear.¡]

hamlet. Hic et ubique?¡ Then we'll shift our ground.

[He moves to another spot.]

Come hither, gentlemen,

And lay your hands again upon my sword.

Swear by my sword

Never to speak of this that you have heard.

ghost [beneath]. Swear by his sword. [They swear.]

hamlet. Well said, old mole. Canst work i' th' earth so fast?

A worthy pioneer!¡—Once more removed, good friends.

[He moves again.]

horatio. O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!

hamlet. And henceforth as a stranger¡ give it welcome.

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.¡

But come;

Here, as before, never, so help you mercy,¡

How strange or odd soe'er I bear myself—

As I perchance hereafter shall think meet

To put an antic¡ disposition on—

That you, at such times seeing me, never shall,

With arms encumbered¡ thus, or this headshake,

Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase

As "Well, we know," or "We could, an if¡ we would,"

Or "If we list¡ to speak," or "There be, an if they might,"¡

Or such ambiguous giving out,¡ to note¡

That you know aught¡ of me—this do swear,

So grace and mercy at your most need help you.

ghost [beneath]. Swear. [They swear.]

hamlet. Rest, rest, perturb d spirit! So, gentlemen,

With all my love I do commend me to you;¡

And what so poor a man as Hamlet is

May do t' express his love and friending¡ to you,

God willing, shall not lack.¡ Let us go in together,

And still¡ your fingers on your lips, I pray.

The time¡ is out of joint. O curs d spite¡

That ever I was born to set it right!

[They wait for him to leave first.]

Nay, come, let's go together.¡

Exeunt.

2.1 Enter old polonius with his man [reynaldo].

polonius. Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.

[He gives money and papers.]

reynaldo. I will, my lord.

polonius. You shall do marvelous¡ wisely, good Reynaldo,

Before you visit him, to make inquire¡

Of his behavior.

reynaldo. My lord, I did intend it.

polonius. Marry, well said, very well said. Look you, sir,

Inquire me first what Danskers¡ are in Paris,

And how, and who, what means,¡ and where they keep,¡

What company, at what expense; and finding

By this encompassment¡ and drift¡ of question

That they do know my son, come you more nearer Than your particular demands will touch it.¡
Take you,¡ as ’twere, some distant knowledge of him,
As thus, “I know his father and his friends,
And in part him.” Do you mark this, Reynaldo?
reynaldo. Ay, very well, my lord.
polonius. “And in part him, but,” you may say, “not well.
But if ’t be he I mean, he’s very wild,
Addicted so and so,” and there put on¡ him
What forgeries¡ you please—marry, none so rank¡
As may dishonor him, take heed of that,
But, sir, such wanton,¡ wild, and usual slips
As are companions noted and most known
To youth and liberty.
reynaldo. As gaming, my lord.
polonius. Ay, or drinking, fencing, swearing, Quarreling, drabbing¡—you may go so far.
reynaldo. My lord, that would dishonor him.
polonius. Faith, no, as you may season¡ it in the charge.
You must not put another scandal on him
That he is open to incontinency¡
That’s not my meaning. But breathe his faults so quaintly¡
That they may seem the taints of liberty,¡
The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
A savageness in unreclaim d blood,
Of general assault.¡
reynaldo. But, my good lord—polonius. Wherefore should you do this?

reynaldo. Ay, my lord, I would know that.

polonius. Marry, sir, here's my drift,

And I believe it is a fetch of warrant.¡

You laying these slight sullies on my son,

As 'twere a thing a little soiled wi' the working,¡

Mark you,

Your party in converse,¡ him you would sound,¡

Having ever¡ seen in the prenominate crimes¡

The youth you breathe¡ of guilty, be assured

He closes with you in this consequence:¡

"Good sir," or so, or "friend," or "gentleman,"

According to the phrase or the addition¡

Of man and country.

reynaldo. Very good, my lord.

polonius. And then, sir does 'a this—'a does—what was I about to say?

By the Mass, I was about to say something. Where did

I leave?

reynaldo. At "closes in the consequence."

polonius. At "closes in the consequence," ay, marry.

He closes thus: "I know the gentleman,

I saw him yesterday," or "th' other day,"

Or then, or then, with such or such, "and as you say,

There was 'a gaming," "there o'ertook in 's rouse,"¡

There falling out¡ at tennis," or perchance

"I saw him enter such a house of sale,"

Videlicet¡ a brothel, or so forth. See you now,

Your bait of falsehood takes this carp¡ of truth;

And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,¡

With windlasses¡ and with assays of bias,¡

By indirections find directions¡ out.

So by my former lecture and advice

Shall you my son. You have¡ me, have you not?

reynaldo. My lord, I have.

polonius. God b'wi'¡ ye; fare ye well.

reynaldo. Good my lord.

polonius. Observe his inclination in yourself.¡

reynaldo. I shall, my lord.

polonius. And let him ply his music.

reynaldo. Well, my lord.

polonius. Farewell.

Exit reynaldo.

Enter ophelia.

How now, Ophelia, what's the matter?

ophelia. O my lord, my lord, I have been so affrighted!

polonius. With what, i' the name of God?

ophelia. My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,¡

Lord Hamlet, with his doublet¡ all unbraced,¡

No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,

Ungartered, and down-gyv d¡ to his ankle,

Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,

And with a look so piteous in purport¡

As if he had been loos d out of hell

To speak of horrors—he comes before me.

polonius. Mad for thy love?

ophelia. My lord, I do not know,

But truly I do fear it.

polonius. What said he?

ophelia. He took me by the wrist and held me hard.

Then goes he to the length of all his arm,

And, with his other hand thus o'er his brow

He falls to such perusal of my face

As¡ 'a would draw it. Long stayed he so.

At last, a little shaking of mine arm

And thrice his head thus waving up and down,

He raised a sigh so piteous and profound

As it did seem to shatter all his bulk¡

And end his being. That done, he lets me go,

And with his head over his shoulder turned

He seemed to find his way without his eyes,

For out o' doors he went without their helps,

And to the last bended their light on me.

polonius. Come, go with me. I will go seek the King.

This is the very ecstasy¡ of love,

Whose violent property¡ fordoes¡ itself

And leads the will to desperate undertakings

As oft as any passion under heaven

That does afflict our natures. I am sorry.

What, have you given him any hard words of late?

ophelia. No, my good lord, but as you did command

I did repel his letters and denied

His access to me.

polonius. That hath made him mad.

I am sorry that with better heed and judgment

I had not quoted¡ him. I feared he did but trifle

And mean to wrack¡ thee. But beshrew my jealousy!¡

By heaven, it is as proper to our age¡

To cast beyond¡ ourselves in our opinions

As it is common for the younger sort

To lack discretion. Come, go we to the King.

This must be known,¡ which, being kept close,¡ might move

More grief to hide than hate to utter love.¡

Come.

Exeunt.

2.2 -Flourish. Enter king and queen, rosencrantz, and guildenstern [with others].

king. Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.

Moreover that¡ we much did long to see you,

The need we have to use you did provoke

Our hasty sending. Something have you heard

Of Hamlet's transformation—so call it,

Sith nor¡ th' exterior nor the inward man

Resembles that¡ it was. What it should be,

More than his father's death, that thus hath put him

So much from th' understanding of himself,

I cannot dream of. I entreat you both

That, being of so young days¡ brought up with him,

And sith so neighbored to¡ his youth and havior,¡

That you vouchsafe your rest¡ here in our court

Some little time, so by your companies

To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather

So much as from occasion¡ you may glean,

Whether aught to us unknown afflicts him thus

That, opened,¡ lies within our remedy.

queen. Good gentlemen, he hath much talked of you,

And sure I am two men there is not living

To whom he more adheres. If it will please you

To show us so much gentry¡ and good will

As to expend your time with us awhile

For the supply and profit of our hope,¡

Your visitation shall receive such thanks

As fits a king's remembrance.¡

rosencrantz. Both Your Majesties

Might, by the sovereign power you have of¡ us,

Put your dread¡ pleasures more into command

Than to entreaty.

guildenstern. But we both obey,

And here give up ourselves in the full bent¡

To lay our service freely at your feet,

To be commanded.

king. Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.

queen. Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz.

And I beseech you instantly to visit

My too much chang d son. Go, some of you,

And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.

guildenstern. Heavens make our presence and our practices¡

Pleasant and helpful to him!

queen. Ay, amen!

Exeunt rosencrantz and guildenstern [with some attendants].

Enter polonius.

polonius. Th' ambassadors from Norway, my good lord,

Are joyfully returned.

king. Thou still¡ hast been the father of good news.

polonius. Have I, my lord? I assure my good liege

I hold¡ my duty, as¡ I hold my soul,

Both to my God and to my gracious king;

And I do think, or else this brain of mine

Hunts not the trail of policy¡ so sure

As it hath used to do, that I have found

The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.

king. O, speak of that! That do I long to hear.

polonius. Give first admittance to th' ambassadors.

My news shall be the fruit¡ to that great feast.

king. Thyself do grace¡ to them and bring them in.

[Exit polonius.]

He tells me, my dear Gertrude, he hath found

The head and source of all your son's distemper.

queen. I doubt¡ it is no other but the main,¡

His father's death and our o'erhasty marriage.

Enter Ambassadors voltimand and cornelius, with polonius.

king. Well, we shall sift him.¡—Welcome, my good friends!

Say, Voltimand, what from our brother¡ Norway?

voltimand. Most fair return of greetings and desires.¡

Upon our first,¡ he sent out to suppress

His nephew's levies, which to him appeared

To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,

But, better looked into, he truly found

It was against Your Highness. Whereat grieved

That so his sickness, age, and impotence¡

Was falsely borne in hand,¡ sends out arrests¡

On Fortinbras, which he, in brief, obeys,

Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine¡

Makes vow before his uncle never more

To give th' assay¡ of arms against Your Majesty.

Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,

Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee

And his commission to employ those soldiers,

So levied as before, against the Polack,

With an entreaty, herein further shown, [giving a paper]

That it might please you to give quiet pass

Through your dominions for this enterprise

On such regards of safety and allowance¡

As therein are set down.

king. It likes¡ us well,

And at more considered¡ time we'll read,

Answer, and think upon this business.

Meantime we thank you for your well-took labor.

Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together.

Most welcome home!

Exeunt Ambassadors.

polonius. This business is well ended.

My liege, and madam, to expostulate¡

What majesty should be, what duty is,

Why day is day, night night, and time is time,

Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time.

Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,¡

And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,

I will be brief. Your noble son is mad.

Mad call I it, for, to define true madness.

What is't but to be nothing else but mad?

But let that go.

queen. More matter, with less art.

polonius. Madam, I swear I use no art at all.

That he's mad, tis true: 'tis true 'tis pity.

And pity 'tis 'tis true—a foolish figure,¡

But farewell it, for I will use no art.

Mad let us grant him, then, and now remains

That we find out the cause of this defect,

Or rather say, the cause of this defect,

For this effect defective comes by cause.¡

Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.

Perpend.¡

I have a daughter—have while she is mine—

Who, in her duty and obedience, mark,

Hath given me this. Now gather and surmise.¡

[He reads the letter.] "To the celestial and my soul's idol, the most beautified Ophelia"—

That's an ill phrase, a vile phrase; "beautified" is a vile phrase. But you shall hear. Thus: [He reads.]

"In her excellent white bosom,¡ these,¡ etc."

queen. Came this from Hamlet to her?

polonius. Good madam, stay¡ awhile, I will be faithful.¡ [He reads.]

"Doubt thou the stars are fire,

Doubt that the sun doth move,

Doubt¡ truth to be a liar,

But never doubt I love.

-O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers.¡ I have not art to reckon¡ my groans. But that I love thee best, O most best, believe it.
Adieu.
Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst this machine¡ is to him, Hamlet."
This in obedience hath my daughter shown me,
And, more above,¡ hath his solicitings,
As they fell out¡ by¡ time, by means, and place,
All given to mine ear.¡
king. But how hath she Received his love?
polonius. What do you think of me?
king. As of a man faithful and honorable.
polonius. I would fain¡ prove so. But what might you think,
When I had seen this hot love on the wing—
As I perceived it, I must tell you that,
Before my daughter told me—what might you,
Or my dear Majesty your queen here, think,
If I had played the desk or table book,¡
Or given my heart a winking,¡ mute and dumb,
Or looked upon this love with idle sight?¡
What might you think? No, I went round¡ to work,
And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:¡
"Lord Hamlet is a prince out of thy star;¡
This must not be." And then I prescripts¡ gave her,
That she should lock herself from his resort,¡
Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.
Which done, she took the fruits of my advice;

And he, repell d—a short tale to make—

Fell into a sadness, then into a fast,

Thence to a watch,¡ thence into a weakness,

Thence to a lightness,¡ and by this declension¡

Into the madness wherein now he raves,

And all we¡ mourn for.

king. [to the queen]. Do you think 'tis this?

queen. It may be, very like.

polonius. Hath there been such a time—I would fain know that—

That I have positively said "'Tis so,"

When it proved otherwise?

king. Not that I know.

polonius. Take this from this,¡ if this be otherwise.

If circumstances lead me, I will find

Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed

Within the center.¡

king. How may we try¡ it further?

polonius. You know sometimes he walks for hours together

Here in the lobby.

queen. So he does indeed.

polonius. At such a time I'll loose¡ my daughter to him.

Be you and I behind an arras¡ then.

Mark the encounter. If he love her not

And be not from his reason fall'n thereon,¡

Let me be no assistant for a state,

But keep a farm and carters.¡

king. We will try it.

Enter hamlet [reading on a book].

queen. But look where sadly¡ the poor wretch comes reading.

polonius. Away, I do beseech you both, away.

I'll board¡ him presently.¡ O, give me leave.¡

Exeunt king and queen [with attendants].

How does my good Lord Hamlet?

hamlet. Well, God-a-mercy.¡

polonius. Do you know me, my lord?

hamlet. Excellent well. You are a fishmonger.¡

polonius. Not I, my lord.

hamlet. Then I would you were so honest a man.

polonius. Honest, my lord?

hamlet. Ay, sir. To be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

polonius. That's very true, my lord.

hamlet. For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a good kissing carrion¡—Have you a daughter?

polonius. I have, my lord.

hamlet. Let her not walk i' the sun.¡ Conception¡ is a blessing, but as your daughter may conceive, friend, look to 't.

polonius [aside]. How say you by that? Still harping on my daughter.

Yet he knew me not at first; 'a¡ said I was a fishmonger. 'A is far gone. And truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love, very near this. I'll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord?

hamlet. Words, words, words.

polonius. What is the matter,¡ my lord?

hamlet. Between who?

polonius. I mean, the matter that you read, my lord.

hamlet. Slanders, sir; for the satirical rogue says here that old men have gray beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging¡ thick amber¡ and plum-tree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit,¡ together with most weak hams. All which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty¡ to have it thus set down, for yourself, sir, shall grow old¡ as I am, if like a crab you could go backward.

polonius [aside]. Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.—Will you walk out of the air,¡ my lord?

hamlet. Into my grave.

polonius. Indeed, that's out of the air. [Aside.] How pregnant¡ sometimes his replies are! A happiness¡ that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously¡ be delivered of. I will leave him and suddenly¡ contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable lord, I will most humbly take my leave of you.

hamlet. You cannot, sir, take from me anything that I will more willingly part withal¡—except my life, except my life, except my life.

Enter guildenstern and rosencrantz.

polonius. Fare you well, my lord.

hamlet. These tedious old fools!¡

polonius. You go to seek the Lord Hamlet. There he is.

rosencrantz [to polonius]. God save you, sir!

[Exit polonius.]

guildenstern. My honored lord!

rosencrantz. My most dear lord!

hamlet. My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern? Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do you both?

rosencrantz. As the indifferent¡ children of the earth.

guildenstern. Happy in that we are not overhappy.

On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.

hamlet. Nor the soles of her shoe?

rosencrantz. Neither, my lord.

hamlet. Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favors?¡

guildenstern. Faith, her privates we.¡

hamlet. In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true, she is a strumpet.¡

What news?

rosencrantz. None, my lord, but the world's grown honest.

hamlet. Then is doomsday near. But your news is not true. Let me question more in particular. What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune that she sends you to prison hither?

guildenstern. Prison, my lord?

hamlet. Denmark's a prison.

rosencrantz. Then is the world one.

hamlet. A goodly one, in which there are many confines,¡ wards,¡ and dungeons, Denmark being one o' the worst.

rosencrantz. We think not so, my lord.

hamlet. Why then 'tis none to you, for there is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so. To me it is a prison.

rosencrantz. Why then, your ambition makes it one. 'Tis too narrow for your mind.

hamlet. O God, I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams.

guildenstern. Which dreams indeed are ambition, for the very substance of the ambitious¡ is merely the shadow of a dream.

hamlet. A dream itself is but a shadow.

rosencrantz. Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow.

hamlet. Then are our beggars bodies,¡ and our monarchs and outstretched¡ heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to the court? For,

by my fay,¡ I cannot reason.

rosencrantz, guildenstern. We'll wait upon¡ you.

hamlet. No such matter. I will not sort¡ you with the rest of my servants, for, to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended.¡ But, in the beaten way¡ of friendship, what make¡ you at Elsinore?

rosencrantz. To visit you, my lord, no other occasion.

hamlet. Beggar that I am, I'm even poor in thanks; but I thank you, and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny.¡ Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free¡ visitation? Come, come, deal justly with me. Come, come. Nay, speak.

guildenstern. What should we say; my lord?

hamlet. Anything but to the purpose.¡ You were sent for, and there is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties¡ have not craft enough to color.¡ I know the good King and Queen have sent

for you.

rosencrantz. To what end, my lord?

hamlet. That you must teach me. But let me conjure¡ you, by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth,¡ by the obligation of our ever-preserved love, and by what more dear a better¡ proposer could charge¡ you withal, be even¡ and direct with me whether you were sent for or no.

rosencrantz [aside to guildenstern]. What say you?

hamlet [aside]. Nay, then, I have an eye of¡ you.—If you love me, hold not off.¡

guildenstern. My lord, we were sent for.

hamlet. I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery,¡ and your secrecy to the King and Queen molt no feather,¡ I have of late—but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, forgone all custom of exercises; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory; this most excellent canopy, the air, look you, this brave¡ o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted¡ with golden fire, why, it appeareth nothing to me but a foul and pestilent congregation¡ of vapors. What a piece of work¡ is a man! How noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving how express¡ and admirable, in action how like an angel, in apprehension¡ how like a god! The beauty of the world, the paragon of animals! And ye, to me, what is this quintessence¡of dust? Man delights not me—no, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

rosencrantz. My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

hamlet. Why did you laugh, then, when I said man delights not me?

rosencrantz. To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what Lenten entertainment¡ the players shall receive from you. We coted¡ them on the way, and higher are they coming to offer you service.

hamlet. He that plays the king shall be welcome; His Majesty shall have tribute¡ of¡ me. The adventurous knight shall use his foil and target,¡ the lover shall not sigh gratis,¡ the humorous man¡ shall end his part in peace,¡ the clown shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o' the sear,¡ and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt¡ for 't. What players are they?

rosencrantz. Even those you were wont to take such delight in, the tragedians¡ of the city. 305

hamlet. How chances it they travel? Their residence,¡ both in reputation and profit, was better both ways.

rosencrantz. I think their inhibition¡ comes by the means of the late¡ innovation.¡

hamlet. Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? Are they so followed?

rosencrantz. No, indeed are they not.

hamlet. How comes it? Do they grow rusty?

rosencrantz. Nay, their endeavor keeps¡ in the wonted¡ pace. But there is, sir, an aerie¡ of children, little eyases,¡ that cry out on the top of question¡ and are most tyrannically¡ clapped for 't. These are now the fashion, and so berattle¡ the common stages¡—so they call them—that many wearing rapiers¡ are afraid of goose quills¡ and dare scarce come thither.

hamlet. What, are they children? Who maintains 'em? How are they escoted?¡ Will they pursue the quality¡ no longer than they can sing?¡ Will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common¡ prayers—as it is most like,¡ if their means are no better¡—their writers do them wrong to make them exclaim against their own succession?¡

rosencrantz. Faith, there has been much to-do¡ on both sides, and the nation holds it no sin to tar¡ them to controversy. There was for a while no money bid for argument unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question.¡

hamlet. Is 't possible?

guildenstern. O, there has been much throwing about of brains.

hamlet. Do the boys carry it away?¡

rosencrantz. Ay, that they do, my lord—Hercules and his load¡ too.¡

hamlet. It is not very strange; for my uncle is King of Denmark, and those that would make mouths¡ at him while my father lived give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred ducats¡ apiece for his picture in little.¡ 'Sblood,¡ there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy¡ could find it out.

A flourish [of trumpets within].

guildenstern. There are the players.

hamlet. Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands, come then. Th' appurtenance¡ of welcome is fashion and ceremony. Let me comply¡ with you in this garb,¡ lest my extent¡ to the players, which, I tell you, must show fairly outwards,¡ should more appear like entertainment¡ than yours. You are welcome. But my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived.

guildenstern. In what, my dear lord?

hamlet. I am but mad north-north-west.¡ When the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.¡

Enter polonius.

polonius. Well be with you, gentlemen!

hamlet. Hark you, Guildenstern, and you too; at each ear a hearer. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling clouts.¡

rosencrantz. Haply¡ he is the second time come to them, for they say an old man is twice a child.

hamlet. I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players. Mark it.—

You say right, sir, o' Monday morning, 'twas then indeed.

polonius. My lord, I have news to tell you.

hamlet. My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius¡ was an actor in Rome—polonius. The actors are come hither, my lord.

hamlet. Buzz,¡ buzz!

polonius. Upon my honor—

hamlet. Then came each actor on his ass.

polonius. The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable,¡ or poem unlimited.¡ Seneca¡ cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus¡ too light. For the law of writ and the liberty,¡ these¡ are the only men.

hamlet. O Jephthah, judge of Israel,¡ what a treasure hadst thou!

polonius. What a treasure had he, my lord?

hamlet. Why,

"One fair daughter, and no more,

The which he lov d passing¡ well."

polonius [aside]. Still on my daughter.

hamlet. Am I not i' the right, old Jephthah?

polonius. If you call me Jephthah, my lord, I have a daughter that I love passing well.

hamlet. Nay, that follows not.

polonius. What follows then, my lord?

hamlet. Why,

"As by lot,¡ God wot,"¡ and then, you know.

"It came to pass, as most like¡ it was"— the first row¡ of the pious chanson¡ will show you more, for look where my abridgement¡ comes.

Enter the players.

You are welcome, masters; welcome, all. I am glad to see thee well. Welcome, good friends. O, old friend! Why, thy face is valanced¡ since I saw thee last. Com'st thou to beard¡ me in Denmark? What, my young lady¡ and mistress! By 'r Lady,¡ your ladyship is nearer to heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine.¡ Pray God your voice, like a piece of uncurrent¡ gold, be not cracked within the ring.¡ Masters, you are all welcome. We'll e'en to 't¡ like French falconers, fly at anything we see. We'll have a speech straight.¡ Come, give us a taste of your quality.¡ Come, a passionate speech.

first player. What speech, my good lord?

hamlet. I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted, or if it was, not above once, for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviar to the general.¡ But it was—as I received it, and others, whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of¡ mine—an excellent play, well digested¡ in the scenes, set down with as much modesty¡ as cunning.¡ I remember one said there were no sallets¡ in the lines to make the matter savory, nor no matter in the phrase that might indict¡ the author of affectation, but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome¡ than fine.¡ One speech in 't I chiefly loved: 'twas Aeneas' tale to Dido, and thereabout of it especially when he speaks of Priam's slaughter.¡ If it live in your memory, begin at this line: let me see, let me see—

"The rugged Pyrrhus,¡ like th' Hyrcanian beast"¡—

'Tis not so. It begins with Pyrrhus:

"The rugged¡ Pyrrhus, he whose sable¡ arms,

Black as his purpose, did the night resemble

When he lay couch d¡ in the ominous horse,¡

Hath now this dread and black complexion smeared

With heraldry more dismal.¡ Head to foot

Now is he total gules,¡ horridly tricked¡

With blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons,

Baked and impasted¡ with the parching streets,¡

That lend a tyrannous¡ and a damn d light

To their lord's¡ murder. Roasted in wrath and fire,

And thus o'ersized¡ with coaglate gore,

With eyes like carbuncles,¡ the hellish Pyrrhus

Old grandsire Priam seeks."

So proceed you.

polonius. 'Fore God, my lord, well spoken, with good accent and good discretion.

first player. "Anon he finds him

Striking too short at Greeks. His antique¡ sword,

Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,

Repugnant¡ to command. Unequal matched,

Pyrrhus at Priam drives, in rage strikes wide,

But with the whiff and wind of his fell¡ sword

Th' unnerv d¡ father falls. Then senseless Ilium,¡

Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top

Stoops to his¡ base, and with a hideous crash

Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear. For, lo! His sword,

Which was declining¡ on the milky¡ head

Of reverend Priam, seemed i' th' air to stick.

So as a painted¡ tyrant Pyrrhus stood,

And, like a neutral to his will and matter,¡

Did nothing.

But as we often see against¡ some storm

A silence in the heavens, the rack¡ stand still,

The bold winds speechless, and the orb¡ below

As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder

Doth rend the region,¡ so, after Pyrrhus' pause,

A rous d vengeance sets him new a-work

And never did the Cyclops¡ hammers fall

On Mars's armor forged for proof eterne¡

With less remorse¡ than Pyrrhus bleeding sword

Now falls on Priam.

Out, out, thou strumpet Fortune! All you gods

In general synod¡ take away her power!

Break all the spokes and fellies¡ from her wheel,

And bowl the round nave¡ down the hill of heaven¡

As low as to the fiends!"

polonius. This is too long.

hamlet. It shall to the barber's with your beard.—Prithee, say on.

He's for a jig¡ or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps. Say on; come to first player. "But who, ah woe! had¡ seen the mobl d¡ queen"— hamlet. "The mobl d queen?"

Hecuba.¡

polonius. That's good. "Mobl d queen" is good.

first player. “Run barefoot up and down, threat’ning the flames¡

With bisson rheum,¡ a clout¡ upon that head

Where late¡ the diadem stood, and, for a robe,

About her lank and all o’erteem d¡ loins

A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up—

Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steeped,

’Gainst Fortune’s state¡ would treason have pronounced.¡

But if the gods themselves did see her then

When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport

In mincing with his sword her husband’s limbs,

The instant burst of clamor that she made,

Unless things mortal move them not at all,

Would have made milch¡ the burning eyes of heaven,¡

And passion¡ in the gods.”

polonius. Look whe’er¡ he has not turned his color and has tears in ’s eyes. Prithee, no more.

hamlet. ’Tis well; I’ll have thee speak out the rest of this soon.—Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?¡ Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstract¡ and brief chronicles of the time. After your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live.

polonius. My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

hamlet. God’s bodikin,¡ man, much better. Use every man after his desert, and who shall scape whipping? Use them after¡ your own honor and dignity. The less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in.

polonius. Come, sirs.

[Exit.]

hamlet. Follow him, friends. We’ll hear a play tomorrow. [As they start to leave, hamlet detains the first player.] Dost thou hear me, old friend? Can you play The Murder of Gonzago?

first player. Ay, my lord.

hamlet. We'll ha 't¡ tomorrow night. You could, for a need, study¡ a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines which I would set down and insert in 't, could you not?

first player. Ay, my lord.

hamlet. Very well. Follow that lord, and look you mock him not. (Exeunt players.) My good friends, I'll leave you till night. You are welcome to Elsinore.

rosencrantz. Good my lord!

Exeunt [rosencrantz and guildenstern].

hamlet. Ay, so goodbye to you.—Now I am alone.

O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
Is it not monstrous that this player here,
But¡ in a fiction, in a dream of passion,
Could force his soul so to his own conceit?¡
That from her working¡ all his visage wanned,¡ Tears in his eyes, distraction in his aspect,¡
A broken voice, and his whole function suiting
With forms to his conceit¡ And all for nothing!
For Hecuba!
What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears
And cleave the general ear¡ with horrid¡ speech,
Make mad the guilty and appall¡ the free,¡
Confound the ignorant,¡ and amaze¡ indeed
The very faculties of eyes and ears. Yet I,
A dull and muddy-mettled¡ rascal, peak¡
Like John-a-dreams,¡ unpregnant of¡ my cause,

And can say nothing—no, not for a king

Upon whose property¡ and most dear life

A damned defeat¡ was made. Am I a coward?

Who calls me villain? Breaks my pate¡ across?

Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face?

Tweaks me by the nose? Gives me the lie i' the throat¡

As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this?

Ha, 'swounds,¡ I should take it; for it cannot be

But I am pigeon-livered¡ and lack gall

To make oppression bitter,¡ or ere this

I should ha' fatted all the region kites¡

With this slave's offal.¡ Bloody, bawdy villain!

Remorseless,¡ treacherous, lecherous, kindless¡ villain!

O, vengeance!

Why, what an ass am I? This is most brave,¡

That I, the son of a dear father murdered,

Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,

Must like a whore unpack my heart with words

And fall a-cursing, like a very drab,¡

A scullion!¡ Fie upon 't, foh! About,¡ my brains!

Hum, I have heard

That guilty creatures sitting at a play

Have by the very cunning¡ of the scene¡

Been struck so to the soul that presently¡

They have proclaimed their malefactions;

For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak

With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players

Play something like the murder of my father

Before mine uncle. I'll observe his looks;

I'll tent¡ him to the quick.¡ If 'a do blench,¡

I know my course. The spirit that I have seen

May be the devil, and the devil hath power

T' assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps,

Out of my weakness and my melancholy,

As he is very potent with such spirits,¡

Abuses¡ me to damn me. I'll have grounds

More relative¡ than this. The play's the thing

Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the King.

Exit.

3.1 -Enter king, queen, polonius, ophelia, rosencrantz, guildenstern, lords.

king. And can you by no drift of conference¡

Get from him why he puts on this confusion,

Grating so harshly all his days of quiet

With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?

rosencrantz. He does confess he feels himself distracted,

But from what cause 'a will by no means speak.

guildenstern. Nor do we find him forward¡ to be sounded,¡

But with a crafty madness keeps aloof

When we would bring him on to some confession

Of his true state.

queen. Did he receive you well?

rosencrantz. Most like a gentleman.

guildenstern. But with much forcing of his disposition.¡

rosencrantz. Niggard¡ of question,¡ but of our demands

Most free in his reply.

queen. Did you assay¡ him

To any pastime?

rosencrantz. Madam, it so fell out that certain players
We o'erraught¡ on the way. Of these we told him,
And there did seem in him a kind of joy
To hear of it. They are here about the court,
And, as I think, they have already order
This night to play before him.

polonius. 'Tis most true,
And he beseeched me to entreat Your Majesties
To hear and see the matter.

king. With all my heart, and it doth much content me
To hear him so inclined.
Good gentlemen, give him a further edge¡
And drive his purpose into these delights.

rosencrantz. We shall, my lord.

Exeunt rosencrantz and guildenstern.

king. Sweet Gertrude, leave us too,
For we have closely¡ sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here
Affront¡ Ophelia.
Her father and myself, lawful espials,¡
Will so bestow ourselves that seeing, unseen,
We may of their encounter frankly judge,
And gather by him, as he is behaved,
If't be th' affliction of his love or no
That thus he suffers for.

queen. I shall obey you.
And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish

That your good beauties be the happy cause

Of Hamlet's wildness. So shall I hope your virtues

Will bring him to his wonted¡ way again,

To both your honors.

ophelia. Madame, I wish it may.

[Exit queen.]

polonius. Ophelia, walk you here.—Gracious,¡ so please you,

We will bestow¡ ourselves. [To ophelia.] Read on this book,

[giving her a book]

That show of such an exercise¡ may color¡

Your loneliness.¡ We are oft to blame in this—

'Tis too much proved¡—that with devotion's visage

And pious action we do sugar o'er

The devil himself.

king [aside]. O 'tis too true!

How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience!

The harlot's check, beautied with plastering art,

Is not more ugly to¡ the thing¡ that helps it

Than is my deed to my most painted word.

O heavy burden!

polonius. I hear him coming. Let's withdraw, my lord.

[The king and polonius withdraw.¡]

Enter hamlet. [ophelia pretends to read a book.]

hamlet. To be, or not to be, that is the question:

Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer

The slings¡ and arrows of outrageous fortune,

Or to take arms against a sea of troubles

And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep—

No more—and by a sleep to say we end
The heartache and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to. 'Tis a consummation Devoutly to be wished. To die, to sleep;
To sleep, perchance to dream. Ay, there's the rub,¡
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled¡ off this mortal coil,¡ Must give us pause. There's the respect¡
That makes calamity of so long life.¡
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
Th' oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,¡
The pangs of disprized¡ love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office,¡ and the spurns¡
That patient merit of th' unworthy takes,¡
When he himself might his quietus¡ make
With a bare bodkin?¡ Who would fardels¡ bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death,
The undiscovered country from whose bourn¡
No traveler returns, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of?
Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue¡ of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast¡ of thought,
And enterprises of great pitch¡ and moment¡
With this regard¡ their currents¡ turn awry
And lose the name of action.—Soft you¡ now,

The fair Ophelia. Nymph, in thy orisons¡ 90

Be all my sins remembered.

ophelia. Good my lord,

How does your honor for this many a day?

hamlet. I humbly thank you; well, well, well.

ophelia. My lord, I have remembrances of yours,

That I have long d long to redeliver. 95

I pray you, now receive them. [She offers tokens.]

hamlet. No, not I, I never gave you aught.

ophelia. My honored lord, you know right well you did,

And with them words of so sweet breath composed

As made the things more rich. Their perfume lost, 100

Take these again, for to the noble mind

Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.

There, my lord. [She gives tokens.]

hamlet. Ha, ha! Are you honest?¡

ophelia. My lord? 105

hamlet. Are you fair?¡

ophelia. What means your lordship?

hamlet. That if you be honest and fair, your honesty¡ should admit no discourse¡ to your beauty.

ophelia. Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce¡ than with honesty?

hamlet. Ay, truly, for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his¡ likeness. This was sometime¡ a paradox,¡ but now the time¡ gives it proof. I did love you once.

ophelia. Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.

hamlet. You should not have believed me, for virtue cannot so inoculate¡ our old stock but we shall relish of it.¡ I loved you not.

ophelia. I was the more deceived.

hamlet. Get thee to a nunnery.¡ Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners? I am myself indifferent honest,¡ but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious, with more offenses at my beck¡ than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven? We are arrant knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father?

ophelia. At home, my lord.

hamlet. Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in's own house. Farewell.

ophelia. O, help him, you sweet heavens!

hamlet. If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shall not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, farewell. Or, if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool, for wise men know well enough what monsters¡ you¡ make of them. To a nunnery, go, and quickly too.

Farewell.

ophelia. Heavenly powers, restore him!

hamlet. I have heard of your paintings too, well enough. God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another. You jig,¡ you amble,¡ and you lisp, you nickname God's creatures,¡ and make your wantonness your ignorance.¡ Go to, I'll no more on 't;¡ it hath made me mad. I say we will have no more marriage. Those that are married already—all but one—shall live. The rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go.

Exit.

ophelia. O, what a nobler mind is here o'erthrown!

The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword,

Th expectancy¡ and rose¡ of the fair state,

The glass of fashion and the mold of form,¡

Th' observed of all observers,¡ quite, quite down! 150

And I, of ladies most deject and wretched,

That sucked the honey of his music¡ vows,

Now see that noble and most sovereign reason

Like sweet bells jangled out of tune and harsh,

That unmatched form and feature of blown¡ youth

Blasted¡ with ecstasy.¡ O, woe is me,

T’ have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

Enter king and polonius.

king. Love? His affections¡ do not that way tend;

Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little,

Was not like madness. There’s something in his soul

O’er which his melancholy sits on brood,¡

And I do doubt¡ the hatch and the disclose¡

Will be some danger, which for to prevent,

I have in quick determination

Thus set it down:¡ he shall with speed to England

For the demand of¡ our neglected tribute.

Haply the seas and countries different

With variable objects¡ shall expel

This something-settled matter in his heart,¡

Whereon his brains still¡ beating puts him thus

From fashion of himself.¡ What think you on ’t?

polonius. It shall do well. But yet do I believe

The origin and commencement of his grief

Sprung from neglected love.—How now, Ophelia?

You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said;

We heard it all.—My lord, do as you please,

But, if you hold it fit, after the play

Let his queen-mother¡ all alone entreat him

To show his grief. Let her be round¡ with him;

And I'll be placed, so please you, in the ear 180

Of all their conference. If she find him not,¡

To England send him, or confine him where

Your wisdom best shall think.

king. It shall be so.

Madness in great ones must not unwatched to.

Exeunt.

3.2 Enter hamlet and three of the players.

hamlet. Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue. But if you mouth it, as many of our players¡ do, I had as lief¡ the town crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus, but use all gently; for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious¡ periwig-pated¡ fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings,¡ who for the most part are capable of¡ nothing but inexplicable dumb shows¡ and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant.¡ It out-Herods Herod.¡ Pray you, avoid it.

first player. I warrant your honor.

hamlet. Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion be your tutor. Suit the action in the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty¡ of nature. For anything so o'erdone is from¡ the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now, was and is to hold as 't were the mirror up to nature, to show virtue her feature, scorn¡ her own image, and the very age and body of the time¡ his¡ form and pressure.¡ Now this overdone or come tardy off,¡ though it makes the unskillful¡ laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve, the censure of the which one¡ must in your allowance¡ o'erweigh a whole theater of others. O, there be players that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly, not to speak it profanely,¡ that, neither having th' accent of Christians¡ nor the gait of first player. I hope we have reformed that indifferently¡ with us, sir.

Christian, pagan, nor man,¡ have so strutted and bellowed that I have thought some of nature's journeymen¡ had made men and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.¡

hamlet. O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them; for there be of them¡ that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren¡ spectators to laugh too, though in the meantime some necessary question of the play be then to be considered. That's villainous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go make you ready.

[Exeunt players.]

Enter polonius, guildenstern and rosencrantz.

How now, my lord, will the King hear this piece of work?

polonius. And the Queen too, and that presently.¡

hamlet. Bid the players make haste.

[Exit polonius.]

Will you two help to hasten them?

rosencrantz. Ay, my lord.

Exeunt they two.

hamlet. What ho, Horatio!

Enter horatio.

horatio. Here, sweet lord, at your service.

hamlet. Horatio, thou art e'en as just a man

As e'er my conversation coped withal.¡

horatio. O, my dear lord—hamlet. Nay, do not think I flatter,

For what advancement may I hope from thee

That no revenue hast but thy good spirits

To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flattered?
No, let the candied¡ tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant¡ hinges of the knee
Where thrift¡ may follow fawning. Dost thou hear?
Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice
And could of men distinguish her election,¡ Sh' hath sealed thee¡ for herself, for thou hast been
As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing,
A man that Fortune's buffets and rewards
Hast ta'en with equal thanks; and blest are those Whose blood¡ and judgment are so well commeddled¡
That they are not a pipe for Fortune's finger
To sound what stop¡ she please. Give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,
As I do thee.—Something too much of this.—
There is a play tonight before the King.
One scene of it comes near the circumstance
Which I have told thee of my father's death.
I prithee, when thou seest that act afoot,
Even with the very comment of thy soul¡
Observe my uncle. If his occulted¡ guilt
Do not itself unkennel¡ in one speech,
It is a damn d¡ ghost that we have seen,
And my imaginations are as foul
As Vulcan't stithy.¡ Give him heedful note,
For I mine eyes will rivet to his face,
And after we will both our judgments join

In censure of his seeming.¡

horatio. Well, my lord.

If 'a steal aught¡ the whilst this play is playing

And scape detecting, I will pay the theft.

[Flourish.] Enter trumpets and kettledrums, king, queen, polonius, ophelia, [rosencrantz, guildenstern, and other lords, with guards carrying torches].

hamlet. They are coming to the play. I must be idle.¡ 80

Get you a place. [The king, queen, and courtiers sit.]

king. How fares our cousin¡ Hamlet?

hamlet. Excellent, i' faith, of the chameleon's dish:¡ I eat the air, promise-crammed. You cannot feed capons¡ so.

king. I have nothing with¡ this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine.¡

hamlet. No, nor mine now.¡ [To polonius.] My lord, you played once i'

th' university, you say?

polonius. That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.

hamlet. What did you enact?

polonius. I did enact Julius Caesar. I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me.

hamlet. It was a brute¡ part¡ of him to kill so capital a calf¡ there.—Be the players ready?

rosencrantz. Ay, my lord. They stay upon¡ your patience.

queen. Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.

hamlet. No, good Mother, here's metal¡ more attractive.

polonius [to the King]. O, ho, do you mark that?

hamlet. Lady, shall I lie in your lap?

[Lying down at ophelia's feet.]

ophelia. No, my lord.

hamlet. I mean, my head upon your lap?

ophelia. Ay, my lord.

hamlet. Do you think I meant country matters?¡

ophelia. I think nothing, my lord.

hamlet. That's a fair thought to lie between maids' legs.

ophelia. What is, my lord?

hamlet. Nothing.¡

ophelia. You are merry, my lord.

hamlet. Who, I?

ophelia. Ay, my lord.

hamlet. O God, your only jig maker.¡ What should a man do but be merry? For look you how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within's¡ two hours.

ophelia. Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

hamlet. So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.¡ O heavens! Die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year. But, by 'r Lady, 'a must build churches, then, or else shall 'a suffer not thinking on,¡ with the hobbyhorse, whose epitaph is "For O, for O, the hobbyhorse is forgot."¡

The trumpets sound. Dumb show follows.

Enter a King and a Queen [very lovingly]; the Queen embracing him, and he her. [She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him.] He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck. He lies him down upon a bank of flowers. She, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon comes in another man, takes off his crown, kisses it, pours poison in the sleeper's ears, and leaves him. The Queen returns, finds the King dead, makes passionate action. The Poisoner with some three or four come in again, seem to condole with her. The dead body is carried away. The Poisoner woos the Queen with gifts; she seems harsh awhile, but in the end accepts love.

ophelia. What means this, my lord?

hamlet. Marry, this' miching mallico;¡ it means mischief.

ophelia. Belike¡ this show imports the argument¡ of the play.

Enter prologue.

hamlet. We shall know by this fellow. The players cannot keep counsel;¡

they'll tell all ophelia. Will 'a tell us what this show meant?

hamlet. Ay, or any show that you will show him. Be not you¡ ashamed to show, he'll not shame to tell you what it means.

ophelia. You are naught,¡ you are naught. I'll mark the play.

prologue. For us and for our tragedy,

Here stooping¡ to your clemency,

We beg your hearing patiently.

[Exit.]

hamlet. Is this a prologue, or the posy of a ring?¡

ophelia. 'Tis brief, my lord.

hamlet. As woman's love.

Enter [two players as] King and Queen.

player king. Full thirty times hath Phoebus' cart¡ gone round

Neptune's salt wash¡ and Tellus'¡ orb d ground,

And thirty dozen moons with borrowed¡ sheen

About the world have times twelve thirties been,

Since love our hearts and Hymen¡ did our hands

Unite commutual¡ in most sacred bands.¡

player queen. So many journeys may the sun and moon

Make us again count o'er ere love be done!

But, woe is me, you are sick of late,

So far from cheer and from your former state,
That I distrust¡ you. Yet, though I distrust, Discomfort¡ you, my lord, it is nothing¡ must.
For women's fear and love hold quantity;¡
In neither aught, or in extremity.¡
Now, what my love is, proof¡ hath made you know,
And as my love is sized,¡ my fear is so.
Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear;
Where little fears grow great, great love grows there.

player king. Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;
My operant powers¡ their functions leave to do.¡
And thou shalt live in this fair world behind,¡ Honored, beloved; and haply one as kind
For husband shalt thou—player queen. O, confound the rest!

Such love must needs be treason in my breast.
In second husband let me be accurst!
None¡ wed the second but who¡ killed the first.

hamlet. Wormwood,¡ wormwood.

player queen. The instances¡ that second marriage move¡
Are base respects of thrift,¡ but none of love.
A second time I kill my husband dead
When second husband kisses me in bed.

player king. I do believe you think what now you speak,
But what we do determine oft we break.
Purpose is but the slave to memory,¡
Of violent birth, but poor validity,¡
Which¡ now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,

But fall unshaken when they mellow be.

Most necessary ’tis that we forget

To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt.¡

What to ourselves in passion we propose,

The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.

The violence of either grief or joy

Their own enactures¡ with themselves destroy.

Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;

Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.¡

This world is not for aye,¡ nor ’tis not strange

That even our loves should with our fortunes change;

For ’tis a question left us yet to prove,

Whether love lead fortune, or else fortune love.

The great man down,¡ you mark his favorite flies;

The poor advanced makes friends of enemies.¡

And hitherto¡ doth love on fortune tend;¡

For who not needs¡ shall never lack a friend,

And who in want¡ a hollow friend doth try¡

Directly seasons him¡ his enemy.

But, orderly to end where I begun,

Our wills and fates do so contrary run¡

That our devices still¡ are overthrown;

Our thoughts are ours, their ends¡ none of our own.

So think thou wilt no second husband wed,

But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.

player queen. Nor¡ earth to me give food, nor heaven light,

Sport and repose lock from me day and night,¡

To desperation turn my trust and hope,

An anchor's cheer¡ in prison be my scope!¡

Each opposite that blanks¡ the face of joy

Meet what I would have well and it destroy!¡

Both here and hence¡ pursue me lasting strife

If, once a widow, ever I be wife!

hamlet. If she should break it now!

player king. 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here awhile;

My spirits¡ grow dull, and fain I would beguile.

The tedious day with sleep.

player queen. Sleep rock thy brain,

And never come mischance between us twain!

[He sleeps.] Exit [player queen].

hamlet. Madam, how like you this play?

queen. The lady doth protest too much,¡ methinks.

hamlet. O, but she'll keep her word.

king. Have you heard the argument?¡ Is there no offense in 't?

hamlet. No, no, they do but jest,¡ poison in jest. No offense¡ i' the world.

king. What do you call the play?

hamlet. The Mousetrap. Marry, how? Tropically.¡ This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna. Gonzago is the Duke's¡ name, his wife, Baptista. You shall see anon. 'Tis a knavish piece of work, but what of that? Your Majesty, and we that have free¡ souls, it touches us not. Let the galled jade¡ wince, our withers¡ are unwrung.¡

Enter lucianus.

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the King.

ophelia. You are as good as a chorus,¡ my lord.

hamlet. I could interpret¡ between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying.¡

ophelia. You are keen,¡ my lord, you are keen.

hamlet. It would cost you a groaning to take off mine edge.

ophelia. Still better, and worse.¡

hamlet. So¡ you mis-take¡ your husbands. Begin, murder; leave thy damnable faces and begin. Come, the croaking raven doth bellow for revenge.

lucianus. Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing,

Confederate season,¡ else¡ no creature seeing,¡

Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,

With Hecate's ban¡ thrice blasted, thrice infected,

Thy natural magic and dire property¡

On wholesome life usurp immediately.

[He pours the poison into the sleeper's ear.]

hamlet. 'A poisons him i' the garden for his estate.¡ His¡ name's Gonzago. The story is extant, and written in very choice Italian.

You shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago's wife.

[claudius rises.]

ophelia. The King rises.

hamlet. What, frighted with false fire?¡

queen. How fares my lord?

polonius. Give o'er the play.

king. Give me some light. Away!

polonius. Lights, lights, lights!

Exeunt all but hamlet and horatio.

hamlet. "Why, let the strucken deer go weep,

The hart ungall d¡ play.

For some must watch,¡ while some must sleep;

Thus runs the world away.”¡

Would not this,¡ sir, and a forest of feathers¡—if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with¡ me—with two Provincial roses¡ on my razed¡ shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry¡ of players?¡

horatio. Half a share.

hamlet. A whole one, I.

“For thou dost know, O Damon¡ dear,
This realm dismantled¡ was
Of Jove himself, and now reigns here
A very, very—pajock.”¡ horatio. You might have rhymed.

hamlet. O good Horatio, I’ll take the ghost’s word for a thousand pound. Didst perceive?

horatio. Very well, my lord.

hamlet. Upon the talk of the poisoning?

horatio. I did very well note him.

Enter rosencrantz and guildenstern.

hamlet. Aha! Come, some music! Come, the recorders.¡

“For if the King like not the comedy, Why then, belike, he likes it not, perdy.”¡ Come, some music.

guildenstern. Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.

hamlet. Sir, a whole history.

guildenstern. The King, sir—hamlet. Ay, sir, what of him?

guildenstern. Is in his retirement¡ marvelous distempered.¡

hamlet. With drink, sir?

guildenstern. No, my lord, with choler.¡

hamlet. Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to the doctor, for me to put him to his purgation¡ would perhaps plunge him into more choler.

guildenstern. Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame¡ and start¡ not so wildly from my affair.

hamlet. I am tame, sir. Pronounce.

guildenstern. The Queen, your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you.

hamlet. You are welcome.

guildenstern. Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed.¡ If it shall please you to make me a wholesome answer, I will do your mother's commandment; if not, your pardon¡ and my return shall be the end of my business.

hamlet. Sir, I cannot.

rosencrantz. What, my lord?

hamlet. Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased. But, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command, or rather, as you say, my mother. Therefore no more, but to the matter. My mother, you say—rosencrantz. Then thus she says: your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.¡

hamlet. O wonderful son, that can so stonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of this mother's admiration? Impart.

rosencrantz. She desires to speak with you in her closet¡ ere you go to bed.

hamlet. We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade with us?

rosencrantz. My lord, you once did love me.

hamlet. And so still, by these pickers and stealers.¡

rosencrantz. Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? You do surely bar the door upon your own liberty¡ if you deny¡ your griefs to your friend.

hamlet. Sir, I lack advancement.

rosencrantz. How can that be, when you have the voice of the King himself for your succession in Denmark?

hamlet. Ay, sir, but “While the grass grows”¡—the proverb is something¡ musty.

Enter the players¡ with recorders.

O, the recorders. Let me see one. [He takes a recorder.]

To withdraw¡ with you: why do you go about to recover the wind¡ of me, as if you would drive me into a toil?¡

guildenstern. O, my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.¡

hamlet. I do not well understand that.¡ Will you play upon this pipe?

guildenstern. My lord, I cannot.

hamlet. I pray you.

guildenstern. Believe me, I cannot.

hamlet. I do beseech you.

guildenstern. I know no touch of it, my lord.

hamlet. It is as easy as lying. Govern these ventages¡ with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops.

guildenstern. But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony. I have not the skill.

hamlet. Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me, you would seem to know my stops, you would pluck out the heart of my mystery, you would sound¡ me from my lowest note to the top of my compass,¡ and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ,¡ yet cannot you make it speak. ’Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret¡ me, you cannot play upon me.

Enter polonius.

God bless you, sir!

polonius. My lord, the Queen would speak with you, and presently.¡

hamlet. Do you see yonder cloud that’s almost in shape of a camel?

polonius. By the Mass and ’tis, like a camel indeed.

hamlet. Methinks it is like a weasel.

polonius. It is backed like a weasel.

hamlet. Or like a whale.

polonius. Very like a whale.

hamlet. Then I will come to my mother by and by.¡ [Aside.] They fool me¡ to the top of my bent.¡—I will come by and by.

polonius. I will say so.

[Exit.]

hamlet. “By and by” is easily said. Leave me, friends.

[Exeunt all but hamlet.]

’Tis now the very witching time¡ of night,
When churchyards yawn and hell itself breathes out Contagion to his world. Now could I drink hot blood
And do such bitter business as the day
Would quake to look on. Soft, now to my mother.
O heart, lose not thy nature!¡ Let not ever
The soul of Nero¡ enter this firm bosom.
Let me be cruel, not unnatural;
I will speak daggers to her, but use none.
My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites:
How in my words soever¡ she be shent,¡
To give them seals¡ never my soul consent!

Exit.

3.3 Enter king, rosencrantz, and guildenstern.

king. I like him¡ not, nor stands it safe with us
To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you.
I your commission will forthwith dispatch,¡
And he to England shall along with you.

The terms of our estate¡ may not endure
Hazard so near 's as doth hourly grow
Out of his brows.¡

guildenstern. We will ourselves provide.
Most holy and religious fear¡ it is
To keep those many bodies safe
That live and feed upon Your Majesty.

rosencrantz. The single and peculiar¡ life is bound
With all the strength and armor of the mind
To keep itself from noyance,¡ but much more
That spirit upon whose weal depends and rests
The lives of many. The cess¡ of majesty
Dies not alone, but like a gulf¡ doth draw
What's near it with it; or it is a massy¡ wheel
Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
Are mortised¡ and adjoined, which, when it falls,¡
Each small annexment, petty consequence,¡ Attends¡ the boisterous ruin. Never alone
Did the King sigh, but with a general groan.

king. Arm¡ you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage,
For we will fetters put about this fear,
Which now goes too free-footed.

rosencrantz. We will haste us.

Exeunt gentlemen [rosencrantz and guildenstern].

Enter polonius.

polonius. My lord, he's going to his mother's closet.
Behind the arras¡ I'll convey myself

To hear the process.¡ I'll warrant she'll tax him home,¡

And, as you said—and wisely was it said—

'Tis meet¡ that some more audience than a mother,

Since nature makes them partial, should o'erhear

The speech, of vantage.¡ Fare you well, my liege.

I'll call upon you ere you go to bed

And tell you what I know.

king. Thanks, dear my lord.

Exit [polonius].

O, my offense is rank! It smells to heaven.

It hath the primal eldest curse¡ upon't,

A brother's murder. Pray can I not,

Though inclination be as sharp as will;¡

My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent,

And like a man to double business bound¡

I stand in pause where I shall first begin,

And both neglect. What if this curs d hand

Were thicker than itself with brother's blood,

Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens

To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy

But to confront the visage of offense?¡

And what's in prayer but this twofold force,

To be forestall d¡ ere we come to fall,

Or pardoned being down? Then I'll look up.

My fault is past. But O, what form of prayer

Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder"?

That cannot be, since I am still possessed

Of those effects for which I did the murder:

My crown, mine own ambition, and my Queen.

May one be pardoned and retain th' offense?¡

In the corrupted currents¡ of this world

Offense's gilded hand¡ may shove by¡ justice,

And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize¡ itself

Buys out the law. But 'tis not so above.

There¡ is no shuffling,¡ there the action lies¡

In his¡ true nature, and we ourselves compelled,

Even to the teeth and forehead¡ of our faults,

To give in¡ evidence. What then? What rests?¡

Try what repentance can. What can it not?

Yet what can it, when one cannot repent?

O wretched state, O bosom black as death,

O lim d¡ soul, that, struggling to be free,

Are more engaged!¡ Help, angels! Make assay.¡

Bow, stubborn knees, and heart with strings of steel,

Be soft as sinews of the newborn babe!

All may be well.

[He kneels.]

Enter hamlet.

hamlet. Now might I do it pat,¡ now 'a is a-praying;

And now I'll do 't. [He draws his sword.] And so 'a goes to heaven,

And so am I revenged. That would be scanned:¡

A villain kills my father, and for that,

I, his sole son, do this same villain send

To heaven.

Why, this is hire and salary, not revenge.

'A took my father grossly, full of bread,¡

With all his crimes broad blown,¡ as flush¡ as May;
And how his audit¡ stands who knows save¡ heaven?
But in our circumstance and course of thought¡
'Tis heavy with him. And am I then revenged,
To take him in the purging of his soul,
When he is fit and seasoned¡ for his passage?
No!
Up, sword, and know thou a more horrid hent.¡
[He puts up his sword.]
When he is drunk asleep, or in his rage,¡
Or in th' incestuous pleasure of his bed,
At game,¡ a-swearing, or about some act
That has no relish¡ of salvation in 't—
Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
And that his soul may be as damned and black
As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays.¡
This physic¡ but prolongs thy sickly days.

Exit.

king. My words fly up, my thoughts remain below.
Words without thoughts never to heaven go.

Exit.

3.4 Enter [queen] gertrude and polonius.

polonius. 'A will come straight. Look you lay home¡ to him.
Tell him his pranks have been too broad¡ to bear with,
And that Your Grace hath screened and stood between Much heat¡ and him. I'll shroud¡ me even here.
Pray you, be round¡ with him.

hamlet [within]. Mother, Mother, Mother!

queen. I'll warrant you, fear me not.

Withdraw, I hear him coming.

[polonius hides behind the arras.]

Enter hamlet.

hamlet. Now, Mother, what's the matter?

queen. Hamlet, thou hast thy father¡ much offended.

hamlet. Mother, you have my father much offended.

queen. Come, come, you answer with an idle¡ tongue.

hamlet. Go, go you question with a wicked tongue.

queen. Why, how now, Hamlet?

hamlet. What's the matter now?

queen. Have you forgot me?¡

hamlet. No, by the rood,¡ not so:

You are the Queen your husband's brother's wife,

And—would it were not so!—you are my mother.

queen. Nay, then, I'll set those to you that can speak.¡

hamlet. Come, come, and sit you down; you shall not budge.

You go not till I set you up a glass

Where you may see the inmost part of you.

queen. What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?

Help, ho!

polonius [behind the arras]. What ho! Help!

hamlet [drawing]. How now? A rat? Dead for a ducat,¡ dead!

[He thrusts his rapier through the arras.]

polonius [behind the arras]. O, I am slain! [He falls and dies.]

queen. O me, what hast thou done?

hamlet. Nay, I know not. Is it the King?

queen. O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!

hamlet. A bloody deed—almost as bad, good Mother,

As kill a King, and marry with his brother.

queen. As kill a King!

hamlet. Ay, lady, it was my word.

[He parts the arras and discovers polonius.]

Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!

I took thee for thy better. Take thy fortune.

Thou find'st to be too busy¡ is some danger.—

Leave wringing of your hands. Peace, sit you down,

And let me wring your heart, for so I shall,

If it be made of penetrable stuff,

If damn d custom¡ have not brazed¡ it so

That it be proof¡ and bulwark against sense.¡

queen. What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue

In noise so rude against me?

hamlet. Such an act

That blurs the grace and blush of modesty,

Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose

From the fair forehead of an innocent love

And sets a blister¡ there, makes marriage vows

As false as dicers' oaths. O, such a deed

As from the body of contraction¡ plucks

The very soul, and sweet religion makes¡

A rhapsody¡ of words. Heaven's face does glow

O'er this solidity and compound mass

With tristful visage, as against the doom,

Is thought-sick at the act.¡

queen. Ay me, what act,

That roars so loud and thunders in the index?¡

hamlet [showing her two likenesses]. Look here upon this picture, and on this,

The counterfeit presentment¡ of two brothers.

See what a grace was seated on this brow:

Hyperion's¡ curls, the front¡ of Jove himself,

An eye like Mars¡ to threaten and command,

A station¡ like the herald Mercury¡

New-lighted¡ on a heaven-kissing hill—

A combination and a form indeed

Where every god did seem to set his seal?¡

To give the world assurance of a man.

This was your husband. Look you now what follows:

Here is your husband, like a mildewed ear,¡

Blasting¡ his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?

Could you on this far mountain leave¡ to feed

And batten¡ on this moor?¡ Ha, have you eyes?

You cannot call it love, for at your age

The heyday¡ in the blood¡ is tame, it's humble,

And waits upon the judgment, and what judgment

Would step from this to this? Sense,¡ sure, you have,

Else could you not have motion, but sure that sense

Is apoplexed,¡ for madness would not err,¡

Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thralled,

But¡ it reserved some quantity of choice

To serve in such a difference.¡ What devil was 't

That thus hath cozened¡ you at hoodman-blind?¡

Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,

Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans¡ all,

Or but a sickly part of one true sense

Could not so mope.¡ O shame, where is thy blush?

Rebellious hell,

If thou canst mutine¡ in a matron's bones,

To flaming youth let virtue be as wax

And melt in her own fire.¡ Proclaim no shame

When the compulsive ardor gives the charge,

Since frost itself as actively doth burn,

And reason panders will.¡

queen. O Hamlet, speak no more!

Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul,

And there I see such black and grain d¡ spots

As will not leave their tinct.¡

hamlet. Nay, but to live

In the rank sweat of an enseam d¡ bed,

Stewed¡ in corruption, honeying and making love

Over the nasty sty!

queen. O, speak to me no more!

These words like daggers enter in my ears.

No more, sweet Hamlet!

hamlet. A murderer and a villain,

A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe¡

Of your precedent lord,¡ a vice¡ of kings,

A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,

That from a shelf the precious diadem stole

And put it in his pocket!

queen. No more!

Enter ghost [in his nightgown].

hamlet. A king of shreds and patches¡—

Save me, and hover o’er me with your wings,

You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?

queen. Alas, he’s mad!

hamlet. Do you not come your tardy son to chide,

That, lapsed¡ in time and passion, lets go by

Th’ important¡ acting of your dread command?

O, say!

ghost. Do not forget. This visitation

Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.

But look, amazement¡ on thy mother sits.

O, step between her and her fighting soul!

Conceit¡ in weakest bodies strongest works.

Speak to her, Hamlet.

hamlet. How is it with you, lady?

queen. Alas, how is ’t with you,

That you do bend your eye on vacancy,

And with th’ incorporal¡ air do hold discourse?

Forth at your eyes your spirts wildly peep,

And, as the sleeping soldiers in th’ alarm,¡

Your bedded¡ hair, like life in excrements,¡

Start up and stand on end. O gentle son,

Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper¡

Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look?

hamlet. On him, on him! Look you how pale he glares!

His form and cause conjoined,¡ preaching to stones,

Would make them capable.¡—Do not look upon me,

Lest with this piteous action you convert

My stern effects.¡ Then what I have to do

Will want true color—tears perchance for blood.¡

queen. To whom do you speak this?

hamlet. Do you see nothing there?

queen. Nothing at all, yet all that is I see.

hamlet. Nor did you nothing hear?

queen. No, nothing but ourselves.

hamlet. Why, look you there, look how it steals away!

My father, in his habit¡ as¡ he lived!

Look where he goes even now out at the portal!

Exit ghost.

queen. This is the very¡ coinage of your brain.

This bodiless creation ecstasy

Is very cunning in.¡

hamlet. Ecstasy?

My pulse as yours doth temperately keep time,

And makes as healthful music. It is not madness

That I have uttered. Bring me to the test,

And I the matter will reword,¡ which madness

Would gambol¡ from. Mother, for love of grace,

Lay not that flattering unction¡ to your soul

That not your trespass but my madness speaks.

It will but skin¡ and film the ulcerous place,

Whiles rank corruption, mining¡ all within,

Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven,

Repeat what's past, avoid what is to come,

And do not spread the compost¡ on the weeds

To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue;¡

For in the fatness¡ of these pursy¡ times
Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg,
Yea, curb¡ and woo for leave¡ to do him good.

queen. O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.

hamlet. O, throw away the worser part of it,
And live the purer with the other half.
Good night. But go not to my uncle's bed;
Assume a virtue, if you have it not.
That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,¡
Of habits devil,¡ is angel yet in this,
That to the use of actions fair and good
He likewise gives a frock or livery¡
That aptly¡ is put on. Refrain tonight,
And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
For use¡ almost can change the stamp of nature,¡
And either¡ . . .the devil, or throw him out
With wondrous potency. Once more, good night;
And when you are desirous to be blest,
I'll blessing beg of you.¡ For this same lord,
[Pointing to polonius.]
I do repent; but heaven hath pleased it so
To punish me with this, and this with me,
That I must be their scourge and minister.¡
I will bestow¡ him, and will answer¡ well
The death I gave him. So again, good night.
I must be cruel only to be kind.
This¡ bad begins, and worse remains behind.¡

One word more, good lady.

queen. What shall I do?

hamlet. Not this by no means that I bid you do:

Let the bloat¡ King tempt you again to bed,

Pinch wanton¡ on your cheek, call you his mouse,

And let him, for a pair of reechy¡ kisses,

Or paddling¡ in your neck with his damned fingers,

Make you to ravel all this matter out¡

That I essentially am not in madness,

But mad in craft.¡ 'Twere good¡ you let him know,

For who that's but a Queen, fair, sober, wise,

Would from a paddock,¡ from a bat, a gib,¡

Such dear concernings¡ hide? Who would do so?

No, in despite of sense and secrecy,¡

Unpeg the basket¡ on the house's top,

Let the birds fly, and like the famous ape,¡

To try conclusions,¡ in the basket creep

And break your own neck down.¡

queen. Be thou assured, if words be made of breath,

And breath of life, I have no life to breathe

What thou hast said to me.

hamlet. I must to England. You know that?

queen. Alack,

I had forgot. 'Tis so concluded on.

hamlet. There's letters sealed, and my two schoolfellows,

Whom I will trust as I will adders fanged,

They bear the mandate; they must sweep my way

And marshall me to knavery.¡ Let it work.¡

For ’tis the sport to have the enginer¡
Hoist with¡ his own petard,¡ and ’t shall go hard
But I will¡ delve one yard below their mines¡
And blow them at the moon. O, ’tis most sweet
When in one line¡ two crafts¡ directly meet.
This man shall set me packing.¡
I’ll lug the guts into the neighbor room.
Mother, good night indeed. This counselor
Is now most still, most secret, and most grave,
Who was in life a foolish prating knave.—
Come, sir, to draw toward an end¡ with you.—
Good night, Mother.

Exeunt [separately, hamlet dragging in polonius].

4.1 Enter king and queen¡, with rosencrantz and guildenstern.

king. There’s matter¡ in these sighs, these profound heaves.¡
You must translate: ’tis fit we understand them.
Where is your son?

queen. Bestow this place on us a little while.

[Exeunt rosencrantz and guildenstern.]

Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen tonight!

king. What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?

queen. Mad as the sea and wind when both contend Which is the mightier. In his lawless fit,
Behind the arras hearing something stir,
Whips out his rapier, cries, “A rat, a rat!”
And in this brainish apprehension¡ kills
The unseen good old man.

king. O heavy¡ deed!

It had been so with us,¡ had we been there.

His liberty is full of threats to all—

To you yourself, to us, to everyone.

Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answered?¡

It will be laid to us, whose providence¡

Should have kept short,¡ restrained, and out of haunt¡

This mad young man. But so much was our love,

We would not understand what was most fit,

But, like the owner of a foul disease,

To keep it from divulging,¡ let it feed

Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?

queen. To draw apart the body he hath killed,

O'er whom his very madness, like some ore¡

Among a mineral¡ of metals base,

Shows itself pure: 'a weeps for what is done.

king. O Gertrude, come away!

The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch

But we will ship him hence, and this vile deed

We must with all our majesty and skill

Both countenance¡ and excuse.—Ho, Guildenstern!

Enter rosencrantz and guildenstern.

Friends both, go join you with some further aid.

Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,

And from his mother's closet hath he dragged him.

Go seek him out, speak fair, and bring the body

Into the chapel. I pray you, haste in this.

[Exeunt rosencrantz and guildenstern.]

Come, Gertrude, we'll call up our wisest friends

And let them know both what we mean to do

And what's untimely done¡. 40

Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter,¡

As level¡ as the cannon to his blank,¡

Transports his poisoned shot, may miss our name

And hit the woundless¡ air. O, come away!

My soul is full of discord and dismay. 45

Exeunt.

4.2 Enter hamlet.

hamlet. Safely stowed.

rosencrantz, guildenstern [within]. Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!

hamlet. But soft, what noise? Who calls on Hamlet? O, here they come.

Enter rosencrantz and guildenstern.

rosencrantz. What have you done, my lord, with the dead body?

hamlet. Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin. 5 rosencrantz. Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence

And bear it to the chapel.

hamlet. Do not believe it.

rosencrantz. Believe what?

hamlet. That I can keep your counsel and not mine own.¡ Besides, to 10 be demanded of¡ a sponge, what replication¡ should be made by the son of a king?

rosencrantz. Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

hamlet. Ay, sir, that soaks up the King's countenance,¡ his rewards, his authorities.¡ But such officers do the King best service in the end. 15

He keeps them, like an ape, an apple, in the corner of his jaw, first mouthed to be last swallowed. When he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again.

rosencrantz. I understand you not, my lord.

hamlet. I am glad of it. A knavish speech sleeps in¡ a foolish ear.

rosencrantz. My lord, you must tell us where the body is and go with us to the King.

hamlet. The body is with the King, but the King is not with the body.¡

The King is a thing—

guildenstern. A thing, my lord?

hamlet. Of nothing.¡ Bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after!¡

Exeunt [running].

4.3 Enter king, and two or three.

king. I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.

How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!

Yet must not we put the strong law on him.

He's loved of¡ the distracted¡ multitude,

Who like not in their judgment, but their eyes,¡

And where 'tis so, th' offender's scourge¡ is weighed,¡

But never the offense. To bear all smooth and even,¡

This sudden sending him away must seem

Deliberate pause.¡ Diseases desperate grown

By desperate appliance¡ are relieved,

Or not at all.

Enter rosencrantz, guildenstern, and all the rest.

How now, what hath befall'n?

rosencrantz. Where the dead body is bestowed, my lord,

We cannot get from him.

king. But where is he?

rosencrantz. Without, my lord; guarded, to know your pleasure.

king. Bring him before us.

rosencrantz. Ho! Bring in the lord.

They enter [with hamlet].

king. Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?

hamlet. At supper.

king. At supper? Where?

hamlet. Not where he eats, but where 'a is eaten. A certain convocation of politic worms¡ are e'en¡ at him. Your worm¡ is your only emperor for diet.¡ We fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service¡—two dishes, but to one table. That's the end.

king. Alas, alas!

hamlet. A many may fish with the worm that hath eat¡ of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm.

king. What dost thou mean by this?

hamlet. Nothing but to show you how a king may go a progress¡ through the guts of a beggar.

king. Where is Polonius?

hamlet. In heaven. Send thither to see. If your messenger find him not there, seek him i' th' other place yourself. But if indeed you find him not within this month, you shall nose him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

king [to some attendants]. Go seek him there.

hamlet. 'A will stay till you come.

[Exeunt attendants.]

king. Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety—

Which we do tender,¡ as we dearly¡ grieve

For that which thou hast done—must send thee hence

With fiery quickness. Therefore prepare thyself.

The bark¡ is ready, and the wind at help,

Th' associates tend,¡ and everything is bent¡

For England.

hamlet. For England!

king. Ay, Hamlet.

hamlet. Good.

king. So is it, if thou knew'st our purposes.

hamlet. I see a cherub¡ that sees them. But come, for England!

Farewell, dear mother.

king. Thy loving father, Hamlet.

hamlet. My mother. Father and mother is man and wife, man and wife is one flesh, and so, my mother. Come, for England!

Exit.

king. Follow him at foot;¡ tempt him with speed aboard.

Delay it not. I'll have him hence tonight.

Away! For everything is sealed and done

That else leans on¡ th' affair. Pray you, make haste.

[Exeunt all but the king.]

And, England,¡ if my love thou hold'st at aught¡—

As my great power thereof may give thee sense,¡

Since yet thy cicatrice¡ looks raw and red

After the Danish sword, and thy free awe¡

Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set¡

Our sovereign process,¡ which imports at full,¡

By letters congruing¡ to that effect,

The present¡ death of Hamlet. Do it, England,

For like the hectic¡ in my blood he rages,

And thou must cure me. Till I know 'tis done,

Howe'er my haps,¡ my joys were ne'er begun.

Exit.

4.4 Enter fortinbras with his army over the stage.

fortinbras. Go, Captain, from me greet the Danish king.
Tell him that by his license¡ Fortinbras
Craves the conveyance of¡ a promised march
Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.
If that His Majesty would aught with us,
We shall express our duty¡ in his eye;¡
And let him know so.

captain. I will do ’t, my lord.

fortinbras. Go softly¡ on.

[Exeunt all but the captain.]

Enter hamlet, rosencrantz, [guildenstern,] etc.

hamlet. Good sir, whose powers¡ are these?

captain. They are of Norway, sir.

hamlet. How purposed, sir, I pray you?

captain. Against some part of Poland.

hamlet. Who commands them, sir?

captain. The nephew to old Norway. Fortinbras.

hamlet. Goes it against the main¡ of Poland, sir,
Or for some frontier?

captain. Truly to speak, and with no addition,¡
We go to gain a little patch of ground
That hath in it no profit but the name.
To pay¡ five ducats, five, I would not farm it;¡
Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole
A ranker¡ rate, should it be sold in fee.¡

hamlet. Why, then the Polack never will defend it.

captain. Yes, it is already garrisoned.

hamlet. Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats
Will not debate the question of this straw.¡
This is th' impostume¡ of much wealth and peace,
That inward breaks, and shows no cause without Why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.

captain. God b' wi' you, sir.

[Exit.]

rosencrantz. Will 't please you go, my lord?

hamlet. I'll be with you straight. Go a little before.

[Exeunt all except hamlet.]

How all occasions do inform against¡ me
And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
If his chief good and market of¡ his time
Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more.
Sure he that made us with such large discourse,¡ Looking before and after,¡ gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To fust¡ in us unused. Now, whether it be Bestial oblivion,¡ or some craven¡ scruple
Of thinking too precisely¡ on th' event¡—
A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
And ever three parts coward—I do not know
Why yet I live to say "This thing's to do,"
Sith¡ I have cause, and will, and strength, and means
To do 't. Examples gross¡ as earth exhort me:
Witness this army of such mass and charge,¡
Led by a delicate and tender¡ prince,

Whose spirit with divine ambition puffed
Makes mouths¡ at the invisible event,¡ Exposing what is moral and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,¡ Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
Is not to stir without great argument,
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
When honor's at the stake.¡ How stand I, then,
That have a father killed, a mother stained,
Excitements of¡ my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men
That for a fantasy¡ and trick¡ of fame
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot¡
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,¡
Which is not tomb enough and continent¡
To hide the slain? O, from this time forth
My thoughts be bloody or be nothing worth!

Exit.

4.5 Enter horatio, [queen] gertrude, and a gentleman.

queen. I will not speak with her.

gentleman. She is importunate, Indeed distract.¡ Her mood will needs be pitied.

queen. What would she have?

gentleman. She speaks much of her father, says she hears There's tricks¡ i' the world, and hems,¡ and beats her heart,¡ Spurns enviously at straws,¡ speaks things in doubt¡
That carry but half sense. Her speech is nothing,

Yet the unshap d use¡ of it doth move

The hearers to collection;¡ they yawn¡ at it,

And botch¡ the words up fit to their own thoughts,

Which,¡ as her winks and nods and gestures yield¡ them,

Indeed would make one think there might be thought,¡

Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.¡

horatio. 'Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew

Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding¡ minds.

queen. Let her come in. [Exit gentleman.]

[Aside.] To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,

Each toy¡ seems prologue to some great amiss.¡

So full of artless jealousy is guilt,

It spills itself in fearing to be spilt.¡

Enter ophelia¡ [distracted].

ophelia. Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?

queen. How now, Ophelia?

ophelia [she sings].

"How should I your true love know

From another one?

By his cockle hat¡ and staff,

And his sandal shoon."¡

queen. Alas, sweet lady, what imports this song?

ophelia. Say you? Nay, pray you, mark.

"He is dead and gone, lady, [Song.]

He is dead and gone;

At his head a grass-green turf,

At his heels a stone."

O, ho!

queen. Nay, but Ophelia—ophelia. Pray you, mark. [Sings.]

"White his shroud as the mountain snow"—

Enter king.

queen. Alas, look here, my lord.

ophelia.

"Larded¡ with sweet flowers; [Song.]
Which bewept to the ground did not go With true-love showers."¡ king. How do you, pretty lady?

ophelia. Well, God 'ild¡ you! They say the owl¡ was a baker's daughter. Lord, we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table!

king. Conceit¡ upon her father.

ophelia. Pray let's have no words of this; but when they ask you what it means, say you this:

"Tomorrow is Saint Valentine's day, [Song.]
All in the morning betime,¡
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine.
Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,
And dupped¡ the chamber door,
Let in the maid, that out a maid Never departed more."

king. Pretty Ophelia—

ophelia. Indeed, la, without an oath, I'll make an end on 't: [Sings.]

"By Gis¡ and by Saint Charity,
Alack, and fie for shame!

Young men will do ’t, if they come to ’t;
By Cock,¡ they are to blame.
Quoth she, ÔBefore you tumbled me.
You promised me to wed.’”
He answers:
“ÔSo would I ha’ done, by yonder sun,
An¡ thou hadst not come to my bed.’”

king. How long hath she been thus?

ophelia. I hope all will be well. We must be patient, but I cannot choose but weep to think they would lay him i’ the cold ground. My brother shall know of it. And so I thank you for your good counsel. Come, my coach! Good night, ladies, good night, sweet ladies, good night, good night.

[Exit.]

king [to horatio]. Follow her close. Give her good watch, I pray you.

[Exit horatio.]

O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father’s death—and now behold!
O Gertrude, Gertrude,
When sorrows come, they come not single spies,¡
But in battalions. First, her father slain;
Next, your son gone, and he most violent author
Of his own just remove;¡ the people muddied,¡
Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers
For good Polonius’ death— and we have done but greenly,¡
In hugger-mugger¡ to inter him; poor Ophelia Divided from herself and her fair judgment.
Without the which we are pictures or mere beasts;
Last, and as much containing¡ as all these,

Her brother is in secret come from France,

Feeds on this wonder, keeps himself in clouds,¡

And wants¡ not buzzers¡ to infect his ear

With pestilent speeches of his father's death,

Wherein necessity,¡ of matter beggared,¡

Will nothing stick our person to arraign

In ear and ear.¡ O my dear Gertrude, this,

Like to a murdering piece,¡ in many places

Gives me superfluous death.¡ [A noise within.]

queen. Alack, what noise is this?

king. Attend!¡

Where is my Switzers?¡ Let them guard the door.

Enter a messenger.

What is the matter?

messenger. Save yourself, my lord!

The ocean, overpeering of his list,¡

Eats not the flats¡ with more impetuous¡ haste

Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,¡

O'erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord,

And, as¡ the world were now but to begin,

Antiquity forgot, custom not known,

The ratifiers and props of every word,¡

They cry, "Choose we! Laertes shall be king!"

Caps,¡ hands, and tongues applaud it to the clouds,

"Laertes shall be king, Laertes king!"

queen. How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!

[A noise within.]

O, this is counter,¡ you false Danish dogs!

Enter laertes with others.

king. The doors are broke.

laertes. Where is this king?—Sirs, stand you all without.

all. No, let's come in.

laertes. I pray you, give me leave.

all. We will, we will.

laertes. I thank you. Keep the door. [Exeunt followers.] O thou vile king, Give me my father!

queen [restraining him]. Calmly, good Laertes.

laertes. That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me bastard, Cries cuckold to my father, brands the harlot
Even here, between¡ the chaste unsmirch d brow
Of my true mother.

king. What is the cause, Laertes,
That thy rebellion looks so giantlike?
Let him go, Gertrude. Do not fear our¡ person.
There's such divinity doth hedge¡ a king
That treason can but peep to what it would,¡ Acts little of his will.¡ Tell me, Laertes, Why thou art thus incensed. Let him go, Gertrude.
Speak, man.

laertes. Where is my father?

king. Dead.

queen. But not by him.

king. Let him demand his fill.

laertes. How came he dead? I'll not be juggled with.¡
To hell, allegiance! Vows, to the blackest devil!
Conscience and grace, to the profoundest pit!

I dare damnation. To this point I stand,¡

That both the worlds I give to negligence,¡

Let come what comes, only I'll be revenged

Most throughly¡ for my father.

king. Who shall stay you?

laertes. My will, not all the world's.¡

And for¡ my means, I'll husband them so well

They shall go far with little.

king. Good Laertes,

If you desire to know the certainty

Of your dear father, is 't writ in your revenge

That, swoopstake,¡ you will draw both friend and foe,

Winner and loser?

laertes. None but his enemies.

king. Will you know them, then?

laertes. To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms,

And like the kind life-rendering pelican¡

Repast¡ them with my blood.

king. Why, now you speak

Like a good child and a true gentleman.

That I am guiltless of your father's death,

And am most sensibly¡ in grief for it,

It shall as level¡ to your judgment 'pear

As day does to your eye. [A noise within.] laertes. How now, what noise is that?

Enter ophelia.

king. Let her come in.

laertes. O heat, dry up my brains! Tears seven times salt

Burn out the sense and virtue¡ of mine eye!
By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight¡
Till our scale turn the beam.¡ O rose of May!
Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!
O heavens, is ’t possible a young maid’s wits
Should be as mortal as an old man’s life?
Nature is fine in¡ love, and where ’tis fine
It sends some precious instance¡ of itself
After the thing it loves.¡

ophelia. [Song.]

“They bore him barefaced on the bier,
Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny,
And in his grave rained many a tear—”

Fare you well, my dove!

laertes. Hadst thou thy wits and didst persuade¡ revenge,
It could not move thus.

ophelia. You must sing “A-down a-down,” and you “call him a-down-a.”¡ O, how the wheel¡ becomes it! It is the false steward¡ that stole his master’s daughter.

laertes. This nothing’s more than matter.¡

ophelia. There’s rosemary,¡ that’s for remembrance; pray you, love, remember. And there is pansies;¡ that’s for thoughts.

laertes. A document¡ in madness, thoughts and remembrance fitted.

ophelia. There’s fennel¡ for you, and columbines.¡ There’s rue¡ for you, and here’s some for me; we may call it herb of grace o’ Sundays. You must wear your rue with a difference.¡ There’s a daisy.¡ I would give you some violets,¡ but they withered all when my father died. They say ’a made a good end—[Sings.] “For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy.”

laertes. Thought¡ and affliction, passion,¡ hell itself,

She turns to favor¡ and to prettiness.

ophelia. [Song.]

"And will 'a not come again?

And will 'a not come again?

No, no, he is dead.

Go to thy deathbed,

He never will come again.

"His beard was as white as snow,

All flaxen was his poll.¡

He is gone, he is gone,

And we cast away moan.

God ha' mercy on his soul!"

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God b' wi' you.

[Exit, followed by gertrude.]

laertes. Do you see this, O God?

king. Laertes, I must commune with your grief,

Or you deny me right. Go but apart,

Make choice of whom¡ your wisest friends you will,

And they shall hear and judge twixt you and me.

If by direct or by collateral hand¡

They find us touched,¡ we will our kingdom give,

Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours

To you in satisfaction; but if not,

Be you content to lend your patience to us,

And we shall jointly labor with your soul

To give it due content.

laertes. Let this be so.

His means of death, his obscure funeral—

No trophy,¡ sword, nor hatchment¡ o'er his bones,

No noble rite, nor formal ostentation¡—

Cry to be heard, as 'twere from heaven to earth,

That¡ I must call 't in question.¡

king. So you shall, 215

And where th' offense is, let the great ax fall.

I pray you, go with me.

Exeunt.

4.6 Enter horatio and others.

horatio. What are they that would speak with me?

gentleman. Seafaring men, sir. They say they have letters for you.

horatio. Let them come in.

[Exit gentleman.]

I do not know from what part of the world

I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet. 5

Enter Sailors.

first sailor. God bless you, sir.

horatio. Let him bless thee too.

first sailor. 'A shall, sir, an 't¡ please him. There's a letter for you, sir—it came from th' ambassador¡ that was bound for England—if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is. [He gives a letter.] 10 horatio [reads]. "Horatio, when thou shalt have overlooked¡ this, give these fellows some means¡ to the King; they have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment¡ gave us chase. Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valor, and in the grapple I boarded them. On the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy,¡ but they knew what they did: I am to do a good turn for them. Let the King have the letters I have sent, and repair¡ thou to me with as much speed as thou wouldest fly death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb, yet are they much too light for the bore¡ of the matter. These good fellows will bring thee where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England. Of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell.

He that thou knowest thine, Hamlet.”

Come, I will give you way¡ for these your letters.

And do ’t the speedier that you may direct me

To him from whom you brought them.

Exeunt.

4.7 Enter king and laertes.

king. Now must your conscience my acquittance seal,¡

And you must put me in your heart for friend,

Sith¡ you have heard, and with a knowing ear,

That he which hath your noble father slain

Pursued my life.

laertes. It well appears. But tell me

Why you proceeded not against these feats¡

So crimeful and so capital¡ in nature,

As by your safety, greatness, wisdom, all things else,

You mainly¡ were stirred up.

king. O, for two special reasons,

Which may to you perhaps seem much unsinewed,¡

But yet to me they’re strong. The Queen his mother

Lives almost by his looks, and for myself—

My virtue or my plague, be it either which—

She is so conjunctive¡ to my life and soul

That, as the star moves not but in his¡ sphere,¡

I could not but by her. The other motive

Why to a public count¡ I might not go

Is the great love the general gender¡ bear him,

Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,

Work¡ like the spring¡ that turneth wood to stone,

Convert his gyves¡ to graces, so that my arrows,

Too slightly timbered¡ for so loud¡ a wind,

Would have reverted¡ to my bow again

But not where I had aimed them.

laertes. And so have I a noble father lost,

A sister driven into desperate terms,¡

Whose worth, if praises may go back¡ again,

Stood challenger on mount¡ of all the age

For her perfections. But my revenge will come.

king. Break not your sleeps for that. You must not think

That we are made of stuff so flat and dull

That we can let our beard be shook with danger

And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more.

I loved your father, and we love ourself;

And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine—

Enter a messenger with letters.

How now? What news?

messenger. Letters, my lord, from Hamlet:

This to Your Majesty, this to the Queen.

[He gives letters.]

king. From Hamlet? Who brought them?

messenger. Sailors, my lord, they say. I saw them not.

They were given me by Claudio. He received them

Of him that brought them.

king. Laertes, you shall hear them.—

Leave us.

[Exit messenger.]

[He reads.] “High and mighty, you shall know I am set naked¡ on your kingdom. Tomorrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes, when I shall, first asking your pardon,¡ thereunto recount the occasion of my sudden and more strange return.

Hamlet.”

What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?

Or is it some abuse,¡ and no such thing?¡

laertes. Know you the hand?

king. ’Tis Hamlet’s character.¡ “Naked!”

And in a postscript here he says “alone.”

Can you devise¡ me?

laertes. I am lost in it, my lord. But let him come.

It warms the very sickness in my heart

That I shall live and tell him to his teeth,

“Thus didst thou.”¡

king. If it be so, Laertes—

As how should it be so? How otherwise?¡—

Will you be ruled by me?

laertes. Ay, my lord,

So¡ you will not o’errule me to a peace.

king. To thine own peace. If he be now returned,

As checking at¡ his voyage, and that¡ he means

No more to undertake it, I will work him

To an exploit, now ripe in my device,¡

Under the which he shall not choose but fall;

And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe,

But even his mother shall uncharge the practice¡
And call it an accident.

laertes. My lord, I will be ruled,
The rather if you could devise it so That I might be the organ.¡

king. It falls right.
You have been talked of since your travel much,
And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality
Wherein they say you shine. Your sum of parts¡
Did not together pluck such envy from him
As did that one, and that, in my regard,
Of the unworthiest siege.¡

laertes. What part is that, my lord?

king. A very ribbon in the cap of youth,
Yet needful too, for youth no less becomes¡
The light and careless liverty that it wears
Than settled age his sables¡ and his weeds¡
Importing health and graveness.¡ Two months since Here was a gentleman of Normandy.
I have seen myself, and served against, the French,
And they can well¡ on horseback, but this gallant
Had witchcraft in 't; he grew unto his seat,
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse
As had he been incorpsed and demi-natured¡
With the brave beast. So far he topped¡ my thought That I in forgery¡ of shapes and tricks
Come short of what he did.

laertes. A Norman was 't?

king. A Norman.

laertes. Upon my life, Lamord.

king. The very same.

laertes. I know him well. He is the brooch¡ indeed

And gem of all the nation.

king. He made confession¡ of you,

And gave you such a masterly report

For art and exercise in your defense,¡

And for your rapier most especial,

That he cried out ’twould be a sight indeed

If one could match you. Th’ escrimers¡ of their nation,

He swore, had neither motion, guard, nor eye

If you opposed them. Sir, this report of his

Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy

That he could nothing do but wish and beg

Your sudden¡ coming o’er, to play¡ with you.

Now, out of this—laertes. What out of this, my lord?

king. Laertes, was your father dear to you?

Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,

A face without a heart?

laertes. Why ask you this?

king. Not that I think you did not love your father,

But that I know love is begun by time,¡

And that I see, in passages of proof,¡

Time qualifies¡ the spark and fire of it.

There lives within the very flame of love

A kind of wick or snuff¡ that will abate it,

And nothing is at a like goodness still,¡
For goodness, growing to a pleurisy,¡
Dies in his own too much.¡ That¡ we would do,
We should do when we would; for this “would” changes
And hath abatements¡ and delays as many
As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents,¡
And then this “should” is like a spendthrift sigh,¡
That hurts by easing.¡ But, to the quick o’ th’ ulcer:¡
Hamlet comes back. What would you undertake
To show yourself in deed your father’s son
More than in words?

laertes. To cut his throat i’ the church.

king. No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize;¡
Revenge should have no bounds. But good Laertes,
Will you do this,¡ keep close within your chamber.
Hamlet returned shall know you are come home.
We’ll put on those shall¡ praise your excellence
And set a double varnish on the fame
The Frenchman gave you, bring you in fine¡ together,
And wager on your heads. He, being remiss,¡
Most generous,¡ and free from all contriving,
Will not peruse the foils, so that with ease,
Or with a little shuffling, you may choose
A sword unabated,¡ and in a pass of practice¡
Requite him for your father.

laertes. I will do ’t.
And for that purpose I’ll anoint my sword.
I bought an unction¡ of a mountebank¡

So mortal that, but dip a knife in it,

Where it draws blood no cataplasm¡ so rare,

Collected from all simples¡ that have virtue¡

Under the moon,¡ can save the thing from death

That is but scratched withal. I'll touch my point

With this contagion, that if I gall¡ him slightly,

It may be death.

king. Let's further think of this,

Weigh what convenience both of time and means

May fit us to our shape.¡ If this should fail,

And that our drift look through our bad performance,¡

'Twere better not assayed. Therefore this project

Should have a back or second, that might hold

If this did blast in proof.¡ Soft, let me see

We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings¡—

I ha 't!

When in your motion you are hot and dry—

As¡ make your bouts more violent to that end—

And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepared him

A chalice for the nonce,¡ whereon but sipping,

If he by chance escape your venomed stuck,¡

Our purpose may hold there. [A cry within.] But stay, what noise?

Enter queen.

queen. One woe doth tread upon another's heel,

So fast they follow. Your sister's drowned, Laertes.

laertes. Drowned! O, where queen. There is a willow grows askant¡ the brook,

That shows his hoar leaves¡ in the glassy stream;

Therewith fantastic garlands did she make

Of crowflowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,¡

That liberal¡ shepherds give a grosser name,¡

But our cold¡ maids do dead men's fingers call them.

There on the pendent¡ boughs her crownet¡ weeds

Clamb'ring to hang, an envious sliver¡ broke,

When down her weedy¡ trophies and herself

Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,

And mermaidlike awhile they bore her up,

Which time she chanted snatches of old lauds,¡

As one incapable of¡ her own distress,

Or like a creature native and endued¡

Unto that element. But long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,

Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay

To muddy death.

laertes. Alas, then she is drowned?

queen. Drowned, drowned.

laertes. Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia,

And therefore I forbid my tears. But yet

It is our trick;¡ nature her custom holds,

Let shame say what it will. [He weeps.] When these are gone,

The woman will be out.¡ Adieu, my lord.

I have a speech of fire that fain would blaze,

But that this folly douts¡ it.

Exit.

king. Let's follow, Gertrude.

How much I had to do to calm his rage!

Now fear I this will give it start again;

Therefore let's follow.

Exeunt.

5.1 Enter two clowns¡ [with spades and mattocks].

first clown. Is she to be buried in Christian burial, when she willfully seeks her own salvation?¡

second clown. I tell thee she is; therefore make her grave straight.¡ The crowner¡ hath sat on her,¡ and finds it¡ Christian burial.

first clown. How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defense?

second clown. Why, 'tis found so.¡

first clown. It must be se offendendo,¡ it cannot be else. For here lies the point: if I drown myself wittingly, it argues an act, and an act hath three branches—it is to act, to do, and to perform. Argal,¡ she drowned herself wittingly.

second clown. Nay, but hear you, goodman¡ delver—first clown. Give me leave. Here lies the water; good. Here stands the man; good. If the man go to this water and drown himself, it is, will he, nill he,¡ he goes, mark you that. But if the water come to him and drown him, he drowns not himself. Argal, he that is not guilty of his own death shortens not his own life.

second clown. But is this law?

first clown. Ay, marry, is 't—crowner's quest¡ law.

second clown. Will you ha' the truth on 't? If this had not been a gentlewoman, she should have been buried out o' Christian burial.

first clown. Why, there thou sayst.¡ And the more pity that great folk should have countenance¡ in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their even-Christian.¡ Come, my spade. There is no ancient¡ gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers, and grave makers.

They hold up¡ Adam's profession.

second clown. Was he a gentleman?

first clown. 'A was the first that ever bore arms.¡

second clown. Why, he had none.

first clown. What, art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture? The Scripture says Adam digged. Could he dig without arms?¡ I'll put another question to thee. If thou answerest me not to the purpose, confess thyself¡— second clown. Go to.

first clown. What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter?

second clown. The gallows maker, for that frame¡ outlives a thousand tenants.

first clown. I like thy wit well, in good faith. The gallows does well.¡
But how does it well? It does well to those that do ill. Now thou dost ill to say the gallows is built stronger than the church. Argal, the gallows may do well to thee. To 't again, come.

second clown. "Who builds stronger than a mason, a shipwright, or a carpenter?"

first clown. Ay, tell me that, and unyoke.¡

second clown. Marry, now I can tell.

first clown. To 't.

second clown. Mass,¡ I cannot tell.

Enter hamlet and horatio [at a distance].

first clown. Cudgel thy brains no more about it, for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating; and when you are asked this question next, say "a grave maker. The houses he makes lasts till doomsday." Go get thee in and fetch me a stoup¡ of liquor.

[Exit second clown. first clown digs.]

Song.

"In youth, when I did love, did love,¡
Methought it was very sweet,
To contract—O—the time for—a—my behove,¡ O, methought there—a—was nothing—a—meet."¡ hamlet. Has this fellow no feeling of his business, 'a¡ sings in grave-making?

horatio. Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness.¡

hamlet. 'Tis e'en so. The hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.¡

first clown. Song.

"But age with his stealing steps
Hath clawed me in his clutch,
And hath shipped me into the land,¡
As if I had never been such."

[He throws up a skull.]

hamlet. That skull had a tongue in it and could sing once. How the knave jowls¡ it to the ground, as if 'twere Cain's jawbone, that did the first murder! This might be the pate of a politician,¡ which this ass now o'erreaches,¡ one that would circumvent God, might it not?

horatio. It might, my lord.

hamlet. Or of a courtier, which could say, "Good morrow, sweet lord! How dost thou, sweet lord?" This might be my Lord Such-a-one, that praised my Lord Such-a-one's horse when 'a meant to beg it, might it not?

horatio. Ay, my lord hamlet. Why e'en so, and now my lady Worm's, chapless,¡ and knocked about the mazard¡ with a sexton's spade. Here's fine revolution,¡ an¡ we had the trick to see¡ 't. Did these bones cost

no more the breeding but to play¡ at loggets¡ with them? Mine ache to think on ’t.

first clown. Song.

“A pickax and a spade, a spade,

For and¡ a shrouding sheet;

O, a pit of clay for to be made

For such a guest is meet.”

[He throws up another skull.]

hamlet. There’s another. Why may not that be the skull of a lawyer? Where be his quiddities¡ now, his quillities,¡ his cases, his tenures,¡ and his tricks? Why does he suffer this mad knave now to knock him about the sconce¡ with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action of battery?¡ Hum, this fellow might be in ’s time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances,¡ his fines, his double¡ vouchers,¡ his recoveries.¡ In this the fine of his fines and the recovery of recoveries, to have his fine pate full of fine dirt?¡ Will his vouchers vouch him no more of his purchases, and double ones too, than the length and breadth of a pair of indentures?¡ The very conveyances¡ of his lands will scarcely lie in this box,¡ and must th’ inheritor¡ himself have no more, ha?

horatio. Not a jot more, my lord.

hamlet. Is not parchment made of sheepskins?

horatio. Ay, my lord, and of calves’ skins too.

hamlet. They are sheep and calves, which seek out assurance in that.¡ I will speak to this fellow.—

Whose grave’s this, sirrah?¡

first clown. Mine, sir. [Sings.]

“O, pit of clay for to be made

For such a guest is meet.”

hamlet. I think it be thine, indeed, for thou liest in ’t.

first clown. You lie out on ’t, sir, and therefore ’tis not yours. For my part, I do not lie in ’t, yet it is mine.

hamlet. Thou dost lie in ’t, to be in ’t and say it is thine. ’Tis for the dead, not for the quick;¡ therefore thou liest.

first clown. ÔTis a quick lie, sir; ’twill away again from me to you.

hamlet. What man dost thou dig it for?

first clown. For no man, sir.

hamlet. What woman, then?

first clown. For none, neither.

hamlet. Who is to be buried in ’t?

first clown. One that was a woman, sir, but, rest her soul, she’s dead.

hamlet. How absolute¡ the knave is! We must speak by the card,¡ or equivocation¡ will undo us. By the Lord, Horatio, this three years I have took¡ note of it: the age is grown so picked¡ that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier, he galls his kibe.¡—How long has thou been grave maker?

first clown. Of all the days i’ the year, I came to ’t that day that our last king Hamlet overcame Fortinbras.

hamlet. How long is that since?

first clown. Cannot you tell that? Every fool can tell that. It was that very day that young Hamlet was born—he that is mad and sent into England.

hamlet. Ay, marry, why was he sent into England?

first clown. Why, because ’a was mad. ’A shall recover his wits there, or if ’a do not, ’tis no great matter there.

hamlet. Why?

first clown. ’Twill not be seen in him there. There the men are as mad as he.

hamlet. How came he mad?

first clown. Very strangely, they say.

hamlet. How strangely?

first clown. Faith, e'en with losing his wits.

hamlet. Upon what ground?¡

first clown. Why, here in Denmark. I have been sexton here, man and boy, thirty years.

hamlet. How long will a man lie i' th' earth ere he rot?

first clown. Faith, if 'a be not rotten before 'a die—as we have many pocky¡ corpses nowadays, that will scarce hold the laying in¡—'a will last you¡ some eight year or nine year. A tanner will last you nine year.

hamlet. Why he more than another?

first clown. Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade that 'a will keep out water a great while, and your water is a sore¡ decayer of your whoreson¡ dead body. [He picks up a skull.] Here's a skull now hath lien you¡ i' th' earth three-and-twenty years.

hamlet. Whose was it?

first clown. A whoreson mad fellow's it was. Whose do you think it was?

hamlet. Nay, I know not.

first clown. A pestilence on him for a mad rogue! 'A poured a flagon of Rhenish¡ on my head once. This same skull, sir, was, sir, Yorick's skull, the King's jester.

hamlet. This?

first clown. E'en that.

hamlet. Let me see. [He takes the skull.] Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio, a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy. He hath bore¡ me on his back a thousand times, and now how abhorred in my imagination it is! My gorge rises¡ at it. Here hung those lips that I have kissed I know not how oft. Where be your gibes now? Your gambols, your songs, your flashes of merriment that were wont¡ to set the table on a roar?

Not one now, to mock your own grinning?¡ Quite chopfallen?¡ Now get you to my lady's chamber and tell her, let her paint an inch thick, to this favor¡ she must come. Make her laugh at that. Prithee, Horatio, tell me one thing.

horatio. What's that, my lord?

hamlet. Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' th' earth?

horatio. E'en so.

hamlet. And smelt so? Pah! [He throws down the skull.]

horatio. E'en so, my lord.

hamlet. To what base uses we may return, Horatio! Why may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander till 'a find it stopping a bunghole?¡

horatio. ÔTwere to consider too curiously¡ to consider so.

hamlet. No, faith, not a jot, but to follow him thither with modesty¡ enough, and likelihood to lead it. As thus: Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander returneth to dust, the dust is earth, of earth we make loam,¡ and why of that loam whereto he was converted might they not stop a beer barrel?

Imperious¡ Caesar, dead and turned to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the wind away.
O, that that earth which kept the world in awe
Should patch a wall t' expel the winter's flaw!¡

Enter king, queen, laertes, and the corpse [of ophelia, in procession, with priest, lords, etc.].

But soft,¡ but soft awhile! Here comes the King,
The Queen, the courtiers. Who is this they follow?
And with such maim d¡ rites? This doth betoken
The corpse they follow did with desperate hand
Fordo¡ its own life. 'Twas of some estate.¡
Couch we¡ awhile and mark.

[He and horatio conceal themselves. ophelia's body is taken to the grave.]

laertes. What ceremony else?

hamlet [to horatio]. That is Laertes, a very noble youth. Mark.

laertes. What ceremony else?

priest. Her obsequies have been as far enlarged

As we have warranty.¡ Her death was doubtful,

And but that great command o'ersways the order¡

She should in ground unsanctified been lodged¡

Till the last trumpet. For¡ charitable prayers,

Shards,¡ flints, and pebbles should be thrown on her.

Yet here she is allowed her virgin crants,¡

Her maiden strewments,¡ and the bringing home

Of bell and burial.¡

laertes. Must there no more be done?

priest. No more be done.

We should profane the service of the dead

To sing a requiem and such rest¡ to her

As to peace-parted souls.¡

laertes. Lay her i' th' earth,

And from her fair and unpolluted flesh

May violets¡ spring! I tell thee, churlish priest,

A ministering angel shall my sister be

When thou liest howling.¡

hamlet [to horatio]. What, the fair Ophelia!

queen [scattering flowers]. Sweets to the sweet! Farewell.

I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife.

I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,

And not t' have strewed thy grave.

laertes. O, treble woe

Fall ten times treble on that curs d head

Whose wicked deed thy most ingenious sense¡
Deprived thee of! Hold off the earth awhile,
Till I have caught her once more in mine arms.
[He leaps into the grave and embraces ophelia.]
Now pile your dust upon the quick and dead,
Till of this flat a mountain you have made
T' o'ertop old Pelion or the skyish head
Of blue Olympus.¡

hamlet [coming forward]. What is he whose grief
Bears such an emphasis,¡ whose phrase of sorrow
Conjures the wandering stars¡ and makes them stand
Like wonder-wounded¡ hearers? This is I, Hamlet the Dane.¡

laertes [grappling with him¡]. The devil take thy soul!

hamlet. Thou pray'st not well.
I prithee, take thy fingers from my throat,
For though I am not splenitive¡ and rash,
Yet have I in me something dangerous,
Which let thy wisdom fear. Hold off thy hand.

king. Pluck them asunder.

queen. Hamlet, Hamlet!

all. Gentlemen!

horatio. Good my lord, be quiet.

[hamlet and laertes are parted.]

hamlet. Why, I will fight with him upon this theme Until my eyelids will no longer wag.¡

queen. O my son, what theme?

hamlet. I loved Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers

Could not with all their quantity of love

Make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her?

king. O, he is mad, Laertes.

queen. For love of God, forbear him.¡

hamlet. 'Swounds,¡ show me what thou'lt do.

Woo't¡ weep? Woo't fight? Woo't fast? Woo't tear thyself?

Woo't drink up¡ eisel?¡ Eat a crocodile?¡

I'll do 't. Dost come here to whine?

To outface me with leaping in her grave?

Be buried quick¡ with her, and so will I.

And if thou prate of mountains, let them throw

Millions of acres on us, till our ground,

Singeing his pate¡ against the burning zone,¡

Make Ossa¡ like a wart! Nay, an¡ thou'lt mouth,¡

I'll rant as well as thou.

queen. This is mere¡ madness,

And thus awhile the fit will work on him;

Anon, as patient as the female dove

When that her golden couplets¡ are disclosed,¡

His silence will sit drooping.

hamlet. Hear you, sir,

What is the reason that you use me thus?

I loved you ever. But it is no matter.

Let Hercules himself do what he may,

The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.¡

Exit hamlet.

king. I pray thee, good Horatio, wait upon him.

[Exit horatio.]

[To laertes.] Strengthen your patience in¡ our last night's speech;

We'll put the matter to the present push.¡—

Good Gertrude, set some watch over your son.—

This grave shall have a living¡ monument.

An hour of quiet¡ shortly shall we see;

Till then, in patience our proceeding be.

Exeunt.

5.2 Enter hamlet and horatio.

hamlet. So much for this, sir; now shall you see the other.¡

You do remember all the circumstance?

horatio. Remember it, my lord!

hamlet. Sir, in my heart there was a kind of fighting

That would not let me sleep. Methought I lay

Worse than the mutines¡ in the bilboes¡ Rashly,¡

And praised be rashness for it—let us know¡

Our indiscretion¡ sometimes serves us well

When our deep plots do pall,¡ and that should learn¡ us

There's a divinity that shapes our ends,

Rough-hew¡ them how we will—horatio. That is most certain.

hamlet. Up from my cabin,

My sea-gown¡ scarfed¡ about me, in the dark

Groped I to find out them,¡ had my desire,

Fingered¡ their packet, and in fine¡ withdrew

To mine own room again, making so bold,

My fears forgetting manners, to unseal

Their grand commission; where I found, Horatio—

Ah, royal knavery!—an exact command,

Larded¡ with many several¡ sorts of reasons
Importing¡ Denmark's health and England's too,
With, ho! such bugs¡ and goblins in my life,¡
That on the supervise,¡ no leisure bated,¡
No, not to stay¡ the grinding of the ax,
My head should be struck off.

horatio. Is't possible?

hamlet [giving a document].

Here's the commission. Read it at more leisure.
But wilt thou hear now how I did proceed?

horatio. I beseech you.

hamlet. Being thus benetted round with villainies—
Ere I could make a prologue to my brains,
They had begun the play¡—I sat me down,
Devised a new commission, wrote it fair.¡
I once did hold it, as our statists¡ do,
A baseness¡ to write fair, and labored much
How to forget that learning; but, sir, now
It did me yeoman's¡ service. Wilt thou know
Th' effect¡ of what I wrote?

horatio. Ay, good my lord.

hamlet. An earnest conjuration¡ from the King,
As England was his faithful tributary,
As love between them like the palm¡ might flourish,
As peace should still¡ her wheaten garland¡ wear
And stand a comma¡ 'tween their amities,
And many suchlike "as"es¡ of great charge,¡
That on the view and knowing of these contents,

Without debatement further more or less,
He should those bearers put to sudden death,
Not shriving time¡ allowed.

horatio. How was this sealed?

hamlet. Why, even in that was heaven ordinant.¡
I had my father's signet¡ in my purse.
Which was the model¡ of that Danish seal;
Folded the writ¡ up in the form of th' other,
Subscribed¡ it, gave 't th' impression,¡ placed it safely,
The changeling¡ never known. Now, the next day
Was our sea fight, and what to this was sequent¡
Thou knowest already.

horatio. So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to 't.

hamlet. Why, man, they did make love to this employment.
They are not near my conscience. Their defeat¡
Does by their own insinuation¡ grow.
'Tis dangerous when the baser¡ nature comes Between the pass¡ and fell¡ incens d points
Of mightly opposites.¡

horatio. Why, what a king is this!

hamlet. Does it not, think thee, stand me now upon¡—
He that hath killed my king and whored my mother,
Popped in between th' election¡ and my hopes,
Thrown out his angle¡ for my proper¡ life,
And with such cozenage¡—is 't not perfect conscience
To quit¡ him with this arm? And is 't not to be damned
To let this canker¡ of our nature come In¡ further evil?

horatio. It must be shortly known to him from England

What is the issue of the business there.

hamlet. It will be short. The interim is mine,

And a man's life's no more than to say "one."¡

But I am very sorry, good Horatio,

That to Laertes I forgot myself,

For by the image of my cause I see

The portraiture of his. I'll court his favors.

But, sure, the bravery¡ of his grief did put me

Into a tow'ring passion.

horatio. Peace, who comes here?

Enter a Courtier [osric].

osric. Your lordship is right welcome back to Denmark.

hamlet. I humbly thank you, sir. [To horatio.] Dost know this water fly?

horatio. No, my good lord.

hamlet. Thy state is the more gracious, for 'tis a vice to know him. He hath much land, and fertile. Let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib¡ shall stand at the King's mess.¡ 'Tis a chuff,¡ but, as I say, spacious in the possession of dirt.

osric. Sweet lord, if your lordship were at leisure, I should impart a thing to you from His Majesty.

hamlet. I will receive it, sir, with all diligence of spirit.

Put your bonnet¡ to his¡ right use; 'tis for the head.

osric. I thank your lordship, it is very hot.

hamlet. No, believe me, 'tis very cold. The wind is northerly.

osric. It is indifferent¡ cold, my lord, indeed.

hamlet. But yet methinks it is very sultry and hot for my complexion.¡

osric. Exceedingly, my lord. It is very sultry, as 'twere—I cannot tell how. My lord, His Majesty bade me signify to you that ’a has laid a great wager on your head. Sir, this is the matter—hamlet. I beseech you, remember.

[hamlet moves him to put on his hat.]

osric. Nay, good my lord; for my ease,¡ in good faith. Sir, here is newly come to court Laertes—believe me, an absolute¡ gentleman, full of most excellent differences,¡ of very soft society¡ and great showing.¡ Indeed, to speak feelingly¡ of him, he is the card¡ or calendar¡ of gentry,¡ for you shall find in him the continent of what part a gentleman would see.¡

hamlet. Sir, his definement¡ suffers no perdition¡ in you,¡ though I know to divide him inventorially¡ would dozy¡ th’ arithmetic of memory, and yet but yaw¡ neither¡ in respect of¡ his quick sail.

But, in the verity of extolment,¡ I take him to be a soul of great article,¡ and his infusion¡ of such dearth and rareness¡ as, to make true diction¡ of him, his semblable¡ is his mirror and who else would trace¡ him his umbrage,¡ nothing more.

osric. Your lordship speaks most infallibly of him.

hamlet. The concernancy,¡ sir? Why do we wrap the gentleman in our more rawer breath?¡

osric. Sir?

horatio. Is ’t not possible to understand in another tongue?¡ You will do ’t,¡ sir, really.

hamlet. What imports the nomination¡ of this gentleman?

osric. Of Laertes?

horatio [to hamlet]. His purse is empty already; all ’s golden words are spent.

hamlet. Of him, sir.

osric. I know you are not ignorant—hamlet. I would you did, sir. Yet in faith if you did, it would not much approve¡ me. Well, sir?

osric. You are not ignorant of what excellence Laertes is—hamlet. I dare not confess that, lest I should compare with him in excellence. But to know a man well were to know himself.¡

osric. I mean, sir, for¡ his weapon; but in the imputation laid on him by them,¡ in his meed¡ he's unfellowed.¡

hamlet. What's his weapon?

osric. Rapier and dagger.

hamlet. That's two of his weapons—but well.¡

osric. The King, sir, hath wagered with him six Barbary horses, against the which he¡ has impawned,¡ as I take it, six French rapiers and poniards,¡ with their assigns,¡ as girdle, hangers,¡ and so.¡ Three of the carriages,¡ in faith, are very dear to fancy,¡ very responsive¡ to the hilts, most delicate¡ carriages, and of very liberal conceit.¡

hamlet. What call you the carriages?

horatio [to hamlet]. I knew you must be edified by the margent¡ ere you had done.

osric. The carriages, sir, are the hangers.

hamlet. The phrase would be more germane to the matter if we could carry a cannon by our sides; I would it might be hangers till then. But, on: six Barbary horses against six French swords, their assigns, and three liberal-conceited carriages; that's the French bet against the Danish. Why is this impawned, as you call it?

osric. The King, sir, hath laid,¡ sir, that in a dozen passes¡ between yourself and him, he shall not exceed you three hits. He hath laid on twelve for nine, and it would come to immediate trial, if your lordship would vouchsafe the answer.¡

hamlet. How if I answer no?

osric. I mean, my lord, the opposition of your person in trial.

hamlet. Sir, I will walk here in the hall. If it please His Majesty, it is the breathing time¡ of day with me. Let¡ the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the King hold his purpose. I will win for him an I can; if not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits.

osric. Shall I deliver you¡ so?

hamlet. To this effect, sir—after what flourish your nature will.

osric. I commend¡ my duty to your lordship.

hamlet. Yours, yours. [Exit osric.] 'A does well to commend it himself; there are no tongues else for 's turn.¡

horatio. This lapwing¡ runs away with the shell on his head.

hamlet. 'A did comply with his dug¡ before a' sucked it. Thus has he—and many more of the same breed that I know the drossy¡ age dotes on—only got the tune¡ of the time and, out of an habit of encounter,¡ a kind of yeasty¡ collection,¡ which carries them through and through the most fanned and winnowed opinions;¡ and do¡ but blow them to their trial, the bubbles are out.¡

Enter a lord.

lord. My lord. His Majesty commended him to you by young Osric, who brings back to him that you attend him in the hall. He sends to know if your pleasure hold to play with Laertes, or that¡ you will take longer time.

hamlet. I am constant to my purposes; they follow the King's pleasure. If his fitness speaks, mine is ready;¡ now or whensoever, provided I be so able as now.

lord. The King and Queen and all are coming down.

hamlet. In happy time.¡

lord. The Queen desires you to use some gentle entertainment¡ to Laertes before you fall to play.

hamlet. She well instructs me. [Exit lord.]

horatio. You will lose, my lord.

hamlet. I do not think so. Since he went into France, I have been in continual practice; I shall win at the odds. But thou wouldst not think how ill all's here about my heart; but it is no matter.

horatio. Nay, good my lord—hamlet. It is but foolery, but it is such a kind of gaingiving¡ as would perhaps trouble a woman.

horatio. If your mind dislike anything, obey it. I will forestall their repair¡ hither and say you are not fit.

hamlet. Not a whit, we defy augury. There is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come. The readiness is all. Since no man of aught he leaves knows, what is 't to leave betimes? Let be.¡
A table prepared. [Enter] trumpets, drums, and officers with cushions; king, queen, [osric,] and all the state; foils, daggers, [and wine borne in;] and laertes.

king. Come, Hamlet, come and take this hand from me.
[The king puts laertes' hand into hamlet's.]

hamlet [to laertes]. Give me your pardon, sir. I have done you wrong, But pardon 't as you are a gentleman.
This presence¡ knows,
And you must needs have heard, how I am punished¡
With a sore distraction. What I have done
That might your nature, honor, and exception¡
Roughly awake, I here proclaim was madness.
Was 't Hamlet wronged Laertes? Never Hamlet.
If Hamlet from himself be ta'en away,
And when he's not himself does wrong Laertes,

Then Hamlet does it not, Hamlet denies it.

Who does it, then? His madness. If 't be so,

Hamlet is of the faction¡ that is wronged;

His madness is poor Hamlet's enemy.

Sir, in this audience

Let my disclaiming from a purposed evil

Free me so far in your most generous thoughts

That I have¡ shot my arrow o'er the house

And hurt my brother.

laertes. I am satisfied in nature,¡

Whose motive¡ in this case should stir me most

To my revenge. But in my terms of honor

I stand aloof, and will no reconcilement

Till by some elder masters of known honor

I have a voice¡ and precedent of peace¡

To keep my name ungored.¡ But till that time

I do receive our offered love like love,

And will not wrong it.

hamlet. I embrace it freely,

And will this brothers' wager frankly¡ play.—

Give us the foils. Come on.

laertes. Come, one for me.

hamlet. I'll be your foil,¡ Laertes. In mine ignorance

Your skill shall, like a star i' the darkest night.

Stick fiery off¡ indeed.

laertes. You mock me, sir.

hamlet. No, by this hand.

king. Give them the foils, young Osric. Cousin Hamlet,

You know the wager?

hamlet. Very well, my lord.

Your Grace has laid the odds o'¡ the weaker side.

king. I do not fear it; I have seen you both.

But since he is bettered,¡ we have therefore odds.

laertes. This is too heavy. Let me see another.

[He exchanges his foil for another.]

hamlet. This likes me¡ well. These foils have all a length?

[They prepare to play.]

osric. Ay, my good lord.

king. Set me the stoups of wine upon that table.

If Hamlet give the first or second hit.

Or quit in answer of the third exchange,¡

Let all the battlements their ordnance fire.

The King shall drink to Hamlet's better breath,¡

And in the cup an union¡ shall he throw

Richer than that which four successive kings

In Denmark's crown have worn. Give me the cups,

And let the kettle¡ to the trumpet speak,

The trumpet to the cannoneer without,

The cannons to the heavens, the heaven to earth,

"Now the King drinks to Hamlet." Come, begin.

Trumpets the while.

And you, the judges, bear a wary eye.

hamlet. Come on, sir.

laertes. Come, my lord. [They play. hamlet scores a hit.]

hamlet. One.

laertes. No.

hamlet. Judgment.

osric. A hit, a very palpable hit.

Drum, trumpets, and shot. Flourish. A piece goes off.

laertes. Well, again.

king. Stay, give me drink. Hamlet, this pearl is thine.

[He drinks, and throws a pearl in hamlet's cup.]

Here's to thy health. Give him the cup.

hamlet. I'll play this bout first. Set it by awhile.

Come. [They play.] Another hit; what say you?

laertes. A touch, a touch, I do confess 't.

king. Our son shall win.

queen. He's fat¡ and scant of breath.

Here, Hamlet, take my napkin,¡ rub thy brows.

The Queen carouses¡ to thy fortune, Hamlet.

hamlet. Good, madam!

king. Gertrude, do not drink.

queen. I will, my lord, I pray you pardon me. [She drinks.]

king [aside]. It is the poisoned cup. It is too late.

hamlet. I dare not drink yet, madam; by and by.

queen. Come, let me wipe thy face.

laertes [to king]. My lord, I'll hit him now.

king. I do not think 't.

laertes [aside]. And yet it is almost against my conscience.

hamlet. Come, for the third, Laertes. You do but dally.

I pray you, pass¡ with your best violence;

I am afeard you make a wanton of me.¡

laertes. Say you so? Come on. [They play.]

osric. Nothing neither way.

laertes. Have at you now!

[laertes wounds hamlet; then, in scuffling, they change rapiers,¡ and hamlet wounds laertes.]

king. Part them! They are incensed.

hamlet. Nay, come, again. [The queen falls.]

osric. Look to the Queen there, ho!

horatio. They bleed on both sides. How is it, my lord?

osric. How is ’t, Laertes?

laertes. Why, as a woodcock¡ to mine own springe,¡ Osric;

I am justly killed with mine own treachery.

hamlet. How does the Queen?

king. She swoons to see them bleed.

queen. No, no, the drink, the drink—O my dear Hamlet—

The drink, the drink! I am poisoned. [She dies.]

hamlet. O villainy! Ho, let the door be locked!

Treachery! Seek it out.

laertes. It is here, Hamlet. Hamlet, thou art slain.

No med’cine in the world can do thee good;

In thee there is not half an hour’s life.

The treacherous instrument is in thy hand,

Unbated¡ and envenomed. The foul practice¡

Hath turned itself on me. Lo, here I lie,

Never to rise again. Thy mother’s poisoned.

I can no more. The King, the King’s to blame.

hamlet. The point envenomed too? Then, venom, to thy work.

[He stabs the king.]

all. Treason! Treason!

king. O, yet defend me, friends! I am but hurt.

hamlet [forcing the king to drink].

Here, thou incestuous, murderous, damn d Dane,

Drink off this potion. Is thy union¡ here?

Follow my mother. [The king dies.]

laertes. He is justly served.

It is a poison tempered¡ by himself.

Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet.

Mine and my father's death come not upon thee,

Nor thine on me! [He dies.]

hamlet. Heaven make thee free of it! I follow thee.

I am dead, Horatio. Wretched Queen, adieu!

You that look pale and tremble at this chance,¡

That are but mutes¡ or audience to this act,

Had I but time—as this fell¡ sergeant,¡ Death,

Is strict¡ in his arrest¡—O, I could tell you—

But let it be. Horatio, I am dead;

Thou livest. Report me and my cause aright

To the unsatisfied.

horatio. Never believe it.

I am more an antique Roman¡ than a Dane.

[He attempts to drink from the poisoned cup. hamlet prevents him.]

hamlet. As thou'rt a man,

Give me the cup! Let go! By heaven, I'll ha 't.

O God, Horatio, what a wounded name,

Things standing thus unknown, shall I leave behind me!

If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,

Absent thee from felicity awhile,

And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain

To tell my story. A march afar off [and a volley within].

What warlike noise is this?

Enter osric.

osric. Young Fortinbras, with conquest come from Poland,

To th' ambassadors of England gives

This warlike volley.

hamlet. O, I die, Horatio!

The potent poison quite o'ercrows¡ my spirit.

I cannot live to hear the news from England,

But I do prophesy th' election lights

On Fortinbras. He has my dying voice.¡

So tell him, with th' occurents¡ more and less

Which have solicited¡—the rest is silence. [He dies.]

horatio. Now cracks a noble heart. Good night, sweet prince,

And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!

[March within.]

Why does the drum come hither?

Enter fortinbras, with the [English] Ambassadors [with drum, colors, and attendants].

fortinbras. Where is this sight?

horatio. What is it you would see?

If aught of woe or wonder, cease your search.

fortinbras. This quarry¡ cries on havoc.¡ O proud Death,

What feast¡ is toward¡ in thine eternal cell,

That thou so many princes at a shot

So bloodily hast struck?

first ambassador. The sight is dismal,

And our affirs from England come too late.

The ears are senseless that should give us hearing,

To tell him his commandment is fulfilled,

That Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are dead.

Where should we have our thanks?

horatio. Not from his¡ mouth,

Had it th' ability of life to thank you.

He never gave commandment for their death.

But since, so jump¡ upon this bloody question,¡

You from the Polack wars, and you from England,

And here arrived, give orders that these bodies

High on a stage¡ be plac d to the view,

And let me speak to th' yet unknowing world

How these things came about. So shall you hear

Of carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts,

Of accidental judgments,¡ casual¡ slaughters,

Of deaths put on¡ by cunning and forced cause,¡

And, in this upshot, purposes mistook

Fall'n on th' inventors' heads. All this can I Truly deliver.

fortinbras. Let us haste to hear it,

And call the noblest to the audience.

For me, with sorrow I embrace my fortune.

I have some rights of memory¡ in this kingdom,

Which now to claim my vantage¡ doth invite me.

horatio. Of that I shall have also cause to speak,

And from his mouth whose voice will draw on more.¡

But let this same be presently¡ performed,

Even while men's minds are wild, lest more mischance

On¡ plots and errors happen.

fortinbras. Let four captains

Bear Hamlet, like a soldier, to the stage,

For he was likely, had he been put on,¡

To have proved most royal; and for his passage,¡ 375

The soldiers' music and the rite of war

Speak¡ loudly for him.

Take up the bodies. Such a sight as this Becomes the field,¡ but there shows much amiss.

Go bid the soldiers shoot. 380

Exeunt [marching, bearing off the dead bodies; a peal of ordnance is shot off].

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

Act 1

1. -The first scene (like many other scenes in this play) is full of expressions of uncertainty. What are some of these uncertainties? The Ghost first appears at 1.1.42. Does his appearance surprise us, or have we been prepared for it? Or is there both preparation and surprise? Do the last four speeches of 1.1 help to introduce a note of hope? If so, how?

2. -Does the King's opening speech in 1.2 reveal him to be an accomplished public speaker—or are lines 10–14 offensive? In his second speech (lines 41–49), what is the effect of naming Laertes four times? Claudius sometimes uses the royal pronouns ("we," "our"), sometimes the more intimate "I" and "my." Study his use of these in lines 1–4 and in 106–117. What do you think he is getting at?

3. -Hamlet's first soliloquy (1.2.129–159) reveals that more than just his father's death distresses him. Be as specific as possible about the causes of Hamlet's anguish here. What traits does Hamlet reveal in his conversation with Horatio (1.2.160–258)?

4. -What do you make of Polonius's advice to Laertes (1.3.55–81)? Is it sound? Sound advice, but here uttered by a fool? Ignoble advice? How would one follow the advice of line 78: "to thine own self be true"? In his words to Ophelia in 1.3.102–136, what does he reveal about himself?

5. -Can 1.4.17–38 reasonably be taken as a speech on the “tragic flaw”? (On this idea, see page 1095.) Or is the passage a much more limited discussion, a comment simply on Danish drinking habits?

6. -Hamlet is convinced in 1.5.93–104 that the Ghost has told the truth, indeed, the only important truth. But do we detect in 105–112 a hint of a tone suggesting that Hamlet delights in hating villainy? If so, can it be said that later this delight grows, and that in some scenes (e.g., 3.3) we feel that Hamlet has almost become a diabolic revenger? Explain.

Act 2

1. -Characterize Polonius on the basis of 2.1.1–76.

2. -In light of what we have seen of Hamlet, is Ophelia’s report of his strange behavior when he visits her understandable?

3. -Why does 2.2.33–34 seem almost comic? How do these lines help us to form a view about Rosencrantz and Guildenstern?

4. -Is “the hellish Pyrrhus” (2.2.422) Hamlet’s version of Claudius? Or is he Hamlet, who soon will be responsible for the deaths of Polonius, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, Claudius, Gertrude, Ophelia, and Laertes? Explain.

5. -Is the First Player’s speech (2.2.427ff) an inflated speech? If so, why? To distinguish it from the poetry of the play itself? To characterize the bloody deeds that Hamlet cannot descend to?

6. -In 2.2.504–542 Hamlet rebukes himself for not acting. Why has he not acted? Because he is a coward (line 531)? Because he has a conscience? Because no action can restore his father and his mother’s purity? Because he doubts the Ghost? What reason(s) can you offer?

Act 3

1. -What do you make of Hamlet’s assertion to Ophelia: “I loved you not” (3.1.118)? Of his characterization of himself as full of “offenses” (3.1.121–127)? Why is Hamlet so harsh to Ophelia?

2. -In 3.3.36–72 Claudius’s conscience afflicts him. But is he repentant? What makes you say so?

3. -Is Hamlet other than abhorrent in 3.3.73–96? Do we want him to kill Claudius at this moment, when Claudius (presumably with his back to Hamlet) is praying? Why?

4. -The Ghost speaks of Hamlet's "almost blunted purpose" (3.4.115). Is the accusation fair? Explain.

5. -How would you characterize the Hamlet who speaks in 3.4.209–224?

Act 4

1. -Is Gertrude protecting Hamlet when she says he is mad (4.1.7), or does she believe that he is mad? If she believes he is mad, does it follow that she no longer feels ashamed and guilty? Explain.

2. -Why should Hamlet hide Polonius's body (in 4.2)? Is he feigning madness? Is he on the edge of madness? Explain.

3. -How can we explain Hamlet's willingness to go to England (4.3.52)?

4. -Judging from 4.5, what has driven Ophelia mad? Is Laertes heroic, or somewhat foolish? Consider also the way Claudius treats him in 4.7.

Act 5

1. -Would anything be lost if the gravediggers in 5.1 were omitted?

2. -To what extent do we judge Hamlet severely for sending Rosencrantz and Guildenstern to their deaths, as he reports in 5.2? On the whole, do we think of Hamlet as an intriguer? What other intrigues has he engendered? How successful were they?

3. -Does 5.2.193–197 show a paralysis of the will, or a wise recognition that more is needed than mere human scheming? Explain.

4. -Does 5.2.280 suggest that Laertes takes advantage of a momentary pause and unfairly stabs Hamlet? Is the exchange of weapons accidental, or does Hamlet (as in Olivier's film version), realizing that he has been betrayed, deliberately get possession of Laertes's deadly weapon?

5. -Fortinbras is often cut from the play. How much is lost by the cut? Explain.

6. -Fortinbras gives Hamlet a soldier's funeral. Is this ridiculous? Can it fairly be said that, in a sense, Hamlet has been at war? Explain.

General Questions

1. -Hamlet in 5.2.10–11 speaks of a "divinity that shapes our ends." To what extent does "divinity" (or Fate or mysterious Chance) play a role in the happenings?

2. -How do Laertes, Fortinbras, and Horatio help to define Hamlet for us?

3. -T. S. Eliot says (in “Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca”) that Hamlet, having made a mess, “dies fairly well pleased with himself.” Evaluate.

ERNEST JONES

*Hamlet and the Oedipus Complex [1949]

In short, the whole picture presented by Hamlet, his deep depression, the hopeless note in his attitude towards the world and towards the value of life, his dread of death, his repeated reference to bad dreams, his self-accusations, his desperate efforts to get away from the thoughts of his duty, and his vain attempts to find an excuse for his procrastination: all this unequivocally points to a tortured conscience, to some hidden ground for shirking his task, a ground which he dare not or cannot avow to himself.

Extensive studies of the past half century, inspired by Freud, have taught us that a psychoneurosis means a state of mind where the person is unduly, and often painfully, driven or thwarted by the “unconscious” part of his mind, that buried part that was once the infant’s mind and still lives on side by side with the adult mentality that has developed out of it and should have taken its place. It signifies internal mental conflict. We have here the reason why it is impossible to discuss intelligently the state of mind of anyone suffering from a psychoneurosis, whether the description is of a living person or an imagined one, without correlating the manifestations with what must have operated in his infancy and is still operating. That is what I propose to attempt here.

For some deep-seated reason, which is to him unacceptable, Hamlet is plunged into anguish at the thought of his father being replaced in his mother’s affections by someone else. It is as if his devotion to his mother had made him so jealous for her affection that he had found it hard enough to share this even with his father and could not endure to share it with still another man. Against this thought, however, suggestive as it is, may be urged three objections. First, if it were in itself a full statement of the matter, Hamlet would have been aware of the jealousy, whereas we have concluded that the mental process we are seeking is hidden from him. Secondly, we see in it no evidence of the arousing of an old and forgotten memory. And, thirdly, Hamlet is being deprived by Claudius of no greater share in the Queen's affection than he had been by his own father, for the two brothers made exactly similar claims in this respect—namely, those of a loved husband. The last-named objection, however, leads us to the heart of the situation. How if, in fact, Hamlet had in years gone by, as a child, bitterly resented having had to share his mother's affection even with his own father, had regarded him as a rival, and had secretly wished him out of the way so that he might enjoy undisputed and undisturbed the monopoly of that affection? If such thoughts had been present in his mind in childhood days they evidently would have been "repressed," and all traces of them obliterated, by filial piety and other educative influences. The actual realization of his early wish in the death of his father at the hands of a jealous rival would then have stimulated into activity these "repressed" memories, which would have produced, in the form of depression and other suffering, an obscure aftermath of his childhood's conflict. This is at all events the mechanism that is actually found in the real Hamlets who are investigated psychologically.

The explanation, therefore, of the delay and self-frustration exhibited in the endeavor to fulfil his father's demand for vengeance is that to Hamlet the thought of incest and parricide combined is too intolerable to be borne. One part of him tries to carry out the task, the other flinches inexorably from the thought of it. How fain would he blot it out in that "bestial oblivion" which unfortunately for him his conscience condemns. He is torn and tortured in an insoluble inner conflict.

Now comes the father's death and the mother's second marriage. The association of the idea of sexuality with his mother, buried since infancy, can no longer be concealed from his consciousness. As Bradley well says: "Her son was forced to see in her action not only an astounding shallowness of feeling, but an eruption of coarse sensuality, Ôrank and gross,' speeding post-haste to its horrible delight." Feelings which once, in the infancy of long ago, were pleasurable desires can now, because of his repressions, only fill him with repulsion. The long "repressed" desire to take his father's place in his mother's affection is stimulated to unconscious activity by the sight of someone usurping this place exactly as he himself had once longed to do. More, this someone was a member of the same family, so that the actual usurpation further resembled the imaginary one in being incestuous. Without his being in the least aware of it these ancient desires are ringing in his mind, are once more struggling to find conscious expression, and need such an expenditure of energy again to "repress" them that he is reduced to the deplorable mental state he himself so vividly depicts.

There follows the Ghost's announcement that the father's death was a willed one, was due to murder. Hamlet, having at the moment his mind filled with natural indignation at the news, answers normally enough with the cry (Act I, Sc. 5):

Haste me to know 't, that I with wings as swift

As meditation or the thoughts of love,

May sweep to my revenge.

The momentous words follow revealing who was the guilty person, namely a relative who had committed the deed at the bidding of lust.1 Hamlet's second guilty wish had thus also been realized by his uncle, namely to procure the fulfilment of the first—the possession of the mother—by a personal deed, in fact by murder of the father. The two recent events, the father's death and the mother's second marriage, seemed to the world to have no inner causal relation to each other, but they represented ideas which in Hamlet's unconscious phantasy had always been closely associated. These ideas now in a moment forced their way to conscious recognition in spite of all "repressing forces," and found immediate expression in his almost reflex cry: "O my prophetic soul! My uncle?" The frightful truth his unconscious had already intuitively divined, his consciousness had now to assimiliate as best it could. For the rest of the interview Hamlet is stunned by the effect of the internal conflict thus re-awakened, which from now on never ceases, and into the essential nature of which he never penetrates.

STANLEY WELLS

On the First Soliloquy [1995]

More than most plays, Hamlet is a series of opportunities for virtuosity. This is true above all of the role of Hamlet himself. "Hamlet," wrote Max Beerbohm, is "a hoop through which every very eminent actor must, sooner or later, jump." There is no wonder that it has been such a favorite part with actors, and even with actresses. The performer has the opportunity to demonstrate a wide range of ability, to be melancholy and gay, charming and cynical, thoughtful and flippant, tender and cruel, calm and impassioned, noble and vindictive, downcast and witty, all within a few hours. He can wear a variety of costumes, he need not disguise good looks, he can demonstrate athletic ability, he has perhaps the longest role in drama—he could scarcely ask for more, except perhaps the opportunity to sing and dance.

And if the role of Hamlet is the greatest reason for the play's popularity with actors, the character of Hamlet is surely the greatest reason for its popularity with audiences. Hamlet is the most sympathetic of tragic heroes. We are drawn to him by his youth, his intelligence, and his vulnerability. As soon as he appears we are conscious of one of the sources of his appeal: his immense capacity for taking life seriously. It may sound like a slightly repellent quality, but I don't mean to imply that he is excessively gloomy or over-earnest. Often he is deeply dejected: but he has good cause. There is nothing exceptional about his emotional reactions except perhaps their intensity. He has a larger-than-life capacity for experience, a fullness of response, a depth of feeling, a vibrancy of living, which mark him out from the ordinary. He is a raw nerve in the court of Denmark, disconcertingly liable to make the instinctive rather than the conditioned response. This cuts him off from those around him, but it puts him into peculiar contact with the audience. And as Hamlet is to the other figures of the play, so his soliloquies are to the role, for in them Shakespeare shows us the raw nerves of Hamlet himself.

The use of soliloquy is one of the most brilliant features of the play, for in these speeches Shakespeare solves a major technical problem in the presentation of his central character. The young man who takes himself seriously, who persists in explaining himself and his problems, is someone we are apt—perhaps too apt—to regard as a bore. We have all had experience of him, and so probably have most of our friends. On the other hand, the desire to know someone to the depths is fundamental to human nature. Here was both a problem and a challenge: how to let Hamlet reveal himself without becoming an almighty bore? Shakespeare found a double solution. First, he caused Hamlet to conduct his deepest self-communings in solitude, so that there is none of the awkwardness associated with the presence of a confidant. And secondly, the soliloquies are written in a style which presents us not with conclusions but with the very processes of Hamlet's mind.

There had been nothing like this in drama before: nothing which, while retaining a verse form, at the same time so vividly revealed what Shakespeare elsewhere calls “the quick forge and working-house of thought” (Henry the Fifth [5.Pro.23]). Vocabulary, syntax, and rhythm all contribute to the effect. Consider the second half of Hamlet’s first soliloquy, beginning with his contrast between his uncle and his dead father:

> That it should come to this—
> But two months dead—nay, not so much, not two—
> So excellent a king that was to this
> Hyperion to a satyr, so loving to my mother
> That he might not beteem the winds of heaven
> Visit her face too roughly! Heaven and earth,
> Must I remember? Why, she would hang on him
> As if increase of appetite had grown
> By what it fed on, and yet within a month—
> Let me not think on’t; frailty, thy name is woman—
> A little month, or ere those shoes were old
> With which she followed my poor father’s body,
> Like Niobe, all tears, why she, even she—
> O God, a beast that wants discourse of reason
> Would have mourned longer!—married with mine uncle,
> My father’s brother, but no more like my father
> Than I to Hercules; within a month,
> Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
> Had left the flushing of her gall d eyes,
> She married. O most wicked speed, to post
> With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!
> It is not, nor it cannot come to good.
> But break, my heart, for I must hold my tongue.
> (1.2.137–159)

The anguish that it causes Hamlet to think of his mother's over-hasty marriage is conveyed as much by the tortured syntax as by direct statement; we share his difficulty as he tries—and fails—to assimilate these unwelcome facts into his consciousness, seeking to bring under emotional control the discordant elements of his disrupted universe: his love of his dead father, his love of his mother combined with disgust at her marriage to the uncle whom he loathes, and the disillusion with womankind that this has provoked in him. The short exclamations interrupting the sentence structure point his horror: the rhythms of ordinary speech within the verse give immediacy to the contrasts in phrases such as "Hyperion to a satyr" and "Than I to Hercules"; and the concreteness of the imagery betrays the effort it costs him to master the unwelcome nature of the facts which it expresses: his mother's haste to marry "or ere those shoes were old / With which she followed my poor father's body"—it is as if only by concentrating on the matter-of-fact, physical aspects of the scene can he bear to contemplate it, or bring it within his belief. He ends on a note of utter helplessness: he alone sees the truth; he knows that his mother's actions, which both he and she see as evil, must bring forth evil; but he, the only emotionally honest person there, cannot express his emotion—except to us.

ELAINE SHOWALTER

Representing Ophelia [1985]

"Of all the characters in Hamlet," Bridget Lyons has pointed out, "Ophelia is most persistently presented in terms of symbolic meanings." Her behavior, her appearance, her gestures, her costume, her props, are freighted with emblematic significance, and for many generations of Shakespearean critics her part in the play has seemed to be primarily iconographic. Ophelia's symbolic meanings, moreover, are specifically feminine. Whereas for Hamlet madness is metaphysical, linked with culture, for Ophelia it is a product of the female body and female nature, perhaps that nature's purest form. On the Elizabethan stage, the conventions of female insanity were sharply defined. Ophelia dresses in white, decks herself with "fantastical garlands" of wild flowers, and enters, according to the stage directions of the "Bad" Quarto, "distracted" playing on a lute with her "hair down singing." Her speeches are marked by extravagant metaphors, lyrical free associations, and "explosive sexual imagery." She sings wistful and bawdy ballads, and ends her life by drowning.

All of these conventions carry specific messages about femininity and sexuality. Ophelia's virginal and vacant white is contrasted with Hamlet's scholar's garb, his "suits of solemn black." Her flowers suggest the discordant double images of female sexuality as both innocent blossoming and whorish contamination; she is the "green girl" of pastoral, the virginal "Rose of May" and the sexually explicit madwoman who, in giving away her wild flowers and herbs, is symbolically deflowering herself. The "weedy trophies" and phallic "long purples" which she wears to her death intimate an improper and discordant sexuality that Gertrude's lovely elegy cannot quite obscure. In Elizabethan and Jacobean drama, the stage direction that a woman enters with dishevelled hair indicates that she might either be mad or the victim of a rape; the disordered hair, her offense against decorum, suggests sensuality in each case. The mad Ophelia's bawdy songs and verbal license, while they give her access to "an entirely different range of experience" from what she is allowed as the dutiful daughter, seem to be her one sanctioned form of self-assertion as a woman, quickly followed, as if in retribution, by her death.

Drowning too was associated with the feminine, with female fluidity as opposed to masculine aridity. In his discussion of the "Ophelia complex," the phenomenologist Gaston Bachelard traces the symbolic connections between women, water, and death. Drowning, he suggests, becomes the truly feminine death in the dramas of literature and life, one which is a beautiful immersion and submersion in the female element. Water is the profound and organic symbol of the liquid woman whose eyes are so easily drowned in tears, as her body is the repository of blood, amniotic fluid, and milk. A man contemplating this feminine suicide understands it by reaching for what is feminine in himself, like Laertes, by a temporary surrender to his own fluidity—that is, his tears; and he becomes a man again in becoming once more dry—when his tears are stopped.

Clinically speaking, Ophelia's behavior and appearance are characteristic of the malady the Elizabethans would have diagnosed as female love-melancholy, or erotomania. From about 1580, melancholy had become a fashionable disease among young men, especially in London, and Hamlet himself is a prototype of the melancholy hero. Yet the epidemic of melancholy associated with intellectual and imaginative genius curiously by-passed women. Women's melancholy was seen instead as biological, and emotional in origins.

CLAIRE BLOOM

Playing Gertrude on Television [1980]

-Editors' note: Claire Bloom played Gertrude in the BBC TV production (1980), directed by Rodney Bennett, with Patrick Stewart as Claudius. In the following passage she discusses the role.

It's very hard to play because strangely enough Gertrude has very few lines; I've always known it was a wonderful part and it is, but when you come to play it you realise you have to find many ways around the fact that she in actual fact says little!

You come to rehearse a part like this with certain preconceived notions, which you usually leave! I can only describe them as a battering ram—you knock down the first wall then what is inside is something quite different from what you'd imagined. I was convinced that she was guilty, not of the murder, but certainly that she had found out from Claudius that he had killed her husband. But there's nothing in the text that bears that out and many things that contradict it. I had thought it would make her less of a victim, more of a performer in the world, but [she laughs at herself] it isn't so. Like anyone if you live with a man, she must know there was something more, but I now believe that when Hamlet confronts her with "as kill a king . . . ay, madam, it was my word," it's the first time she's realised. I think from then on she knows and she must accept the fact that Claudius did it, and there is a change in their relationship. But there isn't a break—you don't break with someone suddenly like that. It changes; perhaps if they'd lived another twenty years they would have drifted apart. But there isn't a complete withdrawal. The hold they have on each other is too strong for that to happen. That caused me great difficulty; the scene after the closet scene is with Claudius, when he repeats twice "Gertrude, come away," and she doesn't reply. It's very mysterious. It's a kind of underwritten scene until you realise, or I realised, that there is no real choice for her. For the moment she doesn't go with him, but the next day she does. Hamlet knows it when he says, "Go not to my uncle's bed." She never replies and says "I won't"; she just says, "Thou hast cleft my heart in twain." She's a woman who goes with whatever is happening at the time. She's a weak-willed woman, but most of us are weak-willed if we're in the power of somebody who is very strong—and Claudius and Hamlet are both pretty strong fellows.

The “mysterious” scene with Claudius was one of the hardest to deal with in rehearsal. . . . We tried backwards, forwards, upside down and inside out and didn’t really find it until a couple of days before we shot it. The minute we found it we knew it was the right one, but at other times we’d go away saying, “We’ve got it,” then both Patrick and I would come in the next day depressed and say to Rodney, “Could we please do that scene again because it doesn’t make sense when you think about it.” There are questions that I’m sure have been asked by every cast of every Hamlet since Burbage1 and for Gertrude they are: Was there a decision to go with Claudius or not to go with Claudius? How far was she lying about Hamlet’s madness? I do think part of her believes he’s mad, but when she says to the king “He’s mad,” I think that’s protection, or overstating a fact she believes is possibly true. And of course she withholds information from Claudius; she says, “Behind the arras hearing something stir . . . [he] kills the unseen good old man,” but she doesn’t say he said “Is it the king?” That is a very important bit of information which she certainly doesn’t pass on!

The BBC Hamlet: A Television Production [1981]

With Hamlet, the producers of the BBC Shakespeare Plays have finally met the demands of Shakespeare-on-television by choosing a relatively bare set, conceding only a few richly detailed movable panels and props to shape key locales. By avoiding both location and realistic settings, they point up the natural affinity between Shakespeare’s stage and the undisguised sound set. This starkness of setting admits poetry, heightened intensity—and “what not that’s sweet and happy.”

The producers have thus made a valid choice from among television’s three faces: one, broadcast films, whether made for television or not, which exploit location settings, long shots, and all the clichŽs we associate with movies, including sudden shifts of space and time and full use of distance, from the most extreme long shots to “eyes only” closeups; two, studio-shot television drama with naturalistic settings, such as the hospital corridors and middle-class living rooms of sit-coms and soap operas, mostly in mid- to close-shots, often interspersed, to be sure, with a bit of stock footage of highways and skylines to establish a realistic environment. This second style varies from a close representation of real action to frankly staged action, where canned laughter or even shadowy glimpses of the studio audience can heighten the staged effect. Three, there is bare space with little or no effort made to disguise that this is a televised activity with a television crew out of sight but nearby. News broadcasts, talk shows and some television drama fit into this third category. Because of its patently unrepresentational quality, this last type offers the most freedom in shooting style. To all three kinds of settings we bring particular expectations in response to their conventions.

Shakespeare's plays work best in the last kind of television space, I believe, because it avoids the clash between realism and poetry, between the unity often expected in realistic media and the disunity and ambiguity of many of the plays, especially Hamlet. Yet, while closest to the kind of stage Shakespeare wrote for, the bare television set can be stretched through creative camera work. For example, when Hamlet follows the ghost in the BBC play, the two repeatedly walk across the frame and out of it, first from one direction, then from another; framing fosters the illusion of extended space. Freeing this Hamlet from location (as in the BBC As You Like It) and from realistic sets (as in the BBC Measure for Measure—however well those sets worked for that play) allows the play to be as inconsistent as it is, with, as Bernard Beckerman has so brilliantly explained in Shakespeare at the Globe, 1599–1609, a rising and falling action in each individual scene rather than through the course of the drama as a whole. It also allows for acting, the bravura kind that Derek Jacobi is so capable of.

Although gradually coalescing like the pointillism of impressionistic paintings into a subtly textured portrait, at first his mannerisms suggesting madness seem excessive. It is to be expected, perhaps, that Hamlet is a bit unhinged after the ghost scene, but Jacobi's rapid, hard blows to his forehead with the flat of hand as he says "My tables" recall the desperation of Lear's cry: "O, let me not be mad, not mad, sweet heaven." And soon after, following the last couplet of the scene, Hamlet, maniacally playful, widens his eyes and points, pretending to see the ghost again, then guffaws at Marcellus's fears. Even more unsettling is his laughter when he is alone, as while he is saying "The play's the thing / Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the King." More significantly, he breaks up his own "Mousetrap" by getting right into the play, destroying the distance between audience and stage (a very real raked proscenium-arch stage), spoiling it as a test, because Claudius has a right to be incensed at Hamlet's behavior. Of course, Hamlet does so because Claudius never gives himself away, an unusual and provocative but not impossible interpretation. Thus, Claudius can only have the court's sympathy as he calmly calls for light and uses it to examine Hamlet closely. Hamlet, in response, covers his face, then laughs.

Hamlet himself thinks he is mad. To Ophelia he says, as if the realization had suddenly struck him, “It hath made me mad [emphasis his]” (III.i.147). To his mother he stresses the word “essentially” in “I essentially am not in madness” (III.iv.187). That is, in all essential matters he can be considered sane, though mad around the edges. This indeed turns out to be the explanation.

However doubtful about Hamlet’s sanity Jacobi’s acting leaves us, in this production this question does not seem to make a difference because it does not have a bearing on the tragedy, and this is true at least partly because in each scene on this nonrealistic set we seem to start anew, ready to let Hamlet’s behavior tell us if he is mad or not. Moreover, if Hamlet is mad, it is not so totally as to obscure reason or sensibility. Far from it. It is more as if exacerbated reason and sensibility sometimes tip him into madness. This madness is no excuse for action or delay; it is simply part of the suffering that Hamlet is heir to.

Hamlet, then, is left to struggle against himself—surely where Shakespeare intended the struggle to abide. One of the conflicts in this Hamlet results from his affinity, perhaps, more to the bureaucratic Claudius who handles war-scares with diplomacy and who sits at a desk while brooding over his sins than to the warlike King Hamlet who comes in full armor. Hamlet may admire Fortinbras but is himself more like the bookish Horatio. Through nuance of gesture, through body movement, through a face that is indeed a map of all emotions, Jacobi shapes a Hamlet who loves his father too much to disregard his command, yet who cannot hate his step-father enough to attend to it. Because Jacobi conveys so fully Hamlet’s aloneness and vulnerability, one could be struck, for the first time, by the ghost’s silence about his son. There is no declaration of love, no concern about Hamlet’s ascension to the throne. Hamlet is doomed, it seems, to care about those who consistently care more for others than for him.

All of this production’s richness and suggestiveness was realized not only because Jacobi is a marvelous actor—as indeed he is—but also because within the set’s spareness that acting could unfold, an acting style that subsumes and transcends the “real.” This production’s space tells us what is possible for television presentations of Shakespeare. The more bare the set, it seems, the more glowing the words, the more immediate our apprehension of the enacted emotion.

What follows is an undergraduate's review, published in a college newspaper, of Kenneth Branagh's film version of Hamlet (1996).

Branagh's Film of Hamlet [1996]

Kenneth Branagh's Hamlet opened last night at the Harman Auditorium, and will be shown again on Wednesday and Thursday at 7:30 p.m. According to the clock the evening will be long—the film runs for four hours, and in addition there is one ten-minute intermission—but you will enjoy every minute of it.

Well, almost every minute. Curiously, the film begins and ends relatively weakly, but most of what occurs in between is good and much of it is wonderful. The beginning is weak because it is too strong; Bernardo, the sentinel, offstage says "Who's there?" but before he gets a reply he crashes onto the screen and knocks Francisco down. The two soldiers grapple, swords flash in the darkness, and Francisco finally says, "Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold yourself." Presumably Branagh wanted to begin with a bang, but here, as often, more is less. A quieter, less physical opening in which Bernardo, coming on duty, hears a noise and demands that the maker of the noise identify himself, and Francisco, the sentinel on duty, rightly demands that the newcomer identify himself, would catch the uneasiness and the mystery that pervades the play much better than does Branagh's showy beginning.

Similarly, at the end of the film, we get too much. For one thing, shots of Fortinbras's army invading Elsinore alternate with shots of the duel between Hamlet and King Claudius's pawn, Laertes, and they merely distract us from what really counts in this scene, the duel itself, which will result in Hamlet's death but also in Hamlet's successful completion of his mission to avenge his father. Second, at the very end we get shots of Fortinbras's men pulling down a massive statue of Hamlet Senior, probably influenced by television and newspaper shots of statues of Lenin being pulled down when the Soviet Union was dissolved a few years earlier. This is ridiculous; Hamlet is not a play about the fall of Communism, or about the one form of tyranny replacing another. Shakespeare's Hamlet is not about the triumph of Fortinbras. It is about Hamlet's brave and ultimately successful efforts to do what is right, against overwhelming odds, and to offer us the consolation that in a world where death always triumphs there nevertheless is something that be called nobility.

What, then, is good about the film? First of all, the film gives us the whole play, whereas almost all productions, whether on the stage or in the movie house, gives us drastically abbreviated versions. Although less is often more, when it comes to the text of Hamlet, more is better, and we should be grateful to Branagh for letting us hear all of the lines. Second, it is very well performed, with only a few exceptions. Jack Lemmon as Marcellus is pretty bad, but fortunately the part is small. Other big-name actors in small parts—Charlton Heston as the Player King, Robin Williams as Osric, and Billy Crystal as the First Gravedigger—are admirable. But of course the success or failure of any production of Hamlet will depend chiefly on the actor who plays Hamlet, and to a considerable degree on the actors who play Claudius, Gertrude, Polonius, Ophelia, Laertes, and Horatio. There isn't space here to comment on all of these roles, but let it be said that Branagh's Prince Hamlet is indeed princely, a man who strikes us as having the ability to become a king, not a wimpy whining figure. When at the end Fortinbras says that if Hamlet had lived to become the king, he would "have proved most royal," we believe him. And his adversary, King Claudius, though morally despicable, is a man of great charm and great ability. The two men are indeed "mighty opposites," to use Hamlet's own words.

Branagh's decision to set the play in the late nineteenth century rather than in the Elizabethan period of Shakespeare's day and rather than in our own day contributes to this sense of powerful forces at work. If the play were set in Shakespeare's day, the men would wear tights, and if it were set in our day they would wear suits or trousers and sports jackets and sweaters, but in the film all of the men wear military costumes (black for Hamlet, scarlet for Claudius, white for Laertes) and the women wear ball gowns of the Victorian period. Branagh gives us a world that is closer to our own than would Elizabethan costumes, but yet it is, visually at least, also distant enough to convey a sense of grandeur, which modern dress cannot suggest. Of course Hamlet can be done in modern dress, just as Romeo and Juliet was done, successfully, in the recent film starring Claire Danes and Leonardo DiCaprio, set in a world that seemed to be Miami Beach, but Romeo and Juliet is less concerned with heroism and grandeur than Hamlet is, so Branagh probably did well to avoid contemporary costumes.

Although Branagh is faithful to the text, in that he gives us the entire text, he knows that a good film cannot be made merely by recording on film a stage production, and so he gives us handsome shots of landscape, and of rich interiors—for instance, a great mirrored hall—that would be beyond the resources of any theatrical production. I have already said that at the end, when Fortinbras's army swarms over the countryside and then invades the castle we get material that is distracting, indeed irrelevant, but there are also a few other distractions. It is all very well to let us see the content of long narrative speeches (for instance, when the Player King talks of the fall of Troy and the death of King Priam and the lament of Queen Hecuba, Branagh shows us these things, with John Gielgud as Priam and Judi Dench as Hecuba, performing in pantomime), but there surely is no need for us to see a naked Hamlet and a naked Ophelia in bed, when Polonius is warning Ophelia that Hamlet's talk of love cannot be trusted. Polonius's warning is not so long or so undramatic that we need to be entertained visually with an invention that finds not a word of support in the text. On the contrary, all of Ophelia's lines suggest that she would not be other than a dutiful young woman, obedient to the morals of the times and to her father's authority. Yet another of Branagh's unfortunate inventions is the prostitute who appears in Polonius's bedroom, during Polonius's interview with Reynaldo. A final example of unnecessary spectacle is Hamlet's killing of Claudius: He hurls his rapier the length of the hall, impaling Claudius, and then like some 1930's movie star he swings on the chandelier and drops down on Claudius to finish him off.

But it is wrong to end this review by pointing out faults in Branagh's film of Hamlet. There is so much in this film that is exciting, so much that is moving, so much that is . . ., well, so much that is Hamlet (which is to say that is a great experience), that the film must be recommended without reservation. Go to see it. The four hours will fly.

A postscript. It is good to see that Branagh uses color-blind casting. Voltemand, Fortinbras's Captain, and the messenger who announces Laertes's return are all blacks—the messenger is a black woman—although of course medieval Denmark and Elizabethan England, and, for that matter, Victorian England, would not have routinely included blacks. These performers are effective, and it is appropriate that actors of color take their place in the world's greatest play.

*Tragic irony is sometimes dramatic irony or Sophoclean irony. The terms are often applied to speeches or actions that the audience understands in a sense fuller than or different from the sense in which the dramatic characters understand them.

“The Murder of Gonzago” in 3.3. Because this episode is a play-within-the-play, Shakespeare uses a distinctive form of verse (pairs of rhyming lines, eight syllables to a line) that sets it off from the language of the rest of the play (chiefly prose, or unrhymed lines of ten syllables). The language, too, is different, for it is conspicuously old-fashioned (the sun is called “Phoebus’ cart”; the ocean is called “Neptune’s salt wash”). In this modern-dress production done at Stratford, England, in 1975, Claudius wore a blue business suit and Fortinbras wore combat gear, but the characters in the play-within-the-play were masked, to emphasize their theatricality.

Chapter 30 / Tragedy

The “closet” scene in 3.4. A line in the preceding scene specifically tells us that Hamlet is “going to his mother’s closet.” (In Elizabethan language, a “closet” is a private room, as opposed to a public room—for instance, a room in which a monarch might pray, or relax, as opposed to an audience chamber in which he or she would engage in official actions.) In the twentieth century, at least as early as John Gielgud’s New York production in 1935, and probably in response to Freudian interpretations of the play, the Queen’s “closet” has been fitted with a bed on which Hamlet and Gertrude tussle, and indeed the scene is often wrongly called “the bedroom scene.” In this 1989 Royal Shakespeare Company production, with Mark Rylance as Hamlet, a ranting Hamlet (at the left) confronts Gertrude. The Ghost, unknown to Gertrude, sits on the bed, presumably seeking to protect her from Hamlet’s assault. The setting was not realistic but expressionistic; that is, the curtains stirred and the lighting changed, not because a physical wind was blowing or the sources of illumination were changing, but to express the passions of the characters.

Portfolio: Hamlet on the Stage

Hamlet meditates on death in the grave yard in 5.1. Kenneth Branagh portrayed Hamlet in 1993 for The Royal Shakespeare Theatre. The production used costumes suggesting the late nineteenth century.

The same scene (5.1) as in the previous photo shows Kevin Kline as Hamlet in the 1986 New York Shakespeare Festival production. Costumes are late nineteenth century. Horatio is played by an African-American. Putting aside plays by black authors, and a very few plays by whites about blacks (such as Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones), there are few roles in drama expressly written for blacks. Shakespeare offers only three: Othello, Aaron (a Moor in Titus Adronicus), and the Prince of Morroco (in The Merchant of Venice). The few black actors who played other Shakespearean roles, such as the great Ira Aldridge who in the nineteenth century was known for his King Lear, performed the roles in whiteface. Since the 1980s, however, directors have engaged in open casting, using blacks (and Asians) in any and all roles, and not requiring white makeup.

1It is not maintained that this was by any means Claudius' whole motive, but it was evidently a powerful one and the one that most impressed Hamlet.

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. -Does the writer give adequate evidence to support his favorable comments on the play?

2. -Does he give evidence to support his unfavorable comments?

3. -Given the writer's overall evaluation of the film, do you agree with his strategy of devoting the first and last paragraphs to praising the play?

4. -Do you think the writer apportioned his space well, or should he have spent more time on the weaknesses, or more time on the strenghts? Why?

5. -Do you find the comments about the late-nineteenth-century setting relevant and thoughtful, or irrelevant and not very perceptive? Explain.

6. -Do you find the postscript intrusive? Explain.

7. -If you have seen the film, do you more or less agree with the reviewer? Do you think that the reviewer neglected to make certain points that you would have made in your review?

A NOTE ON THE TEXTS OF OTHELLO

Othello was first published in 1622, in a small volume called a quarto (each sheet of paper has been folded in half, and then in half again, to make four leaves—i.e., eight pages). Othello was next published in 1623, in the first folio edition of Shakespeare's collected plays (a folio is a larger book—each sheet has been folded only once, producing two leaves, four pages).

The quarto (Q) contains 16 lines not in the folio (F), but the folio has about 150 lines not in the quarto. Further, there are hundreds of small but significant differences between the texts—for instance, "O God" in Q and "Oh heaven" in F—but perhaps the most important difference in a single word occurs in Othello's next-to-last speech. In Q he says his hand, "Like the base Indian, threw a pearle away,/Richer than all his Tribe." In F Othello says his hand, "(Like the base Iudean) threw a Pearle away/Richer than all his Tribe." That is, in Q he compares himself to the ignorant savage (perhaps a native of India, perhaps an American Indian) who did not properly value a precious jewel. (Europeans conventionally thought that other cultures did not value pearls.) In F he compares himself to Judas Iscariat, who betrayed Jesus, or perhaps to Herod the Great, king of the Jews, who murdered his wife. Arguments can be made on behalf of both readings, but perhaps the strongest is in favor of “Indian,” on the grounds that Othello is correctly saying that he acted out of ignorance (like the Indian), not out of malice (like Judas).

David Bevington, the editor of the version of Othello that we give, uses F for the most part, but he sometimes draws on Q where (as in the Indian/Judean instance) Q seems to him to be what Shakespeare probably wrote. Bevington has also added some material for the reader’s convenience—for instance, indications of scene and some stage directions. His text and notes were prepared for his book, The Complete Works of Shakespeare, Updated 4th ed. (New York: Longman, 1997).

PORTFOLIO: PLAYING OTHELLO

Perhaps the first thing to say about Othello is that he is a tragic hero, which is to say that he is a great man, since in the Renaissance (as in the ancient Greek world) tragedy dealt with great figures—superior, heroic human beings whose fall evoked in the spectators feelings (to quote Shakespeare’s Horatio near the end of Hamlet) of “woe” and “wonder,” a sort of terrifying awe that such greatness could come to such an end. Of course Othello’s enemies speak ill of him: For them, he is the “barbarous Moor” and the “lascivious Moor,” and sometimes their racism is evident, as when the villainous Iago calls him “an old black ram.” But for other characters in the play—the characters whom we believe, and whose words are confirmed by the Othello, whom we see with our own eyes—Othello is the “valiant Moor,” the “brave Moor,” and the “noble Moor,” a man who is of a “free and open nature”—i.e., a man who is notably frank, not given to concealing his thoughts.

Shakespeare takes an outsider, someone whom most Englishmen of the time would regard as a barbarian, introduces him to us (in the opening scene) through the words of those who scorn him, and then surprises us: When Othello actually first appears onstage (in the second scene) we see not the man who has been described as bombastic and lascivious but, rather, a man of enormous poise and ability. In the course of the play Othello performs a terrible deed, but almost the last words said of him are that he was “great of heart”—that is, “great-hearted”—Anglo Saxon words that correspond to an English word of Latin origin, “magnanimous” (Latin: “great spirit”).

Othello engages in a horrifying action because he is deceived by someone whom he trusts: His tragic deed is in large measure the terrifying consequence of his high-minded nature, a nature that does not suspect that an apparent friend can be monstrously evil. As Iago himself says (and here we repeat some words quoted a moment ago),

The Moor is of a free and open nature

That think men honest that but seem to be so.

Othello's highmindedness makes him vulnerable to such a person as Iago, but at the end, when Othello understands the terrible truth that he has murdered a loving wife, his highmindedness causes him to enact justice upon himself. Comparing himself to an infidel whom he executed, the tragic hero now executes himself:

Set you down this.

And say besides that in Aleppo once,

Where a malignant and a turbaned Turk

Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,

I took by th' throat the circumcis d dog

And smote him—thus. [He stabs himself.]

In this portfolio we will look at some of the great actors who have portrayed the noble Moor.

Abdul Guahid was ambassador from Mauritania to Queen Elizabeth, 1600–1601. Shakespeare and his company performed at court in December 1600, and thus might have seen the ambassador or members of his retinue, or the Moors might have visited an Elizabethan playhouse.

Othello is unquestionably a Moor—someone of mixed Berber and Arab descent, native to northwest Africa (Morocco and Algeria)—but the Elizabethans did not have a clear idea of who the Moors were. That is, the Elizabethans did not clearly distinguish between "blackamoores" and "negars"—i.e., residents of sub-Saharan Africa. Shakespeare may or may not have thought of Othello as a black African. Some terms in the play suggest that Othello is a sub-Saharan African, but most of these terms (e.g., in the first scene Iago's reference to "an old black ram" and Roderigo's reference to Othello as "the thicklips") are spoken by Othello's foes, who quite naturally describe him as unattractive by English standards, where a fair complexion was preferred.

There is no doubt that Othello is a Moor—the play is called The Tragedy of Othello, the Moor of Venice—but the question remains: What did Shakespeare think a Moor looked like? Othello speaks of himself as "black" (3.3.267), but this word is not decisive, since it sometimes clearly means only that the person is darker than a northern European—e.g., olive-skinned. Thus, Shakespeare's Cleopatra, an Egyptian, speaks of herself as "black." On the other hand, in an earlier play, Titus Andronicus, Shakespeare has a Moor who speaks of himself as "coal-black" and who refers to his "fleece of woolly hair," evidence that Shakespeare did not distinguish between the Moors and sub-Saharan Africans—but a stage direction in yet another play, The Merchant of Venice, describes the Prince of Morocco as "a tawny Moor," suggesting that Shakespeare or the associate who revised the playwright's manuscript thought of Moors, or at least of some Moors, as light brown. In short we do not know whether Shakespeare envisioned Othello as black in our sense, and we do not know what sort of makeup the earliest actors of Othello used.

We return, then, to the painting of the Moorish ambassador. He clearly is not black by our standards, but equally clearly the Elizabethans might have called him black, and in any case, he is an outsider as far as the Elizabethans were concerned.

Although there is no hard evidence concerning the makeup used by the earliest actors who played Othello, we do know that in the eighteenth century, British actors played the role in blackface. Strong racist views accompanied the decision. Thus, David Garrick (1717–1779), regarded as the greatest Shakespearean actor of the period, saw Othello not as a white man but as "an African in whose being circulated fire instead of blood." In the early nineteenth century a shift occurred, revealing another aspect of racism: Othello's color was lightened because it seemed inconceivable that Desdemona would fall in love with a black man. Thus, Charles Lamb said that the spectator finds "something extremely revolting in the courtship and wedded caresses of Othello and Desdemona." His friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge said,

> Can we suppose [Shakespeare] so utterly ignorant as to make a barbarous negro plead royal birth? Were negroes then known but as slaves; on the contrary, were not the Moors warriors? . . . It would be something monstrous to conceive this beautiful Venetian girl falling in love with a veritable negro. It would argue a disproportionateness, a want of balance in Desdemona, which Shakespeare does not appear to have in the least contemplated.

The text of Othello refutes Coleridge—clearly Desdemona has made a choice that shocks the Venetians, that seems “monstrous” to them, until Othello delivers to the Duke his speech about wooing Desdemona. The Duke then says,

I think this tale would win my daughter too.

Good Brabantio, take up this mangled matter at the best.

From the early nineteenth century until almost the mid-twentieth century the role was regularly performed by white actors who used makeup to look bronzed—the idea was to look like a desert chief—but one notable exception was Ira Aldridge (1807–1867), an African-American who left America because racism prevented him from playing with white acting companies. Aldridge, a relatively light-skinned man, established himself in England and in Europe, playing Othello. He also played, in whiteface, King Lear and other Shakespearean roles.

In the illustrations, notice that although Othello is a general in Venice, he holds a scimitar, a curved sword of a kind associated with Islamic regions.

Paul Robeson (1898–1976), an African-American actor and singer, played Othello three times—in London (1930), New York (1943), and Stratford-upon-Avon (1959). With very few exceptions, the reviews of his performance in London and New York were highly favorable. There was talk of bringing the London production to New York, but nothing came of it because potential backers were uncertain about how a white audience would react to a black man—a real black man, not a white man in blackface—kissing a white woman. In 1942, however, the enterprising Margaret Webster, an American director, persuaded a group to invite Robeson to do Othello not on Broadway but in summer stock. The production was enthusiastically received, and it moved to Broadway in 1943, where it ran for an astounding 296 continuous performances. The color barrier in America was broken, and many black actors subsequently played the role.

Among the black actors who have played the role in recent times are Paul Winfield, James Earl Jones, and Laurence Fishburne, and indeed in very recent years it has become almost impossible for a white to play it. But a white actor, Anthony Hopkins, looking rather sun-tanned, did play it in the BBC-TV version. The director, Jonathan Miller, offered his justification:

I do not see the play as being about color but as being about jealousy—which is something we are all vulnerable to. . . . When a black actor does the part, it offsets the play, puts it out of balance. It makes it a play about blackness, which it is not. The trouble is, the play was hijacked for political purposes.

A topic worth thinking about.

Orson Welles (1915–1985) played a very light-skinned Othello in a film version released in 1955. The text is highly cut, and much non-Shakespearean business is introduced. It begins with Welles reading a passage from Shakespeare's source, an Italian short story, while we see a shot of the face of the dead Othello. The camera rises above the bier which is being carried by pallbearers, and then we see Desdemona's dead body, also being borne to the grave. The two funeral processions converge, and then we see Iago, in chains, thrust into a cage and hoisted above the crowd. The film ends with a dissolve from the dying Othello to a shot of the funeral procession and then to shots of the fortress at Cyprus, the cage, and Venetian buildings and ships. In short, the film is not for the Shakespeare purist, but it is imaginative and often effective.

Laurence Olivier (1907–1989) played Othello in England in 1964; the production was later filmed (1965) in a sound studio rather than in the theater, but the film closely resembles the staged version. Far from suggesting an Othello who was a Moor, a desert chief, Olivier sought to convey the image of an African Othello: He was very dark, he walked with a sway, he spoke with a lilt that suggested a West Indian accent, and his bare feet were adorned with heavy ankle bracelets. To some viewers this image of Othello is embarrassing if not downright offensive.

The underlying idea apparently was that Othello is a barbarian with a thin veneer of civilization; the change from civilized man to savage was marked by Othello tearing off a crucifix that he wore. No such episode occurs in Shakespeare's text, and in fact it is at odds with the text, since Othello urges Desdemona, before he kills her, to make her peace with God: "I would not kill thy soul." Nevertheless, most viewers agree that Olivier's acting is brilliant, even if the rest of the cast leaves much to be desired.

Patrick Stewart, known to millions from his role in Star Trek, played a white Othello in Washington, D.C., in 1997. He called this version a "photo-negative": Othello was white, but almost all of the other characters, including Desdemona, were black. Stewart explained his rationale:

To replace the black outsider with a white man in a black society, will, I hope, encourage a much broader view of the fundamentals of racism, and perhaps even question those triggers—you know, color of skin, physiognomy, language, culture—that can produce instant feelings of fear, suspicion, and so forth.

In short, Stewart suggested that white spectators—the audience was largely white—might be so disturbed by seeing a white man horribly manipulated that they might be pushed into an increased awareness of the evils of racism, but one of the actors pointed out that a white spectator could probably be disturbed only if he or she were part of an audience that was largely black, and this was not the case in Washington.

Laurence Fishburne plays Othello in a film version directed by Oliver Parker (1994). The film omits almost half of Shakespeare's text, and replaces it with a good deal of exciting visual imagery, including a gondola with what apparently are the eloping lovers at the start, and a sea burial at the end. In between we get such things as a crowd in Cyprus burning an effigy of a Turk, and Iago plotting the destruction of Othello, Desdemona, and Cassio with chess pieces. In short, this Othello is highly cinematic and does not worry about being faithful to Shakespeare's text.

Fishburne, an African-American actor, was already well known for his performances in Boyz n the Hood (1991) and What's Love Got to Do with It? (1993). The later film, which was based on rock singer Tina Turner's autobiography, in which she discussed the abuse she suffered at the hands of her husband, Ike, was widely shown during the time that the African-American athlete O. J. Simpson was accused of murdering his white wife; Nicole Brown, and many viewers of Parker's film probably connected it, in one way or another, with the trial. (The murder took place in 1992; Simpson was acquitted in 1995.) Whether this sort of connection between life and art helps or hinders a viewer's response to the play is a topic worth discussing.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Othello was probably written in 1603–1604, but it was not published until 1622, six years after Shakespeare's death.

1.1 Enter roderigo and iago.

roderigo. Tush, never tell me!¡ I take it much unkindly

That thou, Iago, who hast had my purse

As if the strings were thine, shouldst know of this.¡

iago. 'Sblood,¡ but you'll not hear me.

If ever I did dream of such a matter, 5

Abhor me.

roderigo. Thou toldst me thou didst hold him in thy hate.

iago. Despise me

If I do not. Three great ones of the city,
In personal suit to make his lieutenant,
Off-capped to him;¡ and by the faith of man,
I know my price, I am worth no worse a place.
But he, as loving his own pride and purposes,
Evades them with a bombast circumstance¡
Horribly stuffed with epithets of war,¡
And, in conclusion,
Nonsuits¡ my mediators. For, “Certes,”¡ says he,
“I have already chose my officer.”
And what was he?
Forsooth, a great arithmetician,¡
One Michael Cassio, a Florentine,
A fellow almost damned in a fair wife,¡
That never set a squadron in the field
Nor the division of a battle¡ knows
More than a spinster¡—unless the bookish theoric,¡ Wherein the togaed¡ consuls¡ can propose¡
As masterly as he. Mere prattle without practice
In all his soldiership. Bvt he, sir, had th’ election;
And I, of whom his¡ eyes had seen the proof
At Rhodes, at Cyprus, and on other grounds Christened¡ and heathen, must be beleed and calmed¡
By debitor and creditor.¡ This countercaster,¡
He, in good time,¡ must his lieutenant be,
And I—God bless the mark!¡—his Moorship’s ancient.¡

roderigo. By heaven, I rather would have been his hangman.¡

iago. Why, there’s no remedy. ’Tis the curse of service;

Preferment¡ goes by letter and affection,¡
And not by old gradation,¡ where each second Stood heir to th' first. Now, sir, be judge yourself
Whether I in any just term¡ am affined¡
To love the Moor.

roderigo. I would not follow him then.

iago. O sir, content you.¡
I follow him to serve my turn upon him.
We cannot all be masters, nor all masters Cannot be truly¡ followed. You shall mark
Many a duteous and knee-crooking knave
That, doting on his own obsequious bondage,
Wears out his time, much like his master's ass,
For naught but provender, and when he's old, cashiered.¡
Whip me¡ such honest knaves. Others there are
Who, trimmed in forms and visages of duty,¡
Keep yet their hearts attending on themselves,
And, throwing but shows of service on their lords,
Do well thrive by them, and when they have lined their coats,¡
Do themselves homage.¡ These fellows have some soul,
And such a one do I profess myself. For, sir,
It is as sure as you are Roderigo,
Were I the Moor I would not be Iago.¡
In following him, I follow but myself—
Heaven is my judge, not I for love and duty,
But seeming so for my peculiar¡ end.
For when my outward action doth demonstrate
The native¡ act and figure¡ of my heart

In compliment extern.¡ ’tis not long after
But I will wear my heart upon my sleeve
For daws¡ to peck at. I am not what I am.¡
roderigo. What a full¡ fortune does the thick-lips¡ owe¡
If he can carry ’t thus!¡
iago. Call up her father.
Rouse him, make after him, poison his delight,
Proclaim him in the streets; incense her kinsmen,
And, though he in a fertile climate dwell,
Plague him with flies.¡ Though that his joy be joy.¡
Yet throw such changes of vexation¡ on ’t
As it may¡ lose some color.¡
roderigo. Here is her father’s house. I’ll call aloud.
iago. Do, with like timorous¡ accent and dire yell
As when, by night and negligence,¡ the fire
Is spied in populous cities.
roderigo. What ho, Brabantio! Signor Brabantio, ho!
iago. Awake! What ho, Brabantio! Thieves, thieves, thieves!
Look to your house, your daughter, and your bags!
Thieves, thieves!
brabantio [enters] above [at a window].¡
brabantio. What is the reason of this terrible summons?
What is the matter¡ there?
roderigo. Signor, is all your family within?
iago. Are your doors locked?
brabantio. Why, wherefore ask you this?
iago. Zounds,¡ sir, you’re robbed. For shame, put on your gown!
Your heart is burst; you have lost half your soul.

Even now, now, very now, an old black ram
Is tupping¡ your white ewe. Arise, arise!
Awake the snorting¡ citizens with the bell,
Or else the devil¡ will make a grandsire of you.
Arise, I say!

brabantio. What, have you lost your wits?

roderigo. Most reverend signor, do you know my voice?

brabantio. Not I. What are you?

roderigo. My name is Roderigo.

brabantio. The worser welcome.
I have charged thee not to haunt about my doors.
In honest plainness thou hast heard me say
My daughter is not for thee; and now, in madness,
Being full of supper and distempering¡ drafts,
Upon malicious bravery¡ dost thou come
To start¡ my quiet.

roderigo. Sir, sir, sir—brabantio. But thou must needs be sure

My spirits and my place¡ have in¡ their power
To make this bitter to thee.

roderigo. Patience, good sir.

brabantio. What tell'st thou me of robbing? This is Venice;
My house is not a grange.¡

roderigo. Most grave Brabantio,
In simple¡ and pure soul I come to you.

iago. Zounds, sir, you are one of those that will not serve God if the devil bid you. Because we come to do you service and you think we are ruffians, you'll have your daughter covered with a Barbary¡ horse; you'll have your nephews¡ neigh to you; you'll have coursers¡ for cousins¡ and jennets¡ for germans.¡

brabantio. What profane wretch art thou?

iago. I am one, sir, that comes to tell you your daughter and the Moor are now making the beast with two backs.

brabantio. Thou art a villain.

iago. You are—a senator.¡

brabantio. This thou shalt answer.¡ I know thee, Roderigo.

roderigo. Sir, I will answer anything. But I beseech you, If’t be your pleasure and most wise¡ consent—
As partly I find it is—that your fair daughter,
At this odd-even¡ and dull watch o’ the night,
Transported with¡ no worse nor better guard
But with a knave¡ of common hire, a gondolier,
To the gross clasps of a lascivious Moor—
If this be known to you and your allowance¡
We then have done you bold and saucy¡ wrongs.
But if you know not this, my manners tell me
We have your wrong rebuke. Do not believe That, from¡ the sense of all civility,¡
I thus would play and trifle with your reverence.¡
Your daughter, if you have not given her leave,
I say again, hath made a gross revolt,
Tying her duty, beauty, wit,¡ and fortunes
In an extravagant¡ and wheeling¡ stranger¡
Of here and everywhere. Straight¡ satisfy yourself.
If she be in her chamber or your house,
Let loose on me the justice of the state
For thus deluding you.

brabantio. Strike on the tinder,¡ ho!

Give me a taper! Call up all my people!

This accident¡ is not unlike my dream.

Belief of it oppresses me already.

Light, I say, light! Exit [above].

iago. Farewell, for I must leave you.

It seems not meet¡ nor wholesome to my place¡

To be producted¡—as, if I stay, I shall—

Against the Moor. For I do know the state,

However this may gall¡ him with some check,¡

Cannot with safety cast¡ him, for he's embarked¡

With such loud reason¡ to the Cyprus wars,

Which even now stands in act,¡ for their souls,¡

Another of his fathom¡ they have none

To lead their business; in which regard,¡

Though I do hate him as I do hell pains,

Yet for necessity of present life¡

I must show out a flag and sign of love,

Which is indeed but sign. That you shall surely find him,

Lead to the Sagittary¡ the rais d search,¡

And there will I be with him. So farewell. Exit.

Enter [below] brabantio [in his nightgown¡] with servants and torches.

brabantio. It is too true an evil. Gone she is;

And what's to come of my despis d time¡

Is naught but bitterness. Now, Roderigo,

Where didst thou see her?—O unhappy girl!—

With the Moor, sayst thou?—Who would be a father!—

How didst thou know 'twas she?—O, she deceives me

Past thought!—What said she to you?—Get more tapers.

Raise all my kindred.—Are they married, think you?

roderigo. Truly, I think they are.

brabantio. Oh heaven! How got she out? O treason of the blood!

Fathers, from hence trust not your daughters' minds

By what you see them act. Is there not charms¡

By which the property¡ of youth and maidhood

May be abused?¡ Have you not read, Roderigo,

Of some such thing!

roderigo. Yes, sir, I have indeed.

brabantio. Call up my brother.—O, would you had had her!—

Some one way, some another.—Do you know

Where we may apprehend her and the Moor?

roderigo. I think I can discover¡ him, if you please

To get good guard and go along with me.

brabantio. Pray you, lead on. At every house I'll call;

I may command¡ at most.—Get weapons, ho!

And raise some special officers of night.—

On, good Roderigo, I will deserve¡ your pains.

Exeunt.

1.2 Enter othello, iago, attendants with torches.

iago. Though in the trade of war I have slain men,

Yet do I hold it very stuff¡ o' the conscience

To do no contrived¡ murder. I lack iniquity

Sometimes to do me service. Nine or ten times

I had thought t' have yerked¡ him¡ here under the ribs.

othello. 'Tis better as it is.

iago. Nay, but he prated,

And spoke such scurvy and provoking terms

Against your honor

That, with the little godliness I have,

I did full hard forbear him.¡ But, I pray you, sir,

Are you fast married? Be assured of this,

That the magnifico¡ is much beloved,

And hath in his effect¡ a voice potential¡

As double as the Duke's. He will divorce you,

Or put upon you what restraint or grievance

The law, with all his might to enforce it on,

Will give him cable.¡

othello. Let him do his spite.

My services which I have done the seigniory¡

Shall out-tongue his complaints. 'Tis yet to know¡—

Which, when I know that boasting is an honor,

I shall promulgate—I fetch my life and being

From men of royal siege,¡ and my demerits¡

May speak unbonneted¡ to as proud a fortune

As this that I have reached. For know, Iago,

But that I love the gentle Desdemona,

I would not my unhous d¡ free condition

Put into circumscription and confine¡

For the sea's worth.¡ But look, what lights come yond?

Enter cassio [and certain officers¡] with torches.

iago. Those are the rais d father and his friends.

You were best go in.

othello. Not I. I must be found.

My parts, my title, and my perfect soul¡

Shall manifest me rightly. Is it they?

iago. By Janus,¡ I think no.

othello. The servants of the Duke? And my lieutenant?

The goodness of the night upon you, friends!

What is the news?

cassio. The Duke does greet you, General,

And he requires your haste-post-haste appearance

Even on the instant.

othello. What is the matter,¡ think you?

cassio. Something from Cyprus, as I may divine.¡

It is a business of some heat.¡ The galleys

Have sent a dozen sequent¡ messengers

This very night at one another's heels,

And many of the consuls,¡ raised and met,

Are at the Duke's already. You have been hotly called for;

When, being not at your lodging to be found,

The Senate hath sent about¡ three several¡ quests

To search you out.

othello. 'Tis well I am found by you.

I will but spend a word here in the house.

And go with you. [Exit.]

cassio. Ancient, what makes¡ he here?

iago. Faith, he tonight hath boarded¡ a land carrack.¡

If it prove lawful prize,¡ he's made forever.

cassio. I do not understand.

iago. He's married.

cassio. To who?

[Enter othello.]

iago. Marry,¡ to—Come Captain, will you go?

othello. Have with you.¡

cassio. Here comes another troop to seek for you.

Enter brabantio, roderigo, with officers and torches.¡

iago. It is Brabantio. General, be advised.¡

He comes to bad intent.

othello. Holla! Stand there!

roderigo. Signor, it is the Moor.

brabantio. Down with him, thief!

[They draw on both sides.]

iago. You, Roderigo! Come, sir, I am for you.

othello. Keep up¡ your bright swords, for the dew will rust them.

Good signor, you shall more command with years

Than with your weapons.

brabantio. O thou foul thief, where has thou stowed my daughter?

Damned as thou art, thou hast enchanted her!

For I'll refer me¡ to all things of sense,¡

If she in chains of magic were not bound

Whether a maid so tender, fair, and happy,

So opposite to marriage that she shunned

The wealthy curl d darlings of our nation,

Would ever have, t' incur a general mock,

Run from her guardage¡ to the sooty bosom

Of such a thing as thou—to fear, not to delight.

Judge me the world if 'tis not gross in sense¡

That thou hast practiced on her with foul charms,

Abused her delicate youth with drugs or minerals¡

That weakens motion.¡ I'll have 't disputed on;¡

’Tis probable and palpable to thinking.
I therefore apprehend and do attach¡ thee
For an abuser of the world, a practicer
Of arts inhibited¡ and out of warrant.¡—
Lay hold upon him! If he do resist, Subdue him at his peril.

othello. Hold your hands,
Both you of my inclining¡ and the rest.
Were it my cue to fight, I should have known it Without a prompter.—Whither will you that I go To answer this your charge?

brabantio. To prison, till fit time
Of law and course of direct session¡
Call thee to answer.

othello. What if I do obey?
How may the Duke be therewith satisfied,
Whose messengers are here about my side
Upon some present business of the state
To bring me to him?

officer. ’Tis true, most worthy signor.
The Duke’s in council, and your noble self,
I am sure, is sent for.

brabantio. How? The Duke in council?
In this time of the night? Bring him away.¡
Mine’s not an idle¡ cause. The Duke himself,
Or any of my brothers of the state,
Cannot but feel this wrong as ’twere their own;
For if such actions may have passage free,¡

Bondslaves and pagans shall our statesmen be.

Exeunt.

1.3 Enter duke [and] senators [and sit at a table, with lights], and officers.¡ [The duke and senators are reading dispatches.]¡ duke. There is not composition¡ in these news

That gives them credit.

first senator. Indeed, they are disproportioned.¡

My letters say a hundred and seven galleys.

duke. And mine, a hundred forty.

second senator. And mine, two hundred.

But though they jump¡ not on a just¡ account—

As in these cases, where the aim¡ reports

'Tis oft with difference—yet do they all confirm

A Turkish fleet, and bearing up to Cyprus.

duke. Nay, it is possible enough to judgment.

I do not so secure me in the error

But the main article I do approve¡

In fearful sense.

sailor (within). What ho, what ho, what ho!

Enter sailor.

officer. A messenger from the galleys.

duke. Now, what's the business?

sailor. The Turkish preparation¡ makes for Rhodes.

So was I bid report here to the state

By Signor Angelo.

duke. How say you by¡ this change?

first senator. This cannot be

By no assay¡ of reason. 'Tis a pageant¡

To keep us in false gaze.¡ When we consider
Th' importancy of Cyprus to the Turk,
And let ourselves again but understand
That, as it more concerns the Turk than Rhodes,
So may he with more facile question bear it,¡
For that¡ it stands not in such warlike brace,¡
But altogether lacks th' abilities¡
That Rhodes is dressed in¡—if we make thought of this,
We must not think the Turk is so unskillful¡
To leave that latest¡ which concerns him first,
Neglecting an attempt of ease and gain
To wake¡ and wage¡ a danger profitless.

duke. Nay, in all confidence, he's not for Rhodes.

officer. Here is more news.

Enter a Messenger.

messenger. The Ottomites, reverend and gracious, Steering with due course toward the isle of Rhodes,
Have there injointed them¡ with an after¡ fleet.

first senator. Ay, so I thought. How many, as you guess?

messenger. Of thirty sail; and now they do restem
Their backward course,¡ bearing with frank appearance¡
Their purposes toward Cyprus. Signor Montano,
Your trusty and most valiant servitor,¡
With his free duty¡ recommends¡ you thus,
And prays you to believe him.

duke. 'Tis certain then for Cyprus.
Marcus Luccicos, is not he in town?

first senator. He's now in Florence.

duke. Write from us to him, post-post-haste. Dispatch.

first senator. Here comes Brabantio and the valiant Moor.

Enter brabantio, othello, cassio, iago, roderigo, and officers.

duke. Valiant Othello, we must straight¡ employ you

Against the general enemy¡ Ottoman.

[To brabantio] I did not see you; welcome, gentle¡ signor.

We lacked your counsel and your help tonight.

brabantio. So did I yours. Good Your Grace, pardon me;

Neither my place¡ nor aught I heard of business

Hath raised me from my bed, nor doth the general care

Take hold on me, for my particular¡ grief

Is of so floodgate¡ and o'erbearing nature

That it engluts¡ and swallows other sorrows

And it is still itself.¡

duke. Why, what's the matter?

brabantio. My daughter! O, my daughter!

duke and senators. Dead?

brabantio. Ay, to me.

She is abused,¡ stol'n from me, and corrupted

By spells and medicines bought of mountebanks;

For nature so preposterously to err,

Being not deficient,¡ blind, or lame of sense,¡

Sans¡ witchcraft could not.

duke. Whoe'er he be that in this foul proceeding

Hath thus beguiled your daughter of herself,

And you of her, the bloody book of law

You shall yourself read in the bitter letter

After your own sense¡—yea, though our proper¡ son

Stood in your action.¡

brabantio. Humbly I thank Your Grace.

Here is the man, this Moor, whom now it seems

Your special mandate for the state affairs

Hath hither brought.

all. We are very sorry for ’t.

duke. [to othello] What, in your part, can you say to this?

brabantio. Nothing, but this is so.

othello. Most potent, grave, and reverend signors,

My very noble and approved¡ good masters:

That I have ta’en away this old man’s daughter,

It is most true; true, I have married her.

The very head and front¡ of my offending

Hath this extent, no more. Rude¡ I am in my speech,

And little blessed with the soft phrase of peace;

For since these arms of mine had seven years’ pith,¡

Till now some nine moons wasted,¡ they have used

Their dearest¡ action in the tented field;

And little of this great world can I speak

More than pertains to feats of broils and battle,

And therefore little shall I grace my cause

In speaking for myself. Yet, by your gracious patience,

I will a round¡ unvarnished tale deliver

Of my whole course of love—what drugs, what charms,

What conjuration, and what mighty magic,

For such proceeding I am charged withal,¡

I won his daughter.

brabantio. A maiden never bold;

Of spirit so still and quiet that her motion

Blushed at herself;¡ and she, in spite of nature,

Of years,¡ of country, credit,¡ everything,

To fall in love with what she feared to look on!

It is a judgment maimed and most imperfect

That will confess¡ perfection so could err

Against all rules of nature, and must be driven

To find out practices¡ of cunning hell

Why this should be. I therefore vouch¡ again

That with some mixtures powerful o'er the blood,¡

Or with some dram conjured to this effect,¡

He wrought upon her.

duke. To vouch this is no proof,

Without more wider¡ and more overt test¡

Than these thin habits¡ and poor likelihoods¡

Of modern seeming¡ do prefer¡ against him.

first senator. But Othello, speak.

Did you by indirect and forc d courses¡

Subdue and poison this young maid's affections?

Or came it by request and such fair question¡

As soul to soul affordeth?

othello. I do beseech you,

Send for the lady to the Sagittary

And let her speak of me before her father.

If you do find me foul in her report,

The trust, the office I do hold of you

Not only take away, but let your sentence

Even fall upon my life.

duke. Fetch Desdemona hither.

othello. Ancient, conduct them. You best know the place.

[Exeunt iago and attendants.]

And, till she come, as truly as to heaven

I do confess the vices of my blood,¡

So justly¡ to your grave ears I'll present

How I did thrive in this fair lady's love,

And she in mine.

duke. Say it, Othello.

othello. Her father loved me, oft invited me,

Still¡ questioned me the story of my life

From year to year—the battles, sieges, fortunes

That I have passed.

I ran it through, even from my boyish days

To th' very moment that he bade me tell it,

Wherein I spoke of most disastrous chances,

Of moving accidents¡ by flood and field,

Of hairbreadth scapes i' th' imminent deadly breach,¡

Of being taken by the insolent foe

And sold to slavery, of my redemption thence,

And portance¡ in my travels' history,

Wherein of antres¡ vast and deserts idle,¡

Rough quarries, rocks, and hills whose heads touch heaven,

It was my hint¡ to speak—such was my process—

And of the Cannibals that each other eat,

The Anthropophagi,¡ and men whose heads

Do grow beneath their shoulders. These things to hear

Would Desdemona seriously incline;

But still the house affairs would draw her thence,
Which ever as she could with haste dispatch
She'd come again, and with a greedy ear
Devour up my discourse. Which I, observing,
Took once a pliant¡ hour, and found good means
To draw from her a prayer of earnest heart
That I would all my pilgrimage dilate,¡
Whereof by parcels¡ she had something heard,
But not intentively.¡ I did consent,
And often did beguile her of her tears,
When I did speak of some distressful stroke
That my youth suffered. My story being done,
She gave me for my pains a world of sighs.
She swore, in faith, 'twas strange, 'twas passing¡ strange,
'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful.
She wished she had not heard it, yet she wished
That heaven had made her¡ such a man. She thanked me,
And bade me, if I had a friend that loved her,
I should but teach him how to tell my story,
And that would woo her. Upon this hint¡ I spake.
She loved me for the dangers I had passed,
And I loved her that she did pity them.
This only is the witchcraft I have used.
Here comes the lady. Let her witness it.
Enter desdemona, iago, [and] attendants.

duke. I think this tale would win my daughter too.
Good Brabantio,
Take up this mangled matter at the best.¡

Men do their broken weapons rather use

Than their bare hands.

brabantio. I pray you, hear her speak.

If she confesses that she was half the wooer,

Destruction on my head if my bad blame

Light on the man!—Come hither, gentle mistress.

Do you perceive in all this noble company

Where most you owe obedience?

desdemona. My noble Father,

I do perceive here a divided duty.

To you I am bound for life and education;¡

My life and education both do learn¡ me

How to respect you. You are the lord of duty;¡

I am hitherto your daughter. But here's my husband,

And so much duty as my mother showed

To you, preferring you before her father,

So much I challenge¡ that I may profess

Due to the Moor my lord.

brabantio. God be with you! I have done.

Please it Your Grace, on to the state affairs.

I had rather to adopt a child than get¡ it.

Come hither, Moor. [He joins the hands of othello and desdemona.]

I here do give thee that with all my heart¡

Which, but thou hast already, with all my heart¡

I would keep from thee.—For your sake,¡ jewel,

I am glad at soul I have no other child,

For thy escape¡ would teach me tyranny,

To hang clogs¡ on them.—I have done, my lord.

duke. Let me speak like yourself,¡ and lay a sentence¡

Which, as a grece¡ or step, may help these lovers

Into your favor.

When remedies¡ are past, the griefs are ended

By seeing the worst, which late on hopes depended.¡

To mourn a mischief¡ that is past and gone

Is the next¡ way to draw new mischief on.

What¡ cannot be preserved when fortune takes,

Patience her injury a mockery makes.¡

The robbed that smiles steals something from the thief;

He robs himself that spends a bootless grief.¡

brabantio. So let the Turk of Cyprus us beguile,

We lose it not, so long as we can smile.

He bears the sentence well that nothing bears

But the free comfort which from thence he hears,

But he bears both the sentence and the sorrow

That, to pay grief, must of poor patience borrow.¡

These sentences, to sugar or to gall,

Being strong on both sides, are equivocal.¡

But words are words. I never yet did hear

That the bruised heart was pierc d through the ear.¡

I humbly beseech you, proceed to th' affairs of state.

duke. The Turk with a most mighty preparation makes for Cyprus. Othello, the fortitude¡ of the place is best known to you; and though we

we have there a substitute¡ of most allowed¡ sufficiency, yet opinion, a sovereign mistress of effects, throws a more safer voice on you.¡ You must therefore be content to slubber¡ the gloss of your new fortunes with this more stubborn¡ and boisterous expedition.

othello. The tyrant custom, most grave senators,

Hath made the flinty and steel couch of war
My thrice-driven¡ bed of down. I do agnize¡
A natural and prompt alacrity
I find in hardness,¡ and do undertake
These present wars against the Ottomites.
Most humbly therefore bending to your state,¡
I crave fit disposition for my wife,
Due reference of place and exhibition,¡
With such accommodation¡ and besort¡
As levels¡ with her breeding.¡

duke. Why, at her father's.

brabantio. I will not have it so.

othello. Nor I.

desdemona. Nor I. I would not there reside,
To put my father in impatient thoughts
By being in his eye. Most gracious Duke,
To my unfolding¡ lend your prosperous¡ ear,
And let me find a charter¡ in your voice,
T' assist my simpleness.

duke. What would you, Desdemona?

desdemona. That I did love the Moor to live with him,
My downright violence and storm of fortunes¡
May trumpet to the world. My heart's subdued
Even to the very quality of my lord.¡
I saw Othello's visage in his mind,
And to his honors and his valiant parts¡
Did I my soul and fortunes consecrate.
So that, dear lords, if I be left behind

A moth¡ of peace, and he go to the war,

The rites¡ for why I love him are bereft me,

And I a heavy interim shall support

By his dear¡ absence. Let me go with him.

othello. Let her have your voice.¡

Vouch with me, heaven, I therefor beg it not

To please the palate of my appetite,

Not to comply with heat¡—the young affects¡

In me defunct—and proper¡ satisfaction,

But to be free¡ and bounteous to her mind.

And heaven defend¡ your good souls that you think¡

I will your serious and great business scant

When she is with me. No, when light-winged toys

Of feathered Cupid seel¡ with wanton dullness

My speculative and officed instruments,¡

That¡ my disports¡ corrupt and taint¡ my business,

Let huswives make a skillet of my helm,

And all indign¡ and base adversities

Make head¡ against my estimation!¡

duke. Be it as you shall privately determine,

Either for her stay or going. Th’ affair cries haste,

And speed must answer it.

a senator. You must away tonight.

desdemona. Tonight, my lord?

duke. This night.

othello. With all my heart.

duke. At nine i’ the morning here we’ll meet again.

Othello, leave some officer behind,

And he shall our commission bring to you,

With such things else of quality and respect¡

As doth import¡ you.

othello. So please Your Grace, my ancient;

A man he is of honesty and trust.

To his conveyance I assign my wife,

With what else needful Your Good Grace shall think

To be sent after me.

duke. Let it be so.

Good night to everyone. [To brabantio.] And, noble signor,

If virtue no delighted¡ beauty lack,

Your son-in-law is far more fair than black.

first senator. Adieu, brave Moor. Use Desdemona well.

brabantio. Look to her, Moor, if thou hast eyes to see.

She has deceived her father, and may thee.

Exeunt [duke, brabantio, cassio, senators, and officers].

othello. My life upon her faith! Honest Iago,

My Desdemona must I leave to thee.

I prithee, let thy wife attend on her,

And bring them after in the best advantage.¡

Come, Desdemona, I have but an hour

Of love, of worldly matters and direction,¡

To spend with thee. We must obey the time.¡

Exit [with desdemona].

roderigo. Iago—

iago. What sayst thou, noble heart?

roderigo. What will I do, think’st thou?

iago. Why, go to bed and sleep.

roderigo. I will incontinently¡ drown myself.

iago. If thou dost, I shall never love thee after. Why, thou silly gentleman?

roderigo. It is silliness to live when to live is torment; and then have we a prescription¡ to die when death is our physician.

iago. O villainous!¡ I have looked upon the world for four times seven years, and, since I could distinguish betwixt a benefit and an injury, I never found man that knew how to love himself. Ere I would say I would drown myself for the love of a guinea hen,¡ I would change my humanity with a baboon.

roderigo. What should I do? I confess it is my shame to be so fond,¡ but it is not in my virtue¡ to amend it.

iago. Virtue? A fig!¡ 'Tis in ourselves that we are thus or thus. Our bodies are our gardens to the which our wills are gardeners; so that if we will plant nettles or sow lettuce, set hyssop¡ and weed up thyme, supply it with one gender¡ of herbs or distract it with¡ many, either to have it sterile with idleness¡ or manured with industry—why, the power and corrigible authority¡ of this lies in our wills. If the beam¡ of our lives had not one scale of reason to poise¡ another of sensuality, the blood¡ and baseness of our natures would conduct us to most preposterous conclusions. But we have reason to cool our raging motions,¡ our carnal stings, our unbitted¡ lusts, whereof I take this that you call love to be a sect or scion.¡

roderigo. It cannot be.

iago. It is merely a lust of the blood and a permission of the will. Come, be a man. Drown thyself? Drown cats and blind puppies. I have professed me thy friend, and I confess me knit to thy deserving with cables of perdurable¡ toughness. I could never better stead¡ thee than now. Put money in thy purse. Follow thou the wars; defeat thy favor¡ with an usurped¡ beard. I say, put money in thy purse. It cannot be long that Desdemona should continue her love to the Moor—put money in thy purse—nor he his to her. It was a violent commencement in her, and thou shalt see an answerable sequestration¡—put but money in thy purse. These Moors are changeable in their wills¡—fill thy purse with money. The food that to him now is as luscious as locusts¡ shall be to him shortly as bitter as coloquintida.¡ She must change for youth; when she is sated with his body, she will find the error of her choice. She must have change, she must. Therefore put money in thy purse. If thou wilt needs damn thyself, do it a more delicate way than drowning. Make¡ all the money thou canst. If sanctimony¡ and a frail vow betwixt an erring¡ barbarian and a supersubtle Venetian be not too hard for my wits and all the tribe of hell, thou shalt enjoy her. Therefore make money. A pox of drowning thyself! It is clean out of the way.¡ Seek thou rather to be hanged in compassing¡ thy joy than to be drowned and go without her.

roderigo. Wilt thou be fast¡ to my hopes if I depend on the issue?¡

iago. Thou art sure of me. Go, make money. I have told thee often, and I retell thee again and again, I hate the Moor. My cause is hearted;¡thine hath no less reason. Let us be conjunctive¡ in our revenge against him. If thou canst cuckold him, thou dost thyself a pleasure, me a sport. There
There are many events in the womb of time which will be delivered. Traverse,¡ go, provide thy money. We will have more of this tomorrow. Adieu.

roderigo. Where shall we meet i' the morning?

iago. At my lodging.

roderigo. I'll be with thee betimes.¡ [He starts to leave.]

iago. Go to, farewell.—Do you hear, Roderigo?

roderigo. What say you?

iago. No more of drowning, do you hear?

roderigo. I am changed.

iago. Go to, farewell. Put money enough in your purse.

roderigo. I'll sell all my land. Exit.

iago. Thus do I ever make my fool my purse;

For I mine own gained knowledge should profane
If I would time expend with such a snipe¡
But for my sport and profit. I hate the Moor;
And it is thought abroad¡ that twixt my sheets
He's done my office.¡ I know not if't be true;
But I, for mere suspicion in that kind,
Will do as if for surety.¡ He holds me well;¡
The better shall my purpose work on him.
Cassio's a proper¡ man. Let me see now:
To get his place and to plume up¡ my will
In double knavery—How, how?—Let's see:
After some time, to abuse¡ Othello's ear
That he¡ is too familiar with his wife.
He hath a person and a smooth dispose¡
To be suspected, framed to make women false.
The Moor is of a free¡ and open¡ nature,
That thinks men honest that but seem to be so,
And will as tenderly¡ be led by the nose
As asses are.
I have 't. It is engendered. Hell and night
Must bring this monstrous birth to the world's light.
[Exit.]

2.1 Enter montano and two gentlemen.

montano. What from the cape can you discern at sea?

first gentleman. Nothing at all. It is a high-wrought flood.¡
I cannot, twixt the heaven and the main,¡ Descry a sail.

montano. Methinks the wind hath spoke aloud at land;
A fuller blast ne'er shook our battlements.
If it hath ruffianed¡ so upon the sea,
What ribs of oak, when mountains¡ melt on them,
Can hold the mortise?¡ What shall we hear of this?
second gentleman. A segregation¡ of the Turkish fleet.
For do but stand upon the foaming shore,
The chidden¡ billow seems to pelt the clouds;
The wind-shaked surge, with high and monstrous mane,¡
Seems to cast water on the burning Bear¡
And quench the guards of th' ever-fix d pole.
I never did like molestation¡ view
On the enchaf d¡ flood.
montano. If that¡ the Turkish fleet
Be not ensheltered and embayed,¡ they are drowned;
It is impossible to bear ir out.¡
Enter a [third] gentleman.
third gentleman. News, lads! Our wars are done.
The desperate tempest hath so banged the Turks
That their designment¡ halts.¡ A noble ship of Venice
Hath seen a grievous wreck¡ and sufferance¡
On most part of their fleet.
montano. How? Is this true?
third gentleman. The ship is here put in,
A Veronesa;¡ Michael Cassio,
Lieutenant to the warlike Moor Othello,
Is come on shore; the Moor himself at sea,
And is in full commission here for Cyprus.

montano. I am glad on ’t. ’Tis a worthy governor.

third gentleman. But this same Cassio, though he speak of comfort

Touching the Turkish loss, yet he looks sadly¡

And prays the Moor be safe, for they were parted

With foul and violent tempest.

montano. Pray heaven he be,

For I have served him, and the man commands

Like a full¡ soldier. Let’s to the seaside, ho!

As well to see the vessel that’s come in

As to throw out our eyes for brave Othello,

Even till we make the main and th’ aerial blue¡

An indistinct regard.¡

third gentleman. Come, let’s do so,

For every minute is expentacy¡

Of more arrivance.¡

Enter cassio.

cassio. Thanks, you the valiant of this warlike isle,

That so approve¡ the Moor! O, let the heavens

Give him defense against the elements,

For I have lost him on a dangerous sea.

montano. Is he well shipped?

cassio. His bark is stoutly timbered, and his pilot

Of very expert and approved allowance;¡

Therefore my hopes, not surfeited to death,¡

Stand in bold cure.¡

[A cry] within: “A sail, a sail, a sail!”

cassio. What noise?

a gentleman. The town is empty. On the brow o’ the sea¡

Stand ranks of people, and they cry “A sail!”

cassio. My hopes do shape him for¡ the governor.

[A shot within.]

second gentleman. They do discharge their shot of courtesy;¡

Our friends at least.

cassio. I pray you, sir, go forth,

And give us truth who ’tis that is arrived.

second gentleman. I shall. Exit.

montano. But, good Lieutenant, is your general wived?

cassio. Most fortunately. He hath achieved a maid

That paragons¡ description and wild fame,¡

One that excels the quirks¡ of blazoning¡ pens,

And in th’ essential vesture of creation

Does tire the enginer.¡

Enter [second] gentleman.¡

How now? Who has put in?¡

second gentleman. ’Tis one Iago, ancient to the General.

cassio. He’s had most favorable and happy speed.

Tempests themselves, high seas, and howling winds,

The guttered¡ rocks and congregated sands—

Traitors ensteeped¡ to clog the guiltless keel—

As¡ having sense of beauty, do omit¡

Their mortal¡ natures, letting go safely by

The divine Desdemona.

montano. What is she?

cassio. She that I spake of, our great captain’s captain,

Left in the conduct of the bold Iago,

Whose footing¡ here anticipates our thoughts

A sennight's speed. Great Jove, Othello guard,
And swell his sail with thine own powerful breath,
That he may bless this bay with his tall ship,
Make love's quick pants in Desdemona's arms,
Give renewed fire to our extincted spirits,
And bring all Cyprus comfort!
Enter desdemona, iago, roderigo, and emilia.
O, behold,
The riches of the ship is come on shore!
You men of Cyprus, let her have your knees.
[The gentlemen make curtsy to desdemona.]
Hail to thee, lady! And the grace of heaven
Before, behind thee, and on every hand Enwheel thee round!

desdemona. I thank you, valiant Cassio.
What tidings can you tell me of my lord?

cassio. He is not yet arrived, nor know I aught
But that he's well and will be shortly here.

desdemona. O, but I fear—How lost you company?

cassio. The great contention of the sea and skies Parted our fellowship.
(Within) "A sail, a sail" [A shot.]
But hark. A sail!

second gentleman. They give their greeting to the citadel.
This likewise is a friend.

cassio. See for the news.
[Exit Second Gentleman.]
Good Ancient, you are welcome. [Kissing emilia.] Welcome, mistress.

Let it not gall your patience, good Iago,

That I extend¡ my manners; 'tis my breeding¡

That gives me this bold show of courtesy.

iago. Sir, would she give you so much of her lips

As of her tongue she oft bestows on me,

You would have enough.

desdemona. Alas, she has no speech!¡

iago. In faith, too much.

I find it still,¡ when I have list¡ to sleep.

Marry, before your ladyship, I grant,

She puts her tongue a little in her heart

And chides with thinking.¡

emilia. You have little cause to say so.

iago. Come on, come on. You are pictures out of doors,¡

Bells¡ in your parlors, wildcats in your kitchens,¡

Saints¡ in your injuries, devils being offended,

Players¡ in your huswifery,¡ and huswives¡ in your beds.

desdemona. O, fie upon thee, slanderer!

iago. Nay, it is true, or else I am a Turk.¡

You rise to play, and go to bed to work.

emilia. You shall not write my praise.

iago. No, let me not.

desdemona. What wouldst write of me, if thou shouldst praise me?

iago. O, gentle lady, do not put me to 't,

For I am nothing if not critical.¡

desdemona. Come on, essay.¡—There's one gone to the harbor?

iago. Ay, madam.

desdemona. I am not merry, but I do beguile

The thing I am¡ by seeming otherwise.

Come, how wouldst thou praise me?

iago. I am about it, but indeed my invention

Comes from my pate as birdlime¡ does from frieze¡—

It plucks out brains and all. But my Muse labors,¡

And thus she is delivered:

If she be fair and wise, fairness and wit,

The one's for use, the other useth it.¡

desdemona. Well praised! How if she be black¡ and witty?

iago. If she be black, and thereto have a wit,

She'll find a white¡ that shall her blackness fit.¡

desdemona. Worse and worse.

emilia. How if fair and foolish?

iago. She never yet was foolish that was fair,

For even her folly¡ helped her to an heir.¡

desdemona. These are old fond¡ paradoxes to make fools laugh i' th' ale-house. What miserable praise hast thou for her that's foul and foolish?

iago. There's none so foul¡ and foolish thereunto,¡

But does foul¡ pranks which fair and wise ones do.

desdemona. O heavy ignorance! Thou praisest the worst best. But what praise couldst thou bestow on a deserving woman indeed, one that, in the authority of her merit, did justly put on the vouch¡ of very malice itself?

iago. She that was ever fair, and never proud,

Had tongue at will, and yet was never loud,

Never lacked gold and yet went never gay,¡

Fled from her wish, and yet said, "Now I may,"¡

She that being angered, her revenge being nigh,

Bade her wrong stay¡ and her displeasure fly,

She that in wisdom never was so frail

To change the cod's head for the salmon's tail,¡

She that could think and ne'er disclose her mind,

See suitors following and not look behind,

She was a wight, if ever such wight were—desdemona. To do what?

iago. To suckle fools¡ and chronicle small beer.¡

desdemona. O most lame and impotent conclusion! Do not learn of him, Emilia, though he be thy husband. How say you, Cassio? Is he not a most profane¡ and liberal¡ counselor?

cassio. He speaks home,¡ madam. You may relish¡ him more in¡ the soldier than in the scholar.

[cassio and desdemona stand together, conversing intimately.]

iago [aside]. He takes her by the palm. Ay, well said,¡ whisper. With as little a web as this will I ensnare as great a fly as Cassio. Ay, smile upon her, do; I will gyve¡ thee in thine own courtship.¡ You say true;¡ 'tis so, indeed. If such tricks as these strip you out of your lieutenantry, it had been better you had not kissed your three fingers so oft, which now again you are most apt to play the sir¡ in. Very good; well kissed! An excellent courtesy! 'Tis so, indeed. Yet again your fingers to your lips? Would they were clyster pipes¡ for your sake!

[Trumpet within.] The Moor! I know his trumpet.

cassio. 'Tis truly so.

desdemona. Let's meet him and receive him.

cassio. Lo, where he comes!

Enter othello and attendants.

othello. O my fair warrior!

desdemona. My dear Othello!

othello. It gives me wonder great as my content

To see you here before me. O my soul's joy,
If after every tempest come such calms,
May the winds blow till they have wakened death,
And let the laboring bark climb hills of seas
Olympus-high, and duck again as low
As hell's from heaven! If it were now to die,
'Twere now to be most happy, for I fear
My soul hath her content so absolute
That not another comfort like to this Succeeds in unknown fate.¡

desdemona. The heavens forbid
But that our loves and comforts should increase Even as our days do grow!

othello. Amen to that, sweet powers!
I cannot speak enough of this content.
It stops me here; it is too much of joy.
And this, and this, the greatest discords be [They kiss.]¡
That e'er our hearts shall make!

iago. [aside] O, you are well tuned now!
But I'll set down¡ the pegs that make this music,
As honest as I am.¡

othello. Come, let us to the castle.
News, friends! Our wars are done, the Turks are drowned.
How does my old acquaintance of this isle?—
Honey, you shall be well desired¡ in Cyprus;
I have found great love amongst them. O my sweet,
I prattle out of fashion,¡ and I dote

In mine own comforts.—I prithee, good Iago,

Go to the bay and disembark my coffers.¡

Bring thou the master¡ to the citadel;

He is a good one, and his worthiness

Does challenge¡ much respect.—Come, Desdemona.—

Once more, well met at Cyprus!

Exeunt othello and desdemona [and all but iago and roderigo].

iago. [to an attendant] Do thou meet me presently at the harbor. [To roderigo.] Come hither. If thou be'st valiant—as, they say, base men¡ being in love have then a nobility in their natures more than is native to them—list¡ me. The Lieutenant tonight watches on the court of guard.¡ First, I must tell thee this: Desdemona is directly in love with him.

roderigo. With him? Why, 'tis not possible.

iago. Lay thy finger thus,¡ and let thy soul be instructed. Mark me with what violence she first loved the Moor, but¡ for bragging and telling her fantastical lies. To love him still for prating? Let not thy discreet heart think it. Her eye must be fed; and what delight shall she have to look on the devil? When the blood is made dull with the act of sport,¡ there should be, again to inflame it and to give satiety a fresh appetite, loveliness in favor,¡ sympathy¡ in years, manners, and beauties—all which the Moor is defective in. Now, for want of these required conveniences,¡ her delicate tenderness will find itself abused,¡ begin to heave the gorge,¡ disrelish and abhor the Moor. Very nature¡ will instruct her in it and compel her to some second choice. Now, sir, this granted—as it is a most pregnant¡ and unforced position—who stands so eminent in the degree of¡ this fortune as Cassio does? A knave very voluble,¡ no further conscionable¡ than in putting on the mere form of civil and humane¡ seeming for the better compassing of his salt¡ and most hidden loose affection.¡

Why, none, why, none. A slipper¡ and subtle knave, a finder out of occasions, that has an eye can stamp¡ and counterfeit advantages,¡ though true advantage never present itself; a devilish knave. Besides, the knave is handsome, young, and hath all those requisites in him that folly¡ and green¡ minds look after. A pestilent complete knave, and the woman hath found him¡ already.

roderigo. I cannot believe that in her. She's full of most blessed condition.¡

iago. Blessed fig's end!¡ The wine she drinks is made of grapes. If she had been blessed, she would never have loved the Moor. Blessed pudding!¡ Didst thou not see her paddle with the palm of his hand? Didst not mark that?

roderigo. Yes, that I did; but that was but courtesy.

iago. Lechery, by this hand. An index¡ and obscure¡ prologue to the history of lust and foul thoughts. They met so near with their lips that their breaths embraced together. Villainous thoughts, Roderigo!

When these mutualities¡ so marshal the way, hard at hand¡ comes the master and main exercise, th' incorporate¡ conclusion. Pish! But, sir, be you ruled by me. I have brought you from Venice. Watch you¡ tonight; for the command, I'll lay 't upon you.¡ Cassio knows you not. I'll not be far from you. Do you find some occasion to anger Cassio, either by speaking too loud, or tainting¡ his discipline, or from what other course you please, which the time shall more favorably minister.¡

roderigo. Well.

iago. Sir, he's rash and very sudden in choler,¡ and haply¡ may strike at you. Provoke him that he may, for even out of that will I cause these of Cyprus to mutiny,¡ whose qualification¡ shall come into no true taste¡ again but by the displanting of Cassio. So shall you have a shorter journey to your desires by the means I shall then have to prefer¡ them, and the impediment most profitably removed, without the the which there were no expectation of our prosperity.

roderigo. I will do this, if you can bring it to any opportunity.

iago. I warrant¡ thee. Meet me by and by¡ at the citadel. I must fetch his necessaries ashore. Farewell.

roderigo. Adieu. Exit.

iago. That Cassio loves her, I do well believe 't;
That she loves him, 'tis apt¡ and of great credit.¡
The Moor, howbeit that I endure him not,
Is of a constant, loving, noble nature,
And I dare think he'll prove to Desdemona
A most dear husband. Now, I do love her, too,
Not out of absolute lust—though peradventure
I stand accountant¡ for as great a sin—
But partly led to diet¡ my revenge
For that I do suspect the lusty Moor
Hath leaped into my seat, the thought whereof Doth, like a poisonous mineral, gnaw my innards;
And nothing can or shall content my soul
Till I am evened with him, wife for wife,
Or failing so, yet that I put the Moor
At least into a jealousy so strong
That judgment cannot cure. Which thing to do,
If this poor trash of Venice, whom I trace¡
For¡ his quick hunting, stand the putting on,¡ I'll have our Michael Cassio on the hip,¡
Abuse¡ him to the Moor in the rank garb—¡
For I fear Cassio with my nightcap¡ too—

Make the Moor thank me, love me, and reward me
For making him egregiously an ass
And practicing upon¡ his peace and quiet
Even to madness. 'Tis here, but yet confused.
Knavery's plain face is never seen till used. Exit.

2.2 Enter othello's herald with a proclamation.

herald. It is Othello's pleasure, our noble and valiant general, that, upon certain tidings now arrived, importing the mere perdition¡ of the Turkish fleet, every man put himself into triumph:¡ some to dance, some to make bonfires, each man to what sport and revels his addiction¡ leads him. For, besides these beneficial news, it is the celebration of his nuptial. So much was his pleasure should be proclaimed. All offices¡ are open, and there is full liberty of feasting from this present hour of five till the bell have told eleven. Heaven bless the isle of Cyprus and our noble general Othello!

Exit.

2.3 Enter othello, desdemona, cassio, and attendants.

othello. Good Michael, look you to the guard tonight.
Let's teach ourselves that honorable stop¡
Not to outsport¡ discretion.

cassio. Iago hath direction what to do,
But nothwithstanding, with my personal eye
Will I look to 't.

othello. Iago is most honest.
Michael, good night. Tomorrow with your earliest¡
Let me have speech with you. [To Desdemona.]
Come, my dear love,
The purchase made, the fruits are to ensue;

That profit's yet to come 'tween me and you.¡—

Good night.

Exit [othello, with desdemona and attendants].

Enter iago.

cassio. Welcome, Iago. We must to the watch.

iago. Not this hour,¡ Lieutenant; 'tis not yet ten o' the clock. Our general cast¡ us thus early for the love of his Desdemona; who¡ let us not therefore blame. He hath not yet made wanton the night with her, and she is sport for Jove.

cassio. She's a most exquisite lady.

iago. And, I'll warrant her, full of game.

cassio. Indeed, she's a most fresh and delicate creature.

iago. What an eye she has! Methinks it sounds a parley¡ to provovation.

cassio. An inviting eye, and yet methinks right modest.

iago. And when she speaks, is it not an alarum¡ to love?

cassio. She is indeed perfection.

iago. Well, happiness to their sheets! Come, Lieutenant, I have a stoup¡ of wine, and here without¡ are a brace¡ of Cyprus gallants that would fain have a measure¡ to the health of the black Othello.

cassio. Not tonight, good Iago. I have very poor and unhappy brains for drinking. I could well wish courtesy would invent some other custom of entertainment.

iago. O, they are our friends. But one cup! I'll drink for you.¡

cassio. I have drunk but one cup tonight, and that was craftily qualified¡ too, and behold what innovation¡ it makes here.¡ I am unfortunate in the infirmity and dare not task my weakness with any more.

iago. What, man? 'Tis a night of revels. That gallants desire it.

cassio. Where are they?

iago. Here at the door. I pray you, call them in.

cassio. I'll do 't, but it dislikes me.¡ Exit.

iago. If I can fasten but one cup upon him,

With that which he hath drunk tonight already,

He'll be as full of quarrel and offense¡

As my young mistress' dog. Now, my sick fool Roderigo,

Whom love hath turned almost the wrong side out,

To Desdemona hath tonight caroused¡

Potations pottle-deep;¡ and he's to watch.¡

Three lads of Cyprus—noble swelling¡ spirits,

That hold their honors in a wary distance,¡

The very elements¡ of this warlike isle—

Have I tonight flustered with flowing cups,

And they watch¡ too. Now, 'mongst this flock of drunkards

Am I to put Cassio in some action

That may offend the isle.—But here they come.

Enter cassio, montano, and gentlemen; [servants following with wine].

If consequence do but approve my dream,¡

My boat sails freely both with wind and stream.¡

cassio. 'Fore God, they have given me a rouse¡ already.

montano. Good faith, a little one; not past a pint, as I am a solider.

iago. Some wine, ho! [He sings.]

"And let me the cannikin¡ clink, clink,

And let me the cannikin clink.

A soldier's a man,

O, man's life's but a span;¡

Why, then, let a soldier drink."

Some wine, boys!

cassio. 'Fore God, an excellent song.

iago. I learned it in England, where indeed they are most potent in potting.¡ Your Dane, your German, and your swag-bellied Hollander—drink, ho!— are nothing to your English.

cassio. Is your Englishman so exquisite in his drinking?

iago. Why, he drinks you,¡ with facility, your Dane¡ dead drunk; he sweats not¡ to overthrow your Almain;¡ he gives your Hollander a vomit ere the next pottle can be filled.

cassio. To the health of our general!

montano. I am for it, Lieutenant, and I'll do you justice.¡

iago. O sweet England! [He sings.]

"King Stephen was and-a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown;
He held them sixpence all too dear,
With that he called the tailor lown.¡
He was a wight of high renown,
And thou art but of low degree.
'Tis pride¡ that pulls the country down;
Then take thy auld¡ cloak about thee."

Some wine, ho!

cassio. 'Fore God, this is a more exquisite song than the other.

iago. Will you hear 't again?

cassio. No, for I hold him to be unworthy of his place that does those things. Well, God's above all; and there be souls must be saved, and there be souls must not be saved.

iago. It's true, good Lieutenant.

cassio. For mine own part—no offense to the General, nor any man of quality¡—I hope to be saved.

iago. And so do I too, Lieutenant.

cassio. Ay, but, by your leave, not before me; the lieutenant is to be saved before the ancient. Let's have no more of this; let's to our affairs.—God forgive us our sins!—Gentlemen, let's look to our business. Do not think, gentlemen, I am drunk. This is my ancient; this is my right hand, and this is my left. I am not drunk now. I can stand well enough, and speak well enough.

gentlemen. Excellent, well.

cassio. Why, very well then; you must not think then that I am drunk.

Exit.

montano. To th' platform, masters. Come, let's set the watch.¡

[Exeunt gentlemen.]

iago. You see this fellow that is gone before.

He's a soldier fit to stand by Caesar
And give direction; and do but see his vice.
'Tis to his virtue a just equinox,¡
The one as long as th' other. 'Tis a pity of him.
I fear the trust Othello puts him in,
On some odd time of his infirmity,
Will shake this island.

montano. But is he othen thus?

iago. 'Tis evermore the prologue to his sleep.

He'll watch the horologe a double set,¡
If drink rock not his cradle.

montano. It were well
The General were put in mind of it.
Perhaps he sees it not, or his good nature
Prizes the virtue that appears in Cassio
And looks not on his evils. Is not this true?

Enter roderigo.

iago [aside to him]. How now, Roderigo?

I pray you, after the Lieutenant; go. [Exit roderigo.]

montano. And 'tis great pity that the noble Moor

Should hazard such a place as his own second

With¡ one of an engaffed¡ infirmity.

It were an honest action to say so

To the Moor.

iago. Not I, for this fair island.

I do love Cassio well and would do much

To cure him of this evil. [Cry within: "Help! Help!"]

But, hark! What noise?

Enter cassio, pursuing¡ roderigo.

cassio. Zounds, you rogue! You rascal!

montano. What's the matter, Lieutenant?

cassio. A knave teach me my duty? I'll beat the knave into a twiggen¡ bottle.

roderigo. Beat me?

cassio. Dost thou prate, rogue? [He strikes roderigo.]

montano. Nay, good Lieutenant. [Restraining him.] I pray you, sir, hold your hand.

cassio. Let me go, sir, or I'll knock you o'er the mazard.¡

montano. Come, come, you're drunk.

cassio. Drunk? [They fight.]

iago [aside to roderigo]. Away, I say. Go out and cry a mutiny.¡

[Exit roderigo.]

Nay, good Lieutenant—God's will, gentlemen—

Help, ho!—Lieutenant—sir—Montano—sir—

Help, masters!¡—Here's a goodly watch indeed!

[A bell rings.]¡

Who's that which rings the bell?—Diablo,¡ ho!

The town will rise.¡ God's will, Lieutenant, hold!

You'll be ashamed forever.

Enter othello and attendants [with weapons].

othello. What is the matter here?

montano. Zounds, I bleed still.

I am hurt to th' death. He dies! [He thrusts at cassio.]

othello. Hold, for your lives!

iago. Hold, ho! Lieutenant—sir—Montano—gentlemen—

Have you forgot all sense of place and duty?

Hold! The General speaks to you. Hold, for shame!

othello. Why, how now, ho! From whence ariseth this?

Are we turned Turks, and to ourselves do that

Which heaven hath forbid the Ottomites?¡

For Christian shame, put by this barbarous brawl!

He that stirs next to carve for¡ his own rage

Holds his soul light;¡ he dies upon his motion.¡

Silence that dreadful bell. It frights the isle

From her propriety.¡ What is the matter, masters?

Honest Iago, that looks dead with grieving,

Speak. Who began this? On thy love, I charge thee.

iago. I do not know. Friends all but now, even now,

In quarter¡ and in terms¡ like bride and groom

Devesting them¡ for bed; and then, but now—

As if some planet had unwitted men—

Swords out, and tilting one at others' breasts

In opposition bloody. I cannot speak¡

Any beginning to this peevish odds;¡

And would in action glorious I had lost

Those legs that brought me to a part of it!

othello. How comes it, Michael, you are thus forgot?¡

cassio. I pray you, pardon me. I cannot speak.

othello. Worthy Montano, you were wont be¡ civil;

The gravity and stillness¡ of your youth

The world hath noted, and your name is great

In mouths of wisest censure.¡ What's the matter

That you unlace¡ your reputation thus

And spend your rich opinion¡ for the name

Of a night-brawler? Give me answer to it.

montano. Worthy Othello, I am hurt to danger.

Your officer, Iago, can inform you—

While I spare speech, which something¡ now offends¡ me—

Of all that I do know; nor know I aught

By me that's said or done amiss this night,

Unless self-charity be sometimes a vice,

And to defend ourselves it be a sin

When violence assails us.

othello. Now, by heaven,

My blood¡ begins my safer guides¡ to rule,

And passion, having my best judgment collied,¡

Essays¡ to lead the way. Zounds, if I stir,

Or do but lift this arm, the best of you Shall sink in my rebuke. Give me to know

How this foul rout¡ began, who set it on;

And he that is approved in¡ this offense,

Though he had twinned with me, both at birth,

Shall lose me. What? In a town of¡ war

Yet wild, the people's hearts brim full of fear,

To manage¡ private and domestic quarrel?

In night, and on the court and guard of safety?¡

'Tis monstrous. Iago, who began 't?

montano [to iago]. If partially affined,¡ or leagued in office,¡

Thou dost deliver more or less than truth,

Thou art no soldier.

iago. Touch me not so near.

I had rather have this tongue cut from my mouth

Than it should do offense to Michael Cassio;

Yet, I persuade myself, to speak the truth

Shall nothing wrong him. Thus it is, General.

Montano and myself being in speech,

There comes a fellow crying out for help,

And Cassio following him with determined sword

To execute¡ upon him. Sir, this gentleman

[indicating montano]

Steps in to Cassio and entreats his pause.¡

Myself the crying fellow did pursue,

Lest by his clamor—as it so fell out—

The town might fall in fright. He, swift of foot,

Outran my purpose, and I returned, the rather¡

For that I heard the clink of fall of swords

And Cassio high in oath, which till tonight

I ne'er might say before. When I came back—

For this was brief—I found them close together

At blow and thrust, even as again they were

When you yourself did part them.

More of this matter cannot I report.

But men are men; the best sometimes forget.¡

Though Cassio did some little wrong to him,

As men in rage strike those that wish them best,¡

Yet surely Cassio, I believe, received

From him that fled some strange indignity,

Which patience could not pass.¡

othello. I know, Iago,

Thy honesty and love doth mince this matter,

Making it light to Cassio. Cassio, I love thee,

But nevermore be officer of mine.

Enter desdemona, attended.

Look if my gentle love be not raised up.

I'll make thee an example.

desdemona. What is the matter, dear?

othello. All's well now, sweeting;

Come away to bed. [To montano.] Sir, for your hurts,

Myself will be your surgeon.¡—Lead him off.

[montano is led off.]

Iago, look with care about the town

And silence those whom this vile brawl distracted.

Come, Desdemona. 'Tis the soldiers' life

To have their balmy slumbers waked with strife.

Exit [with all but iago and cassio].

iago. What, are you hurt, Lieutenant?

cassio. Ay, past all surgery.

iago. Marry, God forbid!

cassio. Reputation, reputation, reputation! O, I have lost my reputation! I have lost the immortal part of myself, and what remains is bestial. My reputation, Iago, my reputation!

iago. As I am an honest man, I thought you had received some bodily wound; there is more sense in that than in reputation. Reputation is an idle and most false imposition,¡ oft got without merit and lost without deserving. You have lost no reputation at all, unless you repute yourself such a loser. What, man, there are more ways to recover¡ the General again. You are but now cast in his mood¡—a punishment more in policy¡ than in malice, even so as one would beat his offenseless dog to affright an imperious lion.¡ Sue¡ to him again and he's yours.

cassio. I will rather sue to be despised than to deceive so good a commander with so slight,¡ so drunken, and so indiscreet an officer. Drunk? And speak parrot?¡ And squabble? Swagger? Swear? And discourse fustian with one's own shadow? O thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee devil!

iago. What was he that you followed with your sword? What had he done to you?

cassio. I know not.

iago. Is 't possible?

cassio. I remember a mass of things, but nothing distinctly; a quarrel, but nothing wherefore.¡ O God, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains! That we should, with joy, pleasance, revel, and applause¡ transform ourselves into beasts!

iago. Why, but you are now well enough. How came you thus recovered?

cassio. It hath pleased the devil drunkenness to give place to the devil wrath. One unperfectness shows me another, to make me frankly despise myself.

iago. Come, you are too severe a moraler.¡ As the time, the place, and the condition of this country stands, I could heartily wish this had not befallen; but since it is as it is, mend it for your own good.

cassio. I will ask him for my place again; he shall tell me I am a drunkard. Had I as many mouths as Hydra,¡ such an answer would stop them all. To be now a sensible man, by and by a fool, and presently a beast! O, strange! Every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil.

iago. Come, come, good wine is a good familiar creature, if it be well used. Exclaim no more against it. And, good Lieutenant, I think you think I love you.

cassio. I have well approved¡ it, sir. I drunk!

iago. You or any man living may be drunk at a time,¡ man. I'll tell you what you shall do. Our general's wife is not the general—I may say so in this respect, for that¡ he hath devoted and given up himself to the contemplation, mark, and denotement¡ of her parts¡ and graces. Confess yourself freely to her; importune her help to put you in your place again. She is of so free,¡ so kind, so apt, so blessed a disposition, she holds it a vice in her goodness not to do more than she is requested. This broken joint between you and her husband entreat her to splinter;¡ and,my fortunes against any lay¡ worth naming, this crack of your love shall grow stronger than it was before.

cassio. You advise me well.

iago. I protest,¡ in the sincerity of love and honest kindness.

cassio. I think it freely;¡ and betimes in the morning I will beseech the virtuous Desdemona to undertake for me. I am desperate of my fortunes if they check¡ me here.

iago. You are in the right. Good night, Lieutenant. I must to the watch.

cassio. Good night, honest Iago. Exit cassio.

iago. And what's he then that says I play the villain,
When this advice is free¡ I give, and honest,
Probal¡ to thinking, and indeed the course
To win the Moor again? For 'tis most easy
Th' inclining¡ Desdemona to subdue¡
In any honest suit; she's framed as fruitful¡

As the free elements.¡ And then for her

To win the Moor—were ’t to renounce his baptism,

All seals and symbols of redeem d sin—

His soul is so enfettered to her love

That she may make, unmake, do what she list,

Even as her appetite¡ shall play the god

With his weak function.¡ How am I then a villain,

To counsel Cassio to this parallel¡ course

Directly to his good? Divinity of hell!¡

When devils will the blackest sins put on,¡

They do suggest¡ at first with heavenly shows,

As I do now. For whiles this honest fool

Plies Desdemona to repair his fortune,

And she for him pleads stronger to the Moor,

I’ll pour this pestilence into his ear,

That she repeals him¡ for her body’s lust;

And by how much she strives to do him good,

She shall undo her credit with the Moor.

So will I turn her virtue into pitch,¡

And out of her own goodness make the net

That shall enmesh them all.

Enter roderigo.

How now, Roderigo?

roderigo. I do follow here in the chase, not like a hound that hunts, but one that fills up the cry.¡ My money is almost spent; I have been tonight exceedingly well cudgeled; and I think the issue will be I shall have so much¡ experience for my pains, and so, with no money at all and a little more wit, return again to Venice.

iago. How poor are they that have not patience!

What wound did ever heal but by degrees?

Thou know'st we work by wit, and not by witchcraft,

And wit depends on dilatory time.

Does 't not go well? Cassio hath beaten thee,

And thou, by that small hurt, hast cashiered¡ Cassio.

Though other things grow fair against the sun,

Yet fruits that blossom first will first be ripe,¡

Content thyself awhile. By the Mass, 'tis morning!

Pleasure and action make the hours seem short.

Retire thee; go where thou art billeted.

Away, I say! Thou shalt know more hereafter.

Nay, get thee gone. Exit roderigo.

Two things are to be done.

My wife must move¡ for Cassio to her mistress;

I'll set her on;

Myself the while to draw the Moor apart

And bring him jump¡ when he may Cassio find

Soliciting his wife. Ay, that's the way.

Dull not device¡ by coldness¡ and delay. Exit.

3.1 Enter cassio [and] musicians.

cassio. Masters, play here—I will content your pains¡—

Something that's brief, and bid "Good morrow, General." [They play.]

[Enter] clown.

cassio. Why, masters, have your instruments been in Naples, that they speak 'i the nose¡ thus?

a musician. How, sir, how?

clown. Are these, I pray you, wind instruments?

a musician. Ay, marry, are they, sir.

clown. O, thereby hangs a tail.

a musician. Whereby hangs a tale, sir?

clown. Marry, sir, by many a wind instrument¡ that I know. But, masters, here's money for you. [He gives money.] And the General so likes your music that he desires you, for love's sake,¡ to make no more noise with it.

a musician. Well, sir, we will not.

clown. If you have any music that may not¡ be heard, to 't again; but, as they say, to hear music the General does not greatly care.

a musician. We have none such, sir.

clown. Then put up your pipes in your bag, for I'll away.¡ Go, vanish into air, away! Exeunt musicians.

cassio. Dost thou hear, mine honest friend?

cassio. No, I hear not your honest friend; I hear you.

cassio. Prithee, keep up¡ thy quillets.¡ There's a poor piece of gold for thee. [He gives money.] If the gentle-woman that attends the General's wife be stirring, tell her there's one Cassio entreats her a little favor of speech.¡ Wilt thou do this?

clown. She is stirring, sir. If she will stir¡ hither, I shall seem¡ to notify unto her.

cassio. Do, good my friend. Exit clown.

Enter iago.

In happy time,¡ Iago.

iago. You have not been abed, then?

cassio. Why, no. The day had broke Before we parted. I have made bold, Iago,
To send in to your wife. My suit to her
Is that she will to virtuous Desdemona Procure me some access.

iago. I'll send her to you presently;

And I'll devise a means to draw the Moor

Out of the way, that your converse and business

May be more free.

cassio. I humbly thank you for 't. Exit iago.

I never knew

A Florentine¡ more kind and honest.

Enter emilia.

emilia. Good morrow, good Lieutenant. I am sorry

For your displeasure;¡ but all will sure be well.

The General and his wife are talking of it,

And she speaks for you stoutly.¡ The Moor replies

That he you hurt is of great fame¡ in Cyprus

And great affinity,¡ and that in wholesome wisdom

He might not but refuse you; but he protests¡ he loves you

And needs no other suitor but his likings

To take the safest occasion by the front¡

To bring you in again.

cassio. Yet I beseech you,

If you think fit, or that it may be done,

Give me advantage of some brief discourse

With Desdemona alone.

emilia. Pray you, come in.

I will bestow you where you shall have time

To speak your bosom¡ freely.

cassio. I am much bound to you. [Exeunt.]

3.2 Enter othello, iago, and gentlemen.

othello [giving letters]. These letters, give, Iago, to the pilot,

And by him do my duties¡ to the Senate.

That done, I will be walking on the works;¡

Repair¡ there to me.

iago. Well, my good lord, I'll do 't.

othello. This fortification, gentlemen, shall we see 't?

gentlemen. We'll wait upon¡ your lordship. Exeunt.

3.3 Enter desdemona, cassio, and emilia.

desdemona. Be thou assured, good Cassio, I will do

All my abilities in thy behalf.

emilia. Good madam, do. I warrant it grieves my husband

As if the cause were his.

desdemona. O, that's an honest fellow. Do not doubt, Cassio,

But I will have my lord and you again

As friendly as you were.

cassio. Bounteous madam,

Whatever shall become of Michael Cassio,

He's never anything but your true servant.

desdemona. I know 't. I thank you. You do love my lord;

You have known him long, and be you well assured

He shall in strangeness¡ stand no farther off

Than in a politic¡ distance.

cassio. Ay, but, lady,

That policy may either last so long,

Or feed upon such nice and waterish diet,¡

Or breed itself so out of circumstance,¡

That, I being absent and my place supplied,¡

My general will forget my love and service.

desdemona. Do not doubt¡ that. Before Emilia here

I give thee warrant¡ of thy place. Assure thee,

If I do vow a friendship I'll perform it

To the last article. My lord shall never rest.

I'll watch him tame¡ and talk him out of patience;¡

His bed shall seem a school, his board¡ a shrift;¡

I'll intermingle everything he does

With Cassio's suit. Therefore be merry, Cassio,

For thy solicitor¡ shall rather die

Than give thy cause away.¡

Enter othello and iago [at a distance].

emilia. Madam, here comes my lord.

cassio. Madam, I'll take my leave.

desdemona. Why, stay, and hear me speak.

cassio. Madam, not now. I am very ill at ease,

Unfit for mine own pursposes.

desdemona. Well, do your discretion.¡ Exit cassio.

iago. Ha! I like not that.

othello. What dost thou say?

iago. Nothing, my lord; or if—I know not what.

othello. Was not that Cassio parted from my wife?

iago. Cassio, my lord? No, sure, I cannot think it,

That he would steal away so guiltylike,

Seeing you coming.

othello. I do believe 'twas he.

desdemona. How now, my lord?

I have been talking with a suitor here,

A man that languishes in your displeasure.

othello. Who is ’t you mean?

desdemona. Why, your lieutenant, Cassio. Good my lord,
If I have any grace or power to move you,
His present reconciliation take;¡
For if he be not one that truly loves you,
That errs in ignorance and not in cunning,¡
I have no judgment in an honest face.
I prithee, call him back.

othello. Went he hence now?

desdemona. Yes, faith, so humbled
That he hath left part of his grief with me
To suffer with him. Good love, call him back.

othello. Not now, sweet Desdemona. Some other time.

desdemona. But shall ’t be shortly?

othello. The sooner, sweet, for you.

desdemona. Shall ’t be tonight at supper?

othello. No, not tonight.

desdemona. Tomorrow dinner,¡ then?

othello. I shall not dine at home.
I meet the captains at the citadel.

desdemona. Why, then, tomorrow night, or Tuesday morn,
On Tuesday noon, or night, on Wednesday morn.
I prithee, name the time, but let it not Exceed three days. In faith, he’s penitent;
And yet his trespass, in our common reason¡—
Save that, they say, the wars must make example
Out of her best¡—is not almost¡ a fault

T’ incure a private check.¡ When shall he come?
Tell me, Othello. I wonder in my soul
What you would ask me that I should deny,
Or stand so mammering on.¡ What? Michael Cassio,
That came a-wooing with you, and so many a time,
When I have spoke of you dispraisingly,
Hath ta’en your part—to have so much to do
To bring him in!¡ By ’r Lady, I could do much—othello. Prithee, no more. Let him come when he will;

I will deny thee nothing.

desdemona. Why, this is not a boon.
’Tis as I should entreat you wear your gloves,
Or feed on nourishing dishes, or keep you warm,
Or sue to you to do a peculiar¡ profit
To your own person. Nay, when I have a suit
Wherein I mean to touch¡ your love indeed,
It shall be full of poise¡ and difficult weight,
And fearful to be granted.

othello. I will deny thee nothing.
Whereon,¡ I beseech thee, grant me this,
To leave me but a little to myself.

desdemona. Shall I deny you? No. Farewell, my lord.

othello. Farewell, my Desdemona. I’ll come to thee straight.¡

desdemona. Emilia, come—Be as your fancies¡ teach you; Whate’er you be, I am obedient. Exit [with emilia].

othello. Excellent wretch!¡ Perdition catch my soul
But I do love thee! And when I love thee not, Chaos is come again.¡

iago. My noble lord—

othello. What dost thou say, Iago?

iago. Did Michael Cassio, when you wooed my lady,

Know of your love?

othello. He did, from first to last. Why dost thou ask?

iago. But for a satisfaction of my thought;

No further harm.

othello. Why of thy thought, Iago?

iago. I did not think he had been acquainted with her.

othello. O, yes, and went between us very oft.

iago. Indeed?

othello. Indeed? Ay, indeed. Descern'st thou aught in that?

Is he not honest?

iago. Honest, my lord?

othello. Honest. Ay, honest.

iago. My lord, for aught I know.

othello. What dost thou think?

iago. Think, my lord?

othello. "Think, my lord?" By heaven, thou echo'st me,

As if there were some monster in thy thought

Too hideous to be shown. Thou dost mean something.

I heard thee say even now, thou lik'st not that,

When Cassio left my wife. What didst thou not like?

And when I told thee he was of my counsel¡

In my whole course of wooing, thou criedst "Indeed?"

And didst contract and purse¡ thy brow together

As if thou then hadst shut up in thy brain

Some horrible conceit.¡ If thou dost love me,

Show me thy thought.

iago. My lord, you know I love you.

othello. I think thou dost;

And, for¡ I know thou'rt full of love and honesty,

And weigh'st thy words before thou giv'st them breath,

Therefore these stops¡ of thine fright me the more;

For such things in a false disloyal knave

Are tricks of custom,¡ but in a man that's just

They're close dilations,¡ working from the heart

That passion cannot rule.¡

iago. For¡ Michael Cassio,

I dare be sworn I think that he is honest.

othello. I think so too.

iago. Men should be what they seem;

Or those that be not, would they might seem none!¡

othello. Certain, men should be what they seem.

iago. Why, then, I think Cassio's an honest man.

othello. Nay, yet there's more in this.

I prithee, speak to me as to thy thinkings,

As thou dost ruminate, and give thy worst of thoughts

The worst of words.

iago. Good my lord, pardon me.

Though I am bound to every act of duty,

I am not bound to that¡ all slaves are free to.¡

Utter my thoughts? Why, say they are vile and false,

As where's the palace whereinto foul things

Sometimes intrude not? Who has that breast so pure

But some uncleanly apprehensions

Keep leets and law days,¡ and in sessions sit

With¡ meditations lawful?¡

othello. Thou dost conspire against thy friend,¡ Iago,

If thou but think'st him wronged and mak'st his ear

A stranger to thy thoughts.

iago. I do beseech you,

Though I perchance am vicious¡ in my guess—

As I confess it is my nature's plague

To spy into abuses, and oft my jealousy¡

Shapes faults that are not—that your wisdom then,¡

From one¡ that so imperfectly conceits,¡

Would take no notice, nor build yourself a trouble

Out of his scattering¡ and unsure observance.

It were not for your quiet nor your good,

Nor for my manhood, honesty, and wisdom,

To let you know my thoughts.

othello. What dost thou mean?

iago. Good name in man and woman, dear my lord,

Is the immediate¡ jewel of their souls.

Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;

'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;

But he that filches from me my good name

Robs me of that which not enriches him

And makes me poor indeed.

othello. By heaven, I'll know thy thoughts.

iago. You cannot, if¡ my heart were in your hand,

Nor shall not, whilst 'tis in my custody.

othello. Ha?

iago. O, beware, my lord, of jealousy.

It is the green-eyed monster which doth mock

The meat it feeds on.¡ That cuckold lives in bliss

Who, certain of his fate, loves not his wronger;¡

But O, what damn d minutes tells¡ he o'er

Who dotes, yet doubts, suspects, yet fondly loves!

othello. O misery!

iago. Poor and content is rich, and rich enough,¡

But riches fineless¡ is as poor as winter

To him that ever fears he shall be poor.

Good God, the souls of all my tribe defend

From jealousy!

othello. Why, why is this?

Think'st thou I'd make a life of jealousy,

To follow still the changes of the moon

With fresh suspicions?¡ No! To be once in doubt

Is once¡ to be resolved.¡ Exchange me for a goat

When I shall turn the business of my soul

To such exsufflicate and blown¡ surmises

Matching thy inference.¡ 'Tis not to make me jealous

To say my wife is fair, feeds well, loves company,

Is free of speech, sings, plays, and dances well;

Where virtue is, these are more virtuous.

Not from mine own weak merits will I draw

The smallest fear of doubt of her revolt,¡

For she had eyes, and chose me. No, Iago,

I'll see before I doubt; when I doubt, prove;

And on the proof, there is no more but this—

Away at once with love or jealousy.

iago. I am glad of this, for now I shall have reason

To show the love and duty that I bear you

With franker spirit. Therefore, as I am bound,

Receive it from me. I speak not yet of proof.

Look to your wife; observe her well with Cassio.

Wear your eyes thus, not¡ jealous nor secure.¡

I would not have your free and noble nature,

Out of self-bounty,¡ be abused.¡ Look to 't.

I know our country disposition well;

In Venice they do let God see the pranks

They dare not show their husbands; their best conscience

Is not to leave 't undone, but keep 't unknown.

othello. Dost thou say so?

iago. She did deceive her father, marrying you;

And when she seemed to shake and fear your looks,

She loved them most.

othello. And so she did.

iago. Why, go to,¡ then!

She that, so young, could give out such a seeming,¡

To seel¡ her father's eyes up close as oak,¡

He thought 'twas witchcraft! But I am much to blame.

I humbly do beseech you of your pardon

For too much loving you.

othello. I am bound¡ to thee forever.

iago. I see this hath a little dashed your spirits.

othello. Not a jot, not a jot.

iago. I' faith, I fear it has.

I hope you will consider what is spoke

Comes from my love. But I do see you're moved.

I am to pray you not to strain my speech

To grosser issues¡ nor to larger reach¡

Than to suspicion.

othello. I will not.

iago. Should you do so, my lord,

My speech should fall into such vile success¡

Which my thoughts aimed not. Cassio's my worthy friend.

My lord, I see you're moved.

othello. No, not much moved.

I do not think but Desdemona's honest.¡

iago. Long live she so! And long live you to think so!

othello. And yet, how nature erring from itself—

iago. Ay, there's the point! As—to be bold with you—

Not to affect¡ many propos d matches

Of her own clime, complexion, and degree,¡

Whereto we see in all things nature tends—

Foh! One may smell in such a will¡ most rank,

Foul disproportion,¡ thoughts unnatural.

But pardon me. I do not in position¡

Distinctly speak of her, though I may fear

Her will, recoiling¡ to her better¡ judgment,

May fall to match you with her country forms¡

And happily¡ repent.

othello. Farewell, farewell!

If more thou dost perceive, let me know more.

Set on thy wife to observe. Leave me, Iago.

iago [going]. My lord, I take my leave.

othello. Why did I marry? This honest creature doubtless Sees and knows more, much more, than he unfolds.

iago [returning]. My Lord, I would I might entreat your honor To scan¡ this thing no farther. Leave it to time.
Although 'tis fit that Cassio have his place—
For, sure, he fills it up with great ability—
Yet if you please to hold him off awhile,
You shall by that perceive him and his means.¡
Note if your lady strain his entertainment¡
With any strong or vehement importunity;
Much will be seen in that. In the meantime,
Let me be thought too busy¡ in my fears—
As worthy cause I have to fear I am—
And hold her free,¡ I do beseech your honor.

othello. Fear not my government.¡

iago. I once more take my leave. Exit.

othello. This fellow's of exceeding honesty,
And knows all qualities,¡ with a learn d spirit,
Of human dealings. If I do prove her haggard,¡
Though that her jesses¡ were my dear heartstrings,
I'd whistle her off and let her down the wind¡
To prey at fortune.¡ Haply, for¡ I am black
And have not those soft parts of conversation¡
That chamberers¡ have, or for I am declined
Into the vale of years—yet that's not much—
She's gone. I am abused,¡ and my relief
Must be to loathe her. O curse of marriage,

That we can call these delicate creatures ours
And not their appetites! I had rather be a toad
And live upon the vapor of a dungeon
Than keep a corner in the thing I love
For others' uses. Yet, 'tis the plague of great ones;
Prerogatived¡ are they less than the base.¡
'Tis destiny unshunnable, like death.
Even then this fork d plague is fated to us
When we do quicken.¡ Look where she comes.
Enter desdemona and emilia.
If she be false, O, then heaven mocks itself!
I'll not believe 't.

desdemona. How now, my dear Othello?
Your dinner, and the generous¡ islanders
By you invited, do attend¡ your presence.

othello. I am to blame.

desdemona. Why do you speak so faintly?
Are you not well?

othello. I have a pain upon my forehead here.

desdemona. Faith, that's with watching.¡ 'Twill away again.
[She offers her handkerchief.]
Let me but bind it hard, within this hour
It will be well.

othello. Your napkin¡ is too little.
Let it alone.¡ Come, I'll go in with you.
[He puts the handkerchief from him, and it drops.]

desdemona. I am very sorry that you are not well.
Exit [with othello].

emilia [picking up the handkerchief]. I am glad I have found this napkin.

This was her first remembrance from the Moor.

My wayward¡ husband hath a hundred times

Wooed me to steal it but she so loves the token—

For he conjured her she should ever keep it—

That she reserves it evermore about her

To kiss and talk to. I'll have the work ta'en out,¡

And give 't Iago. What he will do with it

Heaven knows, not I;

I nothing but to please his fantasy.¡

Enter iago.

iago. How now? What do you do here alone?

emilia. Do not you chide. I have a thing for you.

iago. You have a thing for me? It is a common thing¡— emilia. Ha!

iago. To have a foolish wife.

emilia. O, is that all? What will you give me now

For that same handkerchief?

iago. What handkerchief?

emilia. What handkerchief?

Why, that the Moor first gave to Desdemona;

That which so often you did bid me steal.

iago. Hast stolen it from her?

emilia. No, faith. She let it drop by negligence,

And to th' advantage¡ I, being here, took 't up.

Look, here 'tis.

iago. A good wench! Give it me.

emilia. What will you do with 't, that you have been so earnest

To have me filch it?

iago [snatching it]. Why, what is that to you?

emilia. If it be not for some purpose of import,

Give ’t me again. Poor lady, she’ll run mad

When she shall lack¡ it.

iago. Be not acknown on ’t.¡

I have use for it. Go, leave me. Exit emilia.

I will in Cassio’s lodging lose¡ this napkin

And let him find it. Trifles light as air.

Are to the jealous confirmations strong

As proofs of Holy Writ. This may do something.

The Moor already changes with my poison.

Dangerous conceits¡ are in their natures poisons,

Which at the first are scarce found to distaste,¡

But with a little act¡ upon the blood

Burn like the mines of sulfur.

Enter othello.

I did say so.

Look where he comes! Not poppy nor mandragora¡

Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world

Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep

Which thou owedst¡ yesterday.

othello. Ha, ha, false to me?

iago. Why, how now, General? No more of that.

othello. Avaunt! Begone! Thou hast set me on the rack.

I swear ’tis better to be much abused

Than but to know ’t a little.

iago. How now, my lord?

othello. What sense had I of her stolen hours of lust?

I saw ’t not, thought it not, it harmed not me.

I slept the next night well, fed well, was free¡ and merry;

I found not Cassio’s kisses on her lips.

He that is robbed, not wanting¡ what is stolen,

Let him not know ’t and he’s not robbed at all.

iago. I am sorry to hear this.

othello. I had been happy if the general camp,

Pioners¡ and all, had tasted her sweet body,

So¡ I had nothing known. O, now, forever

Farewell the tranquil mind! Farewell content!

Farewell the plum d troops and the big¡ wars

That makes ambition virtue! O, farewell!

Farewell the neighing steed and the shrill trump,

The spirit-stirring drum, th’ ear-piercing fife,

The royal banner, and all quality,¡

Pride,¡ pomp, and circumstance¡ of glorious war!

And O, you mortal engines,¡ whose rude throats

Th’ immortal Jove’s dread clamors¡ counterfeit,

Farewell! Othello’s occupation’s gone.

iago. Is ’t possible, my lord?

othello. Villain, be sure thou prove my love a whore!

Be sure of it. Give me the ocular proof,

Or, by the worth of mine eternal soul,

Thou hadst been better have been born a dog

Than answer my waked wrath!

iago. Is ’t come to this?

othello. Make me to see ’t, or at the least so prove it

That the probation¡ bear no hinge nor loop

To hang a doubt on, or woe upon thy life!

iago. My noble lord—

othello. If thou dost slander her and torture me,

Never pray more; abandon all remorse;¡

On horror's head horrors accumulate;¡

Do deeds to make heaven weep, all earth amazed;¡

For nothing canst thou to damnation add

Greater than that.

iago. O grace! O heaven forgive me!

Are you a man? Have you a soul or sense?

God b' wi' you; take mine office. O wretched fool,¡

That lov'st to make thine honesty a vice!¡

O monstrous world! Take note, take note, O world,

To be direct and honest is not safe.

I thank you for this profit,¡ and from hence¡

I'll love no friend, sith¡ love breeds such offense.¡

othello. Nay, stay. Thou shouldst be¡ honest.

iago. I should be wise, for honesty's a fool

And loses that¡ it works for.

othello. By the world,

I think my wife be honest and think she is not;

I think that thou art just and think thou art not.

I'll have some proof. My name, that was as fresh

As Dian's¡ visage, is now begrimed and black

As mine own face. If there be cords, or knives,

Poison, or fire, or suffocating streams,

I'll not endure it. Would I were satisfied!

iago. I see, sir, you are eaten up with passion.

I do repent me that I put it to you.

You would be satisfied?

othello. Would? Nay, and I will.

iago. And may; but how? How satisfied, my lord?

Would you, the supervisor,¡ grossly gape on?

Behold her topped?

othello. Death and damnation! O!

iago. It were a tedious difficulty, I think,

To bring them to that prospect. Damn them then,¡

If ever mortal eyes do see them bolster¡

More¡ than their own.¡ What then? How then?

What shall I say? Where's satisfaction?

It is impossible you should see this,

Were they as prime¡ as goats, as hot as monkeys,

As salt¡ as wolves in pride,¡ and fools as gross

As ignorance made drunk. But yet I say,

If imputation and strong circumstances¡

Which lead directly to the door of truth

Will give you satisfaction, you might have 't.

othello. Give me a living reason she's disloyal.

iago. I do not like the office.

But sith¡ I am entered in this cause so far,

Pricked¡ to 't by foolish honesty and love,

I will go on. I lay with Cassio lately,

And being troubled with a raging tooth

I could not sleep. There are a kind of men

So loose of soul that in their sleeps will mutter

Their affairs. One of this kind is Cassio.

In sleep I heard him say, “Sweet Desdemona,

Let us be wary, let us hide our loves!”

And then, sir, would he grip and wring my hand,

Cry “O sweet creature!,” then kiss me hard,

As if he plucked up kisses by the roots

That grew upon my lips; then laid his leg

Over my thigh, and sighed, and kissed, and then

Cried, “Curs d fate that gave thee to the Moor!”

othello. O monstrous! Monstrous!

iago. Nay, this was but his dream.

othello. But this denoted a foregone conclusion.¡

’Tis a shrewd doubt,¡ though it be but a dream.

iago. And this may help to thicken other proofs

That do demonstrate thinly.

othello. I’ll tear her all to pieces.

iago. Nay, but be wise. Yet we see nothing done;

She may be honest yet. Tell me but this:

Have you not sometimes seen a handkerchief

Spotted with strawberries¡ in your wife’s hand?

othello. I gave her such a one. ’Twas my first gift.

iago. I know not that; but such a handkerchief—

I am sure it was your wife’s—did I today

See Cassio wipe his beard with.

othello. If it be that—iago. If it be that, or any that was hers,

It speaks against her with the other proofs.

othello. O, that the slave¡ had forty thousand lives!

One is too poor, too weak for my revenge.

Now do I see 'tis true. Look here, Iago,

All my fond¡ love thus do I blow to heaven.

'Tis gone.

Arise, black vengeance, from the hollow hell!

Yield up, O love, thy crown and hearted¡ throne

To tyrannous hate! Swell, bosom, with thy freight,¡

For 'tis of aspics'¡ tongues!

iago. Yet be content.¡

othello. O, blood, blood, blood!

iago. Patience, I say. Your mind perhaps may change.

othello. Never, Iago. Like to the Pontic Sea,¡

Whose icy current and compulsive course

Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on

To the Propontic¡ and the Hellespont,¡

Even so my bloody thoughts with violent pace

Shall ne'er look back, ne'er ebb to humble love,

I that a capable¡ and wide revenge

Swallow them up. Now, by yond marble¡ heaven,

[Kneeling] In the due reverence of a sacred vow

I here engage my words.

iago. Do not rise yet.

[He kneels.]¡ Witness, you ever-burning lights above,

You elements that clip¡ us round about,

Witness that here Iago doth give up

The execution¡ of his wit,¡ hands, heart,

To wronged Othello's service. Let him command,

And to obey shall be in me remorse,¡

What bloody business ever.¡ [They rise.]

othello. I greet thy love,

Not with vain thanks, but with acceptance bounteous,

And will upon the instant put thee to 't.¡

Within these three days let me hear thee say

That Cassio's not alive.

iago. My friend is dead;

'Tis done at your request. But let her live.

othello. Damn her, lewd minx!¡ O, damn her, damn her!

Come, go with me apart. I will withdraw

To furnish me with some swift means of death

For the fair devil. Now art thou my lieutenant.

iago. I am your own forever. Exeunt.

3.4 Enter desdemona, emilia and desdemona. Do you know, sirrah,¡ where Lieutenant Cassio lies?¡

clown. I dare not say he lies anywhere.

desdemona. Why, man?

clown. He's a soldier, and for me to say a soldier lies, 'tis stabbing.

desdemona. Go to. Where lodges he?

clown. To tell you where he lodges is to tell you where I lie.

desdemona. Can anything be made of this?

clown. I know not where he lodges, and for me to devise a lodging and say he lies here, or he lies there, were to lie in mine own throat.¡

desdemona. Can you inquire him out, and be edified by report?

clown. I will catechize the world for him; that is, make questions, and by them answer.

desdemona. Seek him, bid him come hither. Tell him I have moved¡ my lord on his behalf and hope all will be well.

clown. To do this is within the compass of man's wit, and therefore I will attempt the doing it. Exit clown.

desdemona. Where should I lose that handkerchief, Emilia?

emilia. I know not, madam.

desdemona. Believe me, I had rather have lost my purse
Full of crusadoes;¡ and but my noble Moor
Is true of mind and made of no such baseness
As jealous creatures are, it were enough
To put him to ill thinking.

emilia. Is he not jealous?

desdemona. Who, he? I think the sun where he was born Drew all such humors¡ from him.

emilia. Look where he comes.

Enter othello.

desdemona. I will not leave him now till Cassio
Be called to him.—How is 't with you, my lord?

othello. Well, my good lady. [Aside.] O, hardness to dissemble!—
How do you, Desdemona?

desdemona. Well, my good lord.

othello. Give me your hand. [She gives her hand.] This hand is moist, my lady.

desdemona. It yet hath felt no age nor known no sorrow.

othello. This argues¡ fruitfulness¡ and liberal¡ heart.
Hot, hot, and moist. This hand of yours requires
A sequester¡ from liberty, fasting and prayer,
Much castigation,¡ exercise devout;¡
For here's a young and sweating devil here
That commonly rebels. 'Tis a good hand,

A frank¡ one.

desdemona. You may indeed say so,

For ’twas that hand that gave away my heart.

othello. A liberal hand. The hearts of old gave hands,¡

But our new heraldry is hands, not hearts.¡

desdemona. I cannot speak of this. Come now, your promise.

othello. What promise, chuck?¡

desdemona. I have sent to bid Cassio come speak with you.

othello. I have a salt and sorry rheum¡ offends me;

Lend me thy handkerchief.

desdemona. Here, my lord. [She offers a handkerchief.]

othello. That which I gave you.

desdemona. I have it not about me.

othello. Not?

desdemona. No, faith, my lord.

othello. That’s a fault. That handkerchief

Did an Egyptian to my mother give.

She was a charmer,¡ and could almost read

The thoughts of people. She told her, while she kept it

’Twould make her amiable¡ and subdue my father

Entirely to her love, but if she lost it

Or made a gift of it, my father’s eye

Should hold her loath d and his spirits should hunt

After new fancies.¡ She, dying, gave it me,

And bid me, when my fate would have me wived,

To give it her.¡ I did so; and take heed on ’t;

Make it a darling like your precious eye.

To lose ’t or give ’t away were such perdition¡

As nothing else could match.

desdemona. Is ’t possible?

othello. ’Tis true. There’s magic in the web¡ of it.

A sibyl, that had numbered in the world

The sun to course two hundred compasses,¡

In her prophetic fury¡ sewed the work;¡

The worms were hallowed that did breed the silk,

And it was dyed in mummy¡ which the skillful

Conserved of¡ maidens’ hearts.

desdemona. I’ faith! Is ’t true?

othello. Most veritable. Therefore look to ’t well.

desdemona. Then would to God that I had never seen ’t!

othello. Ha? Wherefore?

desdemona. Why do you speak so startingly and rash?¡

othello. Is ’t lost? Is ’t gone? Speak, is ’t out o’ the way?¡

desdemona. Heaven bless us!

othello. Say you?

desdemona. It is not lost; but what an if¡ it were?

othello. How?

desdemona. I say it is not lost.

othello. Fetch ’t, let me see ’t.

desdemona. Why, so I can, sir, but I will not now.

This is a trick to put me from my suit.

Pray you, let Cassio be received again.

othello. Fetch me the handkerchief! My mind misgives.

desdemona. Come, come,

You’ll never meet a more sufficient¡ man.

othello. The handkerchief!

desdemona. I pray, talk¡ me of Cassio.

othello. The handkerchief?

desdemona. A man that all his time¡

Hath founded his good fortunes on your love,

Shared dangers with you—

othello. The handkerchief!

desdemona. I' faith, you are to blame.

othello. Zounds! Exit othello.

emilia. Is not this man jealous?

desdemona. I ne'er saw this before.

Sure, there's some wonder in this handkerchief.

I am most unhappy in the loss of it.

emilia. 'Tis not a year or two shows us a man.¡

They are all but stomachs, and we all but¡ food;

They eat us hungerly,¡ and when they are full

They belch us.

Enter iago and cassio.

Look you, Cassio and my husband.

iago [to cassio]. There is no other way; 'tis she must do 't.

And, lo, the happiness!¡ Go and importune her.

desdemona. How now, good Cassio? What's the news with you?

cassio. Madam, my former suit. I do beseech you

That by your virtuous¡ means I may again

Exist and be a member of his love

Whom I, with all the office¡ of my heart,

Entirely honor. I would not be delayed.

If my offense be of such mortal¡ kind

That nor my service past, nor¡ present sorrows,

Nor purposed merit in futurity

Can ransom me into his love again,

But to know so must be my benefit;¡

So shall I clothe me in a forced content,

And shut myself up in¡ some other course,

To fortune's alms.¡

desdemona. Alas, thrice-gentle Cassio,

My advocation¡ is not now in tune.

My lord is not my lord; nor should I know him,

Were he in favor¡ as in humor¡ altered.

So help me every spirit sanctified

As I have spoken for you all my best

And stood within the blank¡ of his displeasure

For my free speech! You must awhile be patient.

What I can do I will, and more I will

Than for myself I dare. Let that suffice you.

iago. Is my lord angry?

emilia. He went hence but now,

And certainly in strange unquietness.

iago. Can he be angry? I have seen the cannon

When it hath blown his ranks into the air,

And like the devil from his very arm

Puffed his own brother—and is he angry?

Something of moment¡ then. I will go meet him.

There's matter in 't indeed, if he be angry.

desdemona. I prithee, do so. Exit [iago].

Something, sure, of state,¡

Either from Venice, or some unhatched practice¡

Made demonstrable here in Cyprus to him,
Hath puddled¡ his clear spirit; and in such cases
Men's natures wrangle with inferior things,
Though great ones are their object. 'Tis even so;
For let our finger ache, and it indues¡
Our other, healthful members even to a sense
Of pain. Nay, we must think men are not gods,
Nor of them look for such observancy¡
As fits the bridal.¡ Beshrew me¡ much, Emilia,
I was, unhandsome¡ warrior as I am,
Arraigning his unkindness with¡ my soul;
But now I find I had suborned the witness,¡
And he's indicted falsely.

emilia. Pray heaven it be
State matters, as you think, and no conception
Nor no jealous toy¡ concerning you.

desdemona. Alas the day! I never gave him cause.

emilia. But jealous souls will not be answered so;
They are not ever jealous for the cause,
But jealous for¡ they're jealous. It is a monster Begot upon itself,¡ born on itself.

desdemona. Heaven keep that monster from Othello's mind!

emilia. Lady, amen.

desdemona. I will go seek him. Cassio, walk hereabout.
If I do find him fit, I'll move your suit
And seek to effect it to my uttermost.

cassio. I humbly thank your ladyship.

Exit [desdemona with emilia].

Enter bianca.

bianca. Save¡ you, friend Cassio!

cassio. What make¡ you from home?

How is ’t with you, my most fair Bianca?

I’ faith, sweet love, I was coming to your house.

bianca. And I was going to your lodging, Cassio.

What, keep a week away? Seven days and nights?

Eightscore-eight¡ hours? And lovers’ absent hours

More tedious than the dial¡ eightscore times?

O weary reckoning!

cassio. Pardon me, Bianca.

I have this while with leaden thoughts been pressed;

But I shall, in a more continuate¡ time,

Strike off this score¡ of absence. Sweet Bianca,

[giving her desdemona’s handkerchief]

Take me this work out.¡

bianca. O Cassio, whence came this?

This is some token from a newer friend.¡

To the felt absence now I feel a cause.

Is ’t come to this? Well, well.

cassio. Go to, woman!

Throw your vile guesses in the devil’s teeth,

From whence you have them. You are jealous now

That this is from some mistress, some remembrance,

No, by my faith, Bianca.

bianca. Why, whose is it?

cassio. I know not, neither. I found it in my chamber.

I like the work well. Ere it be demanded¡—

As like¡ enough it will—I would have it copied.
Take it and do ’t, and leave me for this time.

bianca. Leave you? Wherefore?

cassio. I do attend here on the General,
And think it no addition,¡ nor my wish,
To have him see me womaned.

bianca. Why, I pray you?

cassio. Not that I love you not.

bianca. But that you do not love me.
I pray you, bring¡ me on the way a little,
And say if I shall see you soon at night.

cassio. ’Tis but a little way that I can bring you,
For I attend here; but I’ll see you soon.

bianca. ’Tis very good. I must be circumstanced.¡ Exeunt omnes.

4.1 Enter othello and iago iago. Will you think so?

othello. Think so, Iago?

iago. What,
To kiss in private?

othello. An unauthorized kiss!

iago. Or to be naked with her friend in bed
An hour or more, not meaning any harm?

othello. Naked in bed, Iago, and not mean harm?
It is hypocrisy against the devil.
They that mean virtuously and yet do so,
The devil their virtue tempts, and they tempt heaven.

iago. If they do nothing, ’tis a venial¡ slip.

But if I give my wife a handkerchief—othello. What then?

iago. Why then, ’tis hers, my lord, and being hers,

She may, I think, bestow ’t on any man.

othello. She is protectress of her honor too

May she give that?.

iago. Her honor is an essence that’s not seen;

They have it¡ very oft that have it not.

But, for the handkerchief—

othello. By heaven, I would most gladly have forgot it.

Thou saidst—O, it comes o’er my memory

As doth the raven o’er the infectious house,¡

Boding to all—he had my handkerchief.

iago. Ay, what of that?

othello. That’s not so good now.

iago. What

If I had said I had seen him do you wrong?

Or heard him say—as knaves be such abroad,¡

Who having, by their own importunate suit,

Or voluntary dotage¡ of some mistress,

Convinc d or supplied¡ them, cannot choose

But they must blab—

othello. Hath he said anything?

iago. He hath, my lord; but, be you well assured,

No more than he’ll unswear.

othello. What hath he said?

iago. Faith, that he did—I know not what he did.

othello. What? What?

iago. Lie—

othello. With her?

iago. With her, on her; what you will.

othello. Lie with her? Lie on her? We say “lie on her” when they belie¡ her. Lie with her? Zounds, that’s fulsome.¡—Handkerchief—confessions—handkerchief!—To confess and be hanged for his labor—first to be hanged and then to confess.¡—I tremble at it. Nature would not invest herself in such shadowing passion without some instruction.¡ It is not words¡ that shakes me thus. Pish! Noses, ears, and lips.—Is ’t possible?—Confess—handkerchief!—O devil!

Falls in a trance.

iago. Work on,

My medicine, work! Thus credulous fools are caught,

And many worthy and chaste dames even thus,

All guiltless, meet reproach.—What, ho! My lord!

My lord, I say! Othello!

Enter cassio.

How now, Cassio?

cassio. What’s the matter?

iago. My lord is fall’n into an epilepsy.

This is his second fit. He had one yesterday.

cassio. Rub him about the temples.

iago. No, forbear.

The lethargy¡ must have his¡ quiet course.

If not, he foams at mouth, and by and by Breaks out to savage madness. Look, he stirs.

Do you withdraw yourself a little while.

He will recover straight. When he is gone,

I would on great occasion¡ speak with you.

[Exit cassio.]

How is it, General? Have you not hurt your head?

othello. Dost thou mock me?¡

iago. I mock you not, by heaven.

Would you would bear your fortune like a man!

othello. A horn d man's a monster and a beast.

iago. There's many a beast then in a populous city,

And many a civil¡ monster.

othello. Did he confess it?

iago. Good sir, be a man.

Think every bearded fellow that's but yoked¡

May draw with you.¡ There's millions now alive

That nightly lie in those unproper¡ beds

Which they dare swear peculiar.¡ Your case is better.¡

O, 'tis the spite of hell, the fiend's arch-mock,

To lip¡ a wanton in a secure¡ couch

And to suppose her chaste! No, let me know,

And knowing what I am,¡ I know what she shall be.¡

othello. O, thou art wise. 'Tis certain.

iago. Stand you awhile apart;

Confine yourself but in a patient list.¡

Whilst you were here o'erwhelm d with your grief—

A passion most unsuiting such a man—

Cassio came hither. I shifted him away,¡

And laid good 'scuse upon your ecstasy,¡

Bade him anon return and here speak with me,

The which he promised. Do but encave¡ yourself

And mark the fleers,¡ the gibes, and notable¡ scorns

That dwell in every region of his face;

For I will make him tell the tale anew,

Where, how, how oft, how long ago, and when

He hath and is again to cope¡ your wife.

I say, but mark his gesture. Marry, patience!

Or I shall say you're all-in-all in spleen,¡

And nothing of a man.

othello. Dost thou hear, Iago?

I will be found most cunning in my patience;

But—dost thou hear?—most bloody.

iago. That's not amiss;

But yet keep time¡ in all. Will you withdraw?

[othello stands apart.]

Now will I question Cassio of Bianca,

A huswife¡ that by selling her desires

Buys herself bread and clothes. It is a creature

That dotes on Cassio—as 'tis the strumpet's plague

To beguile many and be beguiled by one.

He, when he hears of her, cannot restrain¡

From the excess of laughter. Here he comes.

Enter cassio.

As he shall smile, Othello shall go mad;

And his unbookish¡ jealousy must conster¡

Poor Cassio's smiles, gestures, and light behaviors

Quite in the wrong.—How do you now, Lieutenant?

cassio. The worser that you give me the addition¡

Whose want¡ even kills me.

iago. Ply Desdemona well and you are sure on 't.

[Speaking lower.] Now, if this suit lay in Bianca's power,

How quickly should you speed!

cassio [laughing]. Alas, poor caitiff!¡

othello [aside]. Look how he laughs already!

iago. I never knew a woman love man so.

cassio. Alas, poor rogue! I think, i' faith, she loves me.

othello. Now he denies it faintly, and laughs it out.

iago. Do you hear, Cassio?

othello. Now he importunes him

To tell it o'er. Go to!¡ Well said,¡ well said.

iago. She gives it out that you shall marry her.

Do you intend it?

cassio. Ha, ha, ha!

othello. Do you triumph, Roman?¡ Do you triumph?

cassio. I marry her? What? A customer?¡ Prithee, bear some charity to my wit;¡do not think it so unwholesome. Ha, ha, ha!

othello. So, so, so, so! They laugh that win.¡

iago. Faith, the cry¡ goes that you shall marry her.

cassio. Prithee, say true.

iago. I am a very villain else.¡

othello. Have you scored me?¡ Well.

cassio. This is the monkey's own giving out. She is persuaded I will marry her out of her own love and flattery,¡ not out of my promise.

othello. Iago beckons me.¡ Now he begins the story.

cassio. She was here even now; she haunts me in every place. I was the other day talking on the seabank¡ with certain Venetians, and thither comes the bauble,¡ and, by this hand,¡ she falls me thus about my neck—

[He embraces iago.]

othello. Crying, “O dear Cassio!” as it were; his gesture imports it.

cassio. So hangs and lolls and weep upon me, so shakes and pulls me. Ha, ha, ha!

othello. Now he tells how she plucked him to my chamber. O, I see that nose of yours, but not that dog I shall throw it to.¡

cassio. Well, I must leave her company.

iago. Before me,¡ look where she comes.

Enter bianca [with othello’s handkerchief].

cassio. ’Tis such another fitchew!¡ Marry, a perfumed one.—What do you mean by this haunting of me?

bianca. Let the devil and his dam¡ haunt you! What did you mean by that same handkerchief you gave me even now? I was a fine fool to take it. I must take out the work? A likely piece of work,¡ that you should find it in your chamber and know not who left it there! This is some minx’s token, and I must take out the work? There; give it your hobbyhorse.¡ [She gives him the handkerchief.] Wheresoever you had it, I’ll take out no work on ’t.

cassio. How now, my sweet Bianca? How now? How now?

othello. By heaven, that should be¡ my handkerchief!

bianca. If you’ll come to supper tonight, you may; if you will not, come when you are next prepared for.¡

Exit.

iago. After her, after her.

cassio. Faith, I must. She’ll rail in the streets else.

iago. Will you sup there?

cassio. Faith, I intend so.

iago. Well, I may chance to see you, for I would very fain speak with you.

cassio. Prithee, come. Will you?

iago. Go to.¡ Say no more. [Exit cassio.]

othello [advancing]. How shall I murder him, Iago?

iago. Did you perceive how he laughed at his vice?

othello. O, Iago!

iago. And did you see the handkerchief?

othello. Was that mine?

iago. Yours, by this hand. And to see how he prizes the foolish woman your wife! She gave it him, and he hath given it his whore.

othello. I would have him nine years a-killing. A fine woman! A fair woman! A sweet woman!

iago. Nay, you must forget that.

othello. Ay, let her rot and perish, and be damned tonight, for she shall not live. No, my heart is turned to stone; I strike it, and it hurts my hand.

O, the world hath not a sweeter creature! She might lie by an emperor's side and command him tasks.

iago. Nay, that's not your way.¡

othello. Hang her! I do but say what she is. So delicate with her needle!

An admirable musician! O, she will sing the savageness out of a bear. Of so high and plenteous wit and invention!¡

iago. She's the worse for all this.

othello. O, a thousand, a thousand times! And then, of so gentle a condition!¡

iago. Ay, too gentle.¡

othello. Nay, that's certain. But yet the pity of it, Iago! O, Iago, the pity of it, Iago!

iago. If you are so fond¡ over her iniquity, give her patent¡ to offend, for if it touch not you it comes near nobody.

othello. I will chop her into messes.¡ Cuckold me?

iago. O, 'tis foul in her.

othello. With mine officer?

iago. That's fouler.

othello. Get me some poison, Iago, this night. I'll not expostulate with her, lest her body and beauty unprovide¡ my mind again. This night, Iago.

iago. Do it not with poison. Strangle her in her bed, even the bed she hath contaminated.

othello. Good, good! The justice of it pleases. Very good.

iago. And for Cassio, let me be his undertaker.¡ You shall hear more by midnight.

othello. Excellent good. [A trumpet within.] What trumpet is that same?

iago. I warrant, something from Venice.

Enter lodovico, desdemona, and attendants.

'Tis Lodovico. This comes from the Duke.

See, your wife's with him.

lodovico. God save you, worthy General!

othello. With all my heart,¡ sir.

lodovico [giving him a letter]. The Duke and the senators of Venice greet you.

othello. I kiss the instrument of their pleasures.

[He opens the letter, and reads.]

desdemona. And what's the news, good cousin Lodovico?

iago. I am very glad to see you, signor.

Welcome to Cyprus.

lodovico. I thank you. How does Lieutenant Cassio?

iago. Lives, sir.

desdemona. Cousin, there's fall'n between him and my lord

An unkind¡ breach; but you shall make all well.

othello. Are you sure of that?

desdemona. My lord?

othello [reads]. "This fail you not to do, as you will—"

lodovico. He did not call; he's busy in the paper.

Is there division twixt my lord and Cassio?

desdemona. A most unhappy one. I would do much

T’ atone¡ them, for the love I bear to Cassio.

othello. Fire and brimstone!

desdemona. My lord?

othello. Are you wise?

desdemona. What, is he angry?

lodovico. Maybe the letter moved him;

For, as I think, they do command him home,

Deputing Cassio in his government.¡

desdemona. By my troth, I am glad on ’t.¡

othello. Indeed?

desdemona. My lord?

othello. I am glad to see you mad.¡

desdemona. Why, sweet Othello—othello [striking her]. Devil!

desdemona. I have not deserved this.

lodovico. My lord, this would not be believed in Venice,

Though I should swear I saw ’t. ’Tis very much.¡

Make her amends; she weeps.

othello. O devil, devil!

If that the earth could teem¡ with woman’s tears,

Each drop she falls would prove a crocodile.¡

Out of my sight!

desdemona. I will not stay to offend you. [Going.]

lodovico. Truly, an obedient lady.

I do beseech your lordship, call her back.

othello. Mistress!

desdemona [returning]. My lord?

othello. What would you with her, sir?¡

lodovico: Who, I, my lord?

othello. Ay, you did wish that I would make her turn.

Sir, she can turn, and turn, and yet go on

And turn again; and she can weep, sir, weep;

And she's obedient,¡ as you say, obedient,

Very obedient.—Proceed you in your tears.—

Concerning this, sir—O well-painted passion!¡—

I am commanded home.—Get you away;

I'll send for you anon.—Sir, I obey the mandate

And will return to Venice.—Hence, avaunt!

[Exit desdemona.]

Cassio shall have my place. And, sir, tonight

I do entreat that we may sup together.

You are welcome, sir, to Cyprus.—Goats and monkeys!¡ Exit.

lodovico. Is this the noble Moor whom our full Senate

Call all in all sufficient? Is this the nature

Whom passion could not shake? Whose solid virtue

The shot of accident nor dart of chance

Could neither graze nor pierce?

iago. He is much changed.

lodovico. Are his wits safe? Is he not light of brain?

iago. He's that he is. I may not breathe my censure

What he might be. If what he might he is not,

I would to heaven he were!¡

lodovico. What, strike his wife?

iago. Faith, that was not so well; yet would I knew

That stroke would prove the worst!

lodovico. Is it his use?¡

Or did the letters work upon his blood¡

And new-create his fault?

iago. Alas, alas!

It is not honesty in me to speak

What I have seen and known. You shall observe him,

And his own courses will denote¡ him so

That I may save my speech. Do but go after,

And mark how he continues.

lodovico. I am sorry that I am deceived in him. Exeunt.

4.2 Enter othello and emilia othello. You have seen nothing then?

emilia. Nor ever heard, nor ever did suspect.

othello. Yes, you have seen Cassio and she together.

emilia. But then I saw no harm, and then I heard

Each syllable that breath made up between them.

othello. What, did they never whisper?

emilia. Never, my lord.

othello. Nor send you out o' the way?

emilia. Never.

othello. To fetch her fan, her gloves, her mask, nor nothing?

emilia. Never, my lord.

othello. That's strange.

emilia. I durst, my lord, to wager she is honest,

Lay down my soul at stake.¡ If you think other,

Remove your thought; it doth abuse your bosom.¡

If any wretch have put this in your head,

Let heaven requite it with the serpent's curse!¡

For if she be not honest, chaste, and true,

There's no man happy; the purest of their wives

Is foul as slander.

othello. Bid her come hither. Go.

Exit emilia.

She says enough; yet she's a simple bawd

That cannot say as much.¡ This¡ is a subtle whore,

A closet lock and key¡ of villainous secrets.

And yet she'll kneel and pray; I have seen her do 't.

Enter desdemona and emilia.

desdemona. My lord, what is your will?

othello. Pray you, chuck, come hither.

desdemona. What is your pleasure?

othello. Let me see your eyes.

Look in my face.

desdemona. What horrible fancy's this?

othello [to emilia]. Some of your function,¡ mistress.

Leave procreants¡ alone and shut the door;

Cough or cry "hem" if anybody come.

Your mystery, your mystery!¡ Nay, dispatch.

Exit emilia.

desdemona [kneeling]. Upon my knees, what doth your speech import?

I understand a fury in your words,

But not the words.

othello. Why, what art thou?

desdemona. Your wife, my lord, your true

And loyal wife.

othello. Come, swear it, damn thyself,

Lest, being like one of heaven,¡ the devils themselves

Should fear to seize thee. Therefore be double damned:

Swear thou art honest.

desdemona. Heaven doth truly know it.

othello. Heaven truly knows that thou art false as hell.

desdemona. To whom, my lord? With whom? How am I false?

othello [weeping]. Ah, Desdemon! Away, away, away!

desdemona. Alas the heavy day! Why do you weep?

Am I the motive¡ of these tears, my lord?

If haply you my father do suspect

An instrument of this your calling back,

Lay not your blame on me. If you have lost him,

I have lost him too.

othello. Had it pleased heaven

To try me with affliction, had they¡ rained

All kinds of sores and shames on my bare head,

Steeped me in poverty to the very lips,

Given to captivity me and my utmost hopes,

I should have found in some place of my soul

A drop of patience. But, alas, to make me

A fix d figure for the time of scorn¡

To point his¡ slow and moving finger¡ at!

Yet could I bear that too, well, very well.

But there where I have garnered¡ up my heart,

Where either I must live or bear no life,

The fountain¡ from the which my current runs

Or else dries up—to be discarded thence!
Or keep it as a cistern¡ for foul toads
To knot¡ and gender¡ in! Turn thy complexion there,¡ Patience, thou young and rose-lipped cherubin—
Ay, there look grim as hell!¡

desdemona. I hope my noble lord esteems me honest.¡

othello. O, ay, as summer flies are in the shambles,¡
That quicken¡ even with blowing.¡ O thou weed,
Who art so lovely fair and smell'st so sweet
That the sense aches at thee, would thou hadst ne'er been born!

desdemona. Alas, what ignorant¡ sin have I committed?

othello. Was this fair paper, this most goodly book,
Made to write "whore" upon? What committed?
Committed? O thou public commoner!¡
I should make very forges of my cheeks,
That would to cinders burn up modesty,
Did I but speak thy deeds. What committed?
Heaven stops the nose at it and the moon winks;¡
The bawdy¡ wind, that kisses all it meets,
Is hushed within the hollow mine¡ of earth
And will not hear 't. What committed?
Impudent strumpet!

desdemona. By heaven, you do me wrong.

othello. Are not you a strumpet?

desdemona. No, as I am a Christian.
If to preserve this vessel¡ for my lord
From any other foul unlawful touch
Be not to be a strumpet, I am none.

othello. What, not a whore?

desdemona. No, as I shall be saved.

othello. Is't possible?

desdemona. O, heaven forgive us!

othello. I cry you mercy,¡ then.
I took you for that cunning whore of Venice
That married with Othello. [Calling out.] You, mistress,
That have the office opposite to Saint Peter
And keep the gate of hell!
[Enter emilia]
You, you, ay, you!
We have done our course.¡ There's money for your pains.
[He gives money.]
I pray you, turn the key and keep our counsel. Exit.

emilia. Alas, what does this gentleman conceive?¡
How do you, madam? How do you, my good lady!

desdemona. Faith, half asleep.¡

emilia. Good madam, what's the matter with my lord?

desdemona. With who?

emilia. Why, with my lord, madam.

desdemona. Who is thy lord?

emilia. He that is yours, sweet lady.

desdemona. I have none. Do not talk to me, Emilia.
I cannot weep, nor answers have I none
But what should go by water.¡ Prithee, tonight
Lay on my bed my wedding sheets, remember;
And call thy husband hither.

emilia. Here's a change indeed! Exit.

desdemona. ’Tis meet I should be used so, very meet.¡

How have I been behaved, that he might stick¡

The small’st opinion¡ on my least misuse?¡

Enter iago and emilia.

iago. What is your pleasure, madam? How is ’t with you?

desdemona. I cannot tell. Those that do teach young babes

Do it with gentle means and easy tasks.

He might have chid me so, for, in good faith,

I am a child to chiding.

iago. What is the matter, lady?

emilia. Alas, Iago, my lord hath so bewhored her,

Thrown such despite and heavy terms upon her,

That true hearts cannot bear it.

desdemona. Am I that name, Iago?

iago. What name, fair lady?

desdemona. Such as she said my lord did say I was.

emilia. He called her whore. A beggar in his drink

Could not have laid such terms upon his callet.¡

iago. Why did he so?

desdemona [weeping]. I do not know. I am sure I am none such.

iago. Do not weep, do not weep. Alas the day!

emilia. Hath she forsook so many noble matches,

Her father and her country and her friends,

To be called whore? Would it not make one weep?

desdemona. It is my wretched fortune.

iago. Beshrew¡ him for ’t!

How comes this trick¡ upon him?

desdemona. Nay, heaven doth know.

emilia. I will be hanged if some eternal¡ villain,

Some busy and insinuating¡ rogue,

Some cogging,¡ cozening¡ slave, to get some office,

Have not devised this slander. I will be hanged else.

iago. Fie, there is no such man. It is impossible.

desdemona. If any such there be, heaven pardon him!

emilia. A halter¡ pardon him! And hell gnaw his bones!

Why should he call her whore? Who keeps her company?

What place? What time? What form?¡ What likelihood?

The Moor's abused by some most villainous knave,

Some base notorious knave, some scurvy fellow.

O heaven, that¡ such companions¡ thou'dst unfold,¡

And put in every honest hand a whip

To lash the rascals naked through the world

Even from the east to th' west!

iago. Speak within door.¡

emilia. O, fie upon them! Some such squire¡ he was

That turned your wit the seamy side without¡

And made you to suspect me with the Moor.

iago. You are a fool. Go to.¡

desdemona. Alas, Iago,

What shall I do to win my lord again?

Good friend, go to him; for, by this light of heaven,

I know not how I lost him. Here I kneel. [She kneels.]

If e'er my will did trespass 'gainst his love,

Either in discourse¡ of thought or actual deed,

Or that¡ mine eyes, mine ears, or any sense

Delighted them¡ in any other form;

Or that I do not yet,¡ and ever did,

And ever will—though he do shake me off

To beggarly divorcement—love him dearly,

Comfort forswear¡ me! Unkindness may do much,

And his unkindness may defeat¡ my life,

But never taint my love. I cannot say “whore.”

It does abhor¡ me now I speak the word;

To do the act that might the addition¡ earn

Not the world’s mass of vanity¡ could make me.

[She rises.]

iago. I pray you, be content. ’Tis but his humor.¡

The business of the state does him offense,

And he does chide with you.

desdemona. If ’twere no other—iago. It is but so, I warrant. [Trumpets within.]

Hark, how these instruments summon you to supper!

The messengers of Venice stays the meat.¡

Go in, and weep not. All things shall be well.

Exeunt desdemona and emilia.

Enter roderigo.

How now, Roderigo?

roderigo. I do not find that thou deal’st justly with me.

iago. What in the contrary?

roderigo. Every day thou daff’st me¡ with some device,¡ Iago, and rather, as it seems to me now, keep’st from me all conveniency¡ than suppliest me with the least advantage¡ of hope. I will indeed no longer endure it, nor am I yet persuaded to put up¡ in peace what already I have foolishly suffered.

iago. Will you hear me, Roderigo?

roderigo. Faith, I have heard too much, for your words and performances are no kin together.

iago. You charge me most unjustly.

roderigo. With naught but truth. I have wasted myself out of my means. The jewels you have had from me to deliver¡ Desdemona would half have corrupted a votarist.¡ You have told me she hath received them and returned me expectations and comforts of sudden respect¡ and acquaintance, but I find none.

iago. Well, go to, very well.

roderigo. “Very well”! “Go to”! I cannot go to,¡ man, nor ’tis not very well. By this hand, I think it is scurvy, and begin to find myself fopped¡ in it.

iago. Very well.

roderigo. I tell you ’tis not very well.¡ I will make myself known to Desdemona. If she will return me my jewels, I will give over my suit and repent my unlawful solicitation; if not, assure yourself I will seek satisfaction¡ of you.

iago. You have said now?¡

roderigo. Ay, and said nothing but what I protest intendment¡ of doing.

iago. Why, now I see there’s mettle in thee, and even from this instant do build on thee a better opinion than ever before. Give me thy hand, Roderigo. Thou hast taken against me a most just exception; but yet I protest I have dealt most directly in thy affair.

roderigo. It hath not appeared.

iago. I grant indeed it hath not appeared, and your suspicion is not without wit and judgment. But, Roderigo, if thou hast that in thee indeed which I have greater reason to believe now than ever—I mean purpose, courage, and valor—this night show it. If thou the next night following enjoy not Desdemona, take me from this world with treachery and devise engines for¡ my life.

roderigo. Well, what is it? Is it within reason and compass?

iago. Sir, there is especial commission come from Venice to depute Cassio in Othello’s place.

roderigo. Is that true? Why, then Othello and Desdemona return again to Venice.

iago. O, no; he goes into Mauritania and takes away with him the fair Desdemona, unless his abode be lingered here by some accident; wherein none can be so determinate¡ as the removing of Cassio.

roderigo. How do you mean, removing of him?

iago. Why, by making him uncapable of Othello's place—knocking out his brains.

roderigo. And that you would have me to do?

iago. Ay, if you dare do yourself a profit and a right. He sups tonight with a harlotry,¡ and thither will I go to him. He knows not yet of his honorable fortune. If you will watch his going thence, which I will fashion to fall out¡ between twelve and one, you may take him at your pleasure. I will be near to second your attempt, and he shall fall between us. Come, stand not amazed at it, but go along with me. I will show you such a necessity in his death that you shall think yourself bound to put it on him. It is now high¡ suppertime, and the night grows to waste.¡ About it.

roderigo. I will hear further reason for this.

iago. And you shall be satisfied. Exeunt.

4.3 Enter othello, lodovico, desdemona, emilia, and attendants.

lodovico. I do beseech you, sir, trouble yourself no further.

othello. O, pardon me; 'twill do me good to walk.

lodovico. Madam, good night. I humbly thank your ladyship.

desdemona. Your honor is most welcome.

othello. Will you walk, sir?
O, Desdemona!

desdemona. My lord?

othello. Get you to bed on th' instant.

I will be returned forthwith. Dismiss your attendant there. Look ’t be done.

desdemona. I will, my lord.

Exit [othello, with lodovico and attendants].

emilia. How goes it now? He looks gentler than he did.

desdemona. He says he will return incontinent,¡

And hath commanded me to go to bed,

And bid me to dismiss you.

emilia. Dismiss me?

desdemona. It was his bidding. Therefore, good Emilia,

Give me my nightly wearing, and adieu.

We must not now displease him.

emilia. I would you had never seen him!

desdemona. So would not I. My love doth so approve him

That even his stubbornness,¡ his checks,¡ his frowns—

Prithee, unpin me—have grace and favor in them.

[emilia prepares desdemona for bed.]

emilia. I have laid those sheets you bade me on the bed.

desdemona. All’s one.¡ Good faith, how foolish are our minds!

If I do die before thee, prithee shroud me

In one of these same sheets.

emilia. Come, come, you talk.¡

desdemona. My mother had a maid called Barbary.

She was in love, and he she loved proved mad¡

And did forsake her. She had a song of “Willow.”

An old thing ’twas, but it expressed her fortune,

And she died singing it. That song tonight

Will not go from my mind; I have much to do

But to go hang¡ my head all at one side

And sing it like poor Barbary. Prithee, dispatch.

emilia. Shall I go fetch your nightgown?¡

desdemona. No, unpin me here.

This Lodovico is a proper¡ man.

emilia. A very handsome man.

desdemona. He speaks well.

emilia. I know a lady in Venice would have walked barefoot to Palestine for a touch of his nether lip.

desdemona. [singing]:

"The poor soul sat sighing by a sycamore tree,
Sing all a green willow;¡
Her hand on her bosom, her head on her knee,
Sing willow, willow, willow.
The fresh streams ran by her and murmured her moans;
Sing willow, willow, willow;
Her salt tears fell from her, and softened the stones—"

Lay by these.

[Singing.] "Sing willow, willow, willow—"

Prithee, hie thee.¡ He'll come anon.¡

[Singing.] "Sing all a green willow must be my garland.
Let nobody blame him; his scorn I approve—"

Nay, that's not next.—Hark! Who is 't that knocks?

emilia. It's the wind.

desdemona [singing].

"I called my love false love; but what said he then?
Sing willow, willow, willow;
If I court more women, you'll couch with more men."

So, get thee gone. Good night. Mine eyes do itch;

Doth that bode weeping?

emilia. 'Tis neither here nor there.

desdemona. I have heard it said so. O, these men, these men!

Dost thou in conscience think—tell me, Emilia—

That there be women do abuse¡ their husbands

In such gross kind?

emilia. There be some such, no question.

desdemona. Wouldst thou do such a deed for all the world?

emilia. Why, would not you?

desdemona. No, by this heavenly light!

emilia. Nor I neither by this heavenly light;

I might do 't as well i' the dark.

desdemona. Wouldst thou do such a deed for all the world?

emilia. The world's a huge thing. It is a great price

For a small vice.

desdemona. Good troth, I think thou wouldst not.

emilia. By my troth, I think I should, and undo 't when I had done. Marry, I would not do such a thing for a joint ring,¡ nor for measures of lawn,¡ nor for gowns, petticoats, nor caps, nor any petty exhibition.¡ But for all the whole world! Uds¡ pity, who would not make her husband a cuckold to make him a monarch? I should venture purgatory for 't.

desdemona. Beshrew me if I would do such a wrong

For the whole world.

emilia. Why, the wrong is but a wrong i' the world, and having the world for your labor, 'tis a wrong in your own world, and you might quickly make it right.

desdemona. I do not think there is any such woman.

emilia. Yes, a dozen, and as many

To th' vantage¡ as would store¡ the world they played¡ for.

But I do think it is their husbands' faults
If wives do fall. Say that they slack their duties¡
And pour our treasures into foreign laps,¡
Or else break out in peevish jealousies,
Throwing restraint upon us? Or say they strike us,¡
Or scant our former having in despite?¡
Why, we have galls,¡ and though we have some grace, Yet have we some revenge. Let husbands know
Their wives have sense¡ like them. They see, and smell,
And have their palates both for sweet and sour,
As husbands have. What is it that they do
When they change us for others? Is it sport?¡
I think it is. And doth affection¡ breed it?
I think it doth. Is 't frailty that thus errs?
It is so, too. And have not we affections, Desires for sport, and frailty, as men have?
Then let them use us well; else let them know,
The ills we do, their ills instruct us so.

desdemona. Good night, good night. God me such uses¡ send
Not to pick bad from bad, but by bad mend!¡
Exeunt.

5.1 Enter iago and roderigo.

iago. Here stand behind this bulk.¡ Straight will he come.
Wear thy good rapier bare,¡ and put it home.
Quick, quick! Fear nothing. I'll be at thy elbow.
It makes us or it mars us. Think on that,
And fix most firm thy resolution.

roderigo. Be near at hand. I may miscarry in ’t.

iago. Here, at thy hand. Be bold, and take thy stand.

[iago stands aside. roderigo conceals himself.]

roderigo. I have no great devotion to the deed;

And yet he hath given me satisfying reasons.

’Tis but a man gone. Forth, my sword! He dies.

[He draws.]

iago. I have rubbed this young quat¡ almost to the sense,¡

And he grows angry. Now, whether he kill Cassio

Or Cassio him, or each do kill the other,

Every way makes my gain. Live Roderigo,¡

He calls me to a restitution large

Of gold and jewels that I bobbed¡ from him

As gifts to Desdemona.

It must not be. If Cassio do remain,

He hath a daily beauty in his life

That makes me ugly; and besides, the Moor

May unfold¡ me to him; there stand I in much peril.

No, he must die. Be ’t so. I hear him coming.

Enter cassio.

roderigo [coming forth]. I know his gait, ’tis he.—Villain, thou diest!

[He attacks cassio]

cassio. That thrust had been mine enemy indeed,

But that my coat¡ is better than thou know’st.

I will make proof¡ of thine.

[He draws, and wounds roderigo.]

roderigo. O, I am slain! [He falls.]

[iago from behind, wounds cassio in the leg, and exits.]

cassio. I am maimed forever. Help, ho! Murder! Murder!

Enter othello.

othello. The voice of Cassio! Iago keeps his word.

roderigo. O, villain that I am!

othello. It is even so.

cassio. O, help, ho! Light! A surgeon!

othello. 'Tis he. O brave Iago, honest and just,
That hast such noble sense of thy friend's wrong!
Thou teachest me. Minion,¡ your dear lies dead,
And your unblest fate hies.¡ Strumpet, I come.
Forth of¡ my heart those charms, thine eyes are blotted;
Thy bed, lust-stained, shall with lust's blood be spotted.

Exit othello.

Enter lodovico and gratiano.

cassio. What ho! No watch? No passage?¡ Murder! Murder!

gratiano. ÔTis some mischance. The voice is very direful.

cassio. O, help!

lodovico. Hark!

roderigo. O wretched villain!

lodovico. Two or three groan. 'Tis heavy¡ night;
These may be counterfeits. Let's think 't unsafe
To come in to¡ the cry without more help.

[They remain near the entrance.]

roderigo. Nobody come? Then shall I bleed to death.

Enter iago [in his shirtsleeves, with a light].

lodovico. Hark!

gratiano. Here's one comes in his shirt, with light and weapons.

iago. Who's there? Whose noise is this that cries on¡ murder?

lodovico. We do not know.

iago. Did not you hear a cry?

cassio. Here, here! For heaven's sake, help me!

iago. What's the matter?

[He moves toward cassio.]

gratiano [to lodovico]. This is Othello's ancient, as I take it.

lodovico [to gratiano]. The same indeed, a very valiant fellow.

iago [to cassio]. What¡ are you here that cry so grievously?

cassio. Iago? O, I am spoiled,¡ undone by villains!

Give me some help.

iago. O me, Lieutenant! What villains have done this?

cassio. I think that one of them is hereabout,

And cannot make¡ away.

iago. O treacherous villains!

[To lodovico and gratiano.]

What are you there? Come in, and give some help. [They advance.]

roderigo. O, help me there!

cassio. That's one of them.

iago. O murderous slave! O villain!

[He stabs roderigo.]

roderigo. O damned Iago! O inhuman dog!

iago. Kill men i' the dark?—Where be these bloody thieves?—

How silent is this town!—Ho! Murder, murder!—

[To lodovico and gratiano.] What may you be? Are you of good or evil?

lodovico. As you shall prove us, praise¡ us.

iago. Signor Lodovico?

lodovico. He, sir.

iago. I cry you mercy.¡ Here's Cassio hurt by villains.

gratiano. Cassio?

iago. How is 't, brother?

cassio. My leg is cut in two.

iago. Marry, heaven forbid!

Light, gentlemen! I'll bind it with my shirt.

[He hands them the light, and tends to cassio's wound.]

Enter bianca.

bianca. What is the matter, ho? Who is 't that cried?

iago. Who is 't that cried?

bianca. O my dear Cassio!

My sweet Cassio! O Cassio, Cassio, Cassio!

iago. O notable strumpet! Cassio, may you suspect

Who they should be that have thus mangled you?

cassio. No.

gratiano. I am sorry to find you thus. I have been to seek you.

iago. Lend me a garter. [He applies a tourniquet.] So.—O, for a chair,¡

To bear him easily hence!

bianca. Alas, he faints! O Cassio, Cassio, Cassio!

iago. Gentlemen all, I do suspect this trash

To be a party in this injury.—

Patience awhile, good Cassio.—Come, come;

Lend me a light. [He shines the light on roderigo.]

Know we this face or no?

Alas, my friend and my dear countryman

Roderigo! No.—Yes, sure.—O heaven! Roderigo!

gratiano. What, of Venice?

iago. Even he, sir. Did you know him?

gratiano. Know him? Ay.

iago. Signor Gratiano? I cry your gentle¡ pardon.
These bloody accidents¡ must excuse my manners
That so neglected you.

gratiano. I am glad to see you.

iago. How do you, Cassio? O, a chair, a chair!

gratiano. Roderigo!

iago. He, he, 'tis he. [A litter is brought in.] O, that's well said;¡ the chair.
Some good man bear him carefully from hence;
I'll fetch the General's surgeon. [To bianca.] For you, mistress,
Save you your labor.¡—He that lies slain here, Cassio,
Was my dear friend. What malice¡ was between you?

cassio. None in the world, nor do I know the man.

iago [to bianca]. What, look you pale?—O, bear him out o' th' air.¡
[cassio and roderigo are borne off.]
Stay you,¡ good gentlemen.—Look you pale, mistress?—
Do you perceive the gastness¡ of her eye?—
Nay, if you stare,¡ we shall hear more anon.—
Behold her well; I pray you, look upon her.
Do you see, gentlemen? Nay, guiltiness
Will speak, though tongues were out of use.
[Enter emilia.]

emilia. ÔLas, what's the matter? What's the matter, husband?

iago. Cassio hath here been set on in the dark
By Roderigo and fellows that are scaped.
He's almost slain, and Roderigo dead.

emilia. Alas, good gentleman! Alas, good Cassio!

iago. This is the fruits of whoring. Prithee, Emilia,

Go know¡ of Cassio where he supped tonight.

[To bianca.] What, do you shake at that?

bianca. He supped at my house, but I therefore shake not.

iago. O, did he so? I charge you go with me.

emilia. O, fie upon thee, strumpet!

bianca. I am no strumpet, but of life as honest¡

As you that thus abuse me.

emilia. As I? Faugh! Fie upon thee!

iago. Kind gentlemen, let's go see poor Cassio dressed.¡—

Come, mistress, you must tell's another tale.

Emilia, run you to the citadel

And tell my lord and lady what hath happed.—

Will you go on afore? [Aside.] This is the night

That either makes me or fordoes¡ me quite. Exeunt.

5.2 Enter othello [with a light], and desdemona in her bed.

othello. It is the cause,¡ it is the cause, my soul.

Let me not name it to you, you chaste stars!

It is the cause. Yet I'll not shed her blood,

Nor scar that whiter skin of hers than snow,

And smooth as monumental¡ alabaster.

Yet she must die, else she'll betray more men.

Put out the light, and then put out the light.¡

If I quench thee, thou flaming minister,¡

I can again thy former light restore,

Should I repent me;¡ but once put out thy light,

Thou cunning'st pattern¡ of excelling nature,

I know not where is that Promethean heat¡

That can thy light relume.¡ When I have plucked thy rose,
I cannot give it vital growth again;
It needs must wither. I'll smell thee on the tree.
[He kisses her.]
O balmy breath, that dost almost persuade Justice to break her sword! One more, one more.
Be thus when thou art dead, and I will kill thee,
And love thee after. One more, and that's the last.
[He kisses her.]
So sweet was ne'er so fatal. I must weep,
But they are cruel¡ tears. This sorrow's heavenly;
It strikes where it doth love.¡ She wakes.

desdemona. Who's there? Othello?

othello. Ay, Desdemona.

desdemona. Will you come to bed, my lord?

othello. Have you prayed tonight, Desdemon?

desdemona. Ay, my lord.

othello. If you bethink yourself of any crime¡
Unreconciled as yet to heaven and grace, Solicit¡ for it straight.¡

desdemona. Alack, my lord, what may you mean by that?

othello. Well, do it, and be brief. I will walk by.
I would not kill thy unprepar d spirit.
No, heaven forfend!¡ I would not kill thy soul.

desdemona. Talk you of killing?

othello. Ay, I do.

desdemona. Then heaven
Have mercy on me!

othello. Amen, with all my heart!

desdemona. If you say so, I hope you will not kill me.

othello. Humh!

desdemona. And yet I fear you; for you're fatal then

When your eyes roll so. Why I should fear I know not,

Since guiltiness I know not; but yet I feel I fear.

othello. Think on thy sins.

desdemona. They are loves I bear to you.¡

othello. Ay, and for that thou diest.

desdemona. That death's unnatural that kills for loving.

Alas, why gnaw you so your nether lip?

Some bloody passion shakes your very frame.

These are portents; but yet I hope, I hope,

They do not point on¡ me.

othello. Peace, and be still!

desdemona. I will so. What's the matter?

othello. That handkerchief which I so loved and gave thee

Thou gav'st to Cassio.

desdemona. No, by my life and soul!

Send for the man and ask him.

othello. Sweet soul, take heed, take heed of perjury.

Thou art on thy deathbed.

desdemona. Ay, but not yet to die.

othello. Yes, presently.¡

Therefore confess thee freely of thy sin;

For to deny each article with oath

Cannot remove nor choke the strong conception¡

That I do groan withal.¡ Thou art to die.

desdemona. Then Lord have mercy on me!

othello. I say, amen.

desdemona. And have you mercy too! I never did

Offend¡ you in my life; never loved Cassio

But with such general warranty¡ of heaven

As I might love. I never gave him token.

othello. By heaven, I saw my handkerchief in 's hand.

O perjured woman! Thou dost stone¡ my heart,

And makes me call what I intend to do

A murder, which I thought a sacrifice.

I saw the handkerchief.

desdemona. He found it, then.

I never gave it him. Send for him hither;

Let him confess a truth.

othello. He hath confessed.

desdemona. What, my lord?

othello. That he hath used thee.

desdemona. How? Unlawfully?

othello. Ay.

desdemona. He will not say so.

othello. No, his mouth is stopped;

Honest Iago hath ta'en order¡ for 't.

desdemona. O, my fear interprets. What, is he dead?

othello. Had all his hairs been lives, my great revenge

Had stomach for them all.

desdemona. Alas, he is betrayed and I undone! [She weeps.]

othello. Out, strumpet! Weep'st thou for him to my face?

desdemona. O, banish me, my lord, but kill me not!

othello. Down, strumpet!

desdemona. Kill me tomorrow; let me live tonight!

othello. Nay, if you strive—desdemona. But half an hour!

othello. Being done,¡ there is no pause.

desdemona. But while I say one prayer!

othello. It is too late.

Smothers her,

emilia [at the door]. My lord, my lord! What, ho! My lord, my lord!

othello. What noise is this? Not dead? Not yet quite dead?

I that am cruel am yet merciful;

I would not have thee linger in thy pain.

[He dispatches her.]

So, so.

emilia [within]. What, ho! My lord, my lord!

othello. Who’s there?

emilia [within]. O, good my lord, I would speak a word with you!

othello. Yes, ’tis Emilia.—By and by.—She’s dead.

’Tis like¡ she comes to speak of Cassio’s death.—

The noise was here.¡ Ha! No more moving?

Still as the grave. Shall she come in? Were ’t good?—

I think she stirs again. No. What’s best to do?

If she come in, she’ll sure speak to my wife,

My wife! My wife! What wife? I have no wife.

O, insupportable! O heavy hour!

Methinks it should be now a huge eclipse

Of sun and moon, and that th’ affrighted globe

Should yawn¡ at alteration.¡

emilia [within]. I do beseech you

That I may speak with you, O, good my lord!

othello. I had forgot thee. O, come in, Emilia.—

Soft,¡ by and by. Let me the curtains draw.—

[He closes the bed-curtains and opens the door.]

Where art thou?

Enter emilia.

What’s the matter with thee now?

emilia. O, my good lord, yonder’s foul murders done!

othello. What, now?

emilia. But now, my lord.

othello. It is the very error¡ of the moon;

She comes more nearer earth than she was wont,

And makes men mad.

emilia. Cassio, my lord, hath killed a young Venetian

Called Roderigo.

othello. Roderigo killed?

And Cassio killed?

emilia. No, Cassio is not killed.

othello. Not Cassio killed? Then murder’s out of tune,

And sweet revenge grows harsh.

desdemona. O, falsely, falsely murdered!

emilia. O Lord, what cry is that?

othello. That? What?

emilia. Out¡ and alas, that was my lady’s voice.

[She opens the bed-curtains.]

Help, help, ho, help! O lady, speak again!

Sweet Desdemona! O sweet mistress, speak!

desdemona. A guiltless death I die.

emilia. O, who hath done this deed?

desdemona. Nobody; I myself. Farewell.

Commend me to my kind lord. O, farewell! [She dies.]

othello. Why, how should she be murdered?

emilia. Alas, who knows?

othello. You heard her say herself it was not I.

emilia. She said so. I must needs report the truth.

othello. She's like a liar gone to burning hell!

'Twas I that killed her.

emilia. O, the more angel she,

And you the blacker devil!

othello. She turned to folly,¡ and she was a whore.

emilia. Thou dost belie¡ her, and thou art a devil.

othello. She was false as water.

emilia. Thou art rash as fire to say

That she was false. O, she was heavenly true!

othello. Cassio did top her. Ask thy husband else.¡

O, I were damned beneath all depth in hell

But that I did proceed upon just grounds

To this extremity. Thy husband knew it all.

emilia. My husband?

othello. Thy husband.

emilia. That she was false to wedlock?

othello. Ay, with Cassio. Nay, had she been true,

If heaven would make me such another world

Of one entire and perfect chrysolite,¡

I'd not have sold her for it.

emilia. My husband?

othello. Ay, ’twas he that told me on her first.

An honest man he is, and hates the slime

That sticks on filthy deeds.

emilia. My husband?

othello. What needs this iterance,¡ woman? I say thy husband.

emilia. O mistress, villainy hath made mocks with¡ love!

My husband say she was false?

othello. He, woman;

I say thy husband. Dost understand the word?

My friend, thy husband, honest, honest Iago.

emilia. If he say so, may his pernicious soul

Rot half a grain a day! He lies to th’ heart.

She was too fond of her most filthy bargain.

othello. Ha? [He draws.]

emilia. Do thy worst!

This deed of thine is no more worthy heaven

Than thou wast worthy her.

othello. Peace, you were best.¡

emilia. Thou hast not half that power to do me harm

As I have to be hurt.¡ O gull!¡ O dolt!

As ignorant as dirt! Thou hast done a deed—

I care not for thy sword; I’ll make thee known,

Though I lost twenty lives.—Help! Help, ho, help!

The Moor hath killed my mistress! Murder, murder!

Enter montano, gratiano, and iago montano. What is the matter? How now, General?

emilia. O, are you come, Iago? You have done well,

That men must lay their murders on your neck.

gratiano. What is the matter?

emilia [to iago]. Disprove this villain, if thou be’st a man.

He says thou toldst him that his wife was false.

I know thou didst not; thou’rt not such a villain.

Speak, for my heart is full.

iago. I told him what I thought, and told no more Than what he found himself was apt¡ and true.

emilia. But did you ever tell him she was false?

iago. I did.

emilia. You told a lie, an odious, damn d lie!

Upon my soul, a lie, a wicked lie.

She false with Cassio? Did you say with Cassio?

iago. With Cassio, mistress. Go to, charm¡ your tongue.

emilia. I will not charm my tongue; I am bound to speak.

My mistress here lies murdered in her bed—

all. O heavens forfend!

emilia. And your reports have set the murder on.

othello. Nay, stare not, masters. It is true indeed.

gratiano. ’Tis a strange truth.

montano. O monstrous act!

emilia. Villainy, villainy, villainy!

I think upon ’t—I think I smell ’t! O villainy!

I thought so then¡—I’ll kill myself for grief—

O villainy, villainy!

iago. What, are you mad? I charge you, get you home.

emilia. Good gentlemen, let me have leave to speak.

’Tis proper I obey him, but not now.

Perchance, Iago, I will ne’er go home.

othello. O! O! O! [othello falls on the bed.¡] emilia. Nay, lay thee down and roar,

For thou hast killed the sweetest innocent

That e’er did lift up eye.¡

othello [rising]. O, she was foul!

I scarce did know you, uncle. There lies your niece,

Whose breath indeed these hands have newly stopped.

I know this act shows¡ horrible and grim.

gratiano. Poor Desdemon! I am glad thy father’s dead.

Thy match was mortal to him, and pure grief

Shore his old thread¡ in twain. Did he live now,

This sight would make him do a desperate turn,¡

Yea, curse his better angel from his side,

And fall to reprobance.¡

othello. ’Tis pitiful. But yet Iago knows

That she with Cassio hath the act of shame

A thousand times committed. Cassio confessed it;

And she did gratify¡ his amorous works

With that recognizance¡ and pledge of love

Which I first gave her. I saw it in his hand;

It was a handkerchief, an antique token

My father gave my mother.

emilia. O God! O heavenly God!

iago. Zounds, hold your peace.

emilia. ’Twill out, ’twill out! I peace?

No, I will speak as liberal as the north.¡

Let heaven and men and devils, let them all,

All, all, cry shame against me, yet I'll speak.

iago. Be wise, and get you home.

emilia. I will not.

[iago threatens emilia.]

gratiano. Fie

Your sword upon a woman?

emilia. O thou dull Moor! That handkerchief thou speak'st of

I found by fortune and did give my husband;

For often, with a solemn earnestness,

More than indeed belonged¡ to such a trifle,

He begged of me to steal 't.

iago. Villainous whore!

emilia. She give it Cassio? No, alas! I found it,

And I did give 't my husband.

iago. Filth, thou liest!

emilia. By heaven, I do not, I do not, gentlemen.

O murderous coxcomb!¡ What should such a fool

Do with so good a wife?

othello. Are there no stones¡ in heaven

But what serves for the thunder?—Precious¡ villain!

[He runs at iago; montano disarms othello. iago, from behind, stabs emilia.¡] gratiano. The woman falls! Sure he hath killed his wife.

emilia. Ay, ay. O, lay me by my mistress' side.

Exit [iago.]

gratiano. He's gone, but his wife's killed.

montano. 'Tis a notorious villain. Take you this weapon,

Which I have here recovered from the Moor.

Come, guard the door without. Let him not pass,

But kill him rather. I'll after that same villain,

For 'tis a damn d slave.

Exit [with all but othello and emilia, who has been laid by desdemona's side].

othello. I am not valiant neither,

But every puny whipster¡ gets my sword.

But why should honor¡ outlive honesty?¡

Let it go all.

emilia. What did thy song bode, lady?

Hark, canst thou hear me? I will play the swan,

And die in music. [She sings.] "Willow, willow, willow."

Moor, she was chaste. She loved thee, cruel Moor.

So come my soul to bliss as I speak true.

So speaking as I think, alas, I die. [She dies.]

othello. I have another weapon in this chamber;

It was a sword of Spain, the ice-brook's temper¡—

O, here it is. [He finds a sword.] Uncle, I must come forth.

gratiano [within]. If thou attempt it, it will cost thee dear.

Thou hast no weapon, and perforce must suffer.

othello. Look in upon me then and speak with me,

Or, naked¡ as I am, I will assault thee.

[Enter gratiano.]

gratiano. What is the matter?

othello. Behold, I have a weapon;

A better never did itself sustain

Upon a soldier's thigh. I have seen the day

That, with this little arm and this good sword,

I have made my way through more impediments

Than twenty times your stop.¡ But O, vain boast!

Who can control his fate? 'Tis not so now.

Be not afraid, though you do see me weaponed;

Here is my journey's end, here is my butt¡

And very seamark¡ of my utmost sail.

[gratiano steps back.]

Do you go back dismayed? 'Tis a lost¡ fear;

Man but a rush¡ against Othello's breast

And he retires. Where should Othello go?

[He turns to desdemona.]

Now, how dost thou look now? O ill-starred wench!

Pale as thy smock! When we shall meet at compt,¡

This look of thine will hurl my soul from heaven,

And fiends will snatch at it. Cold, cold, my girl?

Even like thy chastity. O curs d, curs d slave!¡

Whip me, ye devils,

From the possession of this heavenly sight!

Blow me about in winds! Roast me in sulfur!

Wash me in steep-down gulfs of liquid fire!

O Desdemon! Dead, Desdemon! Dead! O! O!

Enter lodovico, cassio [carried in a litter¡], montano, and iago [prisoner], with officers.

lodovico. Where is this rash and most unfortunate man?

othello. That's he that was Othello. Here I am.

lodovico. Where is that viper? Bring the villain forth.

[iago is led forward.]

othello. I look down towards his feet;¡ but that's a fable.

If that thou be'st a devil, I cannot kill thee.

[He wounds iago.]

lodovico. Wrench his sword from him. [othello is disarmed.]

iago. I bleed, sir, but not killed.

othello. I am not sorry neither. I'd have thee live,

For in my sense¡ 'tis happiness to die.

lodovico. O thou Othello, that was once so good,

Fall'n in the practice¡ of a curs d slave,¡

What shall be said to thee?

othello. Why, anything.

An honorable murderer, if you will,

For naught I did in hate, but all in honor.

lodovico. This wretch hath part confessed his villainy.

Did you and he consent¡ in Cassio's death?

othello. Ay.

cassio. Dear General, I never gave you cause.

othello. I do believe it, and I ask your pardon.

Will you, I pray, demand that demi-devil

Why he hath thus ensnared my soul and body?

iago. Demand me nothing. What you know, you know.

From this time forth I never will speak word.

lodovico. What, not to pray?

gratiano. Torments¡ will ope your lips.

othello. Well, thou dost best.

lodovico. Sir, you shall understand what hath befall'n,

Which, as I think, you know not. Here is a letter

Found in the pocket of the slain Roderigo;

And here another. [He produces letters.] The one of them imports

The death of Cassio, to be undertook

By Roderigo.

othello. O villain!

cassio. Most heathenish and most gross!¡

lodovico [showing another paper]. Now here's another discontented¡ paper

Found in his pocket too. And this, it seems,

Roderigo meant t' have sent this damn d villain;

But that belike¡ Iago in the interim

Came in and satisfied him.¡

othello. O thou pernicious caitiff!—

How came you, Cassio, by that handkerchief

That was my wife's?

cassio. I found it in my chamber;

And he himself confessed but even now

That there he dropped it for a special purpose

Which wrought to his desire.¡

othello. O fool, fool, fool!

cassio. There is besides in Roderigo's letter

How he upbraids Iago, that he made him

Brave¡ me upon the watch, whereon it came¡

That I was cast;¡ and even but now he spake,

After long seeming dead, Iago hurt him,

Iago set him on.

lodovico [to othello]. You must forsake this room and go with us.

Your power and your command is taken off,¡

And Cassio rules in Cyprus. For this slave,

If there be any cunning cruelty

That can torment him much and hold him long,¡

It shall be his. You shall close prisoner rest¡

Till that the nature of your fault be known

To the Venetian state.—Come, bring away.

othello. Soft you;¡ a word or two before you go.

I have done the state some service, and they know ’t.

No more of that. I pray you, in your letters,

When you shall these unlucky¡ deeds relate,

Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate,

Nor set down aught in malice. Then must you speak

Of one that loved not wisely but too well;

Of one not easily jealous but, being wrought,¡

Perplexed¡ in the extreme; of one whose hand,

Like the base Indian,¡ threw a pearl away

Richer than all his tribe; of one whose subdued¡ eyes,

Albeit unus d to the melting mood,

Drops tears as fast as the Arabian trees

Their medicinable gum.¡ Set you down this;

And say besides that in Aleppo once,

Where a malignant and a turbaned Turk

Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,

I took by th’ throat the circumcis d dog

And smote him, thus. [He stabs himself.¡]

lodovico. O bloody period!¡

gratiano. All that is spoke is marred.

othello. I kissed thee ere I killed thee. No way but this,

Killing myself, to die upon a kiss.

[He kisses desdemona and] dies.

cassio. This did I fear, but thought he had no weapon;

For he was great of heart.

lodovico [to iago]. O Spartan dog,¡

More fell¡ than anguish, hunger, or the sea!

Look on the tragic loading of this bed.

This is thy work. The object poisons sight;

Let it be hid.¡ Gratiano, keep¡ the house,

[The bed curtains are drawn]

And seize upon¡ the fortunes of the Moor,

For they succeed on¡ you. [To cassio.] To you, Lord Governor,

Remains the censure¡ of this hellish villain,

The time, the place, the torture. O, enforce it!

Myself will straight aboard, and to the state

This heavy act with heavy heart relate. Exeunt.

Act 1

1. -Iago, contemptuous of dutiful servants, compares them in 1.1.49 to asses. What other animal images does he use in the first scene? In your view, what does the use of such images tell us about Iago?

2. -Is there any need to do more than knock loudly at Brabantio's door? What does 1.1.81–83 tell us about Iago?

3. -In 1.1.111ff., and in his next speech, Iago uses prose instead of blank verse. What effect do you think is gained?

4. -What is Iago trying to do to Othello in the first speech of 1.2? In 1.2.29 why does Iago urge Othello to "go in"? When Othello first speaks (1.2.6), does he speak as we might have expected him to, given Iago's earlier comments about Othello? In Othello's second speech is there anything that resembles Iago's earlier description of him?

5. -Do you think it incredible that a young woman who has rejected "the wealthy, curl d darlings" (1.2.69) of Venice should choose a Moor? Explain your view.

6. -Iago had said (1.1.14) that Othello uses "bombast circumstance." Is 1.3.130ff. an example? Why, or why not?

7. -Brabantio in 1.3.213–222 speaks in couplets (pairs of rhyming lines), as the Duke has just done. What is the effect of the verse? Does it suggest grief? Mockery?

8. -Do you think the love of Othello and Desdemona is impetuous and irrational? What is their love based on?

9. -The last speech in 1.3 is in verse, though previous speeches are in prose. How would you describe the effect of the change?

10. -Is it a fault that Othello “thinks men honest that but seem to be so” (1.3.379)?

Act 2

1. -In 2.1.1–17, Shakespeare introduces a description of a storm. What symbolic overtones, if any, do you think it may it have?

2. -What does Iago’s description (2.1.146–156) of a good woman tell us about his attitude toward goodness and women?

3. -In Iago’s last speech in this act he gives several reasons why he hates Othello. List them, and add to the list any reasons he gave earlier. Evaluate them carefully. How convincing are they?

4. -Again (2.1.262ff.) Shakespeare gives Iago verse, when alone, after prose dialogue. Why do you suppose he did this—i.e., what effect (if any) does the change have?

5. -In 2.3.13–21, what sort of thing is Iago trying to get Cassio to say?

6. -How does 2.3.178–191 prepare us for Othello’s later tragic deed of killing Desdemona?

Act 3

1. -What is the point of the repetition (3.3.106–142) of “thought,” “think,” “know,” and “honest”?

2. -Is it surprising that Othello speaks (3.3.194) of a goat? In later scenes keep an eye out for his use of animal imagery.

3. -Does one indeed smell “a will most rank” (3.3.248) in Desdemona’s choice? Or had her choice been based on other qualities? If you think the latter, explain.

4. -Emilia gets possession of the handkerchief by accident (3.3.306). Is it fair, then, to say that the tragic outcome is based on mere accident? And if so, is the play seriously weakened as a tragedy?

5. -In 3.4.65–71 Othello is, of course, talking about a handkerchief, but he is also asking for the restoration of love. What words apply especially to love?

Act 4

1. -In 4.1.35ff. Othello uses prose. What does this shift suggest about Othello's state of mind?
2. -Othello says (4.1.183) "I will chop her into messes. Cuckold me?" Do you think that in this scene Othello's ferocity toward Desdemona is chiefly motivated by a sense of personal injury? What if anything does Shakespeare do here to prevent the audience from merely loathing Othello?
3. -What is Othello's emotional state in the first nineteen lines of 4.2?
4. -In 4.2 Othello's baseness, very evident in the previous scene, continues here. But what lines in this scene tend to work against the view that he is merely base, and give him the stature of a tragic hero?
5. -Why is it that Othello "looks gentler than he did" (4.3.11)?
6. -What qualities in Desdemona's singing prevent us from regarding her as a merely pathetic figure here?

Act 5

1. -What do 5.1.19–20 tell us about Iago? How much "daily beauty" have we seen in Cassio's life? Do we assume Iago judges him incorrectly?
2. -What does 5.2.16–17 tell us about the spirit with which Othello is about to kill Desdemona? Is he acting from a sense of wounded pride?
3. -In 5.2.128–129 Desdemona dies with a lie on her lips. Do you think the worse of her? Why?
4. -Emilia calls Othello "gull," "dolt," "ignorant as dirt" (5.2.170–171). Has she a point? If so, do these words prevent Othello from being a tragic hero?
5. -T. S. Eliot, in "Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca," Selected Essays, says of 3.2.348–366: "Othello . . . is cheering himself up. He is endeavoring to escape reality, he has ceased to think about Desdemona, and is thinking about himself." Evaluate this view. To what does Othello in effect compare himself in the last line of this speech?
6. -In Christian thought suicide is a sin. Do you judge it sinful here?

General Questions

1. -W. H. Auden, in The Dyer's Hand, says that "in most tragedies the fall of the hero from glory to misery and death is the work, either of the gods, or of his own freely chosen acts, or, more commonly, a mixture of both. But the fall of Othello is the work of another human being; nothing he says or does originates with himself. In consequence we feel pity for him but no respect; our esthetic respect is reserved for Iago." Evaluate Auden's view.

2. -Harley Granville-Barker, in Prefaces to Shakespeare, says: "The mere sight of such beauty and nobility and happiness, all wickedly destroyed must be a harrowing one. Yet the pity and terror of it come short of serving for the purgation of our souls, since Othello's own soul stays unpurged. É It is a tragedy without meaning, and that is the ultimate horror of it." Evaluate this view.

3. -A black British actor has said,

> When a black actor plays a role written for a white actor in black make-up and for a predominantly white audience, does he not encourage the white way, or rather the wrong way, of looking at black men, namely that black men, or "Moors," are over-emotional, excitable and unstable, thereby vindicating Iago's statement, "These Moors are changeable in their wills" (1.3)? Of all the parts in the canon, perhaps Othello is the one which should most definitely not be played by a black actor.
>
> Quoted in Lois Potter, Shakespeare in Performance: Othello (2002), 169

Does this view make sense to you? Why or why not?

4. -How important to the play is the theme of race? Central to everything to happens? Significant but not really central? Please explain.

5. -It has been said that a reader's or a spectator's interest in Iago consists of equal parts admiration and horror. Your view?

6. -What does it mean to say that a tragic hero achieves self-knowledge? Is this knowledge essential to the dramatic power of a tragedy, or could a play still be tragic without it? Does Othello achieve self-knowledge in the final scene?

7. -Could you imagine a different version of Othello, in which the play is a comedy rather than a tragedy? How would you revise the play to make everything turn out well in the end?

8. -Do you think that Shakespeare is trying to teach us something special in this play? What is this

"something," and where in the text do you perceive the evidence for it? What is the relationship between the action on the stage and the lives that we lead?

9. -Have you read other Shakespearean tragedies beside this one? Which is your favorite? What are the reasons for your choice?

10. -Shakespeare's plays have been performed and studied for centuries. Often it's said that they are inexhaustible. What does it mean to say that a literary work, by Shakespeare or some other great writer, is inexhaustible? Would you say that this is true—true for you—about Othello? Where in the text might you locate evidence for your view?

A Note on the Texts of Othello

Quarto, 1622

Folio, 1623

Note: The technology of printing in England in Shakespeare's day was fairly low, not only by comparison with printing today but even by comparison with printing on the Continent in the early seventeenth century. With very few exceptions publishers in England produced books for a market that wanted cheap editions rather than fine editions, which means that the consumer would get pages that were unevenly inked and were sometimes printed from typefaces that were damaged.

Above: Part of the page of the 1622 quarto, where Othello speaks of himself as a "base Indian." An Elizabethan tradition associated American Indians with ignorantly neglecting to value precious jewels and gold, so Othello here may be comparing himself to such an Indian. Most editors accept this reading.

Below: Part of a page in the 1623 folio, where Othello speaks of himself as "the base Iudean," Conceivably the manuscript had Indian or Indean, but the type-setter mistakenly inverted an n, producing a u. On the other hand, Iudean (that is, Judean) makes sense, referring either to (a) Herod the Great (king of the Jews), who murdered his wife after she had been accused (falsely) of infidelity, or (b) Judas Iscariat, who betrayed Jesus (in Matthew 13.46 Jesus tells a parable comparing the kingdom of heaven to "a pearl of great price").

Comedy

Though etymology is not always helpful (after all, is it really illuminating to say that tragedy may come from a Greek word meaning "goat song"?), the etymology of comedy helps to reveal comedy's fundamental nature. Comedy (Greek: komoidia) is a revel-song; ancient Greek comedies are descended from fertility rituals that dramatized the joy of renewal, the joy of triumphing over obstacles, the joy of being (in a sense) reborn. Whereas the movement of tragedy, speaking roughly, is from prosperity to disaster, the movement of comedy is from some sort of minor disaster to prosperity.

To say, however, that comedy dramatizes the triumph over obstacles is to describe it as though it were melodrama, a play in which, after hairbreadth adventures, good prevails over evil, often in the form of the hero's unlikely last-minute rescue of the fair Belinda from the clutches of the villain. What distinguishes comedy from melodrama is the pervasive high spirits of comedy. The joyous ending in comedy—usually a marriage—is in the spirit of what has gone before; the entire play, not only the end, is a celebration of fecundity.

The threats in the world of comedy are not taken very seriously; the parental tyranny that makes Romeo and Juliet and Antigone tragedies is, in comedy, laughable throughout. Parents may fret, fume, and lock doors, but in doing so they make themselves ridiculous, for love will find a way. Villains may threaten, but the audience never takes the threats seriously.

The marriage and renewal of society, so usual at the end of comedy, may be most improbable, but they do not therefore weaken the comedy. The stuff of comedy is, in part, improbability. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, Puck speaks for the spectator when he says:

And those things do best please me

That befall preposterously.

In tragedy, probability is important; in comedy, *im*probability is often desirable, for at least three reasons. First, comedy seeks to include as much as possible, to reveal the rich abundance of life. The motto of comedy (and the implication in the weddings with which it usually concludes) is, "The more the merrier." Second, the improbable is the surprising; surprise often evokes laughter, and laughter surely has a central place in comedy. Third, by getting the characters into improbable situations, the dramatist can show off the absurdity of their behavior. This point needs amplification.

Comedy often shows the absurdity of ideals. The miser, the puritan, the health faddist, and so on, are people of ideals, but their ideals are suffocating. The miser, for example, treats everything in terms of money; the miser's ideal causes him or her to renounce much of the abundance and joy of life. He or she is in love, but is unwilling to support a spouse; or he or she has a headache, but will not be so extravagant as to take an aspirin tablet. If a thief accosts the miser with "Your money or your life," the miser will prefer to give up life—and that is what in fact the miser has been doing all the while. Now, by putting this miser in a series of improbable situations, the dramatist can continue to demonstrate entertainingly the miser's absurdity.*

The comic protagonist's tenacious hold on his or her ideals is not very far from that of the tragic protagonist. In general, however, tragedy suggests the nobility of ideals; the tragic hero's ideals undo him or her, and they may be ideals about which we have serious reservations, but still we admire the nobility of these ideals. Romeo and Juliet will not put off their love for each other; Antigone will not yield to Creon, and Creon holds almost impossibly long to his stern position. But the comic protagonist who is always trying to keep his or her hands clean is funny; we laugh at this refusal to touch dirt with the rest of us, this refusal to enjoy the abundance life has to offer. The comic protagonist who is always talking about his or her beloved is funny; we laugh at the failure to see that the world is filled with people more attractive than the one with whom he or she is obsessed.

In short, the ideals for which the tragic protagonist loses the world seem important to us and gain, in large measure, our sympathy, but the ideals for which the comic protagonist loses the world seem trivial compared with the rich variety that life has to offer, and we laugh at their absurdity. The tragic figure makes a claim on our sympathy. The absurd comic figure continually sets up obstacles to our sympathetic interest; we feel detached from, superior to, and amused by comic figures. Something along these lines is behind William Butler Yeats's insistence that character is always present in comedy but not in tragedy. Though Yeats is eccentric in his notion that individual character is obliterated in tragedy, he interestingly gets at one of the important elements in comedy:

> When the tragic reverie is at its height . . . [we do not say,] "How well that man is realized. I should know him were I to meet him in the street," for it is always ourselves that we see upon the [tragic] stage. . . . Tragedy must always be a drowning and breaking of the dikes that separate man from man, and . . . it is upon these dikes comedy keeps house.

Most comic plays can roughly be sorted into one of two types: romantic comedy and satiric comedy. Romantic comedy presents an ideal world, a golden world, a world more delightful than our own; if there are difficulties in it, they are not briers but (to quote from Shakespeare's As You Like It) "burrs . . . thrown . . . in holiday foolery." It is the world of most of Shakespeare's comedies, a world of Illyria, of the Forest of Arden, of Belmont, of the moonlit Athens in A Midsummer Night's Dream. The chief figures are lovers; the course of their love is not smooth, but the outcome is never in doubt and the course is the more fun for being bumpy. Occasionally in this golden world there is a villain, but if so, the villain is a great bungler who never really does any harm; the world seems to be guided by a benevolent providence who prevents villains from seriously harming even themselves. In these plays, the world belongs to golden lads and lasses. When we laugh, we laugh not so much at them as with them.

If romantic comedy shows us a world with people more attractive than we find in our own, satiric comedy shows us a world with people less attractive. The satiric world seems dominated by morally inferior people—the decrepit wooer, the jealous spouse, the demanding parent. These unengaging figures go through their paces, revealing again and again their absurdity. The audience laughs at (rather than with) such figures, and writers justify this kind of comedy by claiming to reform society: antisocial members of the audience will see their grotesque images on the stage and will reform themselves when they leave the theater. But it is hard to believe that this theory is rooted in fact. Jonathan Swift was probably right when he said, "Satire is a sort of glass wherein beholders do generally discover everybody's face but their own."

Near the conclusion of a satiric comedy, the obstructing characters are dismissed, often perfunctorily, allowing for a happy ending—commonly the marriage of figures less colorful than the obstructionist(s).

And so all-encompassing are the festivities at the end that even obstructionists are invited to join in the wedding feast. If they refuse to join, we may find them—yet again—laughable rather than sympathetic, though admittedly one may also feel lingering regret that this somewhat shabby world of ours cannot live up to the exalted (even if rigid and rather crazy) standards of the outsider who refuses to go along with the way of the world.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) was born in Stratford, England, of middle-class parents. Nothing of interest is known about his early years, but by 1590 he was acting and writing plays in London. By the end of the following decade he had worked in all three Elizabethan dramatic genres—tragedy, comedy, and history. Romeo and Juliet, for example, was written about 1595, the year of Richard II, and in the following year he wrote A Midsummer Night's Dream. Julius Caesar (1599) probably preceded As You Like It by one year, and Hamlet probably followed As You Like It by less than a year. Among the plays that followed King Lear (1605–1606) were Macbeth (1605–1606) and several "romances"—plays (including The Tempest) that have happy endings but that seem more meditative and closer to tragedy than such comedies as A Midsummer Night's Dream, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night.

Lords and Attendants on Theseus and Hippolyta

SCENE: Athens, and a wood near it]*

1.1 Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, [and PHILOSTRATE,] with others.*

THESEUS. Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour Draws on apace. Four happy days bring in Another moon; but, O, methinks, how slow
This old moon wanes! She lingers° my desires,
Like to a stepdame° or a dowager° 5
Long withering out° a young man's revenue.

HIPPOLYTA. Four days will quickly steep themselves in night,
Four nights will quickly dream away the time;
And then the moon, like to a silver bow
New bent in heaven, shall behold the night 10
Of our solemnities.

THESEUS. Go, Philostrate,

Stir up the Athenian youth to merriments,
Awake the pert and nimble spirit of mirth,
Turn melancholy forth to funerals;
The pale companion° is not for our pomp.° [Exit PHILOSTRATE.]
Hippolyta, I wooed thee with my sword°
And won thy love doing thee injuries;
But I will wed thee in another key,
With pomp, with triumph,° and with reveling.

Enter EGEUS and his daughter HERMIA, and LYSANDER, and DEMETRIUS.

EGEUS. Happy be Theseus, our renowned duke!

THESEUS. Thanks, good Egeus. What's the news with thee?

EGEUS. Full of vexation come I, with complaint Against my child, my daughter Hermia.
Stand forth, Demetrius. My noble lord,
This man hath my consent to marry her.
Stand forth, Lysander. And, my gracious Duke,
This man hath bewitched the bosom of my child.
Thou, thou, Lysander, thou hast given her rhymes
And interchanged love tokens with my child.
Thou hast by moonlight at her window sung
With feigning voice verses of feigning° love,
And stol'n the impression of her fantasy°
With bracelets of thy hair, rings, gauds,° conceits,° Knacks,° trifles, nosegays, sweetmeats—messengers
Of strong prevailment in° unhardened youth.
With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart,
Turned her obedience, which is due to me,
To stubborn harshness. And, my gracious Duke,

Be it so° she will not here before Your Grace
Consent to marry with Demetrius,
I beg the ancient privilege of Athens:
As she is mine, I may dispose of her,
Which shall be either to this gentleman
Or to her death, according to our law
Immediately° provided in that case.

THESEUS. What say you, Hermia? Be advised, fair maid.
To you your father should be as a god—
One that composed your beauties, yea, and one
To whom you are but as a form in wax
By him imprinted, and within his power
To leave° the figure or disfigure° it.
Demetrius is a worthy gentleman.

HERMIA. So is Lysander.

THESEUS. In himself he is;
But in this kind,° wanting° your father's voice,°
The other must be held the worthier.

HERMIA. I would my father looked but with my eyes.

THESEUS. Rather your eyes must with his judgment look.

HERMIA. I do entreat Your Grace to pardon me.
I know not by what power I am made bold,
Nor how it may concern° my modesty
In such a presence here to plead my thoughts;
But I beseech Your Grace that I may know
The worst that may befall me in this case
If I refuse to wed Demetrius.

THESEUS. Either to die the death or to abjure

Forever the society of men.

Therefore, fair Hermia, question your desires,

Know of your youth, examine well your blood,°

Whether, if you yield not to your father's choice,

You can endure the livery° of a nun,

For aye° to be in shady cloister mewed,°

To live a barren sister all your life,

Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless moon.

Thrice blessèd they that master so their blood

To undergo such maiden pilgrimage;

But earthlier happy° is the rose distilled

Than that which, withering on the virgin thorn,

Grows, lives, and dies in single blessedness.

HERMIA. So will I grow, so live, so die, my lord,

Ere I will yield my virgin patent° up

Unto his lordship, whose unwishèd yoke

My soul consents not to give sovereignty.

THESEUS. Take time to pause, and by the next new moon—

The sealing day betwixt my love and me

For everlasting bond of fellowship—

Upon that day either prepare to die

For disobedience to your father's will,

Or° else to wed Demetrius, as he would,

Or on Diana's altar to protest°

For aye austerity and single life.

DEMETRIUS. Relent, sweet Hermia, and, Lysander, yield

Thy crazèd° title to my certain right.

LYSANDER. You have her father's love, Demetrius;

Let me have Hermia's. Do you marry him.

EGEUS. Scornful Lysander! True, he hath my love,
And what is mine my love shall render him.
And she is mine, and all my right of her
I do estate unto° Demetrius.

LYSANDER. I am, my lord, as well derived° as he,
As well possessed;° my love is more than his;
My fortunes every way as fairly° ranked,
If not with vantage,° as Demetrius';
And, which is more than all these boasts can be,
I am beloved of beauteous Hermia.
Why should not I then prosecute my right?
Demetrius, I'll avouch it to his head,°
Made love to Nedar's daughter, Helena
And won her soul; and she, sweet lady, dotes,
Devoutly dotes, dotes in idolatry,
Upon this spotted° and inconstant man.

THESEUS. I must confess that I have heard so much,
And with Demetrius thought to have spoke thereof;
But, being overfull of self-affairs,°
My mind did lose it. But, Demetrius, come,
And come, Egeus, you shall go with me;
I have some private schooling° for you both.
For you, fair Hermia, look you arm° yourself
To fit your fancies° to your father's will;
Or else the law of Athens yields you up—
Which by no means we may extenuate°—
To death or to a vow of single life.

Come, my Hippolyta. What cheer, my love?

Demetrius and Egeus, go° along.

I must employ you in some business

Against° our nuptial and confer with you

Of something nearly that° concerns yourselves.

EGEUS. With duty and desire we follow you.

Exeunt [all but LYSANDER and HERMIA].

LYSANDER. How now, my love, why is your cheek so pale?

How chance the roses there do fade so fast?

HERMIA. Belike° for want of rain, which I could well

Beteem° them from the tempest of my eyes.

LYSANDER. Ay me! For aught that I could ever read,

Could ever hear by tale or history,

The course of true love never did run smooth

But either it was different in blood°—

HERMIA. O cross!° Too high to be enthralled to low.

LYSANDER. Or else misgrafted° in respect of years—

HERMIA. O spite! Too old to be engaged to young.

LYSANDER. Or else it stood upon the choice of friends°—

HERMIA. O hell, to choose love by another's eyes!

LYSANDER. Or if there were a sympathy° in choice,

War, death, or sickness did lay siege to it,

Making it momentany° as a sound,

Swift as a shadow, short as any dream,

Brief as the lightning in the collied° night,

That in a spleen° unfolds° both heaven and earth,

And ere a man hath power to say "Behold!"

The jaws of darkness do devour it up.

So quick° bright things come to confusion.°

HERMIA. If then true lovers have been ever crossed,°

It stands as an edict in destiny.

Then let us teach our trial patience,°

Because it is a customary cross,

As due to love as thoughts and dreams and sighs,

Wishes and tears, poor fancy's° followers.

LYSANDER. A good persuasion.° Therefore, hear me, Hermia:

I have a widow aunt, a dowager

Of great revenue, and she hath no child.

From Athens is her house remote seven leagues;

And she respects° me as her only son.

There, gentle Hermia, may I marry thee,

And to that place the sharp Athenian law

Cannot pursue us. If thou lovest me, then,

Steal forth thy father's house tomorrow night;

And in the wood, a league without the town,

Where I did meet thee once with Helena

To do observance to a morn of May,°

There will I stay for thee.

HERMIA. My good Lysander!

I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow,

By his best arrow° with the golden head,

By the simplicity° of Venus' doves,°

By that which knitteth souls and prospers loves,

And by that fire which burned the Carthage queen°

When the false Trojan° under sail was seen,

By all the vows that ever men have broke,

In number more than ever women spoke,

In that same place thou hast appointed me

Tomorrow truly will I meet with thee.

LYSANDER. Keep promise, love. Look, here comes Helena.

Enter HELENA.

HERMIA. God speed, fair° Helena! Whither away?

HELENA. Call you me fair? That "fair" again unsay.

Demetrius loves your fair.° O happy fair!°

Your eyes are lodestars,° and your tongue's sweet air°

More tunable° than lark to shepherd's ear

When wheat is green, when hawthorn buds appear.

Sickness is catching. O, were favor° so!

Yours would I catch, fair Hermia, ere I go;

My ear should catch your voice, my eye your eye,

My tongue should catch your tongue's sweet melody.

Were the world mine, Demetrius being bated,°

The rest I'd give to be to you translated.°

O, teach me how you look and with what art

You sway the motion° of Demetrius' heart.

HERMIA. I frown upon him, yet he loves me still.

HELENA. O, that your frowns would teach my smiles such skill!

HERMIA. I give him curses, yet he gives me love.

HELENA. O, that my prayers could such affection° move!°

HERMIA. The more I hate, the more he follows me.

HELENA. The more I love, the more he hateth me.

HERMIA. His folly, Helena, is no fault of mine.

HELENA. None but your beauty. Would that fault were mine!

HERMIA. Take comfort. He no more shall see my face.

Lysander and myself will fly this place.
Before the time I did Lysander see Seemed Athens as a paradise to me.
O, then, what graces in my love do dwell
That he hath turned a heaven unto a hell!

LYSANDER. Helen, to you our minds we will unfold.
Tomorrow night, when Phoebe° doth behold
Her silver visage in the watery glass,°
Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass,
A time that lovers' flights doth still° conceal,
Through Athens' gates have we devised to steal.

HERMIA. And in the wood, where often you and I Upon faint° primrose beds were wont to lie,
Emptying our bosoms of their counsel° sweet,
There my Lysander and myself shall meet;
And thence from Athens turn away our eyes,
To seek new friends and stranger companies.
Farewell, sweet playfellow. Pray thou for us,
And good luck grant thee thy Demetrius!
Keep word, Lysander. We must starve our sight
From lovers' food till morrow deep midnight.

LYSANDER. I will, my Hermia. Exit HERMIA.
Helena, adieu.
As you on him, Demetrius dote on you! Exit LYSANDER.

HELENA. How happy some o'er other some can be!° Through Athens I am thought as fair as she.
But what of that? Demetrius thinks not so;
He will not know what all but he do know.

And as he errs, doting on Hermia's eyes,
So I, admiring of° his qualities.
Things base and vile, holding no quantity,°
Love can transpose to form and dignity.
Love looks not with the eyes, but with the mind,
And therefore is winged Cupid painted blind.
Nor hath Love's mind of any judgment taste;°
Wings, and no eyes, figure° unheedy haste.
And therefore is Love said to be a child,
Because in choice he is so oft beguiled.
As waggish° boys in game° themselves forswear,
So the boy Love is perjured everywhere.
For ere Demetrius looked on Hermia's eyne,°
He hailed down oaths that he was only mine;
And when this hail some heat from Hermia felt,
So he dissolved, and showers of oaths did melt.
I will go tell him of fair Hermia's flight.
Then to the wood will he tomorrow night
Pursue her; and for this intelligence°
If I have thanks, it is a dear expense.°
But herein mean I to enrich my pain,
To have his sight thither and back again.

Exit.

1.2 -Enter QUINCE the carpenter, and SNUG the joiner, and BOTTOM the weaver, and FLUTE the bellows mender, and SNOUT the tinker, and STARVELING the tailor.

QUINCE. Is all our company here?

BOTTOM. You were best to call them generally,° man by man, according to the scrip.°

QUINCE. Here is the scroll of every man's name which is thought fit, through all Athens, to play in our interlude before the Duke and the Duchess on his wedding day at night.

BOTTOM. First, good Peter Quince, say what the play treats on, then read the names of the actors, and so grow to° a point.

QUINCE. Marry,° our play is "The most lamentable comedy and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisbe."

BOTTOM. A very good piece of work, I assure you, and a merry. Now, good Peter Quince, call forth your actors by the scroll. Masters, spread yourselves.

QUINCE. Answer as I call you. Nick Bottom,° the weaver.

BOTTOM. Ready. Name what part I am for, and proceed.

QUINCE. You, Nick Bottom, are set down for Pyramus.

BOTTOM. What is Pyramus? A lover or a tyrant?

QUINCE. A lover, that kills himself most gallant for love.

BOTTOM. That will ask some tears in the true performing of it. If I do it, let the audience look to their eyes. I will move storms; I will con-dole° in some measure. To the rest—yet my chief humor° is for a tyrant. I could play Ercles° rarely, or a part to tear a cat° in, to make all split.°

"The raging rocks
And shivering shocks
Shall break the locks
Of prison gates:
And Phibbus' car°
Shall shine from far
And make and mar
The foolish Fates."

This was lofty! Now name the rest of the players. This is Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein. A lover is more condoling.

QUINCE. Francis Flute, the bellows mender.

FLUTE. Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE. Flute, you must take Thisbe on you.

FLUTE. What is Thisbe? A wandering knight?

QUINCE. It is the lady that Pyramus must love.

FLUTE. Nay, faith, let not me play a woman. I have a beard coming.

QUINCE. That's all one.° You shall play it in a mask, and you may speak as small° as you will.

BOTTOM. An° I may hide my face, let me play Thisbe too. I'll speak in a monstrous little voice, "Thisne, Thisne!" "Ah Pyramus, my lover dear! Thy Thisbe dear, and lady dear!"

QUINCE. No, no, you must play Pyramus, and, Flute, you Thisbe.

BOTTOM. Well, proceed.

QUINCE. Robin Starveling, the tailor.

STARVELING. Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE. Robin Starveling, you must play Thisbe's mother. Tom Snout, the tinker.

SNOUT. Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE. You, Pyramus' father; myself, Thisbe's father; Snug, the joiner, you, the lion's part, and I hope here is a play fitted.

SNUG. Have you the lion's part written? Pray you, if it be, give it me, for I am slow of study.

QUINCE. You may do it extempore, for it is nothing but roaring.

BOTTOM. Let me play the lion too. I will roar that I will do any man's heart good to hear me. I will roar that I will make the Duke say, "Let him roar again, let him roar again."

QUINCE. An you should do it too terribly, you would fright the Duchess and the ladies, that they would shriek; and that were enough to hang us all.

ALL. That would hang us, every mother's son.

BOTTOM. I grant you, friends, if you should fright the ladies out of their wits, they would have no more discretion but to hang us; but I will aggravate° my voice so that I will roar you° as gently as any sucking dove;° I will roar you an ’twere any nightingale.

QUINCE. You can play no part but Pyramus; for Pyramus is a sweet-faced man, a proper° man as one shall see in a summer’s day, a most lovely gentlemanlike man. Therefore you must needs play Pyramus.

BOTTOM. Well, I will undertake it. What beard were I best to play it in?

QUINCE. Why, what you will.

BOTTOM. I will discharge° it in either your° straw-color beard, your orange-tawny beard, your purple-in-grain° beard, or your French-crown-color° beard, your perfect yellow.

QUINCE. Some of your French crowns° have no hair at all, and then you will play barefaced. But, masters, here are your parts. [He distributes parts.] And I am to entreat you, request you, and desire you to con° them by tomorrow night; and meet me in the palace wood, a mile without the town, by moonlight. There will we rehearse; for if we meet in the city, we shall be dogged with company, and our devices° known. In the meantime I will draw a bill° of properties, such as our play wants. I pray you, fail me not.

BOTTOM. We will meet, and there we may rehearse most obscenely° and courageously. Take pains, be perfect;° adieu.

QUINCE. At the Duke’s oak we meet.

BOTTOM. Enough. Hold, or cut bowstrings.°

Exeunt.

2.1 -Enter a FAIRY at one door, and ROBIN GOODFELLOW *[PUCK] at another.*

PUCK. How now, spirit, whither wander you?

FAIRY.

Over hill, over dale,
Thorough° bush, thorough brier,
Over park, over pale,° Thorough flood, thorough fire,
I do wander everywhere,

Swifter than the moon's sphere;°

And I serve the Fairy Queen,

To dew her orbs° upon the green.

The cowslips tall her pensioners° be.

In their gold coats spots you see:

Those be rubies, fairy favors;°

In those freckles live their savors.°

I must go seek some dewdrops here

And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.

Farewell, thou lob° of spirits: I'll be gone.

Our Queen and all her elves come here anon.°

PUCK. The King doth keep his revels here tonight.

Take heed the Queen come not within his sight.

For Oberon is passing fell° and wrath,°

Because that she as her attendant hath

A lovely boy, stolen from an Indian king;

She never had so sweet a changeling.°

And jealous Oberon would have the child

Knight of his train, to trace° the forests wild.

But she perforce° withholds the lovèd boy,

Crowns him with flowers, and makes him all her joy.

And now they never meet in grove or green,

By fountain° clear, or spangled starlight sheen,°

But they do square,° that all their elves for fear

Creep into acorn cups and hide them there.

FAIRY. Either I mistake your shape and making quite,

Or else you are that shrewd° and knavish sprite°

Called Robin Goodfellow. Are not you he

That frights the maidens of the villagery,°

Skim milk, and sometimes labor in the quern,°

And bootless° make the breathless huswife° churn,

And sometimes make the drink to bear no barm,°

Mislead night wanderers, laughing at their harm?

Those that "Hobgoblin" call you, and "Sweet Puck,"

You do their work, and they shall have good luck.

Are you not he?

PUCK. Thou speakest aright;

I am that merry wanderer of the night.

I jest to Oberon and make him smile

When I a fat and bean-fed horse beguile,

Neighing in likeness of a filly foal;

And sometimes lurk I in a gossip's° bowl,

In very likeness of a roasted crab,°

And when she drinks, against her lips I bob

And on her withered dewlap° pour the ale.

The wisest aunt,° telling the saddest° tale,

Sometimes for three-foot stool mistaketh me;

Then slip I from her bum, down topples she,

And "Tailor"° cries, and falls into a cough;

And then the whole choir° hold their hips and laugh,

And waxen° in their mirth, and neeze,° and swear

A merrier hour was never wasted there.

But, room,° fairy! Here comes Oberon.

FAIRY. And here my mistress. Would that he were gone!

Enter [OBERON] the King of Fairies at one door, with his train; and [TITANIA] the Queen at another, with hers.

OBERON. Ill met by moonlight, proud Titania.

TITANIA. What, jealous Oberon? Fairies, skip hence.
I have forsworn his bed and company.

OBERON. Tarry, rash wanton.° Am not I thy lord?

TITANIA. Then I must be thy lady; but I know
When thou hast stolen away from Fairyland
And in the shape of Corin° sat all day,
Playing on pipes of corn° and versing love
To amorous Phillida. Why art thou here
Come from the farthest step° of India
But that, forsooth, the bouncing Amazon,
Your buskined° mistress and your warrior love,
To Theseus must be wedded, and you come
To give their bed joy and prosperity.

OBERON. How canst thou thus for shame, Titania, Glance at my credit with Hippolyta,°
Knowing I know thy love to Theseus?
Didst not thou lead him through the glimmering night
From Perigenia,° whom he ravishèd?
And make him with fair Aegles° break his faith,
With Ariadne° and Antiopa?°

TITANIA. These are the forgeries of jealousy;
And never, since the middle summer's spring,°
Met we on hill, in dale, forest, or mead,
By pavèd° fountain or by rushy° brook,
Or in° the beachèd margent° of the sea,
To dance our ringlets° to the whistling wind,
But with thy brawls thou hast disturbed our sport.

Therefore the winds, piping to us in vain,
As in revenge, have sucked up from the sea
Contagious° fogs; which, falling in the land,
Hath every pelting° river made so proud
That they have overborne their continents.°
The ox hath therefore stretched his yoke in vain,
The plowman lost his sweat, and the green corn°
Hath rotted ere his youth attained a beard;
The fold° stands empty in the drownèd field,
And crows are fatted with the murrain° flock;
The nine-men's-morris° is filled up with mud,
And the quaint mazes° in the wanton° green
For lack of tread are undistinguishable.
The human mortals want° their winter° here;
No night is now with hymn or carol blessed.
Therefore° the moon, the governess of floods,
Pale in her anger, washes all the air,
That rheumatic diseases° do abound.
And thorough this distemperature° we see
The seasons alter: hoary-headed frosts
Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose,
And on old Hiems'° thin and icy crown
An odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds
Is, as in mockery, set. The spring, the summer,
The childing° autumn, angry winter, change
Their wonted liveries,° and the mazèd° world
By their increase° now knows not which is which.
And this same progeny of evils comes

From our debate,° from our dissension;

We are their parents and original.°

OBERON. Do you amend it, then; it lies in you.

Why should Titania cross her Oberon?

I do but beg a little changeling boy

To be my henchman.°

TITANIA. Set your heart at rest.

The fairy land buys not the child of me.

His mother was a vot'ress of my order,

And in the spicèd Indian air by night

Full often hath she gossiped by my side

And sat with me on Neptune's yellow sands,

Marking th' embarkèd traders° on the flood,°

When we have laughed to see the sails conceive

And grow big-bellied with the wanton° wind;

Which she, with pretty and with swimming° gait,

Following—her womb then rich with my young squire—

Would imitate, and sail upon the land

To fetch me trifles, and return again

As from a voyage, rich with merchandise.

But she, being mortal, of that boy did die;

And for her sake do I rear up her boy,

And for her sake I will not part with him.

OBERON. How long within this wood intend you stay?

TITANIA. Perchance till after Theseus' wedding day.

If you will patiently dance in our round°

And see our moonlight revels, go with us;

If not, shun me, and I will spare° your haunts.

OBERON. Give me that boy and I will go with thee.

TITANIA. Not for thy fairy kingdom. Fairies, away!

We shall chide downright if I longer stay.

Exeunt [TITANIA with her train].

OBERON. Well, go thy way. Thou shalt not from° this grove

Till I torment thee for this injury.

My gentle Puck, come hither. Thou rememb'rest

Since° once I sat upon a promontory,

And heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back

Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath°

That the rude° sea grew civil at her song,

And certain stars shot madly from their spheres

To hear the sea-maid's music?

PUCK. I remember.

OBERON. That very time I saw, but thou couldst not,

Flying between the cold moon and the earth,

Cupid all° armed. A certain aim he took

At a fair vestal° thronèd by the west,

And loosed° his love shaft smartly from his bow

As° it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts;

But I might° see young Cupid's fiery shaft

Quenched in the chaste beams of the watery moon,

And the imperial vot'ress passèd on

In maiden meditation, fancy-free.°

Yet marked I where the bolt° of Cupid fell:

It fell upon a little western flower,

Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound,

And maidens call it "love-in-idleness."°

Fetch me that flower; the herb I showed thee once.
The juice of it on sleeping eyelids laid
Will make or man or° woman madly dote
Upon the next live creature that it sees.
Fetch me this herb, and be thou here again
Ere the leviathan° can swim a league.

PUCK. I'll put a girdle round about the earth
In forty° minutes. [Exit.]

OBERON. Having once this juice,
I'll watch Titania when she is asleep
And drop the liquor of it in her eyes.
The next thing then she waking looks upon,
Be it on lion, bear, or wolf, or bull,
On meddling monkey, or on busy ape,
She shall pursue it with the soul of love.
And ere I take this charm from off her sight,
As I can take it with another herb,
I'll make her render up her page to me.
But who comes here? I am invisible,
And I will overhear their conference.

Enter DEMETRIUS, HELENA following him.

DEMETRIUS. I love thee not; therefore pursue me not.
Where is Lysander and fair Hermia?
The one I'll slay; the other slayeth me.
Thou toldst me they were stol'n unto this wood;
And here am I, and wode° within this wood,
Because I cannot meet my Hermia.
Hence, get thee gone, and follow me no more.

HELENA. You draw me, you hardhearted adamant!°
But yet you draw not iron, for my heart
Is true as steel. Leave° you your power to draw,
And I shall have no power to follow you.
DEMETRIUS. Do I entice you? Do I speak you fair?°
Or rather do I not in plainest truth
Tell you I do not nor I cannot love you?
HELENA. And even for that do I love you the more.
I am your spaniel; and, Demetrius,
The more you beat me, I will fawn on you.
Use me but as your spaniel, spurn me, strike me,
Neglect me, lose me; only give me leave,
Unworthy as I am, to follow you.
What worser place can I beg in your love—
And yet a place of high respect with me—
Than to be usèd as you use your dog?
DEMETRIUS. Tempt not too much the hatred of my spirit,
For I am sick when I do look on thee.
HELENA. And I am sick when I look not on you.
DEMETRIUS. You do impeach° your modesty too much
To leave the city and commit yourself
Into the hands of one that loves you not,
To trust the opportunity of night
And the ill counsel of a desert° place
With the rich worth of your virginity.
HELENA. Your virtue° is my privilege.° For that°
It is not night when I do see your face,
Therefore I think I am not in the night;

Nor doth this wood lack worlds of company,

For you, in my respect,° are all the world.

Then how can it be said I am alone

When all the world is here to look on me?

DEMETRIUS. I'll run from thee and hide me in the brakes,°

And leave thee to the mercy of wild beasts.

HELENA. The wildest hath not such a heart as you.

Run when you will, the story shall be changed:

Apollo flies and Daphne holds the chase,°

The dove pursues the griffin,° the mild hind°

Makes speed to catch the tiger—bootless° speed,

When cowardice pursues and valor flies!

DEMETRIUS. I will not stay° thy questions.° Let me go!

Or if thou follow me, do not believe

But I shall do thee mischief in the wood.

HELENA. Ay, in the temple, in the town, the field,

You do me mischief. Fie, Demetrius!

Your wrongs do set a scandal on my sex.°

We cannot fight for love, as men may do;

We should be wooed and were not made to woo.

[Exit DEMETRIUS.]

I'll follow thee and make a heaven of hell,

To die upon° the hand I love so well. [Exit.]

OBERON. Fare thee well, nymph. Ere he do leave this grove,

Thou shalt fly him and he shall seek thy love.

Enter PUCK.

Hast thou the flower there? Welcome, wanderer.

PUCK. Ay, there it is. [He offers the flower.]

OBERON. I pray thee, give it me.

I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,°

Where oxlips° and the nodding violet grows,

Quite overcanopied with luscious woodbine,°

With sweet muskroses° and with eglantine.°

There sleeps Titania sometimes of the night,

Lulled in these flowers with dances and delight;

And there the snake throws° her enameled skin,

Weed° wide enough to wrap a fairy in.

And with the juice of this I'll streak° her eyes

And make her full of hateful fantasies.

Take thou some of it, and seek through this grove.

[He gives some love juice.]

A sweet Athenian lady is in love

With a disdainful youth. Anoint his eyes,

But do it when the next thing he espies

May be the lady. Thou shalt know the man

By the Athenian garments he hath on.

Effect it with some care, that he may prove

More fond on° her than she upon her love;

And look thou meet me ere the first cock crow.

PUCK. Fear not, my lord, your servant shall do so.

Exeunt.

2.2 Enter TITANIA, Queen of Fairies, with her train.

TITANIA. Come, now a roundel° and a fairy song;

Then, for the third part of a minute, hence—

Some to kill cankers° in the muskrose buds,

Some war with reremice° for their leathern wings

To make my small elves coats, and some keep back
The clamorous owl, that nightly hoots and wonders
At our quaint° spirits. Sing me now asleep.
Then to your offices, and let me rest.

Fairies sing.

FIRST FAIRY.

You spotted snakes with double° tongue,
Thorny hedgehogs, be not seen;
Newts° and blindworms, do no wrong,
Come not near our Fairy Queen.

CHORUS.

Philomel,° with melody
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby, lulla, lulla, lullaby.
Never harm
Nor spell nor charm
Come our lovely lady nigh.
So good night, with lullaby.

FIRST FAIRY.

Weaving spiders, come not here;
Hence, you long-legged spinners, hence!
Beetles black, approach not near;
Worm nor snail, do no offense.

CHORUS.

Philomel, with melody
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby, lulla, lulla, lullaby.
Never harm

Nor spell nor charm

Come our lovely lady nigh.

So good night, with lullaby.

[TITANIA sleeps.]

SECOND FAIRY.

Hence, away! Now all is well.

One aloof stand sentinel.

[Exeunt FAIRIES.]

Enter OBERON [and squeezes the flower on TITANIA's eyelids].

OBERON.

What thou seest when thou dost wake,

Do it for thy true love take;

Love and languish for his sake.

Be it ounce,° or cat, or bear,

Pard,° or boar with bristled hair,

In thy eye that shall appear

When thou wak'st, it is thy dear.

Wake when some vile thing is near. [Exit.]

Enter LYSANDER and HERMIA.

LYSANDER. Fair love, you faint with wandering in the wood;

And to speak truth, I have forgot our way.

We'll rest us, Hermia, if you think it good,

And tarry for the comfort of the day.

HERMIA. Be it so, Lysander. Find you out a bed,

For I upon this bank will rest my head.

LYSANDER. One turf shall serve as pillow for us both;

One heart, one bed, two bosoms, and one troth.°

HERMIA. Nay, good Lysander, for my sake, my dear,

Lie further off yet; do not lie so near.

LYSANDER. O, take the sense, sweet, of my innocence!°
Love takes the meaning in love's conference.°
I mean that my heart unto yours is knit
So that but one heart we can make of it;
Two bosoms interchainèd with an oath—
So then two bosoms and a single troth.
Then by your side no bed-room me deny,
For lying so, Hermia, I do not lie.°

HERMIA. Lysander riddles very prettily.
Now much beshrew° my manners and my pride
If Hermia meant to say Lysander lied.
But, gentle friend, for love and courtesy
Lie further off, in human° modesty;
Such separation as may well be said
Becomes a virtuous bachelor and a maid,
So far be distant; and good night, sweet friend.
Thy love ne'er alter till thy sweet life end!

LYSANDER. Amen, amen, to that fair prayer, say I,
And then end life when I end loyalty!
Here is my bed. Sleep give thee all his rest!

HERMIA. With half that wish the wisher's eyes be pressed!°

[They sleep, separated by a short distance.]

Enter PUCK.

PUCK.

Through the forest have I gone,
But Athenian found I none
On whose eyes I might approve°

This flower's force in stirring love.

Night and silence.—Who is here?

Weeds of Athens he doth wear.

This is he, my master said,

Despisèd the Athenian maid;

And here the maiden, sleeping sound,

On the dank and dirty ground.

Pretty soul, she durst not lie

Near this lack-love, this kill-courtesy.

Churl, upon thy eyes I throw

All the power this charm doth owe.°

[He applies the love juice.]

When thou wak'st, let love forbid

Sleep his seat on thy eyelid.

So awake when I am gone,

For I must now to Oberon. Exit.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HELENA, running.

HELENA. Stay, though thou kill me, sweet Demetrius!

DEMETRIUS. I charge thee, hence, and do not haunt me thus.

HELENA. O, wilt thou darkling° leave me? Do not so.

DEMETRIUS. Stay, on thy peril!° I alone will go. [Exit.]

HELENA. O, I am out of breath in this fond° chase!

The more my prayer, the lesser is my grace.°

Happy is Hermia, wheresoe'er she lies,

For she hath blessèd and attractive eyes.

How came her eyes so bright? Not with salt tears;

If so, my eyes are oftener washed than hers.

No, no, I am as ugly as a bear;

For beasts that meet me run away for fear.
Therefore no marvel though Demetrius
Do, as a monster, fly my presence thus.°
What wicked and dissembling glass of mine
Made me compare° with Hermia's sphery eyne?°
But who is here? Lysander, on the ground?
Dead, or asleep? I see no blood, no wound.
Lysander, if you live, good sir, awake.

LYSANDER [awaking]. And run through fire I will for thy sweet sake.
Transparent° Helena! Nature shows art,
That through thy bosom makes me see thy heart.
Where is Demetrius? O, how fit a word
Is that vile name to perish on my sword!

HELENA. Do not say so, Lysander, say not so.
What though he love your Hermia? Lord, what though?
Yet Hermia still loves you. Then be content.

LYSANDER. Content with Hermia? No! I do repent
The tedious minutes I with her have spent.
Not Hermia but Helena I love.
Who will not change a raven for a dove?
The will of man is by his reason swayed,
And reason says you are the worthier maid.
Things growing are not ripe until their season;
So I, being young, till now ripe not° to reason.
And touching° now the point° of human skill,° Reason becomes the marshal to my will
And leads me to your eyes, where I o'erlook°
Love's stories written in love's richest book.

HELENA. Wherefore° was I to this keen mockery born?

When at your hands did I deserve this scorn?

Is't not enough, is't not enough, young man,

That I did never, no, nor never can,

Deserve a sweet look from Demetrius' eye,

But you must flout my insufficiency?

Good troth,° you do me wrong, good sooth,° you do,

In such disdainful manner me to woo.

But fare you well. Perforce I must confess

I thought you lord of° more true gentleness.°

O, that a lady, of° one man refused,

Should of another therefore be abused!° Exit.

LYSANDER. She sees not Hermia. Hermia, sleep thou there,

And never mayst thou come Lysander near!

For as a surfeit of the sweetest things

The deepest loathing to the stomach brings,

Or as the heresies that men do leave

Are hated most of those they did deceive,°

So thou, my surfeit and my heresy,

Of all be hated, but the most of me!

And, all my powers, address° your love and might

To honor Helen and to be her knight! Exit.

HERMIA [awaking]. Help me, Lysander, help me! Do thy best

To pluck this crawling serpent from my breast!

Ay me, for pity! What a dream was here!

Lysander, look how I do quake with fear.

Methought a serpent ate my heart away,

And you sat smiling at his cruel prey.°

Lysander! What, removed? Lysander! Lord!

What, out of hearing? Gone? No sound, no word?

Alack, where are you? Speak, an if° you hear;

Speak, of all loves!° I swoon almost with fear.

No? Then I well perceive you are not nigh.

Either death, or you, I'll find immediately.

Exit. [The sleeping TITANIA remains.]

3.1 *-Enter the clowns [*QUINCE, SNUG, BOTTOM, FLUTE, SNOUT, and STARVELING*]*.

BOTTOM. Are we all met?

QUINCE. Pat, pat;° and here's a marvelous convenient place for our rehearsal. This green plot shall be our stage, this hawthorn brake° our tiring-house,° and we will do it in action as we will do it before the Duke.

BOTTOM. Peter Quince?

QUINCE. What sayest thou, bully° Bottom?

BOTTOM. There are things in this comedy of Pyramus and Thisbe that will never please. First, Pyramus must draw a sword to kill himself, which the ladies cannot abide. How answer you that?

SNOUT. By 'r lakin,° a parlous° fear.

STARVELING. I believe we must leave the killing out, when all is done.°

BOTTOM. Not a whit. I have a device to make all well. Write me° a prologue, and let the prologue seem to say we will do no harm with our swords, and that Pyramus is not killed indeed; and for the more better assurance, tell them that I, Pyramus, am not Pyramus but Bottom the weaver. This will put them out of fear.

QUINCE. Well, we will have such a prologue, and it shall be written in eight and six.°

BOTTOM. No, make it two more; let it be written in eight and eight.

SNOUT. Will not the ladies be afeard of the lion?

STARVELING. I fear it, I promise you.

BOTTOM. Masters, you ought to consider with yourselves, to bring in—

God shield us!—a lion among ladies° is a most dreadful thing.

For there is not a more fearful° wildfowl than your lion living; and we ought to look to 't.

SNOUT. Therefore another prologue must tell he is not a lion.

BOTTOM. Nay, you must name his name, and half his face must be seen through the lion's neck, and he himself must speak through, saying thus, or to the same defect:° "Ladies"—or "Fair ladies—I would wish you"—or "I would request you"—or "I would entreat you—not to fear, not to tremble; my life for yours.° If you think I come hither as a lion, it were pity of my life.° No, I am no such thing: I am a man as other men are." And there indeed let him name his name and tell them plainly he is Snug the joiner.

QUINCE. Well, it shall be so. But there is two hard things: that is, to bring the moonlight into a chamber; for, you know, Pyramus and Thisbe meet by moonlight.

SNOUT. Doth the moon shine that night we play our play?

BOTTOM. A calendar, a calendar! Look in the almanac. Find out moonshine, find out moonshine. [They consult an almanac.]

QUINCE. Yes, it doth shine that night.

BOTTOM. Why, then, may you leave a casement of the great chamber window, where we play, open, and the moon may shine in at the casement.

QUINCE. Ay; or else one must come in with a bush of thorns° and a lantern and say he comes to disfigure,° or to present,° the person of Moonshine. Then there is another thing: we must have a wall in the great chamber; for Pyramus and Thisbe, says the story, did talk through the chink of a wall.

SNOUT. You can never bring in a wall. What say you, Bottom?

BOTTOM. Some man or other must present Wall. And let him have some plaster, or some loam, or some roughcast° about him, to signify wall; or let him hold his fingers thus, and through that cranny shall Pyramus and Thisbe whisper.

QUINCE. If that may be, then all is well. Come, sit down, every mother's son, and rehearse your parts. Pyramus, you begin. When you have spoken your speech, enter into that brake, and so everyone according to his cue.

Enter ROBIN *[PUCK]*.

PUCK. What hempen homespuns° have we swaggering here
So near the cradle° of the Fairy Queen?
What, a play toward?° I'll be an auditor;
An actor too perhaps, if I see cause.

QUINCE. Speak, Pyramus. Thisbe, stand forth.

BOTTOM [as PYRAMUS].

"Thisbe, the flowers of odious savors sweet—"

QUINCE. Odors, odors.

BOTTOM. "—Odors savors sweet;
So hath thy breath, my dearest Thisbe dear.
But hark, a voice! Stay thou but here awhile,
And by and by I will to thee appear." Exit.

PUCK. A stranger Pyramus than e'er played here.° [Exit.]

FLUTE. Must I speak now?

QUINCE. Ay, marry, must you; for you must understand he goes but to see a noise that he heard, and is to come again.

FLUTE [as THISBE]. "Most radiant Pyramus, most lily-white of hue,
Of color like the red rose on triumphant° brier,

Most brisky juvenal° and eke° most lovely Jew,°
As true as truest horse, that yet would never tire.
I'll meet thee, Pyramus, at Ninny's tomb."

QUINCE. "Ninus'° tomb," man. Why, you must not speak that yet. That you answer to Pyramus. You speak all your part° at once, cues and all. Pyramus, enter. Your cue is past; it is "never tire."

FLUTE. O—"As true as truest horse, that yet would never tire."

[Enter PUCK, and BOTTOM as PYRAMUS with the ass head.°]

BOTTOM. "If I were fair,° Thisbe, I were° only thine."

QUINCE. O, monstrous! O, strange! We are haunted. Pray, masters! Fly, masters! Help!

[Exeunt QUINCE, SNUG, FLUTE, SNOUT, and STARVELING.]

PUCK. I'll follow you, I'll lead you about a round,°
Through bog, through bush, through brake, through brier.
Sometimes a horse I'll be, sometimes a hound,
A hog, a headless bear, sometimes a fire;°
And neigh, and bark, and grunt, and roar, and burn,
Like horse, hound, hog, bear, fire, at every turn. Exit.

BOTTOM. Why do they run away? This is a knavery of them to make me afeard.

Enter SNOUT.

SNOUT. O Bottom, thou art changed! What do I see on thee?

BOTTOM. What do you see? You see an ass head of your own, do you?

[Exit SNOUT.]

Enter QUINCE.

QUINCE. Bless thee, Bottom, bless thee! Thou art translated.° Exit.

BOTTOM. I see their knavery. This is to make an ass of me, to fright me, if they could. But I will not stir from this place, do what they can. I will walk up and down here, and will sing, that they shall hear I am not afraid. [Sings.]

The ouzel cock° so black of hue,

With orange-tawny bill,

The throstle° with his note so true,

The wren with little quill°—

TITANIA [awaking]. What angel wakes me from my flowery bed?

BOTTOM [sings].

The finch, the sparrow, and the lark,

The plainsong° cuckoo gray,

Whose note full many a man doth mark,

And dares not answer nay°—

For, indeed, who would set his wit to so foolish a bird? Who would give a bird the lie,° though he cry "cuckoo" never so?°

TITANIA. I pray thee, gentle mortal, sing again.

Mine ear is much enamored of thy note;

So is mine eye enthrallèd to thy shape;

And thy fair virtue's force° perforce doth move me

On the first view to say, to swear, I love thee.

BOTTOM. Methinks, mistress, you should have little reason for that. And yet, to say the truth, reason and love keep little company together nowadays. The more the pity that some honest neighbors will not make them friends. Nay, I can gleek° upon occasion.

TITANIA. Thou art as wise as thou art beautiful.

BOTTOM. Not so, neither. But if I had wit enough to get out of this wood, I have enough to serve mine own turn.°

TITANIA. Out of this wood do not desire to go.

Thou shalt remain here, whether thou wilt or no.

I am a spirit of no common rate.°

The summer still° doth tend upon my state,°

And I do love thee. Therefore go with me.

I'll give thee fairies to attend on thee

And they shall fetch thee jewels from the deep,

And sing while thou on pressèd flowers dost sleep.

And I will purge thy mortal grossness° so

That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.

Peaseblossom, Cobweb, Mote,° and Mustardseed!

Enter four FAIRIES *[*PEASEBLOSSOM, COBWEB, MOTE, and MUSTARDSEED*]*.

PEASEBLOSSOM. Ready.

COBWEB. And I.

MOTE. And I.

MUSTARDSEED. And I.

ALL. Where shall we go?

TITANIA. Be kind and courteous to this gentleman.

Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes;°

Feed him with apricots and dewberries,°

With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries;

The honey bags steal from the humble-bees,

And for night tapers crop their waxen thighs

And light them at the fiery glowworms' eyes,

To have my love to bed and to arise;

And pluck the wings from painted butterflies

To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes.

Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

PEASEBLOSSOM. Hail, mortal!

COBWEB. Hail!

MOTE. Hail!

MUSTARDSEED. Hail!

BOTTOM. I cry your worships mercy, heartily. I beseech your worship's name.

COBWEB. Cobweb.

BOTTOM. I shall desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Cobweb. If I cut my finger, I shall make bold with you.°—Your name, honest gentleman?

PEASEBLOSSOM. Peaseblossom.

BOTTOM. I pray you, commend me to Mistress Squash,° your mother, and to Master Peascod,° your father. Good Master Peaseblossom, I shall desire you of more acquaintance too.—Your name, I beseech you, sir?

MUSTARDSEED. Mustardseed.

BOTTOM. Good Master Mustardseed I know your patience° well. That same cowardly giantlike ox-beef hath devoured many a gentleman of your house. I promise you, your kindred hath made my eyes water° ere now. I desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Mustardseed.

TITANIA. Come, wait upon him; lead him to my bower.

The moon methinks looks with a watery eye;
And when she weeps,° weeps every little flower,
Lamenting some enforcèd° chastity.
Tie up my lover's tongue,° bring him silently.

[Exeunt.]

3.2 Enter [OBERON,] King of Fairies.

OBERON. I wonder if Titania be awaked;
Then what it was that next came in her eye,
Which she must dote on in extremity.

[Enter] ROBIN GOODFELLOW [PUCK].

Here comes my messenger. How now, mad spirit?

What night-rule° now about this haunted° grove?

PUCK. My mistress with a monster is in love.

Near to her close° and consecrated bower,

While she was in her dull° and sleeping hour,

A crew of patches,° rude mechanicals,°

That work for bread upon Athenian stalls,°

Were met together to rehearse a play

Intended for great Theseus' nuptial day.

The shallowest thick-skin of that barren sort,°

Who Pyramus presented° in their sport,

Forsook his scene° and entered in a brake.

When I did him at this advantage take,

An ass's noll° I fixèd on his head.

Anon his Thisbe must be answered,

And forth my mimic° comes. When they him spy,

As wild geese that the creeping fowler° eye,

Or russet-pated choughs,° many in sort,°

Rising and cawing at the gun's report,

Sever° themselves and madly sweep the sky,

So, at his sight, away his fellows fly;

And, at our stamp, here o'er and o'er one falls;

He "Murder!" cries and help from Athens calls.

Their sense thus weak, lost with their fears thus strong,

Made senseless things begin to do them wrong,

For briers and thorns at their apparel snatch;

Some, sleeves—some, hats; from yielders all things catch.°

I led them on in this distracted fear

And left sweet Pyramus translated there,

When in that moment, so it came to pass,

Titania waked and straightway loved an ass.

OBERON. This falls out better than I could devise.

But hast thou yet latched° the Athenian's eyes

With the love juice, as I did bid thee do?

PUCK. I took him sleeping—that is finished too—

And the Athenian woman by his side,

That, when he waked, of force° she must be eyed.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HERMIA.

OBERON. Stand close. This is the same Athenian.

PUCK. This is the woman, but not this the man.

[They stand aside.]

DEMETRIUS. O, why rebuke you him that loves you so?

Lay breath so bitter on your bitter foe.

HERMIA. Now I but chide; but I should use thee worse,

For thou, I fear, hast given me cause to curse.

If thou hast slain Lysander in his sleep,

Being o'er shoes° in blood, plunge in the deep,

And kill me too.

The sun was not so true unto the day

As he to me. Would he have stolen away

From sleeping Hermia? I'll believe as soon

This whole° earth may be bored, and that the moon

May through the center creep, and so displease

Her brother's° noontide with th' Antipodes.°

It cannot be but thou hast murdered him;

So should a murderer look, so dead,° so grim.

DEMETRIUS. So should the murdered look, and so should I Pierced through the heart with your stern cruelty.
Yet you, the murderer, look as bright, as clear,
As yonder Venus in her glimmering sphere.
HERMIA. What's this to° my Lysander? Where is he?
Ah, good Demetrius, wilt thou give him me?
DEMETRIUS. I had rather give his carcass to my hounds.
HERMIA. Out, dog! Out, cur! Thou driv'st me past the bounds
Of maiden's patience. Hast thou slain him, then?
Henceforth be never numbered among men.
O, once tell true, tell true, even for my sake:
Durst thou have looked upon him being awake?
And hast thou killed him sleeping? O brave touch!°
Could not a worm,° an adder, do so much?
An adder did it; for with doubler tongue
Than thine, thou serpent, never adder stung.
DEMETRIUS. You spend your passion° on a misprised mood.°
I am not guilty of Lysander's blood,
Nor is he dead, for aught that I can tell.
HERMIA. I pray thee, tell me then that he is well.
DEMETRIUS. An if I could, what should I get therefor?
HERMIA. A privilege never to see me more.
And from thy hated presence part I so.
See me no more, whether he be dead or no. Exit.
DEMETRIUS. There is no following her in this fierce vein.
Here therefore for a while I will remain.
So sorrow's heaviness doth heavier° grow
For debt that bankrupt° sleep doth sorrow owe;

Which now in some slight measure it will pay,

If for his tender here I make some stay.° Lie[s] down [and sleeps].

OBERON. What hast thou done? Thou hast mistaken quite

And laid the love juice on some true love's sight.

Of thy misprision° must perforce ensue

Some true love turned, and not a false turned true.

PUCK. Then fate o'errules, that, one man holding troth,°

A million fail, confounding oath on oath.°

OBERON. About the wood go swifter than the wind,

And Helena of Athens look° thou find.

All fancy-sick° she is and pale of cheer°

With sighs of love, that cost the fresh blood° dear.

By some illusion see thou bring her here.

I'll charm his eyes against she do appear.°

PUCK. I go. I go, look how I go,

Swifter than arrow from the Tartar's bow.° [Exit.]

OBERON [applying love juice to Demetrius' eyes].

Flower of this purple dye,

Hit with Cupid's archery,

Sink in apple of his eye.

When his love he doth espy,

Let her shine as gloriously

As the Venus of the sky.

When thou wak'st, if she be by,

Beg of her for remedy.

Enter PUCK.

PUCK. Captain of our fairy band,

Helena is here at hand,

And the youth, mistook by me,

Pleading for a lover's fee.°

Shall we their fond pageant° see?

Lord, what fools these mortals be!

OBERON. Stand aside. The noise they make

Will cause Demetrius to awake.

PUCK. Then will two at once woo one;

That must needs be sport alone.°

And those things do best please me

That befall preposterously.°

[They stand aside.]

Enter LYSANDER and HELENA.

LYSANDER. Why should you think that I should woo in scorn?

Scorn and derision never come in tears.

Look when° I vow, I weep; and vows so born,

In their nativity all truth appears.°

How can these things in me seem scorn to you,

Bearing the badge° of faith to prove them true?

HELENA. You do advance° your cunning more and more.

When truth kills truth,° O, devilish-holy fray!

These vows are Hermia's. Will you give her o'er?

Weigh oath with oath, and you will nothing weigh.

Your vows to her and me, put in two scales,

Will even weigh, and both as light as tales.°

LYSANDER. I had no judgment when to her I swore.

HELENA. Nor none, in my mind, now you give her o'er.

LYSANDER. Demetrius loves her, and he loves not you.

DEMETRIUS [awaking]. O Helen, goddess, nymph, perfect, divine!

To what, my love, shall I compare thine eyne?
Crystal is muddy. O, how ripe in show°
Thy lips, those kissing cherries, tempting grow!
That pure congealèd white, high Taurus'° snow,
Fanned with the eastern wind, turns to a crow°
When thou hold'st up thy hand. O, let me kiss
This princess of pure white, this seal° of bliss!
HELENA. O spite! O hell! I see you all are bent
To set against° me for your merriment.
If you were civil and knew courtesy,
You would not do me thus much injury.
Can you not hate me, as I know you do,
But you must join in souls to mock me too?
If you were men, as men you are in show,
You would not use a gentle lady so—
To vow, and swear, and superpraise° my parts,°
When I am sure you hate me with your hearts.
You both are rivals, and love Hermia;
And now both rivals, to mock Helena.
A trim° exploit, a manly enterprise,
To conjure tears up in a poor maid's eyes
With your derision! None of noble sort°
Would so offend a virgin and extort°
A poor soul's patience, all to make you sport.
LYSANDER. You are unkind, Demetrius. Be not so;
For you love Hermia; this you know I know.
And here, with all good will, with all my heart,
In Hermia's love I yield you up my part;

And yours of Helena to me bequeath,

Whom I do love and will do till my death.

HELENA. Never did mockers waste more idle breath.

DEMETRIUS. Lysander, keep thy Hermia; I will none.°

If e'er I loved her, all that love is gone.

My heart to her but as guest-wise sojourned,°

And now to Helen is it home returned,

There to remain.

LYSANDER. Helen, it is not so.

DEMETRIUS. Disparage not the faith thou dost not know,

Lest, to thy peril, thou aby° it dear.

Look where thy love comes; yonder is thy dear.

Enter HERMIA.

HERMIA. Dark night, that from the eye his° function takes,

The ear more quick of apprehension makes;

Wherein it doth impair the seeing sense

It pays the hearing double recompense.

Thou art not by mine eye, Lysander, found;

Mine ear, I thank it, brought me to thy sound.

But why unkindly didst thou leave me so?

LYSANDER. Why should he stay whom love doth press to go?

HERMIA. What love could press Lysander from my side?

LYSANDER. Lysander's love, that would not let him bide—

Fair Helena, who more engilds° the night

Than all yon fiery oes° and eyes of light.

Why seek'st thou me? Could not this make thee know,

The hate I bear thee made me leave thee so?

HERMIA. You speak not as you think. It cannot be.

HELENA. Lo, she is one of this confederacy!

Now I perceive they have conjoined all three

To fashion this false sport in spite of me.°

Injurious Hermia, most ungrateful maid!

Have you conspired, have you with these contrived°

To bait° me with this foul derision?

Is all the counsel° that we two have shared,

The sisters' vows, the hours that we have spent,

When we have chid the hasty-footed time

For parting us—O, is all forgot?

All schooldays' friendship, childhood innocence?

We, Hermia, like two artificial° gods,

Have with our needles created both one flower,

Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,

Both warbling of one song, both in one key,

As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds

Had been incorporate.° So we grew together

Like to a double cherry, seeming parted

But yet an union in partition,

Two lovely° berries molded on one stem;

So with two seeming bodies but one heart,

Two of the first, like coats in heraldry,

Due but to one and crowned with one crest.°

And will you rend our ancient love asunder

To join with men in scorning your poor friend?

It is not friendly, tis not maidenly.

Our sex, as well as I, may chide you for it,

Though I alone do feel the injury.

HERMIA. I am amazèd at your passionate words.
I scorn you not. It seems that you scorn me.
HELENA. Have you not set Lysander, as in scorn,
To follow me and praise my eyes and face?
And made your other love, Demetrius,
Who even but now did spurn me with his foot,
To call me goddess, nymph, divine and rare,
Precious, celestial? Wherefore speaks he this
To her he hates? And wherefore doth Lysander Deny your love, so rich within his soul,
And tender° me, forsooth, affection,
But by your setting on, by your consent?
What though I be not so in grace° as you,
So hung upon with love, so fortunate,
But miserable most, to love unloved?
This you should pity rather than despise.
HERMIA. I understand not what you mean by this.
HELENA. Ay, do! Persever, counterfeit sad° looks,
Make mouths° upon° me when I turn my back.
Wink each at other, hold the sweet jest up.°
This sport, well carried,° shall be chronicled.
If you have any pity, grace, or manners,
You would not make me such an argument.°
But fare ye well. 'Tis partly my own fault,
Which death, or absence, soon shall remedy.
LYSANDER. Stay, gentle Helena; hear my excuse,
My love, my life, my soul, fair Helena!
HELENA. O excellent!

HERMIA [to LYSANDER]. Sweet, do not scorn her so.

DEMETRIUS. If she cannot entreat,° I can compel.

LYSANDER. Thou canst compel no more than she entreat.

Thy threats have no more strength than her weak prayers.

Helen, I love thee, by my life I do!

I swear by that which I will lose for thee,

To prove him false that says I love thee not.

DEMETRIUS. I say I love thee more than he can do.

LYSANDER. If thou say so, withdraw, and prove it too.

DEMETRIUS. Quick, come!

HERMIA. Lysander, whereto tends all this?

LYSANDER. Away, you Ethiop!°

[He tries to break away from HERMIA.]

DEMETRIUS. No, no; he'll

Seem to break loose; take on as° you would follow,

But yet come not. You are a tame man, go!

LYSANDER. Hang off,° thou cat, thou burr! Vile thing, let loose,

Or I will shake thee from me like a serpent!

HERMIA. Why are you grown so rude? What change is this,

Sweet love?

LYSANDER. Thy love? Out, tawny Tartar, out!

Out, loathèd med'cine!° O hated potion, hence!

HERMIA. Do you not jest?

HELENA. Yes, sooth,° and so do you.

LYSANDER. Demetrius, I will keep my word with thee.

DEMETRIUS. I would I had your bond, for I perceive

A weak bond° holds you. I'll not trust your word.

LYSANDER. What, should I hurt her, strike her, kill her dead?

Although I hate her, I'll not harm her so.

HERMIA. What, can you do me greater harm than hate?
Hate me? Wherefore? O me, what news,° my love?
Am not I Hermia? Are not you Lysander?
I am as fair now as I was erewhile.°
Since night you loved me; yet since night you left me.
Why, then you left me—O, the gods forbid!—
In earnest, shall I say?

LYSANDER. Ay, by my life!
And never did desire to see thee more.
Therefore be out of hope, of question, of doubt;
Be certain, nothing truer. 'Tis no jest
That I do hate thee and love Helena.

HERMIA [to HELENA]. O me! You juggler! You cankerblossom!°
You thief of love! What, have you come by night
And stol'n my love's heart from him?

HELENA. Fine, i faith!
Have you no modesty, no maiden shame,
No touch of bashfulness? What, will you tear Impatient answers from my gentle tongue?
Fie, fie! You counterfeit, you puppet,° you!

HERMIA. "Puppet"? Why, so!° Ay, that way goes the game.
Now I perceive that she hath made compare Between our statures: she hath urged her height,
And with her personage, her tall personage,
Her height, forsooth, she hath prevailed with him.
And are you grown so high in his esteem
Because I am so dwarfish and so low?

How low am I, thou painted maypole? Speak!

How low am I? I am not yet so low

But that my nails can reach unto thine eyes.

[She flails at HELENA but is restrained.]

HELENA. I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,

Let her not hurt me. I was never curst;°

I have no gift at all in shrewishness;

I am a right° maid for my cowardice.

Let her not strike me. You perhaps may think,

Because she is something° lower than myself,

That I can match her.

HERMIA. Lower? Hark, again!

HELENA. Good Hermia, do not be so bitter with me.

I evermore did love you, Hermia,

Did ever keep your counsels, never wronged you;

Save that, in love unto Demetrius,

I told him of your stealth° unto this wood.

He followed you; for love I followed him.

But he hath chid me hence° and threatened me

To strike me, spurn me, nay, to kill me too.

And now, so° you will let me quiet go,

To Athens will I bear my folly back

And follow you no further. Let me go.

You see how simple and how fond° I am.

HERMIA. Why, get you gone. Who is ’t that hinders you?

HELENA. A foolish heart, that I leave here behind.

HERMIA. What, with Lysander?

HELENA. With Demetrius.

LYSANDER. Be not afraid; she shall not harm thee, Helena.

DEMETRIUS. No, sir, she shall not, though you take her part.

HELENA. O, when she is angry, she is keen° and shrewd.°

She was a vixen when she went to school,

And though she be but little, she is fierce.

HERMIA. “Little” again? Nothing but “low” and “little”?

Why will you suffer her to flout me thus?

Let me come to her.

LYSANDER. Get you gone, you dwarf!

You minimus,° of hindering knotgrass° made!

You bead, you acorn!

DEMETRIUS. You are too officious

In her behalf that scorns your services.

Let her alone. Speak not of Helena;

Take not her part. For, if thou dost intend°

Never so little show of love to her,

Thou shalt aby° it.

LYSANDER. Now she holds me not;

Now follow, if thou dar’st, to try whose right,

Of thine or mine, is most in Helena.[Exit.]

DEMETRIUS. Follow? Nay, I’ll go with thee, cheek by jowl.°

[Exit, following LYSANDER.]

HERMIA. You, mistress, all this coil° is ’long of° you.

Nay, go not back.°

HELENA. I will not trust you, I,

Nor longer stay in your curst company.

Your hands than mine are quicker for a fray;

My legs are longer, though, to run away. [Exit.]

HERMIA. I am amazed and know not what to say. Exit.

[OBERON and PUCK come forward.]

OBERON. This is thy negligence. Still thou mistak'st,
Or else committ'st thy knaveries willfully.

PUCK. Believe me, king of shadows, I mistook.
Did not you tell me I should know the man
By the Athenian garments he had on?
And so far blameless proves my enterprise
That I have 'nointed an Athenian's eyes;
And so far am I glad it so did sort,°
As° this their jangling I esteem a sport.

OBERON. Thou seest these lovers seek a place to fight.
Hie° therefore, Robin, overcast the night;
The starry welkin° cover thou anon
With drooping fog as black as Acheron,°
And lead these testy rivals so astray
As one come not within another's way.
Like to Lysander sometimes frame thy tongue,
Then stir Demetrius up with bitter wrong;°
And sometimes rail thou like Demetrius.
And from each other look thou lead them thus,
Till o'er their brows death-counterfeiting sleep
With leaden legs and batty° wings doth creep.
Then crush this herb° into Lysander's eye, [Giving herb.]
Whose liquor hath this virtuous° property,
To take from thence all error with his° might
And make his eyeballs roll with wonted° sight.
When they next wake, all this derision°

Shall seem a dream and fruitless vision,

And back to Athens shall the lovers wend

With league whose date° till death shall never end.

Whiles I in this affair do thee employ,

I'll to my queen and beg her Indian boy;

And then I will her charmèd eye release

From monster's view, and all things shall be peace.

PUCK. My fairy lord, this must be done with haste,

For night's swift dragons° cut the clouds full fast,

And yonder shines Aurora's harbinger,°

At whose approach, ghosts, wand'ring here and there,

Troop home to churchyards. Damnèd spirits all,

That in crossways and floods have burial,°

Already to their wormy beds are gone.

For fear lest day should look their shames upon,

They willfully themselves exile from light

And must for aye° consort with black-browed night.

OBERON. But we are spirits of another sort.

I with the Morning's love° have oft made sport,

And, like a forester,° the groves may tread

Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,

Opening on Neptune with fair blessèd beams,

Turns into yellow gold his salt green streams.

But notwithstanding, haste, make no delay.

We may effect this business yet ere day. [Exit.]

PUCK.

Up and down, up and down,

I will lead them up and down.

I am feared in field and town.

Goblin, lead them up and down.

Here comes one.

Enter LYSANDER.

LYSANDER. Where art thou, proud Demetrius? Speak thou now.

PUCK. [mimicking DEMETRIUS].

Here, villain, drawn° and ready. Where art thou?

LYSANDER. I will be with thee straight.°

PUCK. Follow me, then,

To plainer° ground.

*[*LYSANDER wanders about,° following the voice.]

Enter DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS. Lysander! Speak again!

Thou runaway, thou coward, art thou fled?

Speak! In some bush? Where dost thou hide thy head?

PUCK [mimicking LYSANDER].

Thou coward, art thou bragging to the stars,

Telling the bushes that thou look'st for wars,

And wilt not come? Come, recreant;° come, thou child,

I'll whip thee with a rod. He is defiled

That draws a sword on thee.

DEMETRIUS. Yea, art thou there?

PUCK. Follow my voice. We'll try° no manhood here.

Exeunt.

*[*LYSANDER returns.]

LYSANDER. He goes before me and still dares me on.

When I come where he calls, then he is gone.

The villain is much lighter-heeled than I.

I followed fast, but faster he did fly,

That fallen am I in dark uneven way,

And here will rest me. [He lies down.] Come, thou gentle day!

For if but once thou show me thy gray light,

I'll find Demetrius and revenge this spite. [He sleeps.]

[Enter] ROBIN [PUCK] and DEMETRIUS.

PUCK. Ho, ho, ho! Coward, why com'st thou not?

DEMETRIUS. Abide° me, if thou dar'st; for well I wot°

Thou runn'st before me, shifting every place,

And dar'st not stand nor look me in the face.

Where art thou now?

PUCK. Come hither. I am here.

DEMETRIUS. Nay, then, thou mock'st me. Thou shalt buy° this dear,°

If ever I thy face by daylight see.

Now, go thy way. Faintness constraineth me

To measure out my length on this cold bed.

By day's approach look to be visited.

[He lies down and sleeps.]

Enter HELENA.

HELENA. O weary night, O long and tedious night,

Abate° thy hours! Shine comforts from the east,

That I may back to Athens by daylight,

From these that my poor company detest;

And sleep, that sometimes shuts up sorrow's eye,

Steal me awhile from mine own company.

[She lies down and] sleep[s].

PUCK. Yet but three? Come one more;

Two of both kinds makes up four.

Here she comes, curst° and sad.

Cupid is a knavish lad,

Thus to make poor females mad.

[Enter HERMIA.]

HERMIA. Never so weary, never so in woe,

Bedabbled with the dew and torn with briers

I can no further crawl, no further go;

My legs can keep no pace with my desires.

Here will I rest me till the break of day.

Heavens shield Lysander, if they mean a fray!

[She lies down and sleeps.]

PUCK.

On the ground

Sleep sound.

I'll apply

To your eye,

Gentle lover, remedy.

[Squeezing the juice on LYSANDER's eyes.]

When thou wak'st,

Thou tak'st

True delight

In the sight

Of thy former lady's eye;

And the country proverb known,

That every man should take his own,

In your waking shall be shown:

Jack shall have Jill;°

Naught shall go ill;

The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

[Exit. The four sleeping lovers remain.]

4.1 -Enter [TITANIA] Queen of Fairies, and [BOTTOM] the clown, and FAIRIES; and [OBERON,] the King, behind them.

TITANIA. Come, sit thee down upon this flowery bed,

While I thy amiable° cheeks do coy,°

And stick muskroses in thy sleek smooth head,

And kiss thy fair large ears, my gentle joy.

[They recline.]

BOTTOM. Where's Peaseblossom?

PEASEBLOSSOM. Ready.

BOTTOM. Scratch my head, Peaseblossom. Where's Monsieur Cobweb?

COBWEB. Ready.

BOTTOM. Monsieur Cobweb, good monsieur, get you your weapons in your hand, and kill me a red-hipped humble-bee on the top of a thistle; and, good monsieur, bring me the honey bag. Do not fret yourself too much in the action, monsieur, and, good monsieur, have a care the honey bag break not; I would be loath to have you overflown with a honey bag, signor. [Exit COBWEB.] Where's Monsieur Mustardseed?

MUSTARDSEED. Ready.

BOTTOM. Give me your neaf,° Monsieur Mustardseed. Pray you, leave your courtesy,° good monsieur.

MUSTARDSEED. What's your will?

BOTTOM. Nothing, good monsieur, but to help Cavalery° Cobweb° to scratch. I must to the barber's, monsieur, for methinks I am marvelous hairy about the face; and I am such a tender ass, if my hair do but tickle me, I must scratch.

TITANIA. What, wilt thou hear some music, my sweet love?

BOTTOM. I have a reasonable good ear in music. Let's have the tongs and the bones.°

[Music: tongs, rural music.°]

TITANIA. Or say, sweet love, what thou desirest to eat.

BOTTOM. Truly, a peck of provender.° I could munch your good dry oats. Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle° of hay. Good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.°

TITANIA. I have a venturous fairy that shall seek
The squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee new nuts.

BOTTOM. I had rather have a handful or two of dried peas. But, I pray you, let none of your people stir° me. I have an exposition° of sleep come upon me.

TITANIA. Sleep thou, and I will wind thee in my arms.
Fairies, begone, and be all ways° away.

[Exeunt FAIRIES.]

So doth the woodbine the sweet honeysuckle
Gently entwist; the female ivy so Enrings the barky fingers of the elm.
O, how I love thee! How I dote on thee!

[They sleep.]

Enter ROBIN GOODFELLOW [PUCK].

OBERON [coming forward].

Welcome, good Robin. Seest thou this sweet sight?
Her dotage now I do begin to pity.
For, meeting her of late behind the wood,
Seeking sweet favors° for this hateful fool,
I did upbraid her and fall out with her.
For she his hairy temples then had rounded

With coronet of fresh and fragrant flowers;
And that same dew, which sometime° on the buds
Was wont to swell like round and orient pearls,°
Stood now within the pretty flowerets' eyes
Like tears that did their own disgrace bewail.
When I had at my pleasure taunted her,
And she in mild terms begged my patience,
I then did ask of her her changeling child,
Which straight she gave me, and her fairy sent
To bear him to my bower in Fairyland.
And, now I have the boy, I will undo
This hateful imperfection of her eyes.
And, gentle Puck, take this transformèd scalp
From off the head of this Athenian swain,
That he, awaking when the other° do,
May all to Athens back again repair,°
And think no more of this night's accidents
But as the fierce vexation of a dream.
But first I will release the Fairy Queen.

[He squeezes a herb on her eyes.]

Be as thou wast wont to be;
See as thou wast wont to see.
Dian's bud° o'er Cupid's flower
Hath such force and blessèd power.

Now, my Titania, wake you, my sweet queen.

TITANIA [waking]. My Oberon! What visions have I seen!
Methought I was enamored of an ass.

OBERON. There lies your love.

TITANIA. How came these things to pass?

O, how mine eyes do loathe his visage now!

OBERON. Silence awhile. Robin, take off this head.

Titania, music call, and strike more dead

Than common sleep of all these five° the sense.

TITANIA. Music, ho! Music, such as charmeth° sleep!

[Music.]

PUCK [removing the ass head].

Now, when thou wak'st, with thine own fool's eyes peep.

OBERON. Sound, music! Come, my queen, take hands with me,

And rock the ground whereon these sleepers be. [They dance.]

Now thou and I are new in amity,

And will tomorrow midnight solemnly°

Dance in Duke Theseus' house triumphantly,

And bless it to all fair prosperity.

There shall the pairs of faithful lovers be

Wedded, with Theseus, all in jollity.

PUCK.

Fairy King, attend, and mark:

I do hear the morning lark.

OBERON.

Then, my queen, in silence sad,°

Trip we after night's shade.

We the globe can compass soon,

Swifter than the wandering moon.

TITANIA.

Come, my lord, and in our flight

Tell me how it came this night

That I sleeping here was found

With these mortals on the ground. Exeunt.

Wind horn [within].

Enter THESEUS *and all his train; [HIPPOLYTA, EGEUS].*

THESEUS. Go, one of you, find out the forester,

For now our observation° is performed;

And since we have the vaward° of the day,

My love shall hear the music of my hounds.

Uncouple° in the western valley, let them go.

Dispatch, I say, and find the forester. [Exit an Attendant.]

We will, fair queen, up to the mountain's top

And mark the musical confusion

Of hounds and echo in conjunction.

HIPPOLYTA. I was with Hercules and Cadmus° once,

When in a wood of Crete they bayed° the bear

With hounds of Sparta.° Never did I hear

Such gallant chiding;° for, besides the groves,

The skies, the fountains, every region near Seemed all one mutual cry. I never heard

So musical a discord, such sweet thunder.

THESEUS. My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,°

So flewed,° so sanded;° and their heads are hung

With ears that sweep away the morning dew;

Crook-kneed, and dewlapped° like Thessalian bulls;

Slow in pursuit, but matched in mouth like bells,

Each under each.° A cry° more tunable°

Was never holloed to, nor cheered° with horn,

In Crete, in Sparta, nor in Thessaly.

Judge when you hear. [He sees the sleepers.] But, soft!

What nymphs are these?

EGEUS. My lord, this is my daughter here asleep,

And this Lysander; this Demetrius is,

This Helena, old Nedar's Helena.

I wonder of° their being here together.

THESEUS. No doubt they rose up early to observe

The rite of May, and hearing our intent,

Came here in grace of our solemnity.°

But speak, Egeus. Is not this the day

That Hermia should give answer of her choice?

EGEUS. It is, my lord.

THESEUS. Go, bid the huntsmen wake them with their horns.

[Exit an Attendant.]

Shout within. Wind horns. They all start up.

Good morrow, friends. Saint Valentine° is past.

Begin these woodbirds but to couple now?

LYSANDER. Pardon, my lord. [They kneel.]

THESEUS. I pray you all, stand up.

I know you two are rival enemies;

How comes this gentle concord in the world,

That hatred is so far from jealousy°

To sleep by hate and fear no enmity?

LYSANDER. My lord, I shall reply amazedly,

Half sleep, half waking; but as yet, I swear,

I cannot truly say how I came here.

But, as I think—for truly would I speak,

And now I do bethink me, so it is—

I came with Hermia hither. Our intent
Was to be gone from Athens, where° we might,
Without° the peril of the Athenian law—

EGEUS. Enough, enough, my lord; you have enough.
I beg the law, the law, upon his head.
They would have stol'n away; they would, Demetrius,
Thereby to have defeated° you and me,
You of your wife and me of my consent,
Of my consent that she should be your wife.

DEMETRIUS. My lord, fair Helen told me of their stealth,
Of this their purpose hither° to this wood,
And I in fury hither followed them,
Fair Helena in fancy following me.
But, my good lord, I wot not by what power—
But by some power it is—my love to Hermia,
Melted as the snow, seems to me now
As the remembrance of an idle gaud°
Which in my childhood I did dote upon;
And all the faith, the virtue of my heart,
The object and the pleasure of mine eye,
Is only Helena. To her, my lord,
Was I betrothed ere I saw Hermia,
But like a sickness did I loathe this food;
But, as in health, come to my natural taste,
Now I do wish it, love it, long for it,
And will for evermore be true to it.

THESEUS. Fair lovers, you are fortunately met.
Of this discourse we more will hear anon.

Egeus, I will overbear your will;
For in the temple, by and by, with us
These couples shall eternally be knit.
And, for° the morning now is something° worn,
Our purposed hunting shall be set aside.
Away with us to Athens. Three and three,
We'll hold a feast in great solemnity.
Come, Hippolyta.

[Exeunt THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, EGEUS, and train.]

DEMETRIUS. These things seem small and undistinguishable, Like far-off mountains turnèd into clouds.

HERMIA. Methinks I see these things with parted° eye,
When everything seems double.

HELENA. So methinks;
And I have found Demetrius like a jewel,
Mine own, and not mine own.°

DEMETRIUS. Are you sure
That we are awake? It seems to me
That yet we sleep, we dream. Do not you think
The Duke was here, and bid us follow him?

HERMIA. Yea, and my father.

HELENA. And Hippolyta.

LYSANDER. And he did bid us follow to the temple.

DEMETRIUS. Why, then, we are awake. Let's follow him,
And by the way let us recount our dreams. [Exeunt.]

BOTTOM [awaking]. When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.
My next is, "Most fair Pyramus." Heigh—ho! Peter Quince! Flute, the bellows mender! Snout, the tinker! Starveling! God's° my life, stolen hence and left me asleep! I have had a most rare vision. I have had a dream, past the wit of man to say what dream it was. Man is but an ass if he go about° to expound this dream. Methought I was—there is no man can tell what. Methought I was—and methought I had—but man is but a patched° fool if he will offer° to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report,° what my dream was. I will get Peter Quince to write a ballad of this dream. It shall be called "Bottom's Dream," because it hath no bottom; and I will sing it in the latter end of a play, before the Duke. Peradventure, to make it the more gracious, I shall sing it at her° death.

[Exit.]

4.2 Enter QUINCE, FLUTE, *[*SNOUT, and STARVELING*]*.

QUINCE. Have you sent to Bottom's house? Is he come home yet?

STARVELING. He cannot be heard of. Out of doubt he is transported.°

FLUTE. If he come not, then the play is marred. It goes not forward, doth it?

QUINCE. It is not possible. You have not a man in all Athens able to discharge° Pyramus but he.

FLUTE. No, he hath simply the best wit° of any handicraft man in Athens.

QUINCE. Yea, and the best person° too, and he is a very paramour for a sweet voice.

FLUTE. You must say "paragon." A paramour is, God bless us, a thing of naught.°

Enter SNUG the joiner.

SNUG. Masters, the Duke is coming from the temple and there is two or three lords and ladies more married. If our sport had gone forward, we had all been made men.°

FLUTE. O sweet bully Bottom! Thus hath he lost sixpence a day during his life; he could not have scaped sixpence a day. An the Duke had not given him sixpence a day° for playing Pyramus, I'll be hanged. He would have deserved it. Sixpence a day in Pyramus, or nothing.

Enter BOTTOM.

BOTTOM. Where are these lads? Where are these hearts?°

QUINCE. Bottom! O most courageous day! O most happy hour!

BOTTOM. Masters, I am to discourse wonders.° But ask me not what; for if I tell you, I am no true Athenian. I will tell you everything, right as it fell out.

QUINCE. Let us hear, sweet Bottom.

BOTTOM. Not a word of° me. All that I will tell you is—that the Duke hath dined. Get your apparel together, good strings° to your beards, new ribbons to your pumps;° meet presently° at the palace; every man look o'er his part; for the short and the long is, our play is preferred.° In any case, let Thisbe have clean linen; and let not him that plays the lion pare his nails, for they shall hang out for the lion's claws. And, most dear actors, eat no onions nor garlic, for we are to utter sweet breath; and I do not doubt but to hear them say it is a sweet comedy. No more words. Away! Go, away!

[Exeunt.]

5.1 -Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, and PHILOSTRATE [lords, and attendants].

HIPPOLYTA. 'Tis strange, my Theseus, that° these lovers speak of.

THESEUS. More strange than true. I never may° believe

These antique° fables nor these fairy toys.°

Lovers and madmen have such seething brains,

Such shaping fantasies,° that apprehend°

More than cool reason ever comprehends.°

The lunatic, the lover, and the poet

Are of imagination all compact.°

One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;

That is the madman. The lover, all as frantic,

Sees Helen's° beauty in a brow of Egypt.°

The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,

Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.
Such tricks hath strong imagination
That, if it would but apprehend some joy,
It comprehends some bringer° of that joy;
Or in the night, imagining some fear,°
How easy is a bush supposed a bear!

HIPPOLYTA. But all the story of the night told over,
And all their minds transfigured so together,
More witnesseth than fancy's images°
And grows to something of great constancy;°
But, howsoever,° strange and admirable.°

Enter lovers: LYSANDER, DEMETRIUS, HERMIA, and HELENA.

THESEUS. Here come the lovers, full of joy and mirth.
Joy, gentle friends! Joy and fresh days of love Accompany your hearts!

LYSANDER. More than to us
Wait in your royal walks, your board, your bed!

THESEUS. Come now, what masques,° what dances shall we have To wear away this long age of three hours
Between our after-supper and bedtime?
Where is our usual manager of mirth?
What revels are in hand? Is there no play
To ease the anguish of a torturing hour?
Call Philostrate.

PHILOSTRATE. Here, mighty Theseus.

THESEUS. Say what abridgment° have you for this evening?

What masque? What music? How shall we beguile

The lazy time, if not with some delight?

PHILOSTRATE [giving him a paper].

There is a brief° how many sports are ripe.

Make choice of which Your Highness will see first.

THESEUS [reads]. "The battle with the Centaurs,° to be sung

By an Athenian eunuch to the harp"?

We'll none of that. That have I told my love,

In glory of my kinsman° Hercules.

[reads.] "The riot of the tipsy Bacchanals, Tearing the Thracian singer in their rage"?°

That is an old device;° and it was played

When I from Thebes came last a conqueror.

[reads.] "The thrice three Muses mourning for the death

Of Learning, late deceased in beggary"?°

That is some satire, keen and critical,

Not sorting with° a nuptial ceremony.

[reads.] "A tedious brief scene of young Pyramus

And his love Thisbe; very tragical mirth"?

Merry and tragical? Tedious and brief?

That is hot ice and wondrous strange° snow.

How shall we find the concord of this discord?

PHILOSTRATE. A play there is, my lord, some ten words long,

Which is as brief as I have known a play;

But by ten words, my lord, it is too long,

Which makes it tedious. For in all the play

There is not one word apt, one player fitted.

And tragical, my noble lord, it is,

For Pyramus therein doth kill himself.

Which, when I saw rehearsed, I must confess,

Made mine eyes water; but more merry tears

The passion of loud laughter never shed.

THESEUS. What are they that do play it?

PHILOSTRATE. Hard-handed men that work in Athens here,

Which never labored in their minds till now,

And now have toiled° their unbreathed° memories

With this same play, against° your nuptial.

THESEUS. And we will hear it.

PHILOSTRATE. No, my noble lord,

It is not for you. I have heard it over,

And it is nothing, nothing in the world;

Unless you can find sport in their intents,

Extremely stretched° and conned° with cruel pain

To do you service.

THESEUS. I will hear that play;

For never anything can be amiss

When simpleness° and duty tender it.

Go bring them in; and take your places, ladies.

[PHILOSTRATE goes to summon the players.]

HIPPOLYTA. I love not to see wretchedness o'ercharged,°

And duty in his service° perishing.

THESEUS. Why, gentle sweet, you shall see no such thing.

HIPPOLYTA. He says they can do nothing in this kind.°

THESEUS. The kinder we, to give them thanks for nothing.

Our sport shall be to take what they mistake;
And what poor duty cannot do, noble respect°
Takes it in might, not merit.°
Where I have come, great clerks° have purposèd
To greet me with premeditated welcomes;
Where I have seen them shiver and look pale,
Make periods in the midst of sentences,
Throttle their practiced accent° in their fears,
And in conclusion dumbly have broke off,
Not paying me a welcome. Trust me, sweet,
Out of this silence yet I picked a welcome;
And in the modesty of fearful duty
I read as much as from the rattling tongue
Of saucy and audacious eloquence.
Love, therefore, and tongue-tied simplicity
In least° speak most, to my capacity.°

[PHILOSTRATE returns.]

PHILOSTRATE. So please Your Grace, the Prologue° is addressed.°

THESEUS. Let him approach. [A flourish of trumpets.]

Enter the Prologue [QUINCE].

PROLOGUE.

If we offend, it is with our good will.
That you should think, we come not to offend,
But with good will. To show our simple skill,
That is the true beginning of our end.
Consider then, we come but in despite.
We do not come, as minding° to content you,
Our true intent is. All for your delight.

We are not here. That you should here repent you,
The actors are at hand, and, by their show,
You shall know all that you are like to know.

THESEUS. This fellow doth not stand upon points.°

LYSANDER. He hath rid° his prologue like a rough° colt; he knows not the stop.° A good moral, my lord: it is not enough to speak, but to speak true.

HIPPOLYTA. Indeed he hath played on his prologue like a child on a recorder;° a sound, but not in government.°

THESEUS. His speech was like a tangled chain: nothing° impaired, but all disordered. Who is next?

Enter PYRAMUS *[BOTTOM] and* THISBE *[FLUTE], and* WALL *[SNOUT], and* MOONSHINE *[STARVELING], and* LION *[SNUG].*

PROLOGUE.

Gentles, perchance you wonder at this show,
But wonder on, till truth makes all things plain.
This man is Pyramus, if you would know;
This beauteous lady Thisbe is certain.
This man with lime and roughcast doth present
Wall, that vile Wall which did these lovers sunder;
And through Wall's chink, poor souls, they are content
To whisper. At the which let no man wonder.
This man, with lantern, dog, and bush of thorn,
Presenteth Moonshine; for, if you will know,
By moonshine did these lovers think no scorn°
To meet at Ninus' tomb, there, there to woo.
This grisly beast, which Lion hight° by name,
The trusty Thisbe coming first by night
Did scare away, or rather did affright;
And as she fled, her mantle she did fall,°

Which Lion vile with bloody mouth did stain.
Anon comes Pyramus, sweet youth and tall,°
And finds his trusty Thisbe's mantle slain;
Whereat, with blade, with bloody blameful blade,
He bravely broached° his boiling bloody breast.
And Thisbe, tarrying in mulberry shade,
His dagger drew, and died. For all the rest,
Let Lion, Moonshine, Wall, and lovers twain
At large° discourse while here they do remain.

Exeunt LION, THISBE, and MOONSHINE.

THESEUS. I wonder if the lion be to speak.

DEMETRIUS. No wonder, my lord. One lion may, when many asses do.

WALL. In this same interlude° it doth befall
That I, one Snout by name, present a wall;
And such a wall as I would have you think
That had in it a crannied hole or chink,
Through which the lovers, Pyramus and Thisbe,
Did whisper often, very secretly.
This loam, this roughcast, and this stone doth show
That I am that same wall; the truth is so.
And this the cranny is, right and sinister,°
Through which the fearful lovers are to whisper.

THESEUS. Would you desire lime and hair to speak better?

DEMETRIUS. It is the wittiest partition° that ever I heard discourse, my lord.

*[*PYRAMUS comes forward.]

THESEUS. Pyramus draws near the wall. Silence!

PYRAMUS.

O grim-looked° night! O night with hue so black!

O night, which ever art when day is not!

O night, O night! Alack, alack, alack,

I fear my Thisbe's promise is forgot.

And thou, O wall, O sweet, O lovely wall,

That stand'st between her father's ground and mine,

Thou wall, O wall, O sweet and lovely wall,

Show me thy chink to blink through with mine eyne!

[WALL makes a chink with his fingers.]

Thanks, courteous wall. Jove shield thee well for this.

But what see I? No Thisbe do I see.

O wicked wall, through whom I see no bliss!

Cursed by thy stones for thus deceiving me!

THESEUS. The wall, methinks, being sensible,° should curse again.

PYRAMUS. No, in truth, sir, he should not. "Deceiving me" is Thisbe's cue:

she is to enter now, and I am to spy her through the wall. You shall see, it will fall pat° as I told you. Yonder she comes.

Enter THISBE.

THISBE.

O wall, full often hast thou heard my moans,

For parting my fair Pyramus and me.

My cherry lips have often kissed thy stones,

Thy stones with lime and hair knit up in thee.

PYRAMUS.

I see a voice. Now will I to the chink,

To spy an° I can hear my Thisbe's face.

Thisbe!

THISBE. My love! Thou art my love, I think.

PYRAMUS. Think what thou wilt, I am thy lover's grace,°

And like Limander° am I trusty still.

THISBE. And I like Helen,° till the Fates me kill.

PYRAMUS. Not Shafalus to Procrus° was so true.

THISBE. As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.

PYRAMUS. O, kiss me through the hole of this vile wall!

THISBE. I kiss the wall's hole, not your lips at all.

PYRAMUS. Wilt thou at Ninny's tomb meet me straightway?

THISBE. 'Tide° life, 'tide death, I come without delay.

[Exeunt PYRAMUS and THISBE.]

WALL. Thus have I, Wall, my part dischargèd so;

And, being done, thus Wall away doth go. [Exit.]

THESEUS. Now is the mural down between the two neighbors.

DEMETRIUS. No remedy, my lord, when walls are so willful° to hear without warning.°

HIPPOLYTA. This is the silliest stuff that ever I heard.

THESEUS. The best in this kind° are but shadows;° and the worst are no worse, if imagination amend them.

HIPPOLYTA. It must be your imagination then, and not theirs.

THESEUS. If we imagine no worse of them than they of themselves, they may pass for excellent men. Here come two noble beasts in, a man and a lion.

Enter LION and MOONSHINE.

LION.

You, ladies, you whose gentle hearts do fear
The smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor,
May now perchance both quake and tremble here,
When lion rough in wildest rage doth roar.
Then know that I, as Snug the joiner, am
A lion fell,° nor else no lion's dam;

For, if I should as lion come in strife

Into this place, 'twere pity on my life.

THESEUS. A very gentle beast, and of a good conscience.

DEMETRIUS. The very best at a beast, my lord, that e'er I saw.

LYSANDER. This lion is a very fox for his valor.°

THESEUS. True; and a goose for his discretion.°

DEMETRIUS. Not so, my lord; for his valor cannot carry his discretion; and the fox carries the goose.

THESEUS. His discretion, I am sure, cannot carry his valor; for the goose carries not the fox. It is well. Leave it to his discretion, and let us listen to the moon.

MOON. This lanthorn° doth the hornèd moon present—

DEMETRIUS. He should have worn the horns on his head.°

THESEUS. He is no crescent, and his horns are invisible within the circumference.

MOON. This lanthorn doth the hornèd moon present;

Myself the man i' the moon do seem to be.

THESEUS. This is the greatest error of all the rest. The man should be put into the lanthorn. How is it else the man i' the moon?

DEMETRIUS. He dares not come there for the° candle, for you see, it is already in snuff.°

HIPPOLYTA. I am aweary of this moon. Would he would change!

THESEUS. It appears, by his small light of discretion, that he is in the wane; but yet, in courtesy, in all reason, we must stay the time.

LYSANDER. Proceed, Moon.

MOON. All that I have to say is to tell you that the lanthorn is the moon, I the man i' the moon, this thornbush my thornbush, and this dog my dog.

DEMETRIUS. Why, all these should be in the lanthorn, for all these are in the moon. But silence! Here comes Thisbe.

Enter THISBE.

THISBE. This is old Ninny's tomb. Where is my love?

LION [roaring]. O!

DEMETRIUS. Well roared, Lion.

*[*THISBE runs off, dropping her mantle.]

THESEUS. Well run, Thisbe.

HIPPOLYTA. Well shone, Moon. Truly, the moon shines with a good grace.

[The LION worries THISBE*'s mantle.]*

THESEUS. Well moused,° Lion.

Enter PYRAMUS. [Exit LION.]

DEMETRIUS. And then came Pyramus.

LYSANDER. And so the lion vanished.

PYRAMUS.

Sweet Moon, I thank thee for thy sunny beams;
I thank thee, Moon, for shining now so bright;
For, by thy gracious, golden, glittering gleams,
I trust to take of truest Thisbe sight.
But stay, O spite!
But mark, poor knight,
What dreadful dole° is here?
Eyes, do you see?
How can it be?
O dainty duck! O dear!
Thy mantle good,
What, stained with blood!
Approach, ye Furies° fell!°
O Fates,° come, come,
Cut thread and thrum;°

Quail,° crush, conclude, and quell!°

THESEUS. This passion, and the death of a dear friend, would go near to make a man look sad.°

HIPPOLYTA. Beshrew my heart, but I pity the man.

PYRAMUS. O, wherefore, Nature, didst thou lions frame?
Since lion vile hath here deflowered my dear,
Which is—no, no, which was—the fairest dame
That lived, that loved, that liked, that looked with cheer.°
Come, tears, confound,
Out, sword, and wound
The pap° of Pyramus;
Ay, that left pap,
Where heart doth hop. [He stabs himself.]
Thus die I, thus, thus, thus.
Now am I dead,
Now am I fled;
My soul is in the sky.
Tongue, lose thy light;
Moon, take thy flight. [Exit MOONSHINE.]
Now die, die, die, die, die. [PYRAMUS dies.]

DEMETRIUS. No die, but an ace,° for him; for he is but one.°

LYSANDER. Less than an ace, man; for he is dead, he is nothing.

THESEUS. With the help of a surgeon he might yet recover, and yet prove an ass.°

HIPPOLYTA. How chance Moonshine is gone before Thisbe comes back and finds her lover?

THESEUS. She will find him by starlight.

[Enter THISBE.]

Here she comes, and her passion ends the play.

HIPPOLYTA. Methinks she should not use a long one for such a Pyramus.

I hope she will be brief.

DEMETRIUS. A mote° will turn the balance, which Pyramus, which° Thisbe, is the better: he for a man, God warrant us; she for a woman, God bless us.

LYSANDER. She hath spied him already with those sweet eyes.

DEMETRIUS. And thus she means,° videlicet:°

THISBE.

Asleep, my love?
What, dead, my dove?
O Pyramus, arise!
Speak, speak. Quite dumb?
Dead, dead? A tomb
Must cover thy sweet eyes.
These lily lips,
This cherry nose,
These yellow cowslip cheeks,
Are gone, are gone!
Lovers, make moan.
His eyes were green as leeks.
O Sisters Three,°
Come, come to me,
With hands as pale as milk;
Lay them in gore,
Since you have shore°
With shears his thread of silk.
Tongue, not a word.

Come, trusty sword,

Come, blade, my breast imbrue!° [Stabs herself.]

And farewell, friends.

Thus Thisbe ends.

Adieu, adieu, adieu. [She dies.]

THESEUS. Moonshine and Lion are left to bury the dead.

DEMETRIUS. Ay, and Wall too.

BOTTOM [starting up, as FLUTE does also]. No, I assure you, the wall is down that parted their fathers. Will it please you to see the epilogue, or to hear a Bergomask dance° between two of our company?

[The other players enter.]

THESEUS. No epilogue, I pray you; for your play needs no excuse. Never excuse; for when the players are all dead, there need none to be blamed. Marry, if he that writ it had played Pyramus and hanged himself in Thisbe's garter, it would have been a fine tragedy; and so it is, truly, and very notably discharged. But, come, your Bergomask. Let your epilogue alone. [A dance.]

The iron tongue° of midnight hath told° twelve.

Lovers, to bed, 'tis almost fairy time.

I fear we shall outsleep the coming morn

As much as we this night have overwatched.°

This palpable-gross° play hath well beguiled

The heavy° gait of night. Sweet friends, to bed.

A fortnight hold we this solemnity,

In nightly revels and new jollity. Exeunt.

Enter PUCK [carrying a broom].

PUCK.

Now the hungry lion roars,

And the wolf behowls the moon;

Whilst the heavy° plowman snores,
All with weary task fordone.°
Now the wasted brands° do glow,
Whilst the screech owl, screeching loud
Puts the wretch that lies in woe
In remembrance of a shroud.
Now it is the time of night
That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth his sprite,°
In the church-way paths to glide.
And we fairies, that do run
By the triple Hecate's° team
From the presence of the sun,
Following darkness like a dream,
Now are frolic.° Not a mouse
Shall disturb this hallowed house.
I am sent with broom before,
To sweep the dust behind° the door.

*Enter [*OBERON and TITANIA,] King and Queen of Fairies, with all their train.

OBERON.

Through the house give glimmering light,
By the dead and drowsy fire;
Every elf and fairy sprite
Hop as light as bird from brier;
And this ditty, after me,
Sing, and dance it trippingly.

TITANIA.

First, rehearse your song by rote,

To each word a warbling note.

Hand in hand, with fairy grace,

Will we sing, and bless this place.

[Song and dance.]

OBERON. Now, until the break of day,

Through this house each fairy stray.

To the best bride-bed will we,

Which by us shall blessèd be;

And the issue there create°

Ever shall be fortunate.

So shall all the couples three Ever true in loving be;

And the blots of Nature's hand

Shall not in their issue stand;

Never mole, harelip, nor scar,

Nor mark prodigious,° such as are

Despisèd in nativity,

Shall upon their children be.

With this field dew consecrate°

Every fairy take his gait,°

And each several° chamber bless,

Through this palace, with sweet peace;

And the owner of it blest

Ever shall in safety rest.

Trip away; make no stay;

Meet me all by break of day.

Exeunt [OBERON, TITANIA, and train].

PUCK [to the audience]. If we shadows have offended,

Think but this, and all is mended,
That you have but slumbered here°
While these visions did appear.
And this weak and idle theme,
No more yielding but° a dream,
Gentles, do not reprehend.
If you pardon, we will mend.°
And, as I am an honest Puck,
If we have unearnèd luck
Now to scape the serpents tongue,°
We will make amends ere long;
Else the Puck a liar call.
So, good night unto you all.
Give me your hands,° if we be friends,
And Robin shall restore amends.° [Exit.]

Act 1

1. -On the basis of the first scene, how would you characterize Theseus? Egeus? Hermia? Do you agree with some critics that Egeus is presented comically? (Support your view.)
2. -What connections can you make between 1.2 and the first scene?

Act 2

1. -Why do you suppose that in 2.1 Shakespeare included material about Theseus's past (lines 76–80)?
2. -When the play is staged, audiences invariably laugh loudly at 2.2.109, when Lysander awakens and sees Helena. What's so funny about this?

Act 3

1. -What assumptions does Bottom seem to make about the nature of drama? How do they compare with your own?
2. -Puck himself has said that he is mischievous, but how mischievous is he? Why did he anoint the eyes of the wrong lover?

Act 4

1. -Bottom is the only mortal who sees the fairies. What can we make of this? Or should we not try to make anything of it?

Act 5

1. -What do you make of the debate between Theseus and Hippolyta (lines 1–27)? Which of the two seems to you to come closer to the truth? Explain.
2. -Do you think it is cruel to laugh at the unintentional antics of the rustic performers? Why, or why not?
3. -Puck is sometimes played by a woman. What advantages or disadvantages do you see to giving the part to a woman?

General Questions

1. -Some critics speak of the play as a delightful fantasy that is engaging because it has so little connection with real life, but others find in it intimations of dark and dangerous elements in human beings. Where do you stand, and why?
2. -Today Shakespeare's plays are sometimes done in modern dress or in costumes that reflect a particular time and place, such as the Wild West of the mid-nineteenth century or the South before the Civil War. How would you costume the play? What advantages might there be in your choice?

*A character who is dominated by a single trait—avarice, jealousy, timidity, and so forth—is sometimes called a humor character. Medieval and Renaissance psychology held that an individual's personality depended on the mixture of four liquids (humors): blood (Latin: sanguis), choler, phlegm, and bile. An overabundance of one fluid produced a dominant trait, and even today "sanguine," "choleric," "phlegmatic," and "bilious" describe personalities.

Not all comedy, of course, depends on humor characters placed in situations that exhibit their absurdity. High comedy is largely verbal, depending on witty language; farce, at the other extreme, is dependent on inherently ludicrous situations—for example, a hobo is mistaken for a millionaire. Situation comedy, then, may use humor characters, but it need not do so.

William Shakespeare

Chapter 31 / Comedy

A Midsummer Night's Dream was first published in 1600 in a small book of a type called a quarto. A second quarto edition, printed in 1616 but based on the 1600 text, introduces a few corrections, but it also introduces many errors. The 1619 text in turn was the basis for the text in the first collected edition of Shakespeare's plays, the First Folio (1623). Bevington's edition is of course based on the text of 1600, but it includes a few corrections, and it modifies the punctuation in accordance with modern usage. Material added by the editor, such as amplifications in the dramatis personae, is enclosed within square brackets [ ].*

Two Plays About Marriage

Probably most of us think of marriage chiefly in romantic terms—

Love and marriage, love and marriage

Go together like a horse and carriage—

but history tells us that in most Western societies marriage has been a way for males to transfer their property and their power to their offspring. Men could sow their wild oats, but women were expected to be faithful. Speaking generally, the husband provided food and shelter, and the wife—sometimes regarded as not much more than a property of her husband—bore and reared his children, and the male offspring would inherit the estate.

Amazingly, in popular culture as evinced by cartoons and jokes, women set out to entrap men, and the man is the long-suffering member of the team. A recent cartoon, for instance, showed a husband looking up from his newspaper and saying to his stern-faced wife, "Gay marriage! Haven't they already suffered enough?" Mother-in-law jokes (it is always the wife's mother who is damaging the marriage) are another sign of the widespread view that in marriage the husband is the disadvantaged party.

In this chapter we present two dramatists who explore the nature of marriage in our time. We say "in our time," but even Clare Boothe Luce's play is more than thirty years old, and Henrik Ibsen's is more than a hundred years old. Read the plays, and then ask yourself if either is dated.

HENRIK IBSEN

Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906) was born in Skien, Norway, of wealthy parents who soon after his birth lost their money. Ibsen worked as a pharmacist's apprentice, but at the age of 22 he had written his first play, a promising melodrama entitled Cataline. He engaged in theater work first in Norway and then in Denmark and Germany. By 1865 his plays had won him a state pension that enabled him to settle in Rome. After writing romantic, historic, and poetic plays, he turned to realistic drama with The League of Youth (1869). Among his major realistic "problem plays" are A Doll's House (1879), Ghosts (1881), and An Enemy of the People (1882). In The Wild Duck (1884) he moved toward a more symbolic tragic comedy, and his last plays, written in the nineties, are highly symbolic. Hedda Gabler (1890) looks backward to the plays of the eighties rather than forward to the plays of the nineties.

Act I

A pleasant room, tastefully but not expensively furnished. On the back wall, one door on the right leads to the entrance hall, a second door on the left leads to HELMER*'s study. Between these two doors, a piano. In the middle of the left wall, a door; and downstage from it, a window. Near the window a round table with armchairs and a small sofa. In the right wall, upstage, a door; and on the same wall downstage, a porcelain stove with a couple of armchairs and a rocking chair. Between the stove and the door a small table. Etchings on the walls. A whatnot with china and other small objects d'art; a small bookcase with books in handsome bindings. Carpet on the floor; a fire burns in the stove. A winter's day.*

The front doorbell rings in the hall; a moment later, there is the sound of the front door being opened. NORA comes into the room, happily humming to herself. She is dressed in her outdoor things, and is carrying lots of parcels which she then puts down on the table, right. She leaves the door into the hall standing open; a PORTER can be seen outside holding a Christmas tree and a basket; he hands them to the MAID who has opened the door for them.

NORA. Hide the Christmas tree away carefully, Helene. The children mustn't see it till this evening when it's decorated. [To the PORTER, taking out her purse.] How much?

PORTER. Fifty öre.

NORA. There's a crown. Keep the change.

[The PORTER thanks her and goes. NORA shuts the door. She continues to laugh quietly and happily to herself as she takes off her things. She takes a bag of macaroons out of her pocket and eats one or two; then she walks stealthily across and listens at her husband's door.]

NORA. Yes, he's in.

[She begins humming again as she walks over to the table, right.]

HELMER [in his study]. Is that my little skylark chirruping out there?

NORA [busy opening some of the parcels]. Yes, it is.

HELMER. Is that my little squirrel frisking about?

NORA. Yes!

HELMER. When did my little squirrel get home?

NORA. Just this minute. [She stuffs the bag of macaroons in her pocket and wipes her mouth.] Come on out, Torvald, and see what I've bought.

HELMER. I don't want to be disturbed! [A moment later, he opens the door and looks out, his pen in his hand.] "Bought," did you say? All that? Has my little spendthrift been out squandering money again?

NORA. But, Torvald, surely this year we can spread ourselves just a little. This is the first Christmas we haven't had to go carefully.

HELMER. Ah, but that doesn't mean we can afford to be extravagant, you know.

NORA. Oh yes, Torvald, surely we can afford to be just a little bit extravagant now, can't we? Just a teeny-weeny bit. You are getting quite a good salary now, and you are going to earn lots and lots of money.

HELMER. Yes, after the New Year. But it's going to be three whole months before the first pay cheque comes in.

NORA. Pooh! We can always borrow in the meantime.

HELMER. Nora! [Crosses to her and takes her playfully by the ear.] Here we go again, you and your frivolous ideas! Suppose I went and borrowed a thousand crowns today, and you went and spent it all over Christmas, then on New Year's Eve a slate fell and hit me on the head and there I was. . . .

NORA [putting her hand over his mouth]. Sh! Don't say such horrid things.

HELMER. Yes, but supposing something like that did happen . . . what then?

NORA. If anything as awful as that did happen, I wouldn't care if I owed anybody anything or not.

HELMER. Yes, but what about the people I'd borrowed from?

NORA. Them? Who cares about them! They are only strangers!

HELMER. Nora, Nora! Just like a woman! Seriously though, Nora, you know what I think about these things. No debts! Never borrow! There's always something inhibited, something unpleasant, about a home built on credit and borrowed money. We two have managed to stick it out so far, and that's the way we'll go on for the little time that remains.

NORA [walks over to the stove]. Very well, just as you say, Torvald.

HELMER [following her]. There, there! My little singing bird mustn't go drooping her wings, eh? Has it got the sulks, that little squirrel of mine? [Takes out his wallet.] Nora, what do you think I've got here?

NORA [quickly turning round]. Money!

HELMER. There! [He hands her some notes]. Good heavens, I know only too well how Christmas runs away with the housekeeping.

NORA [counts]. Ten, twenty, thirty, forty. Oh, thank you, thank you, Torvald! This will see me quite a long way.

HELMER. Yes, it'll have to.

NORA. Yes, yes, I'll see that it does. But come over here, I want to show you all the things I've bought.

And so cheap! Look, some new clothes for Ivar . . . and a little sword. There's a horse and a trumpet for Bob. And a doll and a doll's cot for Emmy. They are not very grand but she'll have them all broken before long anyway. And I've got some dress material and some handkerchiefs for the maids. Though, really, dear old Anne Marie should have had something better.

HELMER. And what's in this parcel here?

NORA [shrieking]. No, Torvald! You mustn't see that till tonight!

HELMER. All right. But tell me now, what did my little spendthrift fancy for herself?

NORA. For me? Puh, I don't really want anything.

HELMER. Of course you do. Anything reasonable that you think you might like, just tell me.

NORA. Well, I don't really know. As a matter of fact, though, Torvald . . .

HELMER. Well?

NORA [toying with his coat buttons, and without looking at him]. If you did want to give me something, you could . . . you could always . . .

HELMER. Well, well, out with it!

NORA [quickly]. You could always give me money, Torvald. Only what you think you could spare. And then I could buy myself something with it later on.

HELMER. But Nora. . . .

NORA. Oh, please, Torvald dear! Please! I beg you. Then I'd wrap the money up in some pretty gilt paper and hang it on the Christmas tree. Wouldn't that be fun?

HELMER. What do we call my pretty little pet when it runs away with all the money?

NORA. I know, I know, we call it a spendthrift. But please let's do what I said, Torvald. Then I'll have a bit of time to think about what I need most. Isn't that awfully sensible, now, eh?

HELMER [smiling]. Yes, it is indeed—that is, if only you really could hold on to the money I gave you, and really did buy something for yourself with it. But it just gets mixed up with the housekeeping and frittered away on all sorts of useless things, and then I have to dig into my pocket all over again.

NORA. Oh but, Torvald. . . .

HELMER. You can't deny it, Nora dear. [Puts his arm round her waist.] My pretty little pet is very sweet, but it runs away with an awful lot of money. It's incredible how expensive it is for a man to keep such a pet.

NORA. For shame! How can you say such a thing? As a matter of fact I save everything I can.

HELMER [laughs]. Yes, you are right there. Everything you can. But you simply can't.

NORA [hums and smiles quietly and happily]. Ah, if you only knew how many expenses the likes of us skylarks and squirrels have, Torvald!

HELMER. What a funny little one you are! Just like your father. Always on the lookout for money, wherever you can lay your hands on it; but as soon as you've got it, it just seems to slip through your fingers. You never seem to know what you've done with it. Well, one must accept you as you are. It's in the blood. Oh yes, it is, Nora. That sort of thing is hereditary.

NORA. Oh, I only wish I'd inherited a few more of Daddy's qualities.

HELMER. And I wouldn't want my pretty little songbird to be the least bit different from what she is now. But come to think of it, you look rather . . . rather . . . how shall I put it?. . . rather guilty today. . . .

NORA. Do I?

HELMER. Yes, you do indeed. Look me straight in the eye.

NORA [looks at him]. Well?

HELMER [wagging his finger at her]. My little sweet-tooth surely didn't forget herself in town today?

NORA. No, whatever makes you think that?

HELMER. She didn't just pop into the confectioner's for a moment?

NORA. No, I assure you, Torvald . . . !

HELMER. Didn't try sampling the preserves?

NORA. No, really I didn't.

HELMER. Didn't go nibbling a macaroon or two?

NORA. No, Torvald, honestly, you must believe me . . . !

HELMER. All right then! It's really just my little joke. . . .

NORA [crosses to the table]. I would never dream of doing anything you didn't want me to.

HELMER. Of course not, I know that. And then you've given me your word. . . . [Crosses to her.] Well then, Nora dearest, you shall keep your little Christmas secrets. They'll all come out tonight, I dare say, when we light the tree.

NORA. Did you remember to invite Dr. Rank?

HELMER. No. But there's really no need. Of course he'll come and have dinner with us. Anyway, I can ask him when he looks in this morning. I've ordered some good wine. Nora, you can't imagine how I am looking forward to this evening.

NORA. So am I. And won't the children enjoy it, Torvald!

HELMER. Oh, what a glorious feeling it is, knowing you've got a nice, safe job, and a good fat income. Don't you agree? Isn't it wonderful, just thinking about it?

NORA. Oh, it's marvelous!

HELMER. Do you remember last Christmas? Three whole weeks beforehand you shut yourself up every evening till after midnight making flowers for the Christmas tree and all the other splendid things you wanted to surprise us with. Ugh, I never felt so bored in all my life.

NORA. I wasn't the least bit bored.

HELMER [smiling]. But it turned out a bit of an anticlimax, Nora.

NORA. Oh, you are not going to tease me about that again! How was I to know the cat would get in and pull everything to bits?

HELMER. No, of course you weren't. Poor little Nora! All you wanted was for us to have a nice time—and it's the thought behind it that counts, after all. All the same, it's a good thing we've seen the back of those lean times.

NORA. Yes, really it's marvelous.

HELMER. Now there's no need for me to sit here all on my own, bored to tears. And you don't have to strain your dear little eyes, and work those dainty little fingers to the bone. . . .

NORA [clapping her hands]. No, Torvald, I don't, do I? Not any more. Oh, how marvelous it is to hear that! [Takes his arm.] Now I want to tell you how I've been thinking we might arrange things, Torvald. As soon as Christmas is over. . . . [The door-bell rings in the hall.] Oh, there's the bell. [Tidies one or two things in the room.] It's probably a visitor. What a nuisance!

HELMER. Remember I'm not at home to callers.

MAID [in the doorway]. There's a lady to see you, ma'am.

NORA. Show her in, please.

MAID [to HELMER]. And the doctor's just arrived, too, sir.

HELMER. Did he go straight into my room?

MAID. Yes, he did, sir.

[HELMER goes into his study. The MAID shows in MRS. LINDE, who is in traveling clothes, and closes the door after her.]

MRS. LINDE [subdued and rather hesitantly]. How do you do, Nora?

NORA [uncertainly]. How do you do?

MRS. LINDE. I'm afraid you don't recognize me.

NORA. No, I don't think I . . . And yet I seem to. . . . [Bursts out suddenly.] Why! Kristine! Is it really you?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, it's me.

NORA. Kristine! Fancy not recognizing you again! But how was I to, when . . . [Gently.] How you've changed, Kristine!

MRS. LINDE. I dare say I have. In nine . . . ten years . . . .

NORA. Is it so long since we last saw each other? Yes, it must be. Oh, believe me these last eight years have been such a happy time. And now you've come up to town, too? All that long journey in wintertime. That took courage.

MRS. LINDE. I just arrived this morning on the steamer.

NORA. To enjoy yourself over Christmas, of course. How lovely! Oh, we'll have such fun, you'll see. Do take off your things. You are not cold, are you? [Helps her.] There now! Now let's sit down here in comfort beside the stove. No, here, you take the armchair, I'll sit here on the rocking chair. [Takes her hands.] Ah, now you look a bit more like your old self again. It was just that when I first saw you. . . . But you are a little paler, Kristine . . . and perhaps even a bit thinner!

MRS. LINDE. And much, much older, Nora.

NORA. Yes, perhaps a little older . . . very, very little, not really very much. [Stops suddenly and looks serious.] Oh, what a thoughtless creature I am, sitting here chattering on like this! Dear, sweet Kristine, can you forgive me?

MRS. LINDE. What do you mean, Nora?

NORA [gently]. Poor Kristine, of course you're a widow now.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, my husband died three years ago.

NORA. Oh, I remember now. I read about it in the papers. Oh, Kristine, believe me I often thought at the time of writing to you. But I kept putting it off, something always seemed to crop up.

MRS. LINDE. My dear Nora, I understand so well.

NORA. No, it wasn't very nice of me, Kristine. Oh, you poor thing, what you must have gone through. And didn't he leave you anything?

MRS. LINDE. No.

NORA. And no children?

MRS. LINDE. No.

NORA. Absolutely nothing?

MRS. LINDE. Nothing at all . . . not even a broken heart to grieve over.

NORA [looks at her incredulously]. But, Kristine, is that possible?

MRS. LINDE [smiles sadly and strokes NORA*'s hair*]. Oh, it sometimes happens, Nora.

NORA. So utterly alone. How terribly sad that must be for you. I have three lovely children. You can't see them for the moment, because they're out with their nanny. But now you must tell me all about yourself. . . .

MRS. LINDE. No, no, I want to hear about you.

NORA. No, you start. I won't be selfish today. I must think only about your affairs today. But there's just one thing I really must tell you. Have you heard about the great stroke of luck we've had in the last few days?

MRS. LINDE. No. What is it?

NORA. What do you think? My husband has just been made Bank Manager!

MRS. LINDE. Your husband? How splendid!

NORA. Isn't it tremendous! It's not a very steady way of making a living, you know, being a lawyer, especially if he refuses to take on anything that's the least bit shady—which of course is what Torvald does, and I think he's quite right. You can imagine how pleased we are! He starts at the Bank straight after New Year, and he's getting a big salary and lots of commission. From now on we'll be able to live quite differently . . . we'll do just what we want. Oh, Kristine, I'm so happy and relieved. I must say it's lovely to have plenty of money and not have to worry. Isn't it?

MRS. LINDE. Yes. It must be nice to have enough, at any rate.

NORA. No, not just enough, but pots and pots of money.

MRS. LINDE [smiles]. Nora, Nora, haven't you learned any sense yet? At school you used to be an awful spendthrift.

NORA. Yes, Torvald still says I am. [Wags her finger.] But little Nora isn't as stupid as everybody thinks. Oh, we haven't really been in a position where I could afford to spend a lot of money. We've both had to work.

MRS. LINDE. You too?

NORA. Yes, odd jobs—sewing, crochetwork, embroidery and things like that. [Casually.] And one or two other things, besides. I suppose you know that Torvald left the Ministry when we got married. There weren't any prospects of promotion in his department, and of course he needed to earn more money than he had before. But the first year he wore himself out completely. He had to take on all kinds of extra jobs, you know, and he found himself working all hours of the day and night. But he couldn't go on like that; and he became seriously ill. The doctors said it was essential for him to go South.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I believe you spent a whole year in Italy, didn't you?

NORA. That's right. It wasn't easy to get away, I can tell you. It was just after I'd had Ivar. But of course we had to go. Oh, it was an absolutely marvelous trip. And it saved Torvald's life. But it cost an awful lot of money, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE. That I can well imagine.

NORA. Twelve hundred dollars. Four thousand eight hundred crowns. That's a lot of money, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, but in such circumstances, one is very lucky if one has it.

NORA. Well, we got it from Daddy, you see.

MRS. LINDE. Ah, that was it. It was just about then your father died, I believe, wasn't it?

NORA. Yes, Kristine, just about then. And do you know, I couldn't even go and look after him. Here was I expecting Ivar any day. And I also had poor Torvald, gravely ill, on my hands. Dear, kind Daddy! I never saw him again, Kristine. Oh, that's the saddest thing that has happened to me in all my married life.

MRS. LINDE. I know you were very fond of him. But after that you left for Italy?

NORA. Yes, we had the money then, and the doctors said it was urgent. We left a month later.

MRS. LINDE. And your husband came back completely cured?

NORA. Fit as a fiddle!

MRS. LINDE. But . . . what about the doctor?

NORA. How do you mean?

MRS. LINDE. I thought the maid said something about the gentleman who came at the same time as me being a doctor.

NORA. Yes, that was Dr. Rank. But this isn't a professional visit. He's our best friend and he always looks in at least once a day. No, Torvald has never had a day's illness since. And the children are fit and healthy, and so am I. [Jumps up and claps her hands.] Oh God, oh God, isn't it marvelous to be alive, and to be happy, Kristine!. . . Oh, but I ought to be ashamed of myself . . . Here I go on talking about nothing but myself. [She sits on a low stool near MRS. LINDE and lays her arms on her lap.] Oh, please, you mustn't be angry with me! Tell me, is it really true that you didn't love your husband? What made you marry him, then?

MRS. LINDE. My mother was still alive; she was bedridden and helpless. And then I had my two young brothers to look after as well. I didn't think I would be justified in refusing him.

NORA. No, I dare say you are right. I suppose he was fairly wealthy then?

MRS. LINDE. He was quite well off, I believe. But the business was shaky. When he died, it went all to pieces, and there just wasn't anything left.

NORA. What then?

MRS. LINDE. Well, I had to fend for myself, opening a little shop, running a little school, anything I could turn my hand to. These last three years have been one long relentless drudge. But now it's finished, Nora. My poor dear mother doesn't need me any more, she's passed away. Nor the boys either; they're at work now, they can look after themselves.

NORA. What a relief you must find it. . . .

MRS. LINDE. No, Nora! Just unutterably empty. Nobody to live for any more. [Stands up restless.] That's why I couldn't stand it any longer being cut off up there. Surely it must be a bit easier here to find something to occupy your mind. If only I could manage to find a steady job of some kind, in an office perhaps. . . .

NORA. But, Kristine, that's terribly exhausting; and you look so worn out even before you start. The best thing for you would be a little holiday at some quiet little resort.

MRS. LINDE [crosses to the window]. I haven't any father I can fall back on for the money, Nora.

NORA [rises]. Oh, please, you mustn't be angry with me!

MRS. LINDE [goes to her]. My dear Nora, you mustn't be angry with me either. That's the worst thing about people in my position, they become so bitter. One has nobody to work for, yet one has to be on the look-out all the time. Life has to go on, and one starts thinking only of oneself. Believe it or not, when you told me the good news about your step up, I was pleased not so much for your sake as for mine.

NORA. How do you mean? Ah, I see. You think Torvald might be able to do something for you.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that's exactly what I thought.

NORA. And so he shall, Kristine. Just leave things to me. I'll bring it up so cleverly . . . I'll think up something to put him in a good mood. Oh, I do so much want to help you.

MRS. LINDE. It is awfully kind of you, Nora, offering to do all this for me, particularly in your case, where you haven't known much trouble or hardship in your own life.

NORA. When I . . .? I haven't known much . . . ?

MRS. LINDE [smiling]. Well, good heavens, a little bit of sewing to do and a few things like that. What a child you are, Nora!

NORA [tosses her head and walks across the room]. I wouldn't be too sure of that, if I were you.

MRS. LINDE. Oh?

NORA. You're just like the rest of them. You all think I'm useless when it comes to anything really serious. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Come, come. . . .

NORA. You think I've never had anything much to contend with in this hard world.

MRS. LINDE. Nora dear, you've only just been telling me all the things you've had to put up with.

NORA. Pooh! They were just trivialities! [Softly.] I haven't told you about the really big thing.

MRS. LINDE. What big thing? What do you mean?

NORA. I know you rather tend to look down on me, Kristine. But you shouldn't, you know. You are proud of having worked so hard and so long for your mother.

MRS. LINDE. I'm sure I don't look down on anybody. But it's true what you say: I am both proud and happy when I think of how I was able to make Mother's life a little easier towards the end.

NORA. And you are proud when you think of what you have done for your brothers, too.

MRS. LINDE. I think I have every right to be.

NORA. I think so too. But now I'm going to tell you something, Kristine. I too have something to be proud and happy about.

MRS. LINDE. I don't doubt that. But what is it you mean?

NORA. Not so loud. Imagine if Torvald were to hear! He must never on any account . . . nobody must know about it, Kristine, nobody but you.

MRS. LINDE. But what is it?

NORA. Come over here. [She pulls her down on the sofa beside her.] Yes, Kristine, I too have something to be proud and happy about. I was the one who saved Torvald's life.

MRS. LINDE. Saved . . .? How . . . ?

NORA. I told you about our trip to Italy. Torvald would never have recovered but for that. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Well? Your father gave you what money was necessary. . . .

NORA [smiles]. That's what Torvald thinks, and everybody else. But . . .

MRS. LINDE. But . . .?

NORA. Daddy never gave us a penny. I was the one who raised the money.

MRS. LINDE. You? All that money?

NORA. Twelve hundred dollars. Four thousand eight hundred crowns. What do you say to that!

MRS. LINDE. But, Nora, how was it possible? Had you won a sweepstake or something?

NORA [contemptuously]. A sweepstake? Pooh! There would have been nothing to it then.

MRS. LINDE. Where did you get it from, then?

NORA [hums and smiles secretively]. H'm, tra-la-la!

MRS. LINDE. Because what you couldn't do was borrow it.

NORA. Oh? Why not?

MRS. LINDE. Well, a wife can't borrow without her husband's consent.

NORA [tossing her head]. Ah, but when it happens to be a wife with a bit of a sense for business . . . a wife who knows her way about things, then. . . .

MRS. LINDE. But, Nora, I just don't understand. . . .

NORA. You don't have to. I haven't said I did borrow the money. I might have got it some other way. [Throws herself back on the sofa.] I might even have got it from some admirer. Anyone as reasonably attractive as I am. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Don't be so silly!

NORA. Now you must be dying of curiosity, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE. Listen to me now, Nora dear—you haven't done anything rash, have you?

NORA [sitting up again]. Is it rash to save your husband's life?

MRS. LINDE. I think it was rash to do anything without telling him. . . .

NORA. But the whole point was that he mustn't know anything. Good heavens, can't you see! He wasn't even supposed to know how desperately ill he was. It was me the doctors came and told his life was in danger, that the only way to save him was to go South for a while. Do you think I didn't try talking him into it first? I began dropping hints about how nice it would be if I could be taken on a little trip abroad, like other young wives. I wept, I pleaded. I told him he ought to show some consideration for my condition, and let me have a bit of my own way. And then I suggested he might take out a loan. But at that he nearly lost his temper, Kristine. He said I was being frivolous, that it was his duty as a husband not to give in to all these whims and fancies of mine—as I do believe he called them. All right, I thought, somehow you've got to be saved. And it was then I found a way. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Did your husband never find out from your father that the money hadn't come from him?

NORA. No, never. It was just about the time Daddy died. I'd intended letting him into the secret and asking him not to give me away. But when he was so ill . . . I'm sorry to say it never became necessary.

MRS. LINDE. And you never confided in your husband?

NORA. Good heavens, how could you ever imagine such a thing! When he's so strict about such matters! Besides, Torvald is a man with a good deal of pride—it would be terribly embarrassing and humiliating for him if he thought he owed anything to me. It would spoil everything between us; this happy home of ours would never be the same again.

MRS. LINDE. Are you never going to tell him?

NORA [reflectively, half smiling]. Oh yes, some day perhaps . . . in many years time, when I'm no longer as pretty as I am now. You mustn't laugh! What I mean of course is when Torvald isn't quite so much in love with me as he is now, when he's lost interest in watching me dance, or get dressed up, or recite. Then it might be a good thing to have something in reserve. . . . [Breaks off.] What nonsense! That day will never come. Well, what have you got to say to my big secret, Kristine? Still think I'm not much good for anything? One thing, though, it's meant a lot of worry for me, I can tell you. It hasn't always been easy to meet my obligations when the time came. You know in business there is something called quarterly interest, and other things called instalments, and these are always terribly difficult things to cope with. So what I've had to do is save a little here and there, you see, wherever I could. I couldn't really save anything out of the housekeeping, because Torvald has to live in decent style. I couldn't let the children go about badly dressed either—I felt any money I got for them had to go on them alone. Such sweet little things!

MRS. LINDE. Poor Nora! So it had to come out of your own allowance?

NORA. Of course. After all, I was the one it concerned most. Whenever Torvald gave me money for new clothes and such-like, I never spent more than half. And always I bought the simplest and cheapest things. It's a blessing most things look well on me, so Torvald never noticed anything. But sometimes I did feel it was a bit hard, Kristine, because it is nice to be well dressed, isn't it?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I suppose it is.

NORA. I have had some other sources of income, of course. Last winter I was lucky enough to get quite a bit of copying to do. So I shut myself up every night and sat and wrote through to the small hours of the morning. Oh, sometimes I was so tired, so tired. But it was tremendous fun all the same, sitting there working and earning money like that. It was almost like being a man.

MRS. LINDE. And how much have you been able to pay off like this?

NORA. Well, I can't tell exactly. It's not easy to know where you are with transactions of this kind, you understand. All I know is I've paid off just as much as I could scrape together. Many's the time I was at my wit's end. [Smiles.] Then I used to sit here and pretend that some rich old gentleman had fallen in love with me. . . .

MRS. LINDE. What! What gentleman?

NORA. Oh, rubbish!. . . and that now he had died, and when they opened his will, there in big letters were the words: "My entire fortune is to be paid over, immediately and in cash, to charming Mrs. Nora Helmer."

MRS. LINDE. But my dear Nora–who is this man?

NORA. Good heavens, don't you understand? There never was any old gentleman; it was just something I used to sit here pretending, time and time again, when I didn't know where to turn next for money. But it doesn't make very much difference; as far as I'm concerned, the old boy can do what he likes, I'm tired of him; I can't be bothered any more with him or his will. Because now all my worries are over. [Jumping up.] Oh God, what a glorious thought, Kristine! No more worries! Just think of being without a care in the world . . . being able to romp with the children, and making the house nice and attractive, and having things just as Torvald likes to have them! And then spring will soon be here, and blue skies. And maybe we can go away somewhere. I might even see something of the sea again. Oh, yes! When you're happy, life is a wonderful thing!

[The doorbell is heard in the hall.]

MRS. LINDE [gets up]. There's the bell. Perhaps I'd better go.

NORA. No, do stay, please. I don't suppose it's for me; it's probably somebody for Torvald . . .

MAID [in the doorway]. Excuse me, ma'am, but there's a gentleman here wants to see Mr. Helmer, and I didn't quite know . . . because the doctor is in there. . . .

NORA. Who is the gentleman?

KROGSTAD [in the doorway]. It's me, Mrs. Helmer.

[MRS. LINDE starts, then turns away to the window.]

NORA [tense, takes a step towards him and speaks in a low voice]. You? What is it? What do you want to talk to my husband about?

KROGSTAD. Bank matters . . . in a manner of speaking. I work at the bank, and I hear your husband is to be the new manager. . . .

NORA. So it's . . .

KROGSTAD. Just routine business matters, Mrs. Helmer. Absolutely nothing else.

NORA. Well then, please go into his study.

[She nods impassively and shuts the hall door behind him; then she walks across and sees to the stove.]

MRS. LINDE. Nora . . . who was that man?

NORA. His name is Krogstad.

MRS. LINDE. So it really was him.

NORA. Do you know the man?

MRS. LINDE. I used to know him . . . a good many years ago. He was a solicitor's clerk in our district for a while.

NORA. Yes, so he was.

MRS. LINDE. How he's changed!

NORA. His marriage wasn't a very happy one, I believe.

MRS. LINDE. He's a widower now, isn't he?

NORA. With a lot of children. There, it'll burn better now.

[She closes the stove door and moves the rocking chair a little to one side.]

MRS. LINDE. He does a certain amount of business on the side, they say?

NORA. Oh? Yes, it's always possible. I just don't know. . . . But let's not think about business . . . it's all so dull.

[DR. RANK comes in from HELMER's study.]

DR. RANK [still in the doorway]. No, no, Torvald, I won't intrude. I'll just look in on your wife for a moment. [Shuts the door and notices MRS. LINDE.] Oh, I beg your pardon. I'm afraid I'm intruding here as well.

NORA. No, not at all! [Introduces them.] Dr. Rank . . . Mrs. Linde.

RANK. Ah! A name I've often heard mentioned in this house. I believe I came past you on the stairs as I came in.

MRS. LINDE. I have to take things slowly going upstairs. I find it rather a trial.

RANK. Ah, some little disability somewhere, eh?

MRS. LINDE. Just a bit run down, I think, actually.

RANK. Is that all? Then I suppose you've come to town for a good rest—doing the rounds of the parties?

MRS. LINDE. I have come to look for work.

RANK. Is that supposed to be some kind of sovereign remedy for being run down?

MRS. LINDE. One must live, Doctor.

RANK. Yes, it's generally thought to be necessary.

NORA. Come, come, Dr. Rank. You are quite as keen to live as anybody.

RANK. Quite keen, yes. Miserable as I am, I'm quite ready to let things drag on as long as possible. All my patients are the same. Even those with a moral affliction are no different. As a matter of fact, there's a bad case of that kind in talking with Helmer at this very moment . . .

MRS. LINDE [softly]. Ah!

NORA. Whom do you mean?

RANK. A person called Krogstad—nobody you would know. He's rotten to the core. But even he began talking about having to live, as though it were something terribly important.

NORA. Oh? And what did he want to talk to Torvald about?

RANK. I honestly don't know. All I heard was something about the Bank.

NORA. I didn't know that Krog . . . that this Mr. Krogstad had anything to do with the Bank.

RANK. Oh yes, he's got some kind of job down there. [To MRS. LINDE.] I wonder if you've got people in your part of the country too who go rushing round sniffing out cases of moral corruption, and then installing the individuals concerned in nice, well-paid jobs where they can keep them under observation. Sound, decent people have to be content to stay out in the cold.

MRS. LINDE. Yet surely it's the sick who most need to be brought in.

RANK [shrugs his shoulders]. Well, there we have it. It's that attitude that's turning society into a clinic.

[NORA, lost in her own thoughts, breaks into smothered laughter and claps her hands.]

RANK. Why are you laughing at that? Do you know in fact what society is?

NORA. What do I care about your silly old society? I was laughing about something quite different . . . something frightfully funny. Tell me, Dr. Rank, are all the people who work at the Bank dependent on Torvald now?

RANK. Is that what you find so frightfully funny?

NORA [smiles and hums]. Never you mind! Never you mind! [Walks about the room.] Yes, it really is terribly amusing to think that we . . . that Torvald now has power over so many people. [She takes the bag out of her pocket.] Dr. Rank, what about a little macaroon?

RANK. Look at this, eh? Macaroons. I thought they were forbidden here.

NORA. Yes, but these are some Kristine gave me.

MRS. LINDE. What? I . . . ?

NORA. Now, now, you needn't be alarmed. You weren't to know that Torvald had forbidden them. He's worried in case they ruin my teeth, you know. Still . . . what's it matter once in a while! Don't you think so, Dr. Rank? Here! [She pops a macaroon into his mouth.] And you too, Kristine. And I shall have one as well; just a little one . . . or two at the most. [She walks about the room again.] Really I am so happy. There's just one little thing I'd love to do now.

RANK. What's that?

NORA. Something I'd love to say in front of Torvald.

RANK. Then why can't you?

NORA. No, I daren't. It's not very nice.

MRS. LINDE. Not very nice?

RANK. Well, in that case it might not be wise. But to us, I don't see why. . . . What is this you would love to say in front of Helmer?

NORA. I would simply love to say: “Damn.”

RANK. Are you mad!

MRS. LINDE. Good gracious, Nora . . . !

RANK. Say it! Here he is!

NORA [hiding the bag of macaroons]. Sh! Sh!

[HELMER comes out of his room, his overcoat over his arm and his hat in his hand.]

NORA [going over to him]. Well, Torvald dear, did you get rid of him?

HELMER. Yes, he’s just gone.

NORA. Let me introduce you. This is Kristine, who has just arrived in town. . . .

HELMER. Kristine . . . ? You must forgive me, but I don’t think I know . . .

NORA. Mrs. Linde, Torvald dear. Kristine Linde.

HELMER. Ah, indeed. A school friend of my wife’s, presumably.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, we were girls together.

NORA. Fancy, Torvald, she’s come all this long way just to have a word with you.

HELMER. How is that?

MRS. LINDE. Well, it wasn’t really . . .

NORA. The thing is, Kristine is terribly clever at office work, and she’s frightfully keen on finding a job with some efficient man, so that she can learn even more. . . .

HELMER. Very sensible, Mrs. Linde.

NORA. And then when she heard you’d been made Bank Manager—there was a bit in the paper about it—she set off at once. Torvald please! You will try and do something for Kristine, won’t you? For my sake?

HELMER. Well, that’s not altogether impossible. You are a widow, I presume?

MRS. LINDE. Yes.

HELMER. And you’ve had some experience in business?

MRS. LINDE. A fair amount.

HELMER. Well, it’s quite probable I can find you a job, I think. . . .

NORA [clapping her hands]. There, you see!

HELMER. You have come at a fortunate moment, Mrs. Linde . . .

MRS. LINDE. Oh, how can I ever thank you . . . ?

HELMER. Not a bit. [He puts on his overcoat.] But for the present I must ask you to excuse me. . . .

RANK. Wait. I'm coming with you.

[He fetches his fur coat from the hall and warms it at the stove.]

NORA. Don't be long, Torvald dear.

HELMER. Not more than an hour, that's all.

NORA. Are you leaving too, Kristine?

MRS. LINDE [putting on her things]. Yes, I must go and see if I can't find myself a room.

HELMER. Perhaps we can all walk down the road together.

NORA [helping her]. What a nuisance we are so limited for space here. I'm afraid it just isn't possible. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Oh, you mustn't dream of it! Goodbye, Nora dear, and thanks for everything.

NORA. Goodbye for the present. But . . . you'll be coming back this evening, of course. And you too, Dr. Rank? What's that? If you are up to it? Of course you'll be up to it. Just wrap yourself up well.

[They go out, talking, into the hall; children's voices can be heard on the stairs.]

NORA. Here they are! Here they are! [She runs to the front door and opens it. ANNE MARIE, the nursemaid, enters with the children.] Come in! Come in! [She bends down and kisses them.] Ah! my sweet little darlings. . . . You see them, Kristine? Aren't they lovely!

RANK. Don't stand here chattering in this draught!

HELMER. Come along, Mrs. Linde. The place now becomes unbearable for anybody except mothers.

[DR. RANK, HELMER and MRS. LINDE go down the stairs: the NURSEMAID comes into the room with the children, then Nora, shutting the door behind her.]

NORA. How fresh and bright you look! My, what red cheeks you've got! Like apples and roses. [During the following, the children keep chattering away to her.] Have you had a nice time? That's splendid. And you gave Emmy and Bob a ride on your sledge? Did you now! Both together! Fancy that! There's a clever boy, Ivar. Oh, let me take her a little while, Anne Marie.

There's my sweet little babydoll! [She takes the youngest of the children from the NURSEMAID and dances with her.] All right, Mummy will dance with Bobby too. What? You've been throwing snowballs? Oh, I wish I'd been there. No, don't bother, Anne Marie, I'll help them off with their things. No, please, let me—I like doing it. You go on in, you look frozen. You'll find some hot coffee on the stove. [The NURSEMAID goes into the room, left. NORA takes off the children's coats and hats and throws them down anywhere, while the children all talk at once.] Really! A great big dog came running after you? But he didn't bite. No, the doggies wouldn't bite my pretty little dollies. You mustn't touch the parcels, Ivar! What are they? Wouldn't you like to know! No, no, that's nasty. Now? Shall we play something? What shall we play? Hide and seek? Yes, let's play hide and seek. Bob can hide first. Me first? All right, let me hide first.

[She and the children play, laughing and shrieking, in this room and in the adjacent room on the right. Finally NORA hides under the table; the children come rushing in to look for her but cannot find her; they hear her stifled laughter, rush to the table, lift up the tablecloth and find her. Tremendous shouts of delight. She creeps out and pretends to frighten them. More shouts. Meanwhile there has been a knock at the front door, which nobody has heard. The door half opens, and KROGSTAD can be seen. He waits a little; the game continues.]

KROGSTAD. I beg your pardon, Mrs. Helmer. . . .

NORA [turns with a stifled cry and half jumps up]. Ah! What do you want?

KROGSTAD. Excuse me. The front door was standing open. Somebody must have forgotten to shut it. . . .

NORA [standing up]. My husband isn't at home, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD. I know.

NORA. Well . . . what are you doing here?

KROGSTAD. I want a word with you.

NORA. With . . . ? [Quietly, to the children.] Go to Anne Marie. What? No, the strange man won't do anything to Mummy. When he's gone we'll have another game. [She leads the children into the room, left, and shuts the door after them; tense and uneasy.] You want to speak to me?

KROGSTAD. Yes, I do.

NORA. Today? But it isn't the first of the month yet. . . .

KROGSTAD. No, it's Christmas Eve. It depends entirely on you what sort of Christmas you have.

NORA. What do you want? Today I can't possibly . . .

KROGSTAD. Let's not talk about that for the moment. It's something else. You've got a moment to spare?

NORA. Yes, I suppose so, though . . .

KROGSTAD. Good. I was sitting in Olsen's café, and I saw your husband go down the road . . .

NORA. Did you?

KROGSTAD. . . .with a lady.

NORA. Well?

KROGSTAD. May I be so bold as to ask whether that lady was a Mrs. Linde?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Just arrived in town?

NORA. Yes, today.

KROGSTAD. And she's a good friend of yours?

NORA. Yes, she is. But I can't see . . .

KROGSTAD. I also knew her once.

NORA. I know.

KROGSTAD. Oh? So you know all about it. I thought as much. Well, I want to ask you straight: is Mrs. Linde getting a job in the Bank?

NORA. How dare you cross-examine me like this, Mr. Krogstad? You, one of my husband's subordinates? But since you've asked me, I'll tell you. Yes, Mrs. Linde has got a job. And I'm the one who got it for her, Mr. Krogstad. Now you know.

KROGSTAD. So my guess was right.

NORA [walking up and down]. Oh, I think I can say that some of us have a little influence now and again. Just because one happens to be a woman, that doesn't mean. . . . People in subordinate positions, ought to take care they don't offend anybody . . . who . . . him . . .

KROGSTAD. . . .has influence?

NORA. Exactly.

KROGSTAD [changing his tone]. Mrs. Helmer, will you have the goodness to use your influence on my behalf?

NORA. What? What do you mean?

KROGSTAD. Will you be so good as to see that I keep my modest little job at the Bank?

NORA. What do you mean? Who wants to take it away from you?

KROGSTAD. Oh, you needn't try and pretend to me you don't know. I can quite see that this friend of yours isn't particularly anxious to bump up against me. And I can also see now whom I can thank for being given the sack.

NORA. But I assure you. . . .

KROGSTAD. All right, all right. But to come to the point: there's still time. And I advise you to use your influence to stop it.

NORA. But, Mr. Krogstad, I have no influence.

KROGSTAD. Haven't you? I thought just now you said yourself . . .

NORA. I didn't mean it that way, of course. Me? What makes you think I've got any influence of that kind over my husband?

KROGSTAD. I know your husband from our student days. I don't suppose he is any more steadfast than other married men.

NORA. You speak disrespectfully of my husband like that and I'll show you the door.

KROGSTAD. So the lady's got courage.

NORA. I'm not frightened of you any more. After New Year's I'll soon be finished with the whole business.

KROGSTAD [controlling himself]. Listen to me, Mrs. Helmer. If necessary I shall fight for my little job in the Bank as if I were fighting for my life.

NORA. So it seems.

KROGSTAD. It's not just for the money, that's the last thing I care about. There's something else . . . well, I might as well out with it. You see it's like this. You know as well as anybody that some years ago I got myself mixed up in a bit of trouble.

NORA. I believe I've heard something of the sort.

KROGSTAD. It never got as far as the courts; but immediately it was as if all paths were barred to me. So I started going in for the sort of business you know about. I had to do something, and I think I can say I haven't been one of the worst. But now I have to get out of it. My sons are growing up; for their sake I must try and win back what respectability I can. That job in the Bank was like the first step on the ladder for me. And now your husband wants to kick me off the ladder again, back into the mud.

NORA. But in God's name, Mr. Krogstad, it's quite beyond my power to help you.

KROGSTAD. That's because you haven't the will to help me. But I have ways of making you.

NORA. You wouldn't go and tell my husband I owe you money?

KROGSTAD. Suppose I did tell him?

NORA. It would be a rotten shame. [Half choking with tears.] That secret is all my pride and joy—why should he have to hear about it in this nasty, horrid way . . . hear about it from you. You would make things horribly unpleasant for me. . . .

KROGSTAD. Merely unpleasant?

NORA [vehemently]. Go on, do it then! It'll be all the worse for you. Because then my husband will see for himself what a bad man you are, and then you certainly won't be able to keep your job.

KROGSTAD. I asked whether it was only a bit of domestic unpleasantness you were afraid of?

NORA. If my husband gets to know about it, he'll pay off what's owing at once. And then we'd have nothing more to do with you.

KROGSTAD [taking a pace towards her]. Listen, Mrs. Helmer, either you haven't a very good memory, or else you don't understand much about business. I'd better make the position a little bit clearer for you.

NORA. How do you mean?

KROGSTAD. When your husband was ill, you came to me for the loan of twelve hundred dollars.

NORA. I didn't know of anybody else.

KROGSTAD. I promised to find you the money. . . .

NORA. And you did find it.

KROGSTAD. I promised to find you the money on certain conditions. At the time you were so concerned about your husband's illness, and so anxious to get the money for going away with, that I don't think you paid very much attention to all the incidentals. So there is perhaps some point in reminding you of them. Well, I promised to find you the money against an IOU which I drew up for you.

NORA. Yes, and which I signed.

KROGSTAD. Very good. But below that I added a few lines, by which your father was to stand security. This your father was to sign.

NORA. Was to . . .? He did sign it.

KROGSTAD. I had left the date blank. The idea was that your father was to add the date himself when he signed it. Remember?

NORA. Yes, I think. . . .

KROGSTAD. I then gave you the IOU to post to your father. Wasn't that so?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Which of course you did at once. Because only about five or six days later you brought it back to me with your father's signature. I then paid out the money.

NORA. Well? Haven't I paid the installments regularly?

KROGSTAD. Yes, fairly. But . . . coming back to what we were talking about . . . that was a pretty bad period you were going through then, Mrs. Helmer.

NORA. Yes, it was.

KROGSTAD. Your father was seriously ill, I believe.

NORA. He was very near the end.

KROGSTAD. And died shortly afterwards?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Tell me, Mrs. Helmer, do you happen to remember which day your father died? The exact date, I mean.

NORA. Daddy died on 29 September.

KROGSTAD. Quite correct. I made some inquiries. Which brings up a rather curious point [takes out a paper] which I simply cannot explain.

NORA. Curious . . .? I don't know . . .

KROGSTAD. The curious thing is, Mrs. Helmer, that your father signed this document three days after his death.

NORA. What? I don't understand. . . .

KROGSTAD. Your father died on 29 September. But look here. Your father has dated his signature 2 October. Isn't that rather curious, Mrs. Helmer? [NORA remains silent.] It's also remarkable that the words '2 October' and the year are not in your father's handwriting, but in a handwriting I rather think I recognize. Well, perhaps that could be explained. Your father might have forgotten to date his signature, and then somebody else might have made a guess at the date later, before the fact of your father's death was known. There is nothing wrong in that. What really matters is the signature. And that is of course genuine, Mrs. Helmer? It really was your father who wrote his name here?

NORA [after a moment's silence, throws her head back and looks at him defiantly]. No, it wasn't. It was me who signed father's name.

KROGSTAD. Listen to me. I suppose you realize that that is a very dangerous confession?

NORA. Why? You'll soon have all your money back.

KROGSTAD. Let me ask you a question: why didn't you send that document to your father?

NORA. It was impossible. Daddy was ill. If I'd asked him for his signature, I'd have to tell him what the money was for. Don't you see, when he was as ill as that I couldn't go and tell him that my husband's life was in danger. It was simply impossible.

KROGSTAD. It would have been better for you if you had abandoned the whole trip.

NORA. No, that was impossible. This was the thing that was to save my husband's life. I couldn't give it up.

KROGSTAD. But did it never strike you that this was fraudulent . . . ?

NORA. That wouldn't have meant anything to me. Why should I worry about you? I couldn't stand you, not when you insisted on going through with all those cold-blooded formalities, knowing all the time what a critical state my husband was in.

KROGSTAD. Mrs. Helmer, it's quite clear you still haven't the faintest idea what it is you've committed. But let me tell you, my own offence was no more and no worse than that, and it ruined my entire reputation.

NORA. You? Are you trying to tell me that you once risked everything to save your wife's life?

KROGSTAD. The law takes no account of motives.

NORA. Then they must be very bad laws.

KROGSTAD. Bad or not, if I produce this document in court, you'll be condemned according to them.

NORA. I don't believe it. Isn't a daughter entitled to try and save her father from worry and anxiety on his deathbed? Isn't a wife entitled to save her husband's life? I might not know very much about the law, but I feel sure of one thing: it must say somewhere that things like this are allowed. You mean to say you don't know that—you, when it's your job? You must be a rotten lawyer, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD. That may be. But when it comes to business transactions—like the sort between us two—perhaps you'll admit I know something about them? Good. Now you must please yourself. But I tell you this: if I'm pitched out a second time, you are going to keep me company.

NORA [stands thoughtfully for a moment, then tosses her head]. Rubbish! He's just trying to scare me. I'm not such a fool as all that. [Begins gathering up the children's clothes; after a moment she stops.] Yet . . . ? No, it's impossible! I did it for love, didn't I?

THE CHILDREN [in the doorway, left]. Mummy, the gentleman's just gone out of the gate.

NORA. Yes, I know. But you mustn't say anything to anybody about that gentleman. You hear? Not even to Daddy!

THE CHILDREN. All right, Mummy. Are you going to play again?

NORA. No, not just now.

THE CHILDREN. But Mummy, you promised!

NORA. Yes, but I can't just now. Off you go now, I have a lot to do. Off you go, my darlings. [She herds them carefully into the other room and shuts the door behind them. She sits down on the sofa, picks up her embroidery and works a few stitches, but soon stops.] No! [She flings her work down, stands up, goes to the hall door and calls out.] Helene! Fetch the tree in for me, please. [She walks across to the table, left, and opens the drawer; again pauses.] No, really, it's quite impossible!

MAID [with the Christmas tree]. Where shall I put it, ma'am?

NORA. On the floor there, in the middle.

MAID. Anything else you want me to bring?

NORA. No, thank you. I've got what I want.

[The MAID has put the tree down and goes out.]

NORA [busy decorating the tree]. Candles here . . . and flowers here—Revolting man! It's all nonsense! There's nothing to worry about. We'll have a lovely Christmas tree. And I'll do anything you want me to, Torvald; I'll sing for you, dance for you. . . .

[HELMER, with a bundle of documents under his arm, comes in by the hall door.]

NORA. Ah, back again already?

HELMER. Yes. Anybody been?

NORA. Here? No.

HELMER. That's funny. I just saw Krogstad leave the house.

NORA. Oh? O yes, that's right. Krogstad was here a minute.

HELMER. Nora, I can tell by your face he's been asking you to put a good word in for him.

NORA. Yes.

HELMER. And you were to pretend it was your own idea? You were to keep quiet about his having been here. He asked you to do that as well, didn't he?

NORA. Yes, Torvald. But . . .

HELMER. Nora, Nora, what possessed you to do a thing like that? Talking to a person like him, making him promises? And then on top of everything, to tell me a lie!

NORA. A lie . . . ?

HELMER. Didn't you say that nobody had been here? [Wagging his finger at her.] Never again must my little song-bird do a thing like that! Little song-birds must keep their pretty little beaks out of mischief; no chirruping out of tune! [Puts his arm round her waist.] Isn't that the way we want things to be? Yes, of course it is. [Lets her go.] So let's say no more about it. [Sits down by the stove.] Ah, nice and cozy here!

[He glances through his papers.]

NORA [busy with the Christmas tree, after a short pause]. Torvald!

HELMER. Yes.

NORA. I'm so looking forward to the fancy dress ball at the Stenborgs on Boxing Day.

HELMER. And I'm terribly curious to see what sort of surprise you've got for me.

NORA. Oh, it's too silly.

HELMER. Oh?

NORA. I just can't think of anything suitable. Everything seems so absurd, so pointless.

HELMER. Has my little Nora come to that conclusion?

NORA [behind his chair, her arms on the chair-back]. Are you very busy, Torvald?

HELMER. Oh. . . .

NORA. What are all those papers?

HELMER. Bank matters.

NORA. Already?

HELMER. I have persuaded the retiring manager to give me authority to make any changes in organization or personnel I think necessary. I have to work on it over the Christmas week. I want everything straight by the New Year.

NORA. So that was why that poor Krogstad. . . .

HELMER. Hm!

NORA [still leaning against the back of the chair, running her fingers through his hair]. If you hadn't been so busy, Torvald, I'd have asked you to do me an awfully big favor.

HELMER. Let me hear it. What's it to be?

NORA. Nobody's got such good taste as you. And the thing is I do so want to look my best at the fancy dress ball. Torvald, couldn't you give me some advice and tell me what you think I ought to go as, and how I should arrange my costume?

HELMER. Aha! So my impulsive little woman is asking for somebody to come to her rescue, eh?

NORA. Please, Torvald, I never get anywhere without your help.

HELMER. Very well, I'll think about it. We'll find something.

NORA. That's sweet of you. [She goes across to the tree again; pause.] How pretty these red flowers look.—Tell me, was it really something terribly wrong this man Krogstad did?

HELMER. Forgery. Have you any idea what that means?

NORA. Perhaps circumstances left him no choice?

HELMER. Maybe. Or perhaps, like so many others, he just didn't think. I am not so heartless that I would necessarily want to condemn a man for a single mistake like that.

NORA. Oh no, Torvald, of course not!

HELMER. Many a man might be able to redeem himself, if he honestly confessed his guilt and took his punishment.

NORA. Punishment?

HELMER. But that wasn't the way Krogstad chose. He dodged what was due to him by a cunning trick. And that's what has been the cause of his corruption.

NORA. Do you think it would . . . ?

HELMER. Just think how a man with a thing like that on his conscience will always be having to lie and cheat and dissemble; he can never drop the mask, not even with his own wife and children. And the children—that's the most terrible part of it, Nora.

NORA. Why?

HELMER. A fog of lies like that in a household, and it spreads disease and infection to every part of it. Every breath the children take in that kind of house is reeking with evil germs.

NORA [closer behind him]. Are you sure of that?

HELMER. My dear Nora, as a lawyer I know what I'm talking about. Practically all juvenile delinquents come from homes where the mother is dishonest.

NORA. Why mothers particularly?

HELMER. It's generally traceable to the mothers, but of course fathers can have the same influence. Every lawyer knows that only too well. And yet there's Krogstad been poisoning his own children for years with lies and deceit. That's the reason I call him morally depraved. [Holds out his hands to her.] That's why my sweet little Nora must promise me not to try putting in any more good words for him. Shake hands on it. Well? What's this? Give me your hand. There now! That's settled. I assure you I would have found it impossible to work with him. I quite literally feel physically sick in the presence of such people.

NORA [draws her hand away and walks over to the other side of the Christmas tree]. How hot it is in here! And I still have such a lot to do.

HELMER [stands up and collects his papers together]. Yes, I'd better think of getting some of this read before dinner. I must also think about your costume. And I might even be able to lay my hands on something to wrap in gold paper and hang on the Christmas tree. [He lays his hand on her head.] My precious little singing bird.

[He goes into his study and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [quietly, after a pause]. Nonsense! It can't be. It's impossible. It must be impossible.

MAID [in the doorway, left]. The children keep asking so nicely if they can come in and see Mummy.

NORA. No, no, don't let them in! You stay with them, Anne Marie.

MAID. Very well, ma'am.

[She shuts the door.]

NORA [pale with terror]. Corrupt my children . . . ! Poison my home? [Short pause; she throws back her head.] It's not true! It could never, never be true!

Act II

The same room. In the corner beside the piano stands the Christmas tree, stripped, bedraggled and with its candles burnt out. NORA'S outdoor things lie on the sofa. NORA, alone there, walks about restlessly; at last she stops by the sofa and picks up her coat.

NORA [putting her coat down again]. Somebody's coming! [Crosses to the door, listens.] No, it's nobody. Nobody will come today, of course, Christmas Day—nor tomorrow, either. But perhaps. . . . [She opens the door and looks out.] No, nothing in the letter box; quite empty. [Comes forward.] Oh, nonsense! He didn't mean it seriously. Things like that can't happen. It's impossible. Why, I have three small children.

NURSEMAID. I finally found it, the box with the fancy dress costumes.

NORA. Thank you. Put it on the table, please.

NURSEMAID [does this]. But I'm afraid they are in an awful mess.

NORA. Oh, if only I could rip them up into a thousand pieces!

NURSEMAID. Good heavens, they can be mended all right, with a bit of patience.

NORA. Yes, I'll go over and get Mrs. Linde to help me.

NURSEMAID. Out again? In this terrible weather? You'll catch your death of cold, Ma'am.

NORA. Oh, worse things might happen.—How are the children?

NURSEMAID. Playing with their Christmas presents, poor little things, but ...

NORA. Do they keep asking for me?

NURSEMAID. They are so used to being with their Mummy.

NORA. Yes, Anne Marie, from now on I can't be with them as often as I was before.

NURSEMAID. Ah well, children get used to anything in time.

NORA. Do you think so? Do you think they would forget their Mummy if she went away for good?

NURSEMAID. Good gracious—for good?

NORA. Tell me, Anne Marie—I've often wondered—how on earth could you bear to hand your child over to strangers?

NURSEMAID. Well, there was nothing else for it when I had to come and nurse my little Nora.

NORA. Yes but...how could you bring yourself to do it?

NURSEMAID. When I had the chance of such a good place? When a poor girl's been in trouble she must make the best of things. Because he didn't help, the rotter.

NORA. But your daughter will have forgotten you.

NURSEMAID. Oh no, she hasn't. She wrote to me when she got confirmed, and again when she got married.

NORA [putting her arms round her neck]. Dear old Anne Marie, you were a good mother to me when I was little.

NURSEMAID. My poor little Nora never had any other mother but me.

NORA. And if my little ones only had you, I know you would. . . . Oh, what am I talking about! [She opens the box.] Go in to them. I must . . . Tomorrow I'll let you see how pretty I am going to look.

NURSEMAID. Ah, there'll be nobody at the ball as pretty as my Nora.

NORA [begins unpacking the box, but soon throws it down]. Oh, if only I dare go out. If only I could be sure nobody would come. And that nothing would happen in the meantime here at home. Rubbish—nobody's going to come. I mustn't think about it. Brush this muff. Pretty gloves, pretty gloves! I'll put it right out of my mind. One, two, three, four, five, six. . . . [Screams.] Ah, they are coming. . . . [She starts towards the door, but stops irresolute. MRS. LINDE comes from the hall, where she has taken off her things.] Oh, it's you, Kristine. There's nobody else out there, is there? I'm so glad you've come.

MRS. LINDE. I heard you'd been over looking for me.

NORA. Yes, I was just passing. There's something you must help me with. Come and sit beside me on the sofa here. You see, the Stenborgs are having a fancy dress party upstairs tomorrow evening, and now Torvald wants me to go as a Neapolitan fisher lass and dance the tarantella. I learned it in Capri, you know.

MRS. LINDE. Well, well! So you are going to do a party piece?

NORA. Torvald says I should. Look, here's the costume, Torvald had it made for me down there. But it's got all torn and I simply don't know. . . .

MRS. LINDE. We'll soon have that put right. It's only the trimming come away here and there. Got a needle and thread? Ah, here's what we are after.

NORA. It's awfully kind of you.

MRS. LINDE. So you are going to be all dressed up tomorrow, Nora? Tell you what—I'll pop over for a minute to see you in all your finery. But I'm quite forgetting to thank you for the pleasant time we had last night.

NORA [gets up and walks across the room]. Somehow I didn't think yesterday was as nice as things generally are.—You should have come to town a little earlier, Kristine.—Yes, Torvald certainly knows how to make things pleasant about the place.

MRS. LINDE. You too, I should say. You are not your father's daughter for nothing. But tell me, is Dr.

Rank always as depressed as he was last night?

NORA. No, last night it was rather obvious. He's got something seriously wrong with him, you know. Tuberculosis of the spine, poor fellow. His father was a horrible man, who used to have mistresses and things like that. That's why the son was always ailing, right from being a child.

MRS. LINDE [lowering her sewing]. But my dear Nora, how do you come to know about things like that?

NORA [walking about the room]. Huh! When you've got three children, you get these visits from . . . women who have had a certain amount of medical training. And you hear all sorts of things from them.

MRS. LINDE [begins sewing again; short silence]. Does Dr. Rank call in every day?

NORA. Every single day. He was Torvald's best friend as a boy, and he's a good friend of mine, too. Dr. Rank is almost like one of the family.

MRS. LINDE. But tell me—is he really genuine? What I mean is: doesn't he sometimes rather turn on the charm?

NORA. No, on the contrary. What makes you think that?

MRS. LINDE. When you introduced me yesterday, he claimed he'd often heard my name in this house. But afterwards I noticed your husband hadn't the faintest idea who I was. Then how is it that Dr. Rank should. . . .

NORA. Oh yes, it was quite right what he said, Kristine. You see Torvald is so terribly in love with me that he says he wants me all to himself. When we were first married, it even used to make him sort of jealous if I only as much as mentioned any of my old friends from back home. So of course I stopped doing it. But I often talk to Dr. Rank about such things. He likes hearing about them.

MRS. LINDE. Listen, Nora! In lots of ways you are still a child. Now, I'm a good deal older than you, and a bit more experienced. I'll tell you something: I think you ought to give up all this business with Dr. Rank.

NORA. Give up what business?

MRS. LINDE. The whole thing, I should say. Weren't you saying yesterday something about a rich admirer who was to provide you with money. . . .

NORA. One who's never existed, I regret to say. But what of it?

MRS. LINDE. Has Dr. Rank money?

NORA. Yes, he has.

MRS. LINDE. And no dependents?

NORA. No, nobody. But...?

MRS. LINDE. And he comes to the house every day?

NORA. Yes, I told you.

MRS. LINDE. But how can a man of his position want to pester you like this?

NORA. I simply don't understand.

MRS. LINDE. Don't pretend, Nora. Do you think I don't see now who you borrowed the twelve hundred from?

NORA. Are you out of your mind? Do you really think that? A friend of ours who comes here every day? The whole situation would have been absolutely intolerable.

MRS. LINDE. It really isn't him?

NORA. No, I give you my word. It would never have occurred to me for one moment. . . . Anyway, he didn't have the money to lend then. He didn't inherit it till later.

MRS. LINDE. Just as well for you, I'd say, my dear Nora.

NORA. No, it would never have occurred to me to ask Dr. Rank. . . . All the same I'm pretty certain if I were to ask him ...

MRS. LINDE. But of course you won't.

NORA. No, of course not. I can't ever imagine it being necessary. But I'm quite certain if ever I were to mention it to Dr. Rank. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Behind your husband's back?

NORA. I have to get myself out of that other business. That's also behind his back. I must get myself out of that.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that's what I said yesterday. But ...

NORA [walking up and down]. A man's better at coping with these things than a woman. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Your own husband, yes.

NORA. Nonsense! [Stops.] When you've paid everything you owe, you do get your IOU back again, don't you?

MRS. LINDE. Of course.

NORA. And you can tear it up into a thousand pieces and burn it—the nasty, filthy thing!

MRS. LINDE [looking fixedly at her, puts down her sewing and slowly rises]. Nora, you are hiding something from me.

NORA. Is it so obvious?

MRS. LINDE. Something has happened to you since yesterday morning. Nora, what is it?

NORA [going towards her]. Kristine! [Listens.] Hush! There's Torvald back. Look, you go and sit in there beside the children for the time being. Torvald can't stand the sight of mending lying about. Get Anne Marie to help you.

MRS. LINDE [gathering a lot of the things together]. All right, but I'm not leaving until we have thrashed this thing out.

[She goes into the room, left; at the same time HELMER comes in from the hall.]

NORA [goes to meet him]. I've been longing for you to be back, Torvald, dear.

HELMER. Was that the dressmaker . . . ?

NORA. No, it was Kristine; she's helping me with my costume. I think it's going to look very nice . . .

HELMER. Wasn't that a good idea of mine, now?

NORA. Wonderful! But wasn't it also nice of me to let you have your way?

HELMER [taking her under the chin]. Nice of you—because you let your husband have his way? All right, you little rogue, I know you didn't mean it that way. But I don't want to disturb you. You'll be wanting to try the costume on, I suppose.

NORA. And I dare say you've got work to do?

HELMER. Yes. [Shows her a bundle of papers.] Look at this. I've been down at the Bank. . . .

[He turns to go into his study.]

NORA. Torvald!

HELMER [stopping]. Yes.

NORA. If a little squirrel were to ask ever so nicely . . . ?

HELMER. Well?

NORA. Would you do something for it?

HELMER. Naturally I would first have to know what it is.

NORA. Please, if only you would let it have its way, and do what it wants, it'd scamper about and do all sorts of marvelous tricks.

HELMER. What is it?

NORA. And the pretty little skylark would sing all day long. . . .

HELMER. Huh! It does that anyway.

NORA. I'd pretend I was an elfin child and dance a moonlight dance for you, Torvald.

HELMER. Nora—I hope it's not that business you started on this morning?

NORA [coming closer]. Yes, it is, Torvald. I implore you!

HELMER. You have the nerve to bring that up again?

NORA. Yes, yes, you must listen to me. You must let Krogstad keep his job at the Bank.

HELMER. My dear Nora, I'm giving his job to Mrs. Linde.

NORA. Yes, it's awfully sweet of you. But couldn't you get rid of somebody else in the office instead of Krogstad?

HELMER. This really is the most incredible obstinacy! Just because you go and make some thoughtless promise to put in a good word for him, you expect me . . .

NORA. It's not that, Torvald. It's for your own sake. That man writes in all the nastiest papers, you told me that yourself. He can do you no end of harm. He terrifies me to death. . . .

HELMER. Aha, now I see. It's your memories of what happened before that are frightening you.

NORA. What do you mean?

HELMER. It's your father you are thinking of.

NORA. Yes . . . yes, that's right. You remember all the nasty insinuations those wicked people put in the papers about Daddy? I honestly think they would have had him dismissed if the Ministry hadn't sent you down to investigate, and you hadn't been so kind and helpful.

HELMER. My dear little Nora, there is a considerable difference between your father and me. Your father's professional conduct was not entirely above suspicion. Mine is. And I hope it's going to stay that way as long as I hold this position.

NORA. But nobody knows what some of these evil people are capable of. Things could be so nice and pleasant for us here, in the peace and quiet of our home—you and me and the children, Torvald! That's why I implore you. . . .

HELMER. The more you plead for him, the more impossible you make it for me to keep him on. It's already known down at the Bank that I am going to give Krogstad his notice. If it ever got around that the new manager had been talked over by his wife. . . .

NORA. What of it?

HELMER. Oh, nothing! As long as the little woman gets her own stubborn way . . . ! Do you want me to make myself a laughing stock in the office? . . . Give people the idea that I am susceptible to any kind of outside pressure? You can imagine how soon I'd feel the consequences of that! Anyway, there's one other consideration that makes it impossible to have Krogstad in the Bank as long as I am manager.

NORA. What's that?

HELMER. At a pinch I might have overlooked his past lapses. . . .

NORA. Of course you could, Torvald!

HELMER. And I'm told he's not bad at his job, either. But we knew each other rather well when we were younger. It was one of those rather rash friendships that prove embarrassing in later life. There's no reason why you shouldn't know we were once on terms of some familiarity. And he, in his tactless way, makes no attempt to hide the fact, particularly when other people are present. On the contrary, he thinks he has every right to treat me as an equal, with his "Torvald this" and "Torvald that" every time he opens his mouth. I find it extremely irritating, I can tell you. He would make my position at the Bank absolutely intolerable.

NORA. Torvald, surely you aren't serious?

HELMER. Oh? Why not?

NORA. Well, it's all so petty.

HELMER. What's that you say? Petty? Do you think I'm petty?

NORA. No, not at all, Torvald dear! And that's why . . .

HELMER. Doesn't make any difference! . . . You call my motives petty; so I must be petty too. Petty! Indeed! Well, we'll put a stop to that, once and for all. [He opens the hall door and calls.] Helene!

NORA. What are you going to do?

HELMER [searching among his papers]. Settle things. [The maid comes in.] See this letter? I want you to take it down at once. Get hold of a messenger and get him to deliver it. Quickly. The address is on the outside. There's the money.

MAID. Very good, sir.

[She goes with the letter.]

HELMER [putting his papers together]. There now, my stubborn little miss.

NORA [breathless]. Torvald . . . what was that letter?

HELMER. Krogstad's notice.

NORA. Get it back, Torvald! There's still time! Oh, Torvald, get it back! Please for my sake, for your sake, for the sake of the children! Listen, Torvald, please! You don't realize what it can do to us.

HELMER. Too late.

NORA. Yes, too late.

HELMER. My dear Nora, I forgive you this anxiety of yours, although it is actually a bit of an insult. Oh, but it is, I tell you! It's hardly flattering to suppose that anything this miserable pen-pusher wrote could frighten me! But I forgive you all the same, because it is rather a sweet way of showing how much you love me. [He takes her in his arms.] This is how things must be, my own darling Nora. When it comes to the point, I've enough strength and enough courage, believe me, for whatever happens. You'll find I'm man enough to take everything on myself.

NORA [terrified]. What do you mean?

HELMER. Everything, I said. . . .

NORA [in command of herself]. That is something you shall never, never do.

HELMER. All right, then we'll share it, Nora—as man and wife. That's what we'll do. [Caressing her.] Does that make you happy now? There, there, don't look at me with those eyes, like a little frightened dove. The whole thing is sheer imagination.—Why don't you run through the tarantella and try out the tambourine? I'll go into my study and shut both the doors, then I won't hear anything. You can make all the noise you want. [Turns in the doorway.] And when Rank comes, tell him where he can find me.

[He nods to her, goes with his papers into his room, and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [wild-eyed with terror, stands as though transfixed]. He's quite capable of doing it! He would do it! No matter what, he'd do it.—No, never in this world! Anything but that! Help? Some way out . . . ? [The doorbell rings in the hall.] Dr. Rank . . . ! Anything but that, anything! [She brushes her hands over her face, pulls herself together and opens the door into the hall. DR. RANK is standing outside hanging up his fur coat. During what follows it begins to grow dark.] Hello, Dr. Rank. I recognized your ring. Do you mind not going in to Torvald just yet, I think he's busy.

RANK. And you?

[DR. RANK comes into the room and she closes the door behind him.]

NORA. Oh, you know very well I've always got time for you.

RANK. Thank you. A privilege I shall take advantage of as long as I am able.

NORA. What do you mean—as long as you are able?

RANK. Does that frighten you?

NORA. Well, it's just that it sounds so strange. Is anything likely to happen?

RANK. Only what I have long expected. But I didn't think it would come quite so soon.

NORA [catching at his arm]. What have you found out? Dr. Rank, you must tell me!

RANK. I'm slowly sinking. There's nothing to be done about it.

NORA [with a sigh of relief]. Oh, it's you you're . . . ?

RANK. Who else? No point in deceiving oneself. I am the most wretched of all my patients, Mrs. Helmer. These last few days I've made a careful analysis of my internal economy. Bankrupt! Within a month I shall probably be lying rotting up there in the churchyard.

NORA. Come now, what a ghastly thing to say!

RANK. The whole damned thing is ghastly. But the worst thing is all the ghastliness that has to be gone through first. I only have one more test to make; and when that's done I'll know pretty well when the final disintegration will start. There's something I want to ask you. Helmer is a sensitive soul; he loathes anything that's ugly. I don't want him visiting me. . . .

NORA. But Dr. Rank. . . .

RANK. On no account must he. I won't have it. I'll lock the door on him.—As soon as I'm absolutely certain of the worst, I'll send you my visiting card with a black cross on it. You'll know then the final horrible disintegration has begun.

NORA. Really, you are being quite absurd today. And here was I hoping you would be in a thoroughly good mood.

RANK. With death staring me in the face? Why should I suffer for another man's sins? What justice is there in that? Somewhere, somehow, every single family must be suffering some such cruel retribution. . . .

NORA [stopping up her ears]. Rubbish! Do cheer up!

RANK. Yes, really the whole thing's nothing but a huge joke. My poor innocent spine must do penance for my father's gay subaltern life.

NORA [by the table, left]. Wasn't he rather partial to asparagus and pàté de foie gras?

RANK. Yes, he was. And truffles.

NORA. Truffles, yes. And oysters, too, I believe?

RANK. Yes, oysters, oysters, of course.

NORA. And all the port and champagne that goes with them. It does seem a pity all these delicious things should attack the spine.

RANK. Especially when they attack a poor spine that never had any fun out of them.

NORA. Yes, that is an awful pity.

RANK [looks at her sharply]. Hm. . . .

NORA [after a pause]. Why did you smile?

RANK. No, it was you who laughed.

NORA. No, it was you who smiled, Dr. Rank!

RANK [getting up]. You are a bigger rascal than I thought you were.

NORA. I feel full of mischief today.

RANK. So it seems.

NORA [putting her hands on his shoulders]. Dear, dear Dr. Rank, you mustn't go and die on Torvald and me.

RANK. You wouldn't miss me for long. When you are gone, you are soon forgotten.

NORA [looking at him anxiously]. Do you think so?

RANK. People make new contacts, then . . .

NORA. Who make new contacts?

RANK. Both you and Helmer will, when I'm gone. You yourself are already well on the way, it seems to me. What was this Mrs. Linde doing here last night?

NORA. Surely you aren't jealous of poor Kristine?

RANK. Yes, I am. She'll be my successor in this house. When I'm done for, I can see this woman. . . .

NORA. Hush! Don't talk so loud, she's in there.

RANK. Today as well? There you are, you see!

NORA. Just to do some sewing on my dress. Good Lord, how absurd you are! [She sits down on the sofa.] Now Dr. Rank, cheer up. You'll see tomorrow how nicely I can dance. And you can pretend I'm doing it just for you—and for Torvald as well, of course. [She takes various things out of the box.] Come here, Dr. Rank. I want to show you something.

RANK [sits]. What is it?

NORA. Look!

RANK. Silk stockings.

NORA. Flesh-coloured! Aren't they lovely! Of course, it's dark here now, but tomorrow. . . . No, no, no, you can only look at the feet. Oh well, you might as well see a bit higher up, too.

RANK. Hm. . . .

NORA. Why are you looking so critical? Don't you think they'll fit?

RANK. I couldn't possibly offer any informed opinion about that.

NORA [looks at him for a moment]. Shame on you. [Hits him lightly across the ear with the stockings.] Take that! [Folds them up again.]

RANK. And what other delights am I to be allowed to see?

NORA. Not another thing. You are too naughty. [She hums a little and searches among her things.]

RANK [after a short pause]. Sitting here so intimately like this with you, I can't imagine . . . I simply cannot conceive what would have become of me if I had never come to this house.

NORA [smiles]. Yes, I rather think you do enjoy coming here.

RANK [in a low voice, looking fixedly ahead]. And the thought of having to leave it all . . .

NORA. Nonsense. You aren't leaving.

RANK [in the same tone]. . . .without being able to leave behind even the slightest token of gratitude, hardly a fleeting regret even . . . nothing but an empty place to be filled by the first person that comes along.

NORA. Supposing I were to ask you to . . . ? No . . .

RANK. What?

NORA. . . .to show me the extent of your friendship . . .

RANK. Yes?

NORA. I mean . . . to do me a tremendous favor. . . .

RANK. Would you really, for once, give me that pleasure?

NORA. You have no idea what it is.

RANK. All right, tell me.

NORA. No, really I can't, Dr. Rank. It's altogether too much to ask . . . because I need your advice and help as well. . . .

RANK. The more the better. I cannot imagine what you have in mind. But tell me anyway. You do trust me, don't you?

NORA. Yes, I trust you more than anybody I know. You are my best and my most faithful friend. I know that. So I will tell you. Well then, Dr. Rank, there is something you must help me to prevent. You know how deeply, how passionately Torvald is in love with me. He would never hesitate for a moment to sacrifice his life for my sake.

RANK [bending towards her]. Nora . . . do you think he's the only one who . . . ?

NORA [stiffening slightly]. Who . . . ?

RANK. Who wouldn't gladly give his life for your sake.

NORA [sadly]. Oh!

RANK. I swore to myself you would know before I went. I'll never have a better opportunity. Well, Nora! Now you know. And now you know too that you can confide in me as in nobody else.

NORA [rises and speaks evenly and calmly]. Let me past.

RANK [makes way for her, but remains seated]. Nora. . . .

NORA [in the hall doorway]. Helene, bring the lamp in, please. [Walks over to the stove.] Oh, my dear Dr. Rank, that really was rather horrid of you.

RANK [getting up]. That I have loved you every bit as much as anybody? Is that horrid?

NORA. No, but that you had to go and tell me. When it was all so unnecessary. . . .

RANK. What do you mean? Did you know . . . ?

[The MAID comes in with the lamp, puts it on the table, and goes out again.]

RANK. Nora . . . Mrs. Helmer . . . I'm asking you if you knew?

NORA. How can I tell whether I did or didn't. I simply can't tell you. . . . Oh, how could you be so clumsy, Dr. Rank! When everything was so nice.

RANK. Anyway, you know now that I'm at your service, body and soul. So you can speak out.

NORA [looking at him]. After this?

RANK. I beg you to tell me what it is.

NORA. I can tell you nothing now.

RANK. You must. You can't torment me like this. Give me a chance—I'll do anything that's humanly possible.

NORA. You can do nothing for me now. Actually, I don't really need any help. It's all just my imagination, really it is. Of course! [She sits down in the rocking chair, looks at him and smiles.] I must say, you are a nice one, Dr. Rank! Don't you feel ashamed of yourself, now the lamp's been brought in?

RANK. No, not exactly. But perhaps I ought to go—for good?

NORA. No, you mustn't do that. You must keep coming just as you've always done. You know very well Torvald would miss you terribly.

RANK. And you?

NORA. I always think it's tremendous fun having you.

RANK. That's exactly what gave me wrong ideas. I just can't puzzle you out. I often used to feel you'd just as soon be with me as with Helmer.

NORA. Well, you see, there are those people you love and those people you'd almost rather be with.

RANK. Yes, there's something in that.

NORA. When I was a girl at home, I loved Daddy best, of course. But I also thought it great fun if I could slip into the maids' room. For one thing they never preached at me. And they always talked about such exciting things.

RANK. Aha! So it's their role I've taken over!

NORA [jumps up and crosses to him]. Oh, my dear, kind Dr. Rank, I didn't mean that at all. But you can see how it's a bit with Torvald as it was with Daddy. . . .

[The MAID comes in from the hall.]

MAID. Please, ma'am . . . !

[She whispers and hands her a card.]

NORA [glances at the card]. Ah!

[She puts it in her pocket.]

RANK. Anything wrong?

NORA. No, no, not at all. It's just . . . it's my new costume. . . .

RANK. How is that? There's your costume in there.

NORA. That one, yes. But this is another one. I've ordered it. Torvald mustn't hear about it. . . .

RANK. Ah, so that's the big secret, is it!

NORA. Yes, that's right. Just go in and see him, will you? He's in the study. Keep him occupied for the time being. . . .

RANK. Don't worry. He shan't escape me.

[He goes into HELMER's study.]

NORA [to the MAID]. Is he waiting in the kitchen?

MAID. Yes, he came up the back stairs. . . .

NORA. But didn't you tell him somebody was here?

MAID. Yes, but it was no good.

NORA. Won't he go?

MAID. No, he won't till he's seen you.

NORA. Let him in, then. But quietly. Helene, you mustn't tell anybody about this. It's a surprise for my husband.

MAID. I understand, ma'am. . . .

[She goes out.]

NORA. Here it comes! What I've been dreading! No, no, it can't happen, it can't happen.

[She walks over and bolts HELMER's door. The MAID opens the hall door for KROGSTAD and shuts it again behind him. He is wearing a fur coat, overshoes, and a fur cap.]

NORA [goes towards him]. Keep your voice down, my husband is at home.

KROGSTAD. What if he is?

NORA. What do you want with me?

KROGSTAD. To find out something.

NORA. Hurry, then. What is it?

KROGSTAD. You know I've been given notice.

NORA. I couldn't prevent it, Mr. Krogstad, I did my utmost for you, but it was no use.

KROGSTAD. Has your husband so little affection for you? He knows what I can do to you, yet he dares. . . .

NORA. You don't imagine he knows about it!

KROGSTAD. No, I didn't imagine he did. It didn't seem a bit like my good friend Torvald Helmer to show that much courage. . . .

NORA. Mr. Krogstad, I must ask you to show some respect for my husband.

KROGSTAD. Oh, sure! All due respect! But since you are so anxious to keep this business quiet, Mrs. Helmer, I take it you now have a rather clearer idea of just what it is you've done, than you had yesterday.

NORA. Clearer than you could ever have given me.

KROGSTAD. Yes, being as I am such a rotten lawyer. . . .

NORA. What do you want with me?

KROGSTAD. I just wanted to see how things stood, Mrs. Helmer. I've been thinking about you all day.

Even a mere money-lender, a hack journalist, a—well, even somebody like me has a bit of what you might call feeling.

NORA. Show it then. Think of my little children.

KROGSTAD. Did you or your husband think of mine? But what does it matter now? There was just one thing I wanted to say: you needn't take this business too seriously. I shan't start any proceedings, for the present.

NORA. Ah, I knew you wouldn't.

KROGSTAD. The whole thing can be arranged quite amicably. Nobody need know. Just the three of us.

NORA. My husband must never know.

KROGSTAD. How can you prevent it? Can you pay off the balance?

NORA. No, not immediately.

KROGSTAD. Perhaps you've some way of getting hold of the money in the next few days.

NORA. None I want to make use of.

KROGSTAD. Well, it wouldn't have been very much help to you if you had. Even if you stood there with the cash in your hand and to spare, you still wouldn't get your IOU back from me now.

NORA. What are you going to do with it?

KROGSTAD. Just keep it—have it in my possession. Nobody who isn't implicated need know about it. So if you are thinking of trying any desperate remedies . . .

NORA. Which I am. . . .

KROGSTAD. . . . if you happen to be thinking of running away . . .

NORA. Which I am!

KROGSTAD. . . .or anything worse . . .

NORA. How did you know?

KROGSTAD. . . .forget it!

NORA. How did you know I was thinking of that?

KROGSTAD. Most of us think of that, to begin with. I did, too; but I didn't have the courage. . . .

NORA [tonelessly]. I haven't either.

KROGSTAD [relieved]. So you haven't the courage either, eh?

NORA. No, I haven't! I haven't!

KROGSTAD. It would also be very stupid. There'd only be the first domestic storm to get over. . . . I've got a letter to your husband in my pocket here. . . .

NORA. And it's all in there?

KROGSTAD. In as tactful a way as possible.

NORA [quickly]. He must never read that letter. Tear it up. I'll find the money somehow.

KROGSTAD. Excuse me, Mrs. Helmer, but I've just told you. . . .

NORA. I'm not talking about the money I owe you. I want to know how much you are demanding from my husband, and I'll get the money.

KROGSTAD. I want no money from your husband.

NORA. What do you want?

KROGSTAD. I'll tell you. I want to get on my feet again, Mrs. Helmer; I want to get to the top. And your husband is going to help me. For the last eighteen months I've gone straight; all that time it's been hard going; I was content to work my way up, step by step. Now I'm being kicked out, and I won't stand for being taken back again as an act of charity. I'm going to get to the top, I tell you. I'm going back into that Bank—with a better job. Your husband is going to create a new vacancy, just for me. . . .

NORA. He'll never do that!

KROGSTAD. He will do it. I know him. He'll do it without so much as a whimper. And once I'm in there with him, you'll see what's what. In less than a year I'll be his right-hand man. It'll be Nils Krogstad, not Torvald Helmer, who'll be running that Bank.

NORA. You'll never live to see that day!

KROGSTAD. You mean you . . . ?

NORA. Now I have the courage.

KROGSTAD. You can't frighten me! A precious pampered little thing like you. . . .

NORA. I'll show you! I'll show you!

KROGSTAD. Under the ice, maybe? Down in the cold, black water? Then being washed up in the spring, bloated, hairless, unrecognizable. . . .

NORA. You can't frighten me.

KROGSTAD. You can't frighten me, either. People don't do that sort of thing, Mrs. Helmer. There wouldn't be any point to it, anyway, I'd still have him right in my pocket.

NORA. Afterwards? When I'm no longer . . .

KROGSTAD. Aren't you forgetting that your reputation would then be entirely in my hands? [NORA stands looking at him, speechless.] Well, I've warned you. Don't do anything silly. When Helmer gets my letter, I expect to hear from him. And don't forget: it's him who is forcing me off the straight and narrow again, your own husband! That's something I'll never forgive him for. Goodbye, Mrs. Helmer.

[He goes out through the hall. NORA crosses to the door, opens it slightly, and listens.]

NORA. He's going. He hasn't left the letter. No, no, that would be impossible! [Opens the door further and further.] What's he doing? He's stopped outside. He's not going down the stairs. Has he changed his mind? Is he . . . ? [A letter falls into the letter box. Then KROGSTAD'S footsteps are heard receding as he walks downstairs. NORA gives a stifled cry, runs across the room to the sofa table; pause.] In the letter box! [She creeps stealthily across to the hall door.] There it is! Torvald, Torvald! It's hopeless now!

MRS. LINDE. [comes into the room, left, carrying the costume]. There, I think that's everything. Shall we try it on?

NORA [in a low, hoarse voice]. Kristine, come here.

MRS. LINDE [throws the dress down on the sofa]. What's wrong with you? You look upset.

NORA. Come here. Do you see that letter? There, look! Through the glass in the letter box.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, yes, I can see it.

NORA. It's a letter from Krogstad.

MRS. LINDE. Nora! It was Krogstad who lent you the money!

NORA. Yes. And now Torvald will get to know everything.

MRS. LINDE. Believe me, Nora, it's best for you both.

NORA. But there's more to it than that. I forged a signature. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Heavens above!

NORA. Listen, I want to tell you something, Kristine, so you can be my witness.

MRS. LINDE. What do you mean, “witness”? What do you want me to . . . ?

NORA. If I should go mad . . . which might easily happen . . .

MRS. LINDE. Nora!

NORA. Or if anything happened to me . . . which meant I couldn’t be here. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Nora, Nora! Are you out of your mind?

NORA. And if somebody else wanted to take it all upon himself, the whole blame, you understand. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Yes, yes. But what makes you think . . . ?

NORA. Then you must testify that it isn’t true, Kristine. I’m not out of my mind; I’m quite sane now. And I tell you this: nobody else knew anything, I alone was responsible for the whole thing. Remember that!

MRS. LINDE. I will. But I don’t understand a word of it.

NORA. Why should you? You see something miraculous is going to happen.

MRS. LINDE. Something miraculous?

NORA. Yes, a miracle. But something so terrible as well, Kristine—oh, it must never happen, not for anything.

MRS. LINDE. I’m going straight over to talk to Krogstad.

NORA. Don’t go. He’ll only do you harm.

MRS. LINDE. There was a time when he would have done anything for me.

NORA. Him!

MRS. LINDE. Where does he live?

NORA. How do I know . . . ? Wait a minute. [She feels in her pocket.] Here’s his card. But the letter, the letter . . . !

HELMER [from his study, knocking on the door]. Nora!

NORA [cries out in terror]. What’s that? What do you want?

HELMER. Don’t be frightened. We’re not coming in. You’ve locked the door. Are you trying on?

NORA. Yes, yes, I’m trying on. It looks so nice on me, Torvald.

MRS. LINDE [who has read the card]. He lives just round the corner.

NORA. It's no use. It's hopeless. The letter is there in the box.

MRS. LINDE. Your husband keeps the key?

NORA. Always.

MRS. LINDE. Krogstad must ask for his letter back unread, he must find some sort of excuse. . . .

NORA. But this is just the time that Torvald generally . . .

MRS. LINDE. Put him off! Go in and keep him busy. I'll be back as soon as I can.

[She goes out hastily by the hall door. NORA walks over to HELMER'S door, opens it and peeps in.]

NORA. Torvald!

HELMER [in the study]. Well, can a man get into his own living room again now? Come along, Rank, now we'll see . . . [In the doorway.] But what's this?

NORA. What, Torvald dear?

HELMER. Rank led me to expect some kind of marvelous transformation.

RANK [in the doorway]. That's what I thought too, but I must have been mistaken.

NORA. I'm not showing myself off to anybody before tomorrow.

HELMER. Nora dear, you look tired. You haven't been practising too hard?

NORA. No, I haven't practised at all yet.

HELMER. You'll have to, though.

NORA. Yes, I certainly must, Torvald. But I just can't get anywhere without your help: I've completely forgotten it.

HELMER. We'll soon polish it up.

NORA. Yes, do help me, Torvald. Promise? I'm so nervous. All those people. . . . You must devote yourself exclusively to me this evening. Pens away! Forget all about the office! Promise me, Torvald dear!

HELMER. I promise. This evening I am wholly and entirely at your service . . . helpless little thing that you are. Oh, but while I remember, I'll just look first . . .

[He goes towards the hall door.]

NORA. What do you want out there?

HELMER. Just want to see if there are any letters.

NORA. No, don't, Torvald!

HELMER. Why not?

NORA. Torvald, please! There aren't any.

HELMER. Just let me see.

[He starts to go. NORA, at the piano, plays the opening bars of the tarantella.]

HELMER [at the door, stops]. Aha!

NORA. I shan't be able to dance tomorrow if I don't rehearse it with you.

HELMER [walks to her]. Are you really so nervous, Nora dear?

NORA. Terribly nervous. Let me run through it now. There's still time before supper. Come and sit here and play for me, Torvald dear. Tell me what to do, keep me right—as you always do.

HELMER. Certainly, with pleasure, if that's what you want.

[He sits at the piano. NORA snatches the tambourine out of the box, and also a long gaily coloured shawl which she drapes round herself, then with a bound she leaps forward.]

NORA [shouts]. Now play for me! Now I'll dance!

HELMER [playing]. Not so fast! Not so fast!

NORA. I can't help it.

HELMER. Not so wild, Nora!

NORA. This is how it has to be.

HELMER [stops]. No, no, that won't do at all.

NORA [laughs and swings the tambourine]. Didn't I tell you?

RANK. Let me play for her.

HELMER [gets up]. Yes, do. Then I'll be better able to tell her what to do.

*[*RANK sits down at the piano and plays. NORA dances more and more wildly. HELMER stands by the stove giving her repeated directions as she dances; she does not seem to hear them. Her hair comes undone and falls about her shoulders; she pays no attention and goes on dancing. MRS. LINDE enters.]

MRS. LINDE [standing as though spellbound in the doorway]. Ah . . . !

NORA [dancing]. See what fun we are having, Kristine.

HELMER. But my dear darling Nora, you are dancing as though your life depended on it.

NORA. It does.

HELMER. Stop, Rank! This is sheer madness. Stop, I say.

[RANK stops playing and NORA comes to a sudden halt.]

HELMER [crosses to her]. I would never have believed it. You have forgotten everything I ever taught you.

NORA [throwing away the tambourine]. There you are, you see.

HELMER. Well, some more instruction is certainly needed there.

NORA. Yes, you see how necessary it is. You must go on coaching me right up to the last minute. Promise me, Torvald?

HELMER. You can rely on me.

NORA. You mustn't think about anything else but me until after tomorrow . . . mustn't open any letters . . . mustn't touch the letter box.

HELMER. Ah, you are still frightened of what that man might . . .

NORA. Yes, yes, I am.

HELMER. I can see from your face there's already a letter there from him.

NORA. I don't know. I think so. But you mustn't read anything like that now. We don't want anything horrid coming between us until all this is over.

RANK [softly to HELMER]. I shouldn't cross her.

HELMER [puts his arm round her]. The child must have her way. But tomorrow night, when your dance is done. . . .

NORA. Then you are free.

MAID [in the doorway, right]. Dinner is served, madam.

NORA. We'll have champagne, Helene.

MAID. Very good, madam.

[She goes.]

HELMER. Aha! It's to be quite a banquet, eh?

NORA. With champagne flowing until dawn. [Shouts.] And some macaroons, Helene . . . lots of them, for once in a while.

HELMER [seizing her hands]. Now, now, not so wild and excitable! Let me see you being my own little singing bird again.

NORA. Oh yes, I will. And if you'll just go in . . . you, too, Dr. Rank. Kristine, you must help me to do my hair.

RANK [softly, as they leave]. There isn't anything . . . anything as it were, impending, is there?

HELMER. No, not at all, my dear fellow. It's nothing but these childish fears I was telling you about.

[They go out to the right.]

NORA. Well?

MRS. LINDE. He's left town.

NORA. I saw it in your face.

MRS. LINDE. He's coming back tomorrow evening. I left a note for him.

NORA. You shouldn't have done that. You must let things take their course. Because really it's a case for rejoicing, waiting like this for the miracle.

MRS. LINDE. What is it you are waiting for?

NORA. Oh, you wouldn't understand. Go and join the other two. I'll be there in a minute.

[MRS. LINDE goes into the dining-room. NORA stands for a moment as though to collect herself, then looks at her watch.]

NORA. Five. Seven hours to midnight. Then twenty-four hours till the next midnight. Then the tarantella will be over. Twenty-four and seven? Thirty-one hours to live.

HELMER [in the doorway, right]. What's happened to our little sky-lark?

NORA [running towards him with open arms]. Here she is!

Act III

The same room. The round table has been moved to the center of the room, and the chairs placed round it. A lamp is burning on the table. The door to the hall stands open. Dance music can be heard coming from the floor above. MRS. LINDE is sitting by the table, idly turning over the pages of a book; she tries to read, but does not seem able to concentrate. Once or twice she listens, tensely, for a sound at the front door.

MRS. LINDE [looking at her watch]. Still not here. There isn't much time left. I only hope he hasn't . . . [She listens again.] Ah, there he is. [She goes out into the hall, and cautiously opens the front door. Soft footsteps can be heard on the stairs. She whispers.] Come in. There's nobody here.

KROGSTAD [in the doorway]. I found a note from you at home. What does it all mean?

MRS. LINDE. I had to talk to you.

KROGSTAD. Oh? And did it have to be here, in this house?

MRS. LINDE. It wasn't possible over at my place, it hasn't a separate entrance. Come in. We are quite alone. The maid's asleep and the Helmers are at a party upstairs.

KROGSTAD [comes into the room]. Well, well! So the Helmers are out dancing tonight! Really?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, why not?

KROGSTAD. Why not indeed!

MRS. LINDE. Well then, Nils. Let's talk.

KROGSTAD. Have we two anything more to talk about?

MRS. LINDE. We have a great deal to talk about.

KROGSTAD. I shouldn't have thought so.

MRS. LINDE. That's because you never really understood me.

KROGSTAD. What else was there to understand, apart from the old, old story? A heartless woman throws a man over the moment something more profitable offers itself.

MRS. LINDE. Do you really think I'm so heartless? Do you think I found it easy to break it off?

KROGSTAD. Didn't you?

MRS. LINDE. You didn't really believe that?

KROGSTAD. If that wasn't the case, why did you write to me as you did?

MRS. LINDE. There was nothing else I could do. If I had to make the break, I felt in duty bound to destroy any feeling that you had for me.

KROGSTAD [clenching his hands]. So that's how it was. And all that . . . was for money!

MRS. LINDE. You mustn't forget I had a helpless mother and two young brothers. We couldn't wait for you, Nils. At that time you hadn't much immediate prospect of anything.

KROGSTAD. That may be. But you had no right to throw me over for somebody else.

MRS. LINDE. Well, I don't know. Many's the time I've asked myself whether I was justified.

KROGSTAD [more quietly]. When I lost you, it was just as if the ground had slipped away from under my feet. Look at me now: a broken man clinging to the wreck of his life.

MRS. LINDE. Help might be near.

KROGSTAD. It was near. Then you came along and got in the way.

MRS. LINDE. Quite without knowing, Nils. I only heard today it's you I'm supposed to be replacing at the Bank.

KROGSTAD. If you say so, I believe you. But now you do know, aren't you going to withdraw?

MRS. LINDE. No, that wouldn't benefit you in the slightest.

KROGSTAD. Benefit, benefit . . . ! I would do it just the same.

MRS. LINDE. I have learned to go carefully. Life and hard, bitter necessity have taught me that.

KROGSTAD. And life has taught me not to believe in pretty speeches.

MRS. LINDE. Then life has taught you a very sensible thing. But deeds are something you surely must believe in?

KROGSTAD. How do you mean?

MRS. LINDE. You said you were like a broken man clinging to the wreck of his life.

KROGSTAD. And I said it with good reason.

MRS. LINDE. And I am like a broken woman clinging to the wreck of her life. Nobody to care about, and nobody to care for.

KROGSTAD. It was your own choice.

MRS. LINDE. At the time there was no other choice.

KROGSTAD. Well, what of it?

MRS. LINDE. Nils, what about us two castaways joining forces?

KROGSTAD. What's that you say?

MRS. LINDE. Two of us on one wreck surely stand a better chance than each on his own.

KROGSTAD. Kristine!

MRS. LINDE. Why do you suppose I came to town?

KROGSTAD. You mean, you thought of me?

MRS. LINDE. Without work I couldn't live. All my life I have worked, for as long as I can remember; that has always been my one great joy. But now I'm completely alone in the world, and feeling horribly empty and forlorn. There's no pleasure in working only for yourself. Nils, give me somebody and something to work for.

KROGSTAD. I don't believe all this. It's only a woman's hysteria, wanting to be all magnanimous and self-sacrificing.

MRS. LINDE. Have you ever known me hysterical before?

KROGSTAD. Would you really do this? Tell me—do you know all about my past?

MRS. LINDE. Yes.

KROGSTAD. And you know what people think about me?

MRS. LINDE. Just now you hinted you thought you might have been a different person with me.

KROGSTAD. I'm convinced I would.

MRS. LINDE. Couldn't it still happen?

KROGSTAD. Kristine! You know what you are saying, don't you? Yes, you do. I can see you do. Have you really the courage . . . ?

MRS. LINDE. I need someone to mother, and your children need a mother. We two need each other. Nils, I have faith in what, deep down, you are. With you I can face anything.

KROGSTAD [seizing her hands]. Thank you, thank you, Kristine. And I'll soon have everybody looking up to me, or I'll know the reason why. Ah, but I was forgetting. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Hush! The tarantella! You must go!

KROGSTAD. Why? What is it?

MRS. LINDE. You hear that dance upstairs? When it's finished they'll be coming.

KROGSTAD. Yes, I'll go. It's too late to do anything. Of course, you know nothing about what steps I've taken against the Helmers.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, Nils, I do know.

KROGSTAD. Yet you still want to go on. . . .

MRS. LINDE. I know how far a man like you can be driven by despair.

KROGSTAD. Oh, if only I could undo what I've done!

MRS. LINDE. You still can. Your letter is still there in the box.

KROGSTAD. Are you sure?

MRS. LINDE. Quite sure. But . . .

KROGSTAD [regards her searchingly]. Is that how things are? You want to save your friend at any price? Tell me straight. Is that it?

MRS. LINDE. When you've sold yourself once for other people's sake, you don't do it again.

KROGSTAD. I shall demand my letter back.

MRS. LINDE. No, no.

KROGSTAD. Of course I will, I'll wait here till Helmer comes. I'll tell him he has to give me my letter back . . . that it's only about my notice . . . that he mustn't read it. . . .

MRS. LINDE. No, Nils, don't ask for it back.

KROGSTAD. But wasn't that the very reason you got me here?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that was my first terrified reaction. But that was yesterday, and it's quite incredible the things I've witnessed in this house in the last twenty-four hours. Helmer must know everything. This unhappy secret must come out. Those two must have the whole thing out between them. All this secrecy and deception, it just can't go on.

KROGSTAD. Well, if you want to risk it . . . . But one thing I can do, and I'll do it at once. . . .

MRS. LINDE [listening]. Hurry! Go, go! The dance has stopped. We aren't safe a moment longer.

KROGSTAD. I'll wait for you downstairs.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, do. You must see me home.

KROGSTAD. I've never been so incredibly happy before.

[He goes out by the front door. The door out into the hall remains standing open.]

MRS. LINDE [tidies the room a little and gets her hat and coat ready]. How things change! How things change! Somebody to work for . . . to live for. A home to bring happiness into. Just let me get down to it. . . . I wish they'd come. . . . [Listens.] Ah, there they are. . . . Get my things.

[She takes her coat and hat. The voices of HELMER and NORA are heard outside. A key is turned and HELMER pushes NORA almost forcibly into the hall. She is dressed in the Italian costume, with a big black shawl over it. He is in evening dress, and over it a black cloak, open.]

NORA [still in the doorway, reluctantly]. No, no, not in here! I want to go back up again. I don't want to leave so early.

HELMER. But my dearest Nora . . .

NORA. Oh, please, Torvald, I beg you. . . . Please, just for another hour.

HELMER. Not another minute, Nora my sweet. You remember what we agreed. There now, come along in. You'll catch cold standing there.

[He leads her, in spite of her resistance, gently but firmly into the room.]

MRS. LINDE. Good evening.

NORA. Kristine!

HELMER. Why, Mrs. Linde. You here so late?

MRS. LINDE. Yes. You must forgive me but I did so want to see Nora all dressed up.

NORA. Have you been sitting here waiting for me?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I'm afraid I wasn't in time to catch you before you went upstairs. And I felt I couldn't leave again without seeing you.

HELMER [removing NORA'S shawl]. Well take a good look at her. I think I can say she's worth looking at. Isn't she lovely, Mrs. Linde?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I must say. . . .

HELMER. Isn't she quite extraordinarily lovely? That's what everybody at the party thought, too. But she's dreadfully stubborn . . . the sweet little thing! And what shall we do about that? Would you believe it, I nearly had to use force to get her away.

NORA. Oh Torvald, you'll be sorry you didn't let me stay, even for half an hour.

HELMER. You hear that, Mrs. Linde? She dances her tarantella, there's wild applause—which was well deserved, although the performance was perhaps rather realistic . . . I mean, rather more so than was strictly necessary from the artistic point of view. But anyway! The main thing is she was a success, a tremendous success. Was I supposed to let her stay after that? Spoil the effect? No thank you! I took my lovely little Capri girl—my capricious little Capri girl, I might say—by the arm, whisked her once round the room, a curtsey all round, and then—as they say in novels—the beautiful vision vanished. An exit should always be effective, Mrs. Linde. But I just can't get Nora to see that. Phew! It's warm in here. [He throws his cloak over a chair and opens the door to his study.] What? It's dark. Oh yes, of course. Excuse me. . . .

[He goes in and lights a few candles.]

NORA [quickly, in a breathless whisper]. Well?

MRS. LINDE [softly]. I've spoken to him.

NORA. And . . . ?

MRS. LINDE. Nora . . . you must tell your husband everything.

NORA [tonelessly]. I knew it.

MRS. LINDE. You've got nothing to fear from Krogstad. But you must speak.

NORA. I won't.

MRS. LINDE. Then the letter will.

NORA. Thank you, Kristine. Now I know what's to be done. Hush . . . !

HELMER [comes in again]. Well, Mrs. Linde, have you finished admiring her?

MRS. LINDE. Yes. And now I must say good night.

HELMER. Oh, already? Is this yours, this knitting?

MRS. LINDE [takes it]. Yes, thank you. I nearly forgot it.

HELMER. So you knit, eh?

MRS. LINDE. Yes.

HELMER. You should embroider instead, you know.

MRS. LINDE. Oh? Why?

HELMER. So much prettier. Watch! You hold the embroidery like this in the left hand, and then you take the needle in the right hand, like this, and you describe a long, graceful curve. Isn't that right?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I suppose so. . . .

HELMER. Whereas knitting on the other hand just can't help being ugly. Look! Arms pressed into the sides, the knitting needles going up and down—there's something Chinese about it. . . . Ah, that was marvelous champagne they served tonight.

MRS. LINDE. Well, good night, Nora! And stop being so stubborn.

HELMER. Well said, Mrs. Linde!

MRS. LINDE. Good night, Mr. Helmer.

HELMER [accompanying her to the door]. Good night, good night! You'll get home all right, I hope? I'd be only too pleased to. . . . But you haven't far to walk. Good night, good night! [She goes; he shuts the door behind her and comes in again.] There we are, got rid of her at last. She's a frightful bore, that woman.

NORA. Aren't you very tired, Torvald?

HELMER. Not in the least.

NORA. Not sleepy?

HELMER. Not at all. On the contrary, I feel extremely lively. What about you? Yes, you look quite tired and sleepy.

NORA. Yes, I'm very tired. I just want to fall straight off to sleep.

HELMER. There you are, you see! Wasn't I right in thinking we shouldn't stay any longer.

NORA. Oh, everything you do is right.

HELMER [kissing her forehead]. There's my little sky-lark talking common sense. Did you notice how gay Rank was this evening?

NORA. Oh, was he? I didn't get a chance to talk to him.

HELMER. I hardly did either. But it's a long time since I saw him in such a good mood. [Looks at NORA for a moment or two, then comes nearer her.] Ah, it's wonderful to be back in our own home again, and quite alone with you. How irresistibly lovely you are, Nora!

NORA. Don't look at me like that, Torvald!

HELMER. Can't I look at my most treasured possession? At all this loveliness that's mine and mine alone, completely and utterly mine.

NORA [walks round to the other side of the table]. You mustn't talk to me like that tonight.

HELMER [following her]. You still have the tarantella in your blood, I see. And that makes you even more desirable. Listen! The guests are beginning to leave now. [Softly.] Nora . . . soon the whole house will be silent.

NORA. I should hope so.

HELMER. Of course you do, don't you, Nora my darling? You know, whenever I'm out at a party with you . . . do you know why I never talk to you very much, why I always stand away from you and only steal a quick glance at you now and then . . . do you know why I do that? It's because I'm pretending we are secretly in love, secretly engaged and nobody suspects there is anything between us.

NORA. Yes, yes. I know your thoughts are always with me, of course.

HELMER. And when it's time to go, and I lay your shawl round those shapely, young shoulders, round the exquisite curve of your neck . . . I pretend that you are my young bride, that we are just leaving our wedding, that I am taking you to our new home for the first time . . . to be alone with you for the first time . . . quite alone with your young and trembling loveliness! All evening I've been longing for you, and nothing else. And as I watched you darting and swaying in the tarantella, my blood was on fire . . . I couldn't bear it any longer . . . and that's why I brought you down here with me so early. . . .

NORA. Go away, Torvald! Please leave me alone. I won't have it.

HELMER. What's this? It's just your little game isn't it, my little Nora. Won't! Won't! Am I not your husband . . . ?

[There is a knock on the front door.]

NORA [startled]. Listen . . . !

HELMER [going towards the hall]. Who's there?

RANK [outside]. It's me. Can I come in for a minute?

HELMER [in a low voice, annoyed]. Oh, what does he want now? [Aloud] Wait a moment. [He walks across and opens the door.] How nice of you to look in on your way out.

RANK. I fancied I heard your voice and I thought I would just look in. [He takes a quick glance round.] Ah yes, this dear, familiar old place! How cozy and comfortable you've got things here, you two.

HELMER. You seemed to be having a pretty good time upstairs yourself.

RANK. Capital! Why shouldn't I? Why not make the most of things in this world? At least as much as one can, and for as long as one can. The wine was excellent. . . .

HELMER. Especially the champagne.

RANK. You noticed that too, did you? It's incredible the amount I was able to put away.

NORA. Torvald also drank a lot of champagne this evening.

RANK. Oh?

NORA. Yes, and that always makes him quite merry.

RANK. Well, why shouldn't a man allow himself a jolly evening after a day well spent?

HELMER. Well spent? I'm afraid I can't exactly claim that.

RANK [clapping him on the shoulder]. But I can, you see!

NORA. Dr. Rank, am I right in thinking you carried out a certain laboratory test today?

RANK. Exactly.

HELMER. Look at our little Nora talking about laboratory tests!

NORA. And may I congratulate you on the result?

RANK. You may indeed.

NORA. So it was good?

RANK. The best possible, for both doctor and patient—certainty!

NORA [quickly and searchingly]. Certainty?

RANK. Absolute certainty. So why shouldn't I allow myself a jolly evening after that?

NORA. Quite right, Dr. Rank.

HELMER. I quite agree. As long as you don't suffer for it in the morning.

RANK. Well, you never get anything for nothing in this life.

NORA. Dr. Rank . . . you are very fond of masquerades, aren't you?

RANK. Yes, when there are plenty of amusing disguises. . . .

NORA. Tell me, what shall we two go as next time?

HELMER. There's frivolity for you . . . thinking about the next time already!

RANK. We two? I'll tell you. You must go as Lady Luck . . . .

HELMER. Yes, but how do you find a costume to suggest that?

RANK. Your wife could simply go in her everyday clothes. . . .

HELMER. That was nicely said. But don't you know what you would be?

RANK. Yes, my dear friend, I know exactly what I shall be.

HELMER. Well?

RANK. At the next masquerade, I shall be invisible.

HELMER. That's a funny idea!

RANK. There's a big black cloak . . . haven't you heard of the cloak of invisibility? That comes right down over you, and then nobody can see you.

HELMER [suppressing a smile]. Of course, that's right.

RANK. But I'm clean forgetting what I came for. Helmer, give me a cigar, one of the dark Havanas.

HELMER. With the greatest of pleasure.

[He offers his case.]

RANK [takes one and cuts the end off]. Thanks.

NORA [strikes a match]. Let me give you a light.

RANK. Thank you. [She holds out the match and he lights his cigar.] And now, goodbye!

HELMER. Goodbye, goodbye, my dear fellow!

NORA. Sleep well, Dr. Rank.

RANK. Thank you for that wish.

NORA. Wish me the same.

RANK. You? All right, if you want me to. . . . Sleep well. And thanks for the light.

[He nods to them both, and goes.]

HELMER [subdued]. He's had a lot to drink.

NORA [absently]. Very likely.

[HELMER takes a bunch of keys out of his pocket and goes out into the hall.]

NORA. Torvald . . . what do you want there?

HELMER. I must empty the letter box, it's quite full. There'll be no room for the papers in the morning. . . .

NORA. Are you going to work tonight?

HELMER. You know very well I'm not. Hello, what's this? Somebody's been at the lock.

NORA. At the lock?

HELMER. Yes, I'm sure of it. Why should that be? I'd hardly have thought the maids . . . ? Here's a broken hairpin. Nora, it's one of yours. . . .

NORA [quickly]. It must have been the children. . . .

HELMER. Then you'd better tell them not to. Ah . . . there . . . I've managed to get it open. [He takes the things out and shouts into the kitchen.] Helene! . . . Helene, put the light out in the hall. [He comes into the room again with the letters in his hand and shuts the hall door.] Look how it all mounts up. [Runs through them.] What's this?

NORA. The letter! Oh no, Torvald, no!

HELMER. Two visiting cards . . . from Dr. Rank.

NORA. From Dr. Rank?

HELMER [looking at them]. Dr. Rank, Medical Practitioner. They were on top. He must have put them in as he left.

NORA. Is there anything on them?

HELMER. There's a black cross above his name. Look. What an uncanny idea. It's just as if he were announcing his own death.

NORA. He is.

HELMER. What? What do you know about it? Has he said anything to you?

NORA. Yes. He said when these cards came, he would have taken his last leave of us. He was going to shut himself up and die.

HELMER. Poor fellow! Of course I knew we couldn't keep him with us very long. But so soon. . . . And hiding himself away like a wounded animal.

NORA. When it has to happen, it's best that it should happen without words. Don't you think so, Torvald?

HELMER [walking up and down]. He had grown so close to us. I don't think I can imagine him gone. His suffering and his loneliness seemed almost to provide a background of dark cloud to the sunshine of our lives. Well, perhaps it's all for the best. For him at any rate. [Pauses.] And maybe for us as well, Nora. Now there's just the two of us. [Puts his arms round her.] Oh, my darling wife, I can't hold you close enough. You know, Nora . . . many's the time I wish you were threatened by some terrible danger so I could risk everything, body and soul, for your sake.

NORA [tears herself free and says firmly and decisively]. Now you must read your letters, Torvald.

HELMER. No, no, not tonight. I want to be with you, my darling wife.

NORA. Knowing all the time your friend is dying . . . ?

HELMER. You are right. It's been a shock to both of us. This ugly thing has come between us . . . thoughts of death and decay. We must try to free ourselves from it. Until then . . . we shall go our separate ways.

NORA [her arms round his neck]. Torvald . . . good night! Good night!

HELMER [kisses her forehead]. Goodnight, my little singing bird. Sleep well, Nora, I'll just read through my letters.

[He takes the letters into his room and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [gropes around her, wild-eyed, seizes HELMER'S cloak, wraps it round herself, and whispers quickly, hoarsely, spasmodically]. Never see him again. Never, never, never. [Throws her shawl over her head.] And never see the children again either. Never, never. Oh, that black icy water. Oh, that bottomless . . . ! If only it were all over! He's got it now. Now he's reading it. Oh no, no! Not yet! Torvald, goodbye . . . and my children. . . .

[She rushes out in the direction of the hall; at the same moment HELMER flings open his door and stands there with an open letter in his hand.]

HELMER. Nora!

NORA [shrieks]. Ah!

HELMER. What is this? Do you know what is in this letter?

NORA. Yes, I know. Let me go! Let me out!

HELMER [holds her back]. Where are you going?

NORA [trying to tear herself free]. You mustn't try to save me, Torvald!

HELMER [reels back]. True! Is it true what he writes? How dreadful! No, no, it can't possibly be true.

NORA. It is true. I loved you more than anything else in the world.

HELMER. Don't come to me with a lot of paltry excuses!

NORA [taking a step towards him]. Torvald . . . !

HELMER. Miserable woman . . . what is this you have done?

NORA. Let me go. I won't have you taking the blame for me. You mustn't take it on yourself.

HELMER. Stop play-acting! [Locks the front door.] You are staying here to give an account of yourself. Do you understand what you have done? Answer me! Do you understand?

NORA [looking fixedly at him, her face hardening]. Yes, now I'm really beginning to understand.

HELMER [walking up and down]. Oh, what a terrible awakening this is. All these eight years . . . this woman who was my pride and joy . . . a hypocrite, a liar, worse than that, a criminal! Oh, how utterly squalid it all is! Ugh! Ugh! [NORA remains silent and looks fixedly at him.] I should have realized something like this would happen. I should have seen it coming. All your father's irresponsible ways. . . . Quiet! All your father's irresponsible ways are coming out in you. No religion, no morals, no sense of duty. . . . Oh, this is my punishment for turning a blind eye to him. It was for your sake I did it, and this is what I get for it.

NORA. Yes, this.

HELMER. Now you have ruined my entire happiness, jeopardized my whole future. It's terrible to think of. Here I am, at the mercy of a thoroughly unscrupulous person; he can do whatever he likes with me, demand anything he wants, order me about just as he chooses . . . and I daren't even whimper. I'm done for, a miserable failure, and it's all the fault of a feather-brained woman!

NORA. When I've left this world behind, you will be free.

HELMER. Oh, stop pretending! Your father was just the same, always ready with fine phrases. What good would it do me if you left this world behind, as you put it? Not the slightest bit of good. He can still let it all come out, if he likes; and if he does, people might even suspect me of being an accomplice in these criminal acts of yours. They might even think I was the one behind it all, that it was I who pushed you into it! And it's you I have to thank for this . . . and when I've taken such good care of you, all our married life. Now do you understand what you have done to me?

NORA [coldly and calmly]. Yes.

HELMER. I just can't understand it, it's so incredible. But we must see about putting things right. Take that shawl off. Take it off, I tell you! I must see if I can't find some way or other of appeasing him. The thing must be hushed up at all costs. And as far as you and I are concerned, things must appear to go on exactly as before. But only in the eyes of the world, of course. In other words you'll go on living here; that's understood. But you will not be allowed to bring up the children, I can't trust you with them. . . . Oh, that I should have to say this to the woman I loved so dearly, the woman I still. . . . Well, that must be all over and done with. From now on, there can be no question of happiness. All we can do is save the bits and pieces from the wreck, preserve appearances. . . . [The front door-bell rings. HELMER gives a start.] What's that? So late? How terrible, supposing. . . . If he should . . . ? Hide, Nora! Say you are not well.

*[*NORA stands motionless. HELMER walks across and opens the door into the hall.]

MAID [half dressed, in the hall]. It's a note for Mrs. Helmer.

HELMER. Give it to me. [He snatches the note and shuts the door.] Yes, it's from him. You can't have it. I want to read it myself.

NORA. You read it then.

HELMER [by the lamp]. I hardly dare. Perhaps this is the end, for both of us. Well, I must know. [He opens the note hurriedly, reads a few lines, looks at another enclosed sheet, and gives a cry of joy.] Nora! [NORA looks at him inquiringly.] Nora! I must read it again. Yes, yes, it's true! I am saved! Nora, I am saved!

NORA. And me?

HELMER. You too, of course, we are both saved, you as well as me. Look, he's sent your IOU back. He sends his regrets and apologies for what he has done. . . . His luck has changed. . . . Oh, what does it matter what he says. We are saved, Nora! Nobody can do anything to you now. Oh, Nora, Nora . . . but let's get rid of this disgusting thing first. Let me see. . . . [He glances at the IOU.] No, I don't want to see it. I don't want it to be anything but a dream. [He tears up the IOU and both letters, throws all the pieces into the stove and watches them burn.] Well, that's the end of that. He said in his note you'd known since Christmas Eve. . . . You must have had three terrible days of it, Nora.

NORA. These three days haven't been easy.

HELMER. The agonies you must have gone through! When the only way out seemed to be. . . . No, let's forget the whole ghastly thing. We can rejoice and say: It's all over! It's all over! Listen to me, Nora! You don't seem to understand: it's all over! Why this grim look on your face? Oh, poor little Nora, of course I understand. You can't bring yourself to believe I've forgiven you. But I have, Nora, I swear it. I forgive you everything. I know you did what you did because you loved me.

NORA. That's true.

HELMER. You loved me as a wife should love her husband. It was simply that you didn't have the experience to judge what was the best way of going about things. But do you think I love you any the less for that; just because you don't know how to act on your own responsibility? No, no, you just lean on me, I shall give you all the advice and guidance you need. I wouldn't be a proper man if I didn't find a woman doubly attractive for being so obviously helpless. You mustn't dwell on the harsh things I said in that first moment of horror, when I thought everything was going to come crashing down about my ears. I have forgiven you, Nora, I swear it! I have forgiven you!

NORA. Thank you for your forgiveness.

[She goes out through the door, right.]

HELMER. No, don't go! [He looks through the doorway.] What are you doing in the spare room?

NORA. Taking off this fancy dress.

HELMER [standing at the open door]. Yes, do. You try and get some rest, and set your mind at peace again, my frightened little songbird. Have a good long sleep; you know you are safe and sound under my wing. [Walks up and down near the door.] What a nice, cozy little home we have here, Nora! Here you can find refuge. Here I shall hold you like a hunted dove I have rescued unscathed from the cruel talons of the hawk, and calm your poor beating heart. And that will come, gradually, Nora, believe me. Tomorrow you'll see everything quite differently. Soon everything will be just as it was before. You won't need me to keep on telling you I've forgiven you; you'll feel convinced of it in your own heart. You don't really imagine me ever thinking of turning you out, or even of reproaching you? Oh, a real man isn't made that way, you know, Nora. For a man, there's something indescribably moving and very satisfying in knowing that he has forgiven his wife—forgiven her, completely and genuinely, from the depths of his heart. It's as though it made her his property in a double sense: he has, as it were, given her a new life, and she becomes in a way both his wife and at the same time his child. That is how you will seem to me after today, helpless, perplexed little thing that you are. Don't you worry your pretty little head about anything, Nora. Just you be frank with me, and I'll take all the decisions for you. . . . What's this? Not in bed? You've changed your things?

NORA [in her everyday dress]. Yes, Torvald, I've changed.

HELMER. What for? It's late.

NORA. I shan't sleep tonight.

HELMER. But my dear Nora. . . .

NORA [looks at her watch]. It's not so terribly late. Sit down, Torvald. We two have a lot to talk about.

[She sits down at one side of the table.]

HELMER. Nora, what is all this? Why so grim?

NORA. Sit down. It'll take some time. I have a lot to say to you.

HELMER [sits down at the table opposite her]. You frighten me, Nora. I don't understand you.

NORA. Exactly. You don't understand me. And I have never understood you, either—until tonight. No, don't interrupt. I just want you to listen to what I have to say. We are going to have things out, Torvald.

HELMER. What do you mean?

NORA. Isn't there anything that strikes you about the way we two are sitting here?

HELMER. What's that?

NORA. We have now been married eight years. Hasn't it struck you this is the first time you and I, man and wife, have had a serious talk together?

HELMER. Depends what you mean by "serious."

NORA. Eight whole years—no, more, ever since we first knew each other—and never have we exchanged one serious word about serious things.

HELMER. What did you want me to do? Get you involved in worries that you couldn't possibly help me to bear?

NORA. I'm not talking about worries. I say we've never once sat down together and seriously tried to get to the bottom of anything.

HELMER. But, my dear Nora, would that have been a thing for you?

NORA. That's just it. You have never understood me . . . I've been greatly wronged, Torvald. First by my father, and then by you.

HELMER. What! Us two! The two people who loved you more than anybody?

NORA [shakes her head]. You two never loved me. You only thought how nice it was to be in love with me.

HELMER. But, Nora, what's this you are saying?

NORA. It's right, you know, Torvald. At home, Daddy used to tell me what he thought, then I thought the same. And if I thought differently, I kept quiet about it, because he wouldn't have liked it. He used to call me his baby doll, and he played with me as I used to play with my dolls. Then I came to live in your house. . . .

HELMER. What way is that to talk about our marriage?

NORA [imperturbably]. What I mean is: I passed out of Daddy's hands into yours. You arranged everything to your tastes, and I acquired the same tastes. Or I pretended to . . . I don't really know . . . I think it was a bit of both, sometimes one thing and sometimes the other. When I look back, it seems to me I have been living here like a beggar, from hand to mouth. I lived by doing tricks for you, Torvald. But that's the way you wanted it. You and Daddy did me a great wrong. It's your fault that I've never made anything of my life.

HELMER. Nora, how unreasonable . . . how ungrateful you are! Haven't you been happy here?

NORA. No, never. I thought I was, but I wasn't really.

HELMER. Not . . . not happy!

NORA. No, just gay. And you've always been so kind to me. But our house has never been anything but a playroom. I have been your doll wife, just as at home I was Daddy's doll child. And the children in turn have been my dolls. I thought it was fun when you came and played with me, just as they thought it was fun when I went and played with them. That's been our marriage, Torvald.

HELMER. There is some truth in what you say, exaggerated and hysterical though it is. But from now on it will be different. Playtime is over; now comes the time for lessons.

NORA. Whose lessons? Mine or the children's?

HELMER. Both yours and the children's, my dear Nora.

NORA. Ah, Torvald, you are not the man to teach me to be a good wife for you.

HELMER. How can you say that?

NORA. And what sort of qualifications have I to teach the children?

HELMER. Nora!

NORA. Didn't you say yourself, a minute or two ago, that you couldn't trust me with that job?

HELMER. In the heat of the moment! You shouldn't pay any attention to that.

NORA. On the contrary, you were quite right. I'm not up to it. There's another problem needs solving first. I must take steps to educate myself. You are not the man to help me there. That's something I must do on my own. That's why I'm leaving you.

HELMER [jumps up]. What did you say?

NORA. If I'm ever to reach any understanding of myself and the things around me, I must learn to stand alone. That's why I can't stay here with you any longer.

HELMER. Nora! Nora!

NORA. I'm leaving here at once. I dare say Kristine will put me up for tonight. . . .

HELMER. You are out of your mind! I won't let you! I forbid you!

NORA. It's no use forbidding me anything now. I'm taking with me my own personal belongings. I don't want anything of yours, either now or later.

HELMER. This is madness!

NORA. Tomorrow I'm going home—to what used to be my home, I mean. It will be easier for me to find something to do there.

HELMER. Oh, you blind, inexperienced . . .

NORA. I must set about getting experience, Torvald.

HELMER. And leave your home, your husband and your children? Don't you care what people will say?

NORA. That's no concern of mine. All I know is that this is necessary for me.

HELMER. This is outrageous! You are betraying your most sacred duty.

NORA. And what do you consider to be my most sacred duty?

HELMER. Does it take me to tell you that? Isn't it your duty to your husband and your children?

NORA. I have another duty equally sacred.

HELMER. You have not. What duty might that be?

NORA. My duty to myself.

HELMER. First and foremost, you are a wife and mother.

NORA. That I don't believe any more. I believe that first and foremost I am an individual, just as much as you are—or at least I'm going to try to be. I know most people agree with you, Torvald, and that's also what it says in books. But I'm not content any more with what most people say, or with what it says in books. I have to think things out for myself, and get things clear.

HELMER. Surely you are clear about your position in your own home? Haven't you an infallible guide in questions like these? Haven't you your religion?

NORA. Oh, Torvald, I don't really know what religion is.

HELMER. What do you say!

NORA. All I know is what Pastor Hansen said when I was confirmed. He said religion was this, that and the other. When I'm away from all this and on my own, I'll go into that, too. I want to find out whether what Pastor Hansen told me was right—or at least whether it's right for me.

HELMER. This is incredible talk from a young woman! But if religion cannot keep you on the right path, let me at least stir your conscience. I suppose you do have some moral sense? Or tell me—perhaps you don't?

NORA. Well, Torvald, that's not easy to say. I simply don't know. I'm really very confused about such things. All I know is my ideas about such things are very different from yours. I've also learnt that the law is different from what I thought; but I simply can't get it into my head that that particular law is right. Apparently a woman has no right to spare her old father on his deathbed, or to save her husband's life, even. I just don't believe it.

HELMER. You are talking like a child. You understand nothing about the society you live in.

NORA. No, I don't. But I shall go into that too. I must try to discover who is right, society or me.

HELMER. You are ill, Nora. You are delirious. I'm half inclined to think you are out of your mind.

NORA. Never have I felt so calm and collected as I do tonight.

HELMER. Calm and collected enough to leave your husband and children?

NORA. Yes.

HELMER. Then only one explanation is possible.

NORA. And that is?

HELMER. You don't love me any more.

NORA. Exactly.

HELMER. Nora! Can you say that!

NORA. I'm desperately sorry, Torvald. Because you have always been so kind to me. But I can't help it. I don't love you any more.

HELMER [struggling to keep his composure]. Is that also a "calm and collected" decision you've made?

NORA. Yes, absolutely calm and collected. That's why I don't want to stay here.

HELMER. And can you also account for how I forfeited your love?

NORA. Yes, very easily. It was tonight, when the miracle didn't happen. It was then I realized you weren't the man I thought you were.

HELMER. Explain yourself more clearly. I don't understand.

NORA. For eight years I have been patiently waiting. Because, heavens, I knew miracles didn't happen every day. Then this devastating business started, and I became absolutely convinced the miracle would happen. All the time Krogstad's letter lay there, it never so much as crossed my mind that you would ever submit to that man's conditions. I was absolutely convinced you would say to him: Tell the whole wide world if you like. And when that was done . . .

HELMER. Yes, then what? After I had exposed my own wife to dishonor and shame . . . !

NORA. When that was done, I was absolutely convinced you would come forward and take everything on yourself, and say: I am the guilty one.

HELMER. Nora!

NORA. You mean I'd never let you make such a sacrifice for my sake? Of course not. But what would my story have counted for against yours?—That was the miracle I went in hope and dread of. It was to prevent it that I was ready to end my life.

HELMER. I would gladly toil day and night for you, Nora, enduring all manner of sorrow and distress.

But nobody sacrifices his honor for the one he loves.

NORA. Hundreds and thousands of women have.

HELMER. Oh, you think and talk like a stupid child.

NORA. All right. But you neither think nor talk like the man I would want to share my life with. When you had got over your fright—and you weren't concerned about me but only about what might happen to you—and when all danger was past, you acted as though nothing had happened. I was your little skylark again, your little doll, exactly as before; except you would have to protect it twice as carefully as before, now that it had shown itself to be so weak and fragile. [Rises.] Torvald, that was the moment I realized that for eight years I'd been living with a stranger, and had borne him three children. . . . Oh, I can't bear to think about it! I could tear myself to shreds.

HELMER [sadly]. I see. I see. There is a tremendous gulf dividing us. But, Nora, is there no way we might bridge it?

NORA. As I am now, I am no wife for you.

HELMER. I still have it in me to change.

NORA. Perhaps . . . if you have your doll taken away.

HELMER. And be separated from you! No, no, Nora, the very thought of it is inconceivable.

NORA [goes into the room, right]. All the more reason why it must be done.

[She comes back with her outdoor things and a small traveling bag, which she puts on the chair beside the table.]

HELMER. Nora, Nora, not now! Wait till the morning.

NORA [putting on her coat]. I can't spend the night in a strange man's room.

HELMER. Couldn't we go on living here like brother and sister . . . ?

NORA [tying on her hat]. You know very well that wouldn't last. [She draws the shawl round her.] Goodbye, Torvald. I don't want to see the children. I know they are in better hands than mine. As I am now, I can never be anything to them.

HELMER. But some day, Nora, some day . . . ?

NORA. How should I know? I've no idea what I might turn out to be.

HELMER. But you are my wife, whatever you are.

NORA. Listen, Torvald, from what I've heard, when a wife leaves her husband's house as I am doing now, he is absolved by law of all responsibility for her. I can at any rate free you from all responsibility. You must not feel in any way bound, any more than I shall. There must be full freedom on both sides. Look, here's your ring back. Give me mine.

HELMER. That too?

NORA. That too.

HELMER. There it is.

NORA. Well, that's the end of that. I'll put the keys down here. The maids know where everything is in the house—better than I do, in fact. Kristine will come in the morning after I've left to pack up the few things I brought with me from home. I want them sent on.

HELMER. The end! Nora, will you never think of me?

NORA. I dare say I'll often think about you and the children and this house.

HELMER. May I write to you, Nora?

NORA. No, never. I won't let you.

HELMER. But surely I can send you . . .

NORA. Nothing, nothing.

HELMER. Can't I help you if ever you need it?

NORA. I said no. I don't accept things from strangers.

HELMER. Nora, can I never be anything more to you than a stranger?

NORA [takes her bag]. Ah, Torvald, only by a miracle of miracles . . .

HELMER. Name it, this miracle of miracles!

NORA. Both you and I would have to change to the point where. . . . Oh, Torvald, I don't believe in miracles any more.

HELMER. But I will believe. Name it! Change to the point where . . . ?

NORA. Where we could make a real marriage of our lives together. Goodbye!

[She goes out through the hall door.]

HELMER [sinks down on a chair near the door, and covers his face with his hands]. Nora! Nora! [He rises and looks round.] Empty! She's gone! [With sudden hope.] The miracle of miracles . . . ?

[The heavy sound of a door being slammed is heard from below.]

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Near the beginning of the play, how does Mrs. Linde's presence help to define Nora's character? How does Nora's response to Krogstad's entrance tell us something about Nora?

2. -What does Dr. Rank contribute to the play? If he were eliminated, what would be lost?

3. -In view of the fact that the last act several times seems to be moving toward a "happy ending" (e.g., Krogstad promises to recall his letter), what is wrong with the alternate ending (see page 1530) that Ibsen reluctantly provided for a German production?

4. -Can it be argued that although at the end Nora goes out to achieve self-realization, her abandonment of her children—especially to Torvald's loathsome conventional morality—is a crime? (By the way, exactly why does Nora leave the children? She seems to imply, in some passages, that because she forged a signature she is unfit to bring them up. But do you agree with her?)

5. -Michael Meyer, in his splendid biography Henrik Ibsen, says that the play is not so much about women's rights as about "the need of every individual to find out the kind of person he or she really is, and to strive to become that person." What evidence can you offer to support or refute this interpretation?

6. -In The Quintessence of Ibsenism Bernard Shaw says that Ibsen, reacting against a common theatrical preference for strange situations, "saw that . . . the more familiar the situation, the more interesting the play. Shakespear[e] had put ourselves on the stage but not our situations. Our uncles seldom murder our fathers and . . . marry our mothers. . . . Ibsen . . . gives us not only ourselves, but ourselves in our own situations. The things that happen to his stage figures are things that happen to us. One consequence is that his plays are much more important to us than Shakespear[e]'s. Another is that they are capable both of hurting us cruelly and of filling us with excited hopes of escape from idealistic tyrannies, and with visions of intenser life in the future." How much of this do you believe? Focus on details in the play to explain your response.

CONTEXTS FOR A DOLL'S HOUSE

HENRIK IBSEN

Notes for the Tragedy of Modern Times

The University Library, Oslo, has the following preliminary notes for A Doll's House.

Rome 19.10.78

There are two kinds of moral law, two kinds of conscience, one in man and a completely different one in woman. They do not understand each other; but in matters of practical living the woman is judged by man's law, as if she were not a woman but a man.

The wife in the play ends up quite bewildered and not knowing right from wrong; her natural instincts on the one side and her faith in authority on the other leave her completely confused.

A woman cannot be herself in contemporary society, it is an exclusively male society with laws drafted by men, and with counsel and judges who judge feminine conduct from the male point of view.

She has committed a crime, and she is proud of it; because she did it for love of her husband and to save his life. But the husband, with his conventional views of honour, stands on the side of the law and looks at the affair with male eyes.

Mental conflict. Depressed and confused by her faith in authority, she loses faith in her moral right and ability to bring up her children. Bitterness. A mother in contemporary society, just as certain insects go away and die when she has done her duty in the propagation of the race. Love of life, of home and husband and children and family. Now and then, woman-like, she shrugs off her thoughts. Sudden return of dread and terror. Everything must be borne alone. The catastrophe approaches, ineluctably, inevitably. Despair, resistance, defeat.

[The following note was later added in the margin:]

Krogstad has done some dishonest business, and thus made a bit of money; but his prosperity does not help him, he cannot recover his honour.

Adaptation of A Doll's House for a German Production

Because Norwegian works were not copyrighted in Germany, German theaters could stage and freely adapt Ibsen's works without his consent. When he heard that a German director was going to change the ending to a happy one, Ibsen decided that he had better do the adaptation himself, though he characterized it as "a barbaric outrage" against the play.

NORA. . . .Where we could make a real marriage out of our lives together. Goodbye. (Begins to go.)

HELMER. Go then! (Seizes her arm.) But first you shall see your children for the last time!

NORA. Let me go! I will not see them! I cannot!

HELMER (draws her over to the door, left). You shall see them. (Opens the door and says softly.) Look, there they are asleep, peaceful and carefree. Tomorrow, when they wake up and call for their mother, they will be—motherless.

NORA (trembling). Motherless . . . !

HELMER. As you once were.

NORA. Motherless! (Struggles with herself, lets her traveling-bag fall, and says.) Oh, this is a sin against myself, but I cannot leave them. (Half sinks down by the door.)

HELMER (joyfully, but softly). Nora!

THE CURTAIN FALLS.

Speech at the Banquet of the Norwegian League for Women's Rights

A month after the official birthday celebrations were over, Ibsen and his wife were invited to a banquet in his honor given by the leading Norwegian feminist society.

Christiania, May 26, 1898

I am not a member of the Women's Rights League. Whatever I have written has been without any conscious thought of making propaganda. I have been more the poet and less the social philosopher than people generally seem inclined to believe. I thank you for the toast, but must disclaim the honor of having consciously worked for the women's rights movement. I am not even quite clear as to just what this women's rights movement really is. To me it has seemed a problem of mankind in general. And if you read my books carefully you will understand this. True enough, it is desirable to solve the woman problem, along with all the others; but that has not been the whole purpose. My task has been the description of humanity. To be sure, whenever such a description is felt to be reasonably true, the reader will read his own feelings and sentiments into the work of the poet. These are then attributed to the poet; but incorrectly so. Every reader remolds the work beautifully and neatly, each according to his own personality. Not only those who write but also those who read are poets. They are collaborators. They are often more poetical than the poet himself.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

Clare Boothe Luce (1903–1987) gained distinction in two fields, playwrighting and politics. After working on two magazines, Vogue and Vanity Fair (shewas managing editor of Vanity Fair from 1933 to 1934), she married HenryLuce, the founder of Fortune, Time, Life, and Sports Illustrated, and began a career as a playwright. Her first play, Abide with Me (1935), was unsuccessful, but she soon achieved critical acclaim and financial success with The Women (1936) and Kiss the Boys Good-bye (1938), both of which are social satires, and a comedy-mystery, Margin for Error (1939). She then embarked on a second career, serving two terms in Congress as a representative from Connecticut (1943–1947) and later serving as ambassador to Italy (1953–1956). Ill health compelled her to resign the ambassadorship, but in 1959 she was wellenough to be appointed ambassador to Brazil—although because of a controversy she resigned the post in the same year, without having served.

Slam the Door Softly—the title evokes what is probably the most famous stage direction in drama, "The street door is slammed shut downstairs," in Ibsen's A Doll's House—was first published in Life magazine, in 1970, where it was titled A Doll's House (with Apologies to Henrik Ibsen), but the author later retitled it, calling it Slam the Door Softly. The play, set in the year it was published, was preceded by a note that said:

> Most of Clare Boothe Luce's life has been that of a woman doing a man's job. But even before she became a successful magazine editor, a successful playwright, war correspondent, congresswoman and ambassador, she was an active crusader for the feminist cause. In 1923, at the age of 20, she worked as a secretary at the Washington headquarters of the National Women's party and toured the country on behalf of an equal rights for women campaign. . . . In the following play she brings up to date Henrik Ibsen's famous 1879 drama about a woman who rebelled against her role as a subservient wife.

Slam the Door Softly [1970]

The scene is the Thaw Walds' cheerfully furnished middle-class living room in New York's suburbia. There are a front door and hall, a door to the kitchen area, and a staircase to the bedroom floor. Two easy chairs and two low hassocks with toys on them, grouped around a television, indicate a family of four. Drinks are on a bar cart at one end of a comfortable sofa, and an end table at the other. There are slightly more than the average number of bookshelves. The lamps are on, but as we don't hear the children, we know it is the Parents' Hour.

As the curtain rises, THAW WALD, a good-looking fellow, about 35, is sitting in one of the easy chairs, smoking and watching TV. His back is to the sofa and staircase, so he does not see his wife coming down the stairs. NORA WALD is a rather pretty woman of about 32. She is carrying a suitcase, handbag, and an armful of books.

THAW switches channels, and lands in the middle of a panel show. During the TV dialogue that follows NORA somewhat furtively deposits her suitcase in the hall, takes her coat out of the hall closet, and comes back to the sofa carrying coat, purse, and books. She lays her coat on the sofa, and the books on the end table. The books are full of little paper slips—bookmarkers. All of the above actions are unobserved by THAW. We cannot see the TV screen, but we hear the voices of four women, all talking excitedly at once.

THAW (to the screen and the world in general). God, these Liberation gals! Still at it.

MALE MODERATOR'S VOICE (full of paternal patience wearing a bit thin). Ladies! Lay-deez! Can't we switch now from the question of the sex-typing of jobs to what the Women's Liberation Movement thinks about—

OLDER WOMAN'S VOICE. May I finish! In the Soviet Union 83% of the dentists, 75% of the doctors and 37% of the lawyers are women. In Poland and Denmark—

MODERATOR. I think you have already amply made your point, Mrs. Epstein—anything men can do, women can do better!

YOUNG WOMAN'S VOICE (angrily). That was not her point—and you know it! What she said was, there are very few professional jobs men are doing that women couldn't do, if only—

THAW. Well, for God's sake then, shaddup, and go do 'em—

BLACK WOMAN'S VOICE. What she's been saying, what we've all been saying, and you men just don't want to hear us, is—things are the same for women as they are for us black people. We try to get up, you just sit down on us, like a big elephant sits down on a bunch of poor little mice.

MODERATOR. Well, sometimes moderators have to play the elephant, and sit down on one subject in order to develop another. As I was about to say, ladies, there is one thing a woman can do, no man can do—(in his best holy-night-all-is-bright voice) give birth to a child.

YOUNG WOMAN'S VOICE. So what else is new?

THAW. One gets you ten, she's a Lesbo—

MODERATOR (forcefully). And that brings us to marriage! Now, if I may be permitted to get in just one statistic, edgewise: two-thirds of all adult American females are married women. And now! (At last he's got them where he wants them.) What is the Women's Lib view of Woman's No.1 job—Occupation Housewife?

THAW. Ha! That's the one none of 'em can handle—

YOUNG WOMAN'S VOICE (loud and clear). Marriage, as an institution, is as thoroughly corrupt as prostitution. It is, in fact, legalized and romanticized prostitution. A woman who marries is selling her sexual services and domestic services for permanent bed and board—

BLACK WOMAN'S VOICE. There's no human being a man can buy anymore—except a woman—

THAW (snapping off the TV). Crr-ap! Boy, what a bunch of battle-axes! (He goes back to studying his TV listings.)

NORA (raising her voice). Thaw! I'd like to say something about what they just said about marriage—

THAW (in a warning voice). Uh-uh, Nora! We both agreed months ago, you'd lay off the feminist bit, if I'd lay off watching Saturday football—

NORA. And do something with the children . . . But Thaw, there's something maybe, I ought to try to tell you myself—

(THAW is not listening. NORA makes a "what's the use" gesture, then opens her purse, takes out three envelopes, carefully inserts two of them under the covers of the top two books.)

THAW. Like to hear Senators Smithers, Smethers and Smothers on "How Fast Can We Get Out of Vietnam?"

NORA (cool mockery). That bunch of pot-bellied, bald-headed old goats! Not one of them could get a woman—well, yes, maybe for two dollars.

THAW. You don't look at Senators, Nora. You listen to them.

NORA (nodding). Women are only to look at. Men are to listen to. Got it.

(THAW snaps off the TV. He is now neither looking at her nor listening toher, as he methodically turns pages of the magazine he has picked up.)

THAW. Finished reading to the kids?

NORA. I haven't been reading to the children. I've been reading to myself—and talking to myself—for a long time now.

THAW. That's good. (She passes him, carrying the third envelope, and goes into kitchen.)

THAW (unenthusiastically). Want some help with the dishes?

NORA'S VOICE. I'm not doing the dishes.

THAW (enthusiastically). Say, Nora, this is quite an ad we've got in Life for Stove Mountain Life Insurance.

NORA'S VOICE. Yes, I saw it. Great. (She comes back and goes to sofa.)

THAW. It's the kind of ad that grabs you. This sad-faced, nice-looking woman of 50, sitting on a bench with a lot of discouraged old biddies, in an employment agency. Great caption—(reading)

NORA and THAW (together). "Could this happen to your wife?"

NORA. I'll let you know the answer very shortly. (A pause.) You really don't hear me anymore, do you? (He really doesn't. She buttons herself into her coat, pulls on her gloves.) Well, there are enough groceries for a week. All the telephone numbers you'll need and menus for the children are in the envelope on the spindle. A girl will come in to take care of them after school—until your mother gets here.

THAW. Uh-huh . . .

NORA (looks around sadly). Well, good-bye dear little doll house. Good-bye dear husband. You've had the best ten years of my life.

(She goes to the staircase, blows two deep kisses upstairs, just as THAW glances up briefly at her, but returns automatically to his magazine. NORA picks up suitcase, opens the door, goes out, closing it quietly.)

THAW (like a man suddenly snapping out of a hypnotic trance). Nora? Nora? NOR-RA! (He is out of the door in two seconds.)

THAW'S and NORA'S VOICES. Nora, where're you going?—I'll miss my train—I don't understand—it's all in my letter—let me go!—You come back—

(They return. He is pulling her by the arm. He yanks the suitcase away from her, drops it in the hall.)

NORA. Ouch! You're hurting me!

THAW. Now what is this all about? (He shoves her into the room, then stands between her and door.) Why the hell . . . What're you sneaking out of the house . . . What's that suitcase for?

NORA. I wasn't sneaking. I told you. But you weren't listening.

THAW. I was listening . . . it just didn't register. You said you were reading to yourself. Then you started yakking about the kids and the groceries and the doll house mother sent . . . (flabbergasted.) Good-bye?! What the hell do you mean, good-bye?!

NORA. Just that. I'm leaving you. (Pointing to books.) My letter will explain everything—

THAW. Have you blown your mind?

NORA. Thaw, I've got to scoot, or I'll miss the eight-o-nine.

THAW. You'll miss it. (He backs her to the sofa, pushes her onto it, goes and slams the door and strides back.) Now, my girl, explain all this.

NORA. That's easy. Muscle. The heavier musculature of the male is a secondary sexual characteristic. Although that's not certain. It could be just the result of selective breeding. In primitive times, of course, the heavier musculature of the male was necessary to protect the pregnant female and the immobile young—

THAW (his anger evaporates). Nora, are you sick?

NORA. But what's just happened now shows that nothing has changed—I mean, fundamentally changed—in centuries, in the relations between the sexes. You still Tarzan, me still Jane.

THAW (sits on sofa beside her, feels her head). I've noticed you've been . . . well . . . acting funny lately . . .

NORA. Funny?

THAW. Like there was something on your mind. . . . Tell me, what's wrong, sweetheart? Where does it hurt?

NORA. It hurts (taps head) here. Isn't that where thinking hurts you? No. You're used to it. I was, too, when I was at Wellesley. But I sort of stopped when I left. It's really hard to think of anything else when you're having babies.

THAW. Nora, isn't it about time for your period?

NORA. But if God had wanted us to think just with our wombs, why did He give us a brain? No matter what men say, Thaw, the female brain is not a vestigial organ, like a vermiform appendix.

THAW. Nora . . .

NORA. Thaw, I can just about make my train. I'll leave the car and keys in the usual place at the station. Now, I have a very important appointment in the morning. (She starts to rise.)

THAW. Appointment? (Grabs her shoulders.) Nora, look at me! You weren't sneaking out of the house to . . . get an abortion?

NORA. When a man can't explain a woman's actions, the first thing he thinks about is the condition of her uterus. Thaw, if you were leaving me and I didn't know why, would I ask, first thing, if you were having prostate trouble?

THAW. Don't try to throw me off the track, sweetie! Now, if you want another baby . . .

NORA. Thaw, don't you remember, we both agreed about the overpopulation problem—

THAW. To hell with the overpopulation problem. Let Nixon solve that. Nora, I can swing another baby—

NORA. Maybe you can. I can't. For me there are no more splendid, new truths to be learned from scanning the contents of babies' diapers. Thaw, I am pregnant. But not in a feminine way. In the way only men are supposed to get pregnant.

THAW. Men, pregnant?

NORA (nodding). With ideas. Pregnancies there (taps his head) are masculine. And a very superior form of labor. Pregnancies here (taps her tummy) are feminine—a very inferior form of labor. That's an example of male linguistic chauvinism. Mary Ellmann is great on that. You'll enjoy her Thinking about Women . . .

THAW (going to telephone near bookshelf). I'm getting the doctor. (NORA makes a dash for the door, he drops the phone.) Oh, no you don't!

(He reaches for her as she passes, misses. Grabs her ponytail and hauls her back by it, and shoves her into the easy chair.)

NORA. Brother, Millett sure had you typed.

THAW. Milly who? (A new thought comes to him.) Has one of your goddam-gossipy female friends been trying to break up our marriage? (He suddenly checks his conscience. It is not altogether pure.) What did she tell you? That she saw me having lunch, uh, dinner, with some girl?

NORA (nodding to herself). Right on the button!

THAW. Now, Nora, I can explain about that girl—

NORA. You don't have to. Let's face it. Monogamy is not natural to the male—

THAW. You know I'm not in love with anybody but you—

NORA. It's not natural to the female, either. Making women think it is is man's most successful form of brainwashing—

THAW. Nora, I swear, that girl means nothing to me—

NORA. And you probably mean nothing to her. So whose skin is off whose nose?

THAW (relieved, but puzzled). Well, uh, I'm glad you feel that way about—uh—things.

NORA. Oh, it's not the way I feel. It's the way things really are. What with the general collapse of the mores, and now the Pill, women are becoming as promiscuous as men. It figures. We're educated from birth to think of ourselves just as man-traps. Of course, in my mother's day, good women thought of themselves as private man-traps. Only bad women were public man-traps. Now we've all gone public. (Looks at watch.) I'll have to take the eight-forty.

THAW (a gathering suspicion). Nora, are you trying to tell me . . . that you—

NORA. Of course, a lot of it, today, is the fault of the advertising industry. Making women think they're failures in life if they don't make like sex-pots around the clock. We're even supposed to wear false eyelashes when we're vacuuming. Betty Friedan's great on that. She says many lonely suburban housewives, unable to identify their real problem, think more sex is the answer. So they sleep with the milkman, or the delivery boy. If I felt like sleeping with anybody like that, I'd pick the plumber. When you need him, boy you need him!

THAW (the unpleasant thought he has been wrestling with has now jelled). Nora . . . are you . . . trying to tell me you are leaving me—for someone else?

NORA. Why, Thaw Wald! How could you even think such a thing? (To herself.) Now, how naïve can I be? What else do men think about, in connection with women, but sex? He is saying to himself, she's not having her period, she's not pregnant, she's not jealous; it's got to be another man.

THAW. Stop muttering to yourself, and answer my question.

NORA. I forgot what it was. Oh, yes. No.

THAW. No what?

NORA. No, I'm not in love with anybody else. I was a virgin when I married you. And intacta. And that wasn't par for the course—even at Wellesley. And I've never slept with anybody else, partly because I never wanted to. And partly because, I suppose, of our family's Presbyterian hangup. So, now that all the vital statistics are out of the way, I'll just drive around until—

(Begins to slip her arms into coat. He grabs coat, throws it on easy chair.)

THAW. You're not leaving until you tell me why.

NORA. But it's all in my letter. (Points.) The fat one sticking out of Simone de Beauvoir's Second Sex—

THAW. If you have a bill of particulars against me, I want it—straight. From you.

NORA. Oh, darling, I have no bill of particulars. By all the standards of our present-day society, you are a very good husband. And, mark me, you'll be president of Stove Mountain Life Insurance Company before you're 50. The point is, what will I be when I'm 50—

THAW. You'll be my wife, if I have anything to say. Okay. So you're not leaving me because I'm a bad husband, or because my financial future is dim.

NORA. No. Oh, Thaw, you just wouldn't understand.

THAW (patiently). I might, if you would try, for just one minute, to talk logically—

NORA. Thaw, women aren't trained to talk logically. Men don't like women who talk logically. They find them unfeminine—aggressive—

THAW. Dammit, Nora, will you talk sense . . .

NORA. But Boy! does a man get sore when a woman won't talk logically when he wants her to, and (snaps fingers) like that! And that isn't illogical? What women men are! Now, if you will step aside—

THAW (grabbing her and shaking her). You're going to tell me why you're walking out on me, if I have to sock you!

NORA. Thaw, eyeball to eyeball, I am leaving you—and not for a man. For reasons of my own I just don't think you can understand. And if you mean to stop me, you'll have to beat me to a pulp. But I'm black and blue already.

THAW (seizes her tenderly in his arms, kisses her). Nora, sweetheart! You know I couldn't really hurt you. (Kisses, kisses.) Ba-aaby, what do you say we call it a night? (Scoops her up in his arms.) You can tell me all about it in bed . . .

NORA. The classical male one-two. Sock 'em and screw 'em.

THAW (dumping her on sofa). Well, it's been known to work on a lot of occasions. Something tells me this isn't one of them. (Pours a drink.)

NORA. I guess I need one, too. (He mixes them.) Thaw?

THAW. Yes.

NORA. I couldn't help being a little pleased when you made like a caveman. It shows you really do value my sexual services.

THAW. Jee-zus!

NORA. Well, it can't be my domestic services—you don't realize, yet, what they're worth. (Drinks.) Thaw, you do have a problem with me. But you can't solve it with force. And I do have a problem. But I can't solve it with sex.

THAW. Could you, would you, try to tell me what my-you-our problem is?

NORA. Friedan's Feminine Mystique is very good on The Problem. I've marked all the relevant passages. And I've personalized them in my letter—

(He goes to book. Yanks out letter, starts to tear it up. NORA groans. He changes his mind, and stuffs it in his pocket.)

THAW. Look, Nora, there's one thing I've always said about you. For a woman, you're pretty damn honest. Don't you think you owe it to me to level and give me a chance to defend myself?

NORA. The trouble is, you would have to listen to me. And that's hard for you. I understand why. Not listening to women is a habit that's been passed on from father to son for generations. You could almost say, tuning out on women is another secondary sexual male characteristic.

THAW. So our problem is that I don't listen?

NORA. Thaw, you always go on talking, no matter how hard I'm interrupting.

THAW. Okay. You have the floor.

NORA. Well, let's begin where this started tonight. When you oppressed me, and treated me as an inferior—

THAW. I oppressed . . . (Hesitates.) Lay on, MacDuff.

NORA. You honestly don't think that yanking me around by my hair and threatening to sock me are not the oppressive gestures of a superior male toward an inferior female?

THAW. For Chrissake, Nora, a man isn't going to let the woman he loves leave him, if he can stop her!

NORA. Exactly. Domination of the insubordinate female is an almost instinctive male reflex. In extremis, Thaw, it is rape. Now, would I like it if you should say you were going to leave me? No. But could I drag you back—

THAW. You'd just have to crook your little finger.

NORA. Flattery will get you nowhere this evening. So, where was I?

THAW. I am a born rapist.

NORA. Wasn't that what you had in mind when you tried to adjourn this to our bedroom? But that's just your primitive side. There's your civilized side, too. You are a patriarchal pater familias.

THAW. What am I now?

NORA. Thaw, you do realize we all live in a patriarchy, where men govern women by playing sexual politics?

THAW. Look, you're not still sore because I talked you into voting for Nixon? (She gives him a withering look.) Okay. So we all live in a patriarchy . . .

NORA. Our little family, the Walds, are just one nuclear patriarchal unit among the millions in our patriarchal male-dominated civilization, which is worldwide. It's all in that book—

THAW. Look Nora, I promise I'll read the damn book—but . . .

NORA. So who's interrupting? Well, Thaw, all history shows that the hand that cradles the rock has ruled the world, not the hand that rocks the cradle! Do you know what brutal things men have done to women? Bought and sold them like cattle. Bound their feet at birth to deform them—so they couldn't run away—like in China. Made widows throw themselves on the funeral pyres of their husbands, like in India. Cut off their clitorises, so they could be bred but not enjoy sex. Thaw, did you know that the clitoris is the only sexual organ, in either sex, solely designed by nature for sexual pleasure?

THAW. That fascinating fact, up to now, has escaped me.

NORA. Yes, it's a pity. Well . . . men who committed adultery were almost never punished. But women were always brutally punished. Why, in many countries unfaithful wives were stoned to death—

THAW. This is America, 1970, Nora. And here, when wives are unfaithful, husbands get stoned. (Drinks.) Mind if I do?

NORA. Be your guest. Oh, there's no doubt that relations between the sexes have been greatly ameliorated . . .

THAW. Now, about our relations, Nora. You're not holding it against me that men, the dirty bastards, have done a lot of foul things to women in the past?

NORA (indignant). What do you mean, in the past?

THAW (determined to be patient). Past, present, future—what has what other men have done to other women got to do with us?

NORA. Quite a lot. We are a male and a female—

THAW. That's the supposition I've always gone on. But Nora, we are a particular male and a particular female: Thaw Wald and his wife, Nora—

NORA. Yes. That's why it's so shattering when you find out you are such a typical husband and—

THAW (a new effort to take command). Nora, how many men do you know who are still in love with their wives after ten years?

NORA. Not many. And, Thaw, listen, maybe the reason is—

THAW. So you agree that's not typical? Okay. Now, do I ever grumble about paying the bills? So that's not typical. I liked my mother-in-law, even when she was alive. And God knows that's not typical. And don't I do every damn thing I can to keep my mother off your back? And that's not typical. I'm even thoughtful about the little things. You said so yourself, remember, when I bought you that black see-through nightgown for Mother's Day. That I went out and chose myself. And which you never wear.

NORA. I had to return it. It was too small. And do you know what the saleswoman said? She said, "Men who buy their wives things in this department are in love with them. But why do they all seem to think they are married to midgets?" That's it, Thaw, that's it! Men "think little"—like "thinking thin"—even about women they love. They don't think at all about women they don't love or want to sleep with. Now, I can't help it if you think of me as a midget. But don't you see, I've got to stop thinking of myself as one. Thaw, listen . . .

THAW. Why the devil should you think of yourself as a midget? I think you're a great woman. A real woman! Why, you're the dearest, sweetest, most understanding little wife—most of the time—a man ever had. And the most intelligent and wonderful little mother! Dammit, those kids are the smartest, best-behaved, most self-reliant little kids . . .

NORA. Oh, I've been pretty good at Occupation Housewife, if I do say so myself. But Thaw, listen. Can't you even imagine that there might be something more a woman needs and wants—

THAW. My God, Nora, what more can a woman want than a nice home, fine children and a husband who adores her?

NORA (discouraged). You sound like old Dr. Freud, in person.

THAW. I sound like Freud? I wish I were. Then I'd know why you're so uptight.

NORA. Oh, no you wouldn't. Know what Freud wrote in his diary, when he was 77? "What do women want? My God, what do they want?" Fifty years this giant brain spends analyzing women. And he still can't find out what they want. So this makes him the world's greatest expert on feminine psychology? (She starts to look at her watch.) To think I bought him, in college.

THAW. You've got plenty of time. You were saying about Freud—(He lights a cigarette, hands it to her, determined to stick with it to the end.)

NORA. History is full of ironies! Freud was the foremost exponent of the theory of the natural inferiority of women. You know, "Anatomy is destiny"?

THAW. I was in the School of Business, remember?

NORA. Well, old Freud died in 1939. He didn't live to see what happened when Hitler adopted his theory that "anatomy is destiny." Six million of his own people went to the gas chambers. One reason, Hitler said, that the Jews were naturally inferior was because they were effeminate people, with a slave mentality. He said they were full of those vices which men always identify with women—when they're feeling hostile: You know, sneakiness and deception, scheming and wheedling, whining and pushiness, oh, and materialism, sensuousness and sexuality. Thaw, what's your favorite feminine vice?

THAW. At this moment, feminine monologues.

NORA. I didn't think you'd have the nerve to say sneakiness. I saw you sneak a look at your watch, and egg me on to talk about Freud, hoping I'll miss my train. I won't.

THAW. So nothing I've said—what little I've had a chance to say . . . (she shakes her head)—you still intend to divorce me?

NORA. Oh, I never said I was divorcing you. I'm deserting you. So you can divorce me.

THAW. You do realize, Nora, that if a wife deserts her husband he doesn't have to pay her alimony?

NORA. I don't want alimony. But I do want severance pay. (Points to books.) There's my bill, rendered for ten years of domestic services—the thing sticking in Woman's Place, by Cynthia Fuchs Epstein. I figured it at thegoing agency rates for a full-time cook, cleaning woman, handy-man, laundress, seamstress, and part-time gardener and chauffeur, I've worked an average ten-hour day. So I've charged for overtime. Of course, you've paid my rent, taxes, clothing, medical expenses, and food. So I've deducted those. Even though as a housewife, I've had no fringe benefits. Just the same, the bill . . . well, I'm afraid you're going to be staggered. I was. It comes to over $53,000. I'd like to be paid in ten installments.

THAW (he is staggered). Mathematics isn't really your bag, Nora.

NORA. I did it on that little calculating machine you gave me at Christmas. If you think it's not really fair, I'll be glad to negotiate. And, please notice, I haven't charged anything for sleeping with you!

THAW. Wow! (He is really punch drunk.)

NORA. I'm not a prostitute. And this is what I wanted to say about the Lib girls. They're right about women who marry just for money. But they're wrong about women who marry for love. It's love makes all the difference—

THAW (dispirited). Well, vive la différence.

NORA. And, of course, I haven't charged anything for being a nurse. I've adored taking care of the children, especially when they were babies. I'm going to miss them—awfully.

THAW (on his feet, with outrage). You're deserting the children, too? My God, Nora, what kind of woman are you? You're going to leave those poor little kids alone in this house—

NORA. You're here. And I told you, your mother is coming. I wired her that her son needed her. She'll be happy again—and be needed again—for the first time in years—

THAW (this is a real blow). My mother! Oh, migod, you can't, Nora. You know how she—swarms over me! She thinks I'm still 12 years old . . . (His head is now in his hands.) You know she drives me out of my cotton-picking mind.

NORA. Yes. But you never said so before.

THAW. I love my mother. She's been a good mother, and wife. But Nora, she's a very limited woman! Yak, yak—food, shopping, the kids . . .

NORA. Thaw, the children love this house, and I don't want to take them out of school. And I can't give them another home. Women, you know, can't borrow money to buy a house. Besides, legally this house and everything in it, except mother's few things, are yours. All the worldly goods with which thou didst me endow seem to be in that suitcase.

THAW. Nora, you know damn well that all my life insurance is in your name. If I died tomorrow—and I may blow my brains out tonight—everything would go to you and the kids.

NORA. Widowhood is one of the few fringe benefits of marriage. But, today, all the money I have is what I've saved in the past year out of my clothes allowance—$260.33. But I hope you will give me my severance pay—

THAW. And if I don't—you know legally I don't have to—how do you propose to support yourself?

NORA. Well, if I can't get a job right away—sell my engagement ring. That's why they say diamonds are a gal's best friend. What else do jobless women have they can turn into ready cash—except their bodies?

THAW. What kind of job do you figure on getting?

NORA. Well, I do have a master's in English. So I'm going to try for a spot in Time Research. That's the intellectual harem kept by the Time Inc. editors. The starting pay is good.

THAW. How do you know that?

NORA. From your own research assistant, Molly Peapack. We're both Wellesley, you know. She's a friend of the chief researcher at Time, Marylois Vega. Also, Molly says, computer programming is a field that may open to women—

THAW (indignant). You told Peapack you were leaving me? Before you even told me? How do you like that for treating a mate like an inferior!

NORA. Thaw, I've told you at least three times a week for the last year that with the kids both in school, I'd like to get a job. You always laughed at me. You said I was too old to be a Playboy Bunny, and that the only job an inexperienced woman my age could get would be as a saleswoman—

THAW. Okay. Where are you going to live? That 200 won't go far—

NORA. Peapack's offered to let me stay with her until I find something.

THAW. I'm going to have a word with Miss Molly Peapack tomorrow. She's been too damned aggressive lately, anyway—

NORA. She's going to have a word with you, too. She's leaving.

THAW. Peapack is leaving? Leaving me?

NORA. When you got her from Prudential, you promised her, remember, you'd recommend her for promotion to office manager. So, last week you took on a man. A new man. Now she's got a job offer where she's sure she's got a 40–60 chance for advancement to management. (Pause.) So you've lost your home wife and your office wife.

THAW. Jesus! And this is a male-dominated world?

NORA. Well, I've got five minutes—

THAW. You've still not told me why.

NORA. Oh, Thaw darling! You poor—man. I have told you why: I'm leaving because I want a job. I want to do some share, however small, of the world's work, and be paid for it. Isn't the work you do in the world—and the salary you get—what makes you respect yourself, and other men respect you? Women have begun to want to respect themselves a little, too—

THAW. You mean, the real reason you are leaving is that you want a paying job?

NORA. Yes.

THAW. God, Nora, why didn't you say that in the beginning. All right, go get a job, if it's that important to you. But that doesn't mean you have to leave me and the kids.

NORA. I'm afraid it does. Otherwise, I'd have to do two jobs. Out there. And here.

THAW. Look, Nora, I heard some of the Lib gals say there are millions of working wives and mothers who are doing two jobs. Housework can't be all that rough—

NORA. Scrubbing floors, walls. Cleaning pots, pans, windows, ovens. Messes—dog messes, toilet messes, children's messes. Garbage. Laundry. Shopping for pounds of stuff. Loading them into the car, out of the car—(A pause.) Not all of it hard. But all of it routine. All of it boring.

THAW. Listen, Nora, what say, you work, I work. And we split the housework? How's that for a deal?

NORA. It's a deal you are not quite free to make, Thaw. You sometimes can't get home until very late. And you have to travel a lot, you know. Oh, it might work for a little while. But not for long. After ten years, you still won't empty an ashtray, or pick up after yourself in the bathroom. No. I don't have the physical or moral strength to swing two jobs. So I've got to choose the one, before it's too late, that's most important to me—oh, not for me just now, but for when I'm 50—

THAW. When you're 50, Nora, if you don't leave me, you'll be the wife of the president of Stove Mountain Life Insurance Company. Sharing my wealth, sharing whatever status I have in the community. And with servants of your own. Now you listen to me, Nora. It's a man's world, out there. It's a man's world where there are a lot of women working. I see them every day. What are most of them really doing? Marking time, and looking, always looking, for a man who will offer them a woman's world . . . the world you have here. Marriage is still the best deal that the world has to offer women. And most women know it. It's always been like that. And it's going to be like that for a long, long time.

NORA. Just now I feel that the best deal I, Nora Wald, can hope to get out of life is to learn to esteem myself as a person . . . to stop feeling that every day a little bit more of my mind—and heart—is being washed down the drain with the soapsuds . . . Thaw—listen. If I don't stop shrinking, I'll end up secretly hating you, and trying to cut you—and your son—down to my size. The way your poor, dear mother does you and your father. And you'll become like your father, the typical henpecked husband. Thinking of his old wife as the Ball and Chain. You know he has a mistress? (THAW knows.) A smart gal who owns her own shop . . . who doesn't bore him.

THAW. Well, Nora . . . (Pours drinks.) One for the road?

NORA. Right. For the road.

THAW. Nora . . . I'll wait. But I don't know how long—

NORA. I've thought of that, too . . . that you might remarry . . . that girl, maybe, who means nothing—

THAW. Goddammit, a man needs a woman of his own—

NORA (nodding). I know. A sleep-in, sleep-with body servant of his very own. Well, that's your problem. Just now, I have to wrestle with mine. (Goes to door, picks up suitcase.) I'm not bursting with self-confidence, Thaw. I do love you. And I also need . . . a man. So I'm not slamming the door. I'm closing it . . . very . . . softly.

(EXITS. CURTAIN FALLS.)

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. -Based on the little that we hear of the television program at the start of the play, characterize the moderator of the program.

2. -What dramatic purposes are served by including the bit about the television program?

3. -Very early in the dialogue Thaw warns Nora: "Uh-uh, Nora! We both agreed months ago, you'd lay off the feminist bit if I'd lay off watching Saturday football." What does this tell us about Thaw? And about Nora? Do you think they made a fair bargain? (Notice also the first line that Nora speaks after Thaw's line.)

4. -What are the implications of the ad by Stove Mountain Life Insurance? Why does Thaw think it is "quite an ad"? What do you think of it?

5. -Trace the course of Thaw's methods in his attempts to keep Nora from leaving.

6. -How much do you think Thaw has learned by the end of the play?

7. -In some ways the play—though certainly serious—is a comedy. What, if anything, do you find funny in it?

8. -The play is set in 1970. Is it dated in some ways? Still relevant in others? Explain.

In Brief: Writing Arguments about Drama

The following questions may help you to formulate ideas for an essay on a play.

Perhaps more evidently than stories or poems, plays themselves are writings that offer arguments. Characters, pitted against other characters, are likely to try to justify their behavior. At the end of Othello, for instance, the protagonist offers an account of his behavior—an account that some readers and spectators find convincing and emotionally satisfying, but that others find self-deluded and emotionally unsatisfying. Essays about plays often set forth highly controversial positions, for instance. "The women in Glaspell's Trifles are justified in concealing evidence of the murder," or, to take a more nuanced position, "Although viewers can scarcely approve of withholding evidence of murder, in Glaspell's Trifles viewers probably approve for three reasons: First, . . ., second, . . . , and third . . . ."

Assertions of a thesis will interest readers only if they are supported by evidence. In all probability you can find a thesis by examining your basic responses, or by scanning the questions we give below, but almost certainly you will modify this thesis during the course of your reexamination of the play. Thinking skeptically about your own assertions is the heart of critical thinking, and critical thinking is at the heart of writing an effective argument. It is not, however, the whole of writing an argument. Once you have drafted your argument, and you are satisfied with the position that you have taken, you still need to make sure that you set forth this position effectively, in words that will engage your readers.

PLOT AND CONFLICT

1. -Does the exposition introduce elements that will be ironically fulfilled? During the exposition do you perceive things differently from the way the characters perceive them?

2. -Are certain happenings or situations recurrent? If so, what significance do you attach to them?

3. -If there is more than one plot, do the plots seem to you to be related? Is one plot clearly the main plot and another plot a subplot, a minor variation on the theme?

4. -Do any scenes strike you as irrelevant?

5. -Are certain scenes so strongly foreshadowed that you anticipated them? If so, did the happenings in these scenes merely fulfill your expectations, or did they also in some way surprise you?

6. -What kinds of conflict are there? One character against another, one group against another, one part of a personality against another part in the same person?

7. -How is the conflict resolved? By an unambiguous triumph of one side or by a triumph that is also in some degree a loss for the triumphant side? Do you find the resolution satisfying, or unsettling, or what? Why?

Character

1. -A dramatic character is not likely to be thoroughly realistic, a copy of someone we might know. Still, we can ask if the character is consistent and coherent. We can also ask if the character is complex or is, on the other hand, a simple representative of some human type.

2. -How is the character defined? Consider what the character says and does and what others say about him or her and do to him or her. Also consider other characters who more or less resemble the character in question, because the similarities—and the differences—may be significant.

3. -How trustworthy are the characters when they characterize themselves? When they characterize others?

4. -Do characters change as the play goes on, or do we simply know them better at the end?

5. -What do you make of the minor characters? Are they merely necessary to the plot, or are they foils to other characters? Or do they serve some other functions?

6. -If a character is tragic, does the tragedy seem to you to proceed from a moral flaw, from an intellectual error, from the malice of others, from sheer chance, or from some combination of these?

7. -What are the character's goals? To what degree do you sympathize with them? If a character is comic, do you laugh with or at the character?

8. -Do you think the characters are adequately motivated?

9. -Is a given character so meditative that you feel he or she is engaged less in a dialogue with others than in a dialogue with the self? If so, do you feel that this character is in large degree a spokesperson for the author, commenting not only on the world of the play but also on the outside world?

Tragedy

1. -What causes the tragedy? A flaw in the central character? A mistake (not the same thing as a flaw) made by this character? An outside force, such as another character, or fate?

2. -Is the tragic character defined partly by other characters, for instance, by characters who help us to sense what the character might have done, or who in some other way reveal the strengths or weaknesses of the protagonist?

3. -Does a viewer know more than the tragic figure knows? More than most or all of the characters know?

4. -Does the tragic character achieve any sort of wisdom at the end of the play?

5. -To what degree do you sympathize with the tragic character?

6. -Is the play depressing? If not, why not?

COMEDY

1. -Do the comic complications arise chiefly out of the personalities of the characters (for instance, pretentiousness or amorousness), or out of the situations (for instance, mistaken identity)?

2. -What are the chief goals of the figures? Do we sympathize with these goals, or do we laugh at persons who pursue them? If we laugh, why do we laugh?

3. -What are the personalities of those who oppose the central characters? Do we laugh at them, or do we sympathize with them?

4. -What is funny about the play? Is the comedy high (including verbal comedy) or chiefly situational and physical?

5. -Is the play predominantly genial, or is there a strong satiric tone?

6. -Does the comedy have any potentially tragic elements in it? Might the plot be slightly rewritten so that it would become a tragedy?

7. -What, if anything, do the characters learn by the end of the play?

NONVERBAL LANGUAGE

1. -If the playwright does not provide full stage directions, try to imagine for at least one scene what gestures and tones might accompany each speech. (The first scene is usually a good one to try your hand at.)
2. -What do you make of the setting? Does it help to reveal character? Do changes of scene strike you as symbolic? If so, symbolic of what?
3. -Do certain costumes (dark suits, flowery shawls, stiff collars, etc.) or certain properties (books, pictures, toys, candlesticks, etc.) strike you as symbolic? If so, symbolic of what?

The Play in Performance

Often we can gain a special pleasure from, or insight into, a dramatic work when we actually see it produced onstage or made into a film. This gives us an opportunity to think about the choices that the director has made, and, even more, it may prompt us to imagine and ponder how we would direct the play for the theater or make a film version of it ourselves.

1. -If you have seen the play in the theater or in a film version, what has been added? What has been omitted? Why?
2. -In the case of a film, has the film medium been used to advantage—for example, in focusing attention through close-ups or reaction shots (shots showing not the speaker but a person reacting to the speaker)?
3. -Do certain plays seem to be especially suited—maybe only suited—to the stage? Would they not work effectively as films? Is the reverse true: Are some plays best presented, and best understood, when they are done as films?
4. -Critics have sometimes said about this or that play that it cannot really be staged successfully or presented well on film—that the best way to appreciate and understand it is as something to be read, like a poem or novel. Are there plays you have studied for which this observation appears to hold true? Which features of the work—its characters, settings, dialogue, central themes—might make it difficult to transfer the play from the page to the stage or to the movie screen?
5. -Imagine that you are directing the play. What would be the important decisions you would have to make about character, setting, and pacing of the action? Would you be inclined to omit certain scenes? To add new scenes that are not in the work itself? What kinds of advice would you give to the performers about their roles?

A Sample Student Essay, Using Sources

In Appendix A we discuss manuscript form (page 1764) and in Appendixes B and C the use of sources (page 1769) and documentation (page 1776). Here we give a student's documented paper on Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman. (The play appears in this book on page 000.) The student of course had taken notes on index cards, both from the play and from secondary sources, and had arranged and rearranged the notes as her topic and thesis became clearer to her. We preface the final version of her essay with the rough outline that she prepared before she wrote her first draft.

Here is the final version of the essay.

The Women in Death of a Salesman

Death of a Salesman is of course about a salesman, but it is also about the American dream of success. Somewhere in between the narrowest topic, the death of a salesman, and the largest topic, the examination of American values, is Miller's picture of the American family. This paper will chiefly study one member of the family, Willy's wife, Linda Loman, but before examining Miller's depiction of her, it will look at Miller's depiction of other women in the play in order to make clear Linda's distinctive traits. We will see that although her role in society is extremely limited, she is an admirable figure, fulfilling the roles of wife and mother with remarkable intelligence.

Linda is the only woman who is on stage much of the time, but there are several other women in the play: "the Woman" (the unnamed woman in Willy's hotel room), Miss Forsythe and her friend Letta (the two women who join the brothers in the restaurant), Jenny (Charley's secretary), the various women that the brothers talk about, and the voices of Howard's daughter and wife. We also hear a little about Willy's mother.

We will look first at the least important (but not utterly unimportant) of these, the voices of Howard's daughter and wife on the wire recorder. Katz 2

Of Howard's seven-year-old daughter we know only that she can whistle "Roll Out the Barrel" and that according to Howard she "is crazy about me." The other woman in Howard's life is equally under his thumb. Here is the dialogue that tells us about her--and her relation to her husband.

HOWARD'S VOICE. "Go on, say something." (Pause.) "Well, you gonna talk?"

HIS WIFE. "I can't think of anything."

HOWARD'S VOICE. "Well, talk--it's turning."

HOWARD. (snapping the machine off). That was my wife. (1599)

There is, in fact, a third woman in Howard's life, the maid. Howard says that if he can't be at home when the Jack Benny program comes on, he uses the wire recorder. He tells "the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio. . . ." (1599). In short, the women in Howard's world exist to serve (and to worship) him.

Another woman who seems to have existed only to serve men is Willy Loman's mother. On one occasion, in speaking with Ben, Willy remembers being on her lap, and Ben, on learning that his mother is dead, utters a platitudinous description of her, "Fine specimen of a lady, Mother" (1583), but that's as much as we learn of her. Willy is chiefly interested in learning about his father, who left the family and went to Alaska. Ben characterizes the father as "a very great and a very wild-hearted man" (1585), but the fact that the father left his family and apparently had no further communication with his wife and children seems to mean nothing to Ben. Katz 3

Presumably the mother struggled alone to bring up the boys, but her efforts are unmentioned. Curiously, some writers defend the father's desertion of his family. Lois Gordon says, "The first generation (Willy's father) has been forced, in order to make a living, to break up the family" (278), but nothing in the play supports this assertion that the father was "forced" to break up the family.

Willy, like Ben, assumes that men are heroic and women are nothing except servants and sex machines. For instance, Willy says to Ben, "Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from" (1585). As Kay Stanton, a feminist critic says, Willy's words imply "an Edenic birth myth," a world "with all the Loman men springing directly from their father's side, with no commingling with a female" (69).

Another woman who, like Howard's maid and Willy's mother, apparently exists only to serve is Jenny, Charley's secretary. She is courteous, and she is treated courteously by Charley and by Charley's son, Bernard, but she has no identity other than that of a secretary. And, as a secretary--that is, as a nonentity in the eyes of at least some men--she can be addressed insensitively. Willy Loman makes off-color remarks to her:

> WILLY. . . .Jenny, Jenny, good to see you. How're ya? Workin'? Or still honest?
>
> JENNY. Fine. How've you been feeling?
>
> WILLY. Not much any more, Jenny. Ha, ha! (1606)

The first of these comments seems to suggest that a working woman is not honest--that is, is a prostitute or is engaged in some other sort of hanky-panky, as is the Woman who in exchange for silk stockings and sex sends Willy directly into the buyer's office. The second of Willy's jokes, with its remark about not feeling much, also refers to sex. In short, though readers or viewers of the play see Jenny as a thoroughly respectable woman, they see her not so much as an individual but as a person engaged in routine work and as a person to whom Willy can speak crudely.

It is a little harder to be certain about the characters of Miss Forsythe and Letta, the two women in the scene in Stanley's restaurant. For Happy, Miss Forsythe is "strudel," an object for a man to consume, and for Stanley she and her friend Letta are "chippies," that is, prostitutes. But is it clear that they are prostitutes? When Happy tells Miss Forsythe that he is in the business of selling, he makes a dirty joke, saying, "You don't happen to sell, do you?" (1611).

She replies, "No, I don't sell," and if we take this seriously and if we believe her, we can say that she is respectable and is rightly putting Happy in his place. Further, her friend Letta says, "I gotta get up very early tomorrow. I got jury duty" (1617), which implies that she is a responsible citizen. Still, the girls do not seem especially thoughtful. When Biff introduces Willy to the girls, Letta says, "Isn't he cute? Sit down with us, Pop" (1618), and when Willy breaks down in the restaurant, Miss Forsythe says, "Say, I don't like that temper of his" (1618). Perhaps we can say this: It is going too far--on the basis of what we see--to agree with Stanley that the women are "chippies," or with Happy, who assumes that every woman is available for sex, but Miss Forsythe and Letta do not seem to be especially responsible or even interesting people. That is, as Miller presents them, they are of little substance, simply figures introduced into the play in order to show how badly Happy and Biff behave.

The most important woman in the play, other than Linda, is "the Woman," who for money or stockings and perhaps for pleasure has sex with Willy, and who will use her influence as a receptionist or secretary in the office to send Willy directly on to the buyer, without his having to wait at the desk. But even though the Woman gets something out of the relationship, she knows that she is being used. When Biff appears in the hotel room, she asks him, "Are you football or baseball?" Biff replies, "Football," and the Woman, "angry, humiliated," says, "That's me too" (1620). We can admire her vigorous response, but, again, like the other women whom we have discussed, she is not really an impressive figure. We can say that, at best, in a society that assumes women are to be exploited by men, she holds her own.

So far, then--though we have not yet talked about Linda--the world of Death of a Salesman is not notable for its pictures of impressive women. True, most of the males in the play--Willy, Biff, Happy, Ben, and such lesser characters as Stanley and Howard--are themselves pretty sorry specimens, but Bernard and Charley are exceptionally decent and successful people, people who can well serve as role models. Can any female character in the play serve as a role model?

Linda has evoked strongly contrasting reactions from the critics. Some of them judge her very severely. For instance, Lois Gordon says that Linda "encourages Willy's dream, yet she will not let him leave her for the New Continent, the only realm where the dream can be fulfilled" (280). True, Linda urges Willy not to follow Ben's advice of going to Alaska, but surely the spectator of the play cannot believe that Willy is the sort of man who can follow in Ben’s footsteps and violently make a fortune. And, in fact, Ben is so vile a person (as when he trips Biff, threatens Biff's eye with the point of his umbrella, and says, "Never fight fair with a stranger, boy" [1585]), that we would not want Willy to take Ben's advice.

A second example of a harsh view of Linda is Brian Parker's comment on "the essential stupidity of Linda's behavior. Surely it is both stupid and immoral to encourage the man you love in self-deceit and lies" (54). Parker also says that Linda's speech at the end, when she says she cannot understand why Willy killed himself, "is not only pathetic, it is also an explanation of the loneliness of Willy Loman which threw him into other women's arms" (54). Nothing in the play suggests that Linda was anything other than a highly supportive wife. If Willy turned to other women, surely it was not because Linda did not understand him. Finally, one last example of the Linda-bashing school of commentary: Guerin Bliquez speaks of "Linda's facility for prodding Willy to his doom" (383).

Very briefly, the arguments against Linda are that (1) she selfishly prevented Willy from going to Alaska, (2) she stupidly encourages him in his self-deceptions, and (3) she is materialistic, so that even at the end, in the Requiem, when she says she has made the last Katz payment on the house, she is talking about money. But if we study the play we will see that all three of these charges are false. First, although Linda does indeed discourage Willy from taking Ben's advice and going to Alaska, she points out that there is no need for "everybody [to] conquer the world" and that Willy has "a beautiful job here" (1603), a job with excellent prospects. She may be mistaken in thinking that Willy has a good job--he may have misled her--but, given what seems to be the situation, her comment is entirely reasonable. So far as the second charge goes, that she encourages him in self-deception, there are two answers. First, on some matters she does not know that Willy has lied to her, and so her encouragement is reasonable and right. Second, on other matters she does know that Willy is not telling the truth, but she rightly thinks it is best not to let him know that she knows, since such a revelation would crush what little self-respect remains in him. Consider, for example, this portion of dialogue, early in the play, when Willy, deeply agitated about his failure to drive and about Biff, has returned from what started out as a trip to Boston. Linda, trying to take his mind off his problems, urges him to go downstairs to the kitchen to try a new kind of cheese:

LINDA. Go down, try it. And be quiet.

WILLY. (turning to Linda, guiltily).

You're not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

LINDA. You've got too much on the ball to worry about.

WILLY. You're my foundation and my support, Linda.

LINDA. Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of molehills.

WILLY. I won't fight with him any more. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.

LINDA. He'll find his way. (1569)

Of course she does not really think he has a great deal on the ball, and she probably is not confident that Biff will "find his way," but surely she is doing the best thing possible--calming Willy, partly by using soothing words and partly by doing what she can to get Biff out of the house, since she knows that Biff and Willy can’t live under the same roof.

The third charge, that she is materialistic, is ridiculous. She has to count the pennies because someone has to see that the bills are paid, and Willy is obviously unable to do so. Here is an example of her supposed preoccupation with money:

LINDA. Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.

WILLY. It don't leak, does it?

LINDA. No, they did a wonderful job. Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.

WILLY. I'm not going to pay that man! That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!

LINDA. Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth. (1578)

It might be nice if Linda spent her time taking courses at an adult education center and thinking high thoughts, but it’s obvious that someone in the Loman family (as in all families) has to keep track of the bills.

The worst that can be said of Linda is that she subscribes to three American ideas of the time--that the man is the breadwinner, that the relationship between a father and his sons is far more important than the relationship between a mother and her sons, and that a woman's sole job is to care for the house and to produce sons for her husband. She is the maidservant to her husband and to her sons, but in this she is like the vast majority of women of her time, and she should not be criticized for not being an innovator. Compared to her husband and her sons, Linda (though of course not perfect) is a tower of common sense, virtue, and strength. In fact, far from causing Willy's failure, she does what she can to give him strength to face the facts, for instance when she encourages him to talk to Howard about a job in New York: "Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear" (1567). Notice, too, her speech in which she agrees with Biff's decision that it is best for Biff to leave for good: she goes to Willy and says, "I think that's the best way, dear. 'Cause there's no use drawing it out, you'll just never get along" (1626). Linda is not the most forceful person alive, or the brightest, but she is decent and she sees more clearly than do any of the other Lomans.

There is nothing in the play to suggest that Arthur Miller was a feminist or was ahead of his time in his view of the role of women. On the contrary, the play seems to give a pre-feminist view, with women playing subordinate roles to men. The images of success of the best sort--not of Ben's ruthless sort--are Charley and Bernard, two males. Probably Miller, writing in the 1940s, could hardly conceive of a successful woman other than as a wife or mother. Notice, by the way, that Bernard--probably the most admirable male in the play--is not only an important lawyer but the father of two sons, apparently a sign of his complete success as a man. Still, Miller's picture of Linda is by no means condescending. Linda may not be a genius, but she is the brightest and the most realistic of the Lomans. Things turn out badly, but not because of Linda. The viewer leaves the theater with profound respect for her patience, her strength, her sense of decency, and, yes, her intelligence and her competence in dealing with incompetent men.

American Voices: Drama for a Diverse Nation

In the first act of Arthur Miller's play Death of a Salesman (1947), Willy Loman (the leading character) tells his sons:

> The man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want.

Against Willy's earnest remark we can juxtapose a cynical remark made more than half a century earlier by Mark Twain:

> All you need in this life is ignorance and confidence, then success is sure.

The dream of success, the American Dream—in one form or another—has motivated millions, and it has generated countless pithy remarks. Here are a few observations about America that you may want to recall as you read and reflect on the plays in this chapter.

> America means opportunity, freedom, power.
> —Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), 1864

> America has been another name for opportunity.
> —Frederick Jackson Turner (1861–1932), historian, 1893

> What I do object to about America is the herd thinking. There is no room for individuals in your country—and yet you are dedicated to saving the world for individualism.
> —Bertrand Russell (1872–1970), British philosopher, 1964

> The genius of America is that out of the many, we become one.

—Jesse Jackson (b. 1941), speech at the Democratic National Convention, Atlanta, Georgia, July 1988

If you work hard and play by the rules in this great country, you can get ahead.

—Richard A. Gephardt (b. 1941), Missouri congressman, 1995

America must be described in romantic terms. . . . America is a romance in which we all partake.

—Newt Gingrich (b. 1943), Georgia congressman, in To Renew America, 1995

People in America, of course, live in all sorts of fashions, because they are foreigners, or unlucky, or depraved, or without ambition; people live like that, but Americans live in white detached houses with green shutters. Rigidly, blindly, the dream takes precedence.

—Margaret Mead (1901–1978), anthropologist, 1949

In poetry, prose, and drama, American writers have explored the meanings of the American Dream, even as they have also described the challenges that members of certain social classes and groups and racial and ethnic minorities have faced in gaining access to the Dream. In a sense, there is perhaps only one American Dream, and it involves self-reliance, success, and independence. But in life and literature, there are many different American dreamers, who from their own backgrounds and experiences have expressed their hopes and fears about the possibilities for fulfillment that America offers, as the plays in this chapter attest.

Jane Martin

Jane Martin has never given an interview and has never been photographed. The name presumably is the pseudonym of a writer who works with the Actors Theatre of Louisville, Kentucky. Rodeo is one of a collection of monologues, Talking With . . . , first presented at the Actors Theatre during the 1981 Humana Festival of New American Plays. Jane Martin has also written full- length plays.

Rodeo [1981]

A young woman in her late twenties sits working an a piece of tack. Beside her is a Lone Star beer in the can. As the lights come up we hear the last verse of a Tanya Tucker song or some other female country-western vocalist. She is wearing old worn jeans and boots plus a long-sleeved workshirt with the sleeves rolled up. She works until the song is over and then speaks.*

BIG EIGHT. Shoot—Rodeo's just goin' to hell in a handbasket. Rodeo used to be somethin'. I loved it. I did. Once Daddy an' a bunch of 'em was foolin' around with some old bronc over to our place and this ol' red nose named Cinch got bucked off and my Daddy hooted and said he had him a nine-year-old girl, namely me, wouldn't have no damn trouble cowboyin' that horse. Well, he put me on up there, stuck that ridin' rein in my hand, gimme a kiss, and said, "Now there's only one thing t' remember Honey Love, if ya fall off you jest don't come home." Well I stayed up. You gotta stay on a bronc eight seconds. Otherwise the ride don't count. So from that day on my daddy called me Big Eight. Heck! That's all the name I got anymore . . . Big Eight.

Used to be fer cowboys, the rodeo did. Do it in some open field, folks would pull their cars and pick-ups round it, sit on the hoods, some ranch hand'd bulldog him some rank steer and everybody'd wave their hats and call him by name. Ride us some buckin' stock, rope a few calves, git throwed off a bull, and then we'd jest git us to a bar and tell each other lies about how good we were.

Used to be a family thing. Wooly Billy Tilson and Tammy Lee had them five kids on the circuit. Three boys, two girls and Wooly and Tammy. Wasn't no two-beer rodeo in Oklahoma didn't have a Tilson entered. Used to call the oldest girl Tits. Tits Tilson. Never seen a girl that top-heavy could ride so well. Said she only fell off when the gravity got her. Cowboys used to say if she landed face down you could plant two young trees in the holes she'd leave. Ha! Tits Tilson.

Used to be people came to a rodeo had a horse of their own back home. Farm people, ranch people—lord, they knew what they were lookin' at. Knew a good ride from a bad ride, knew hard from easy. You broke some bones er spent the day eatin' dirt, at least ya got appreciated.

Now they bought the rodeo. Them. Coca-Cola, Pepsi Cola, Marlboro damn cigarettes. You know the ones I mean. Them. Hire some New York faggot t' sit on some ol' stuffed horse in front of a sagebrush photo n' smoke that junk. Hell, tobacco wasn't made to smoke, honey, it was made to chew. Lord wanted ya filled up with smoke he would've set ya on fire. Damn it gets me!

There's some guy in a banker's suit runs the rodeo now. Got him a pinky ring and a digital watch, honey. Told us we oughta have a watchamacallit, choriographus or somethin', some ol' ballbuster used to be with the Ice damn Capades. Wants us to ride around dressed up like Mickey Mouse, Pluto, crap like that. Told me I had to haul my butt through the barrel race done up like Minnie damn Mouse in a tu-tu. Huh uh, honey! Them people is so screwed-up they probably eat what they run over in the road.

Listen, they got the clowns wearin' Astronaut suits! I ain't lyin'. You know what a rodeo clown does! You go down, fall off whatever—the clown runs in front of the bull so's ya don't git stomped. Pin-stripes, he got 'em in space suits tellin' jokes on a microphone. First horse see 'em, done up like the Star Wars went crazy. Best buckin' horse on the circuit, name of Piss 'N' Vinegar, took one look at them clowns, had him a heart attack and died. Cowboy was ridin' him got hisself squashed. Twelve hundred pounds of coronary arrest jes fell right through 'em. Blam! Vio con dios. Crowd thought that was funnier than the astronauts. I swear it won't be long before they're strappin' ice-skates on the ponies. Big crowds now. Ain't hardly no ranch people, no farm people, nobody I know. Buncha disco babies and dee-vorce lawyers—designer jeans and day-glo Stetsons. Hell, the whole bunch of 'em wears French perfume. Oh it smells like money now! Got it on the cable T and V—hey, you know what, when ya rodeo yer just bound to kick yerself up some dust—well now, seems like that fogs up the ol' TV camera, so they told us a while back that from now on we was gonna ride on some new stuff called Astro-dirt. Dust free. Artificial damn dirt, honey. Lord have mercy.

Banker Suit called me in the other day said "Lurlene . . ." "Hold it," I said. "Who's this Lurlene? Round here they call me Big Eight." "Well, Big Eight," he said, "my name's Wallace." "Well that's a read surprise t' me," I said, "cause aroun' here everybody jes calls you Dumb-ass." My, he laughed real big, slapped his big ol' desk, an' then he said I wasn't suitable for the rodeo no more. Said they was lookin' fer another type, somethin' a little more in the showgirl line, like the Dallas Cowgirls maybe. Said the ridin' and ropin' wasn't the thing no more. Talked on about floats, costumes, dancin' choreog-aphy. If I was a man I woulda pissed on his shoe. Said he'd give me a lifetime pass though. Said I could come to his rodeo any time I wanted.

Rodeo used to be people ridin' horses for the pleasure of people who rode horses—made you feel good about what you could do. Rodeo wasn't worth no money to nobody. Money didn't have nothing to do with it! Used to be seven Tilsons riding in the rodeo. Wouldn't none of 'em dress up like Donald damn Duck so they quit. That there's the law of gravity!

There's a bunch of assholes in this country sneak around until they see ya havin' fun and then they buy the fun and start in sellin' it. See, they figure if ya love it, they can sell it. Well you look out, honey! They want to make them a dollar out of what you love. Dress you up like Minnie Mouse. Sell your rodeo. Turn yer pleasure into Ice damn Capades. You hear what I'm sayin'? You're jus' merchandise to them, sweetie. You're jus' merchandise to them.

BLACKOUT.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. -Try to recall your response to the title and the first paragraph or two of the play. Did Big Eight fit your view (perhaps a stereotypical view) of what a cowgirl might sound like?

2. -Reread Rodeo, this time paying attention not only to what Big Eight says but also to your responses to her. By the end of the play has she become a somewhat more complicated figure than she seems to be after the first paragraph, or does she pretty much seem the same? Do you find that you become increasingly sympathetic? Increasingly unsympathetic? Or does your opinion not change?

3. -If you have ever seen a rodeo, do you think Big Eight's characterization is on the mark? Or is she simply bitter because she has been fired?

4. -If a local theater group were staging Rodeo, presumably with some other short plays, would you go to see it? Why, or why not?

The Play on the Stage

5. -If you were directing a production of Rodeo, would you keep the actor seated, or would you have her get up, move around the stage, perhaps hang up one piece of tack and take down another? Why?

6. -If you were directing Rodeo, would you tell Big Eight that her speech is essentially an interior monologue—a soliloquy—or would you tell her that she is speaking directly to the audience—i.e., that the audience is, collectively, a character in the play?

7. -The play ends with a stage direction, "Blackout"; that is, the stage suddenly darkens. One director of a recent production, however, chose to end with a "fade out"; the illumination decreased slowly by means of dimmers (mechanical devices that regulate the intensity of a lighting unit). If you were directing a production, what sort of lighting would you use at the end? Why?

ARTHUR MILLER

Arthur Miller (1915–2005) was born in New York. In 1938 he graduated from the University of Michigan, where he won several prizes for drama. Six years later he had his first Broadway production, The Man Who Had All the Luck, but the play was unlucky and closed after four days. By the time of his first commercial success, All My Sons (1947), he had already written several plays. In 1949 he won a Pulitzer Prize with Death of a Salesman and achieved an international reputation. Among his other works are an adaptation (1950) of Ibsen's Enemy of the People and a play about the Salem witch trials, The Crucible (1953), both containing political implications, and The Misfits (1961, a screenplay), After the Fall (1964), and Incident at Vichy (1965).

SCENE: The action takes place in WILLY LOMAN*'s house and yard and in various places he visits in the New York and Boston of today.*

Act 1

SCENE: A melody is heard, played upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon. The curtain rises.

Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry glow of orange. As more light appears, we see a solid vault of apartment houses around the small, fragile-seeming home. An air of the dream clings to the place, a dream rising out of reality. The kitchen at center seems actual enough, for there is a kitchen table with three chairs, and a refrigerator. But no other fixtures are seen. At the back of the kitchen there is a draped entrance, which leads to the living room. To the right of the kitchen, on a level raised two feet, is a bedroom furnished only with a brass bedstead and a straight chair. On a shelf over the bed a silver athletic trophy stands. A window opens onto the apartment house at the side.

Behind the kitchen, on a level raised six and a half feet, is the boys' bedroom, at present barely visible. Two beds are dimly seen, and at the back of the room a dormer window. (This bedroom is above the unseen living room.) At the left a stairway curves up to it from the kitchen.

The entire setting is wholly or, in some places, partially transparent. The roof-line of the house is one-dimensional; under and over it we see the apartment buildings. Before the house lies an apron, curving beyond the forestage into the orchestra. This forward area serves as the back yard as well as the locale of all WILLY*'s imaginings and of his city scenes. Whenever the action is in the present the actors observe the imaginary wall-lines, entering the house only through its door at the left. But in the scenes of the past these boundaries are broken, and characters enter or leave a room by stepping "through" a wall onto the forestage.*

From the right, WILLY LOMAN*, the Salesman, enters, carrying two large sample cases. The flute plays on. He hears but is not aware of it. He is past sixty years of age, dressed quietly. Even as he crosses the stage to the doorway of the house, his exhaustion is apparent. He unlocks the door, comes* into the kitchen, and thankfully lets his burden down, feeling the soreness of his palms. A word-sigh escapes his lips—it might be "Oh, boy, oh, boy." He closes the door, then carries his cases out into the living room, through the draped kitchen doorway.

LINDA, his wife, has stirred in her bed at the right. She gets out and puts on a robe, listening. Most often jovial, she has developed an iron repression of her exceptions to WILLY's behavior—she more than loves him, she admires him, as though his mercurial nature, his temper, his massive dreams and little cruelties, served her only as sharp reminders of the turbulent longings within him, longings which she shares but lacks the temperament to utter and follow to their end.

LINDA (hearing WILLY outside the bedroom, calls with some trepidation).

Willy!

WILLY. It's all right. I came back.

LINDA. Why? What happened? (Slight pause.) Did something happen, Willy?

WILLY. No, nothing happened.

LINDA. You didn't smash the car, did you?

WILLY (with casual irritation). I said nothing happened. Didn't you hear me?

LINDA. Don't you feel well?

WILLY. I'm tired to the death. (The flute has faded away. He sits on the bed beside her, a little numb.) I couldn't make it. I just couldn't make it, Linda.

LINDA (very carefully, delicately). Where were you all day? You look terrible.

WILLY. I got as far as a little above Yonkers. I stopped for a cup of coffee. Maybe it was the coffee.

LINDA. What?

WILLY (after a pause). I suddenly couldn't drive any more. The car kept going off onto the shoulder, y'know?

LINDA (helpfully). Oh. Maybe it was the steering again. I don't think Angelo knows the Studebaker.

WILLY. No, it's me, it's me. Suddenly I realize I'm goin' sixty miles an hour and I don't remember the last five minutes. I'm—I can't seem to—keep my mind to it.

LINDA. Maybe it's your glasses. You never went for your new glasses.

WILLY. No, I see everything. I came back ten miles an hour. It took me nearly four hours from Yonkers.

LINDA (resigned). Well, you'll just have to take a rest, Willy, you can't continue this way.

WILLY. I just got back from Florida.

LINDA. But you didn't rest your mind. Your mind is overactive, and the mind is what counts, dear.

WILLY. I'll start out in the morning. Maybe I'll feel better in the morning. (She is taking off his shoes.) These goddam arch supports are killing me.

LINDA. Take an aspirin. Should I get you an aspirin? It'll soothe you.

WILLY (with wonder). I was driving along, you understand? And I was fine. I was even observing the scenery. You can imagine, me looking at scenery, on the road every week of my life. But it's so beautiful up there, Linda, the trees are so thick, and the sun is warm. I opened the windshield and just let the warm air bathe over me. And then all of a sudden I'm goin' off the road! I'm tellin' ya, I absolutely forgot I was driving. If I'd've gone the other way over the white line I might've killed somebody. So I went on again—and five minutes later I'm dreamin' again, and I nearly . . . (He presses two fingers against his eyes.) I have such thoughts, I have such strange thoughts.

LINDA. Willy, dear. Talk to them again. There's no reason why you can't work in New York.

WILLY. They don't need me in New York. I'm the New England man. I'm vital in New England.

LINDA. But you're sixty years old. They can't expect you to keep traveling every week.

WILLY. I'll have to send a wire to Portland. I'm supposed to see Brown and Morrison tomorrow morning at ten o'clock to show the line. Goddammit, I could sell them! (He starts putting on his jacket.)

LINDA (taking the jacket from him). Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear.

WILLY. If old man Wagner was alive I'd a been in charge of New York now! That man was a prince, he was a masterful man. But that boy of his, that Howard, he don't appreciate. When I went north the first time, the Wagner Company didn't know where New England was!

LINDA. Why don't you tell those things to Howard, dear?

WILLY (encouraged). I will, I definitely will. Is there any cheese?

LINDA. I'll make you a sandwich.

WILLY. No, go to sleep. I'll take some milk. I'll be up right away. The boys in?

LINDA. They're sleeping. Happy took Biff on a date tonight.

WILLY (interested). That so?

LINDA. It was so nice to see them shaving together, one behind the other, in the bathroom. And going out together. You notice? The whole house smells of shaving lotion.

WILLY. Figure it out. Work a lifetime to pay off a house. You finally own it, and there's nobody to live in it.

LINDA. Well, dear, life is a casting off. It's always that way.

WILLY. No, no, some people—some people accomplish something. Did Biff say anything after I went this morning?

LINDA. You shouldn't have criticized him, Willy, especially after he just got off the train. You mustn't lose your temper with him.

WILLY. When the hell did I lose my temper? I simply asked him if he was making any money. Is that a criticism?

LINDA. But, dear, how could he make any money?

WILLY (worried and angered). There's such an undercurrent in him. He became a moody man. Did he apologize when I left this morning?

LINDA. He was crestfallen, Willy. You know how he admires you. I think if he finds himself, then you'll both be happier and not fight any more.

WILLY. How can he find himself on a farm? Is that a life? A farm hand? In the beginning, when he was young, I thought, well, a young man, it's good for him to tramp around, take a lot of different jobs. But it's more than ten years now and he has yet to make thirty-five dollars a week!

LINDA. He's finding himself, Willy.

WILLY. Not finding yourself at the age of thirty-four is a disgrace!

LINDA. Shh!

WILLY. The trouble is he's lazy, goddammit!

LINDA. Willy, please!

WILLY. Biff is a lazy bum!

LINDA. They're sleeping. Get something to eat. Go on down.

WILLY. Why did he come home? I would like to know what brought him home.

LINDA. I don't know. I think he's still lost, Willy. I think he's very lost.

WILLY. Biff Loman is lost. In the greatest country in the world a young man with such—personal attractiveness, gets lost. And such a hard worker. There's one thing about Biff—he's not lazy.

LINDA. Never.

WILLY (with pity and resolve). I'll see him in the morning; I'll have a nice talk with him. I'll get him a job selling. He could be big in no time. My God! Remember how they used to follow him around in high school? When he smiled at one of them their faces lit up. When he walked down the street . . . (He loses himself in reminiscences.)

LINDA (trying to bring him out of it). Willy, dear, I got a new kind of American-type cheese today. It's whipped.

WILLY. Why do you get American when I like Swiss?

LINDA. I just thought you'd like a change . . .

WILLY. I don't want a change! I want Swiss cheese. Why am I always being contradicted?

LINDA (with a covering laugh). I thought it would be a surprise.

WILLY. Why don't you open a window in here, for God's sake?

LINDA (with infinite patience). They're all open, dear.

WILLY. The way they boxed us in here. Bricks and windows, windows and bricks.

LINDA. We should've bought the land next door.

WILLY. The street is lined with cars. There's not a breath of fresh air in the neighborhood. The grass don't grow any more, you can't raise a carrot in the back yard. They should've had a law against apartment houses. Remember those two beautiful elm trees out there? When I and Biff hung the swing between them?

LINDA. Yeah, like being a million miles from the city.

WILLY. They should've arrested the builder for cutting those down. They massacred the neighborhood. (Lost.) More and more I think of those days, Linda. This time of year it was lilac and wisteria. And then the peonies would come out, and the daffodils. What fragrance in this room!

LINDA. Well, after all, people had to move somewhere.

WILLY. No, there's more people now.

LINDA. I don't think there's more people. I think . . .

WILLY. There's more people! That's what's ruining this country! Population is getting out of control. The competition is maddening! Smell the stink from that apartment house! And another one on the other side . . . How can they whip cheese?

On WILLY's last line, BIFF and HAPPY raise themselves up in their beds, listening.

LINDA. Go down, try it. And be quiet.

WILLY (turning to LINDA, guiltily). You're not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

BIFF. What's the matter?

HAPPY. Listen!

LINDA. You've got too much on the ball to worry about.

WILLY. You're my foundation and my support, Linda.

LINDA. Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of molehills.

WILLY. I won't fight with him any more. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.

LINDA. He'll find his way.

WILLY. Sure. Certain men just don't get started till later in life. Like Thomas Edison, I think. Or B. F. Goodrich. One of them was deaf. (He starts for the bedroom doorway.) I'll put my money on Biff.

LINDA. And Willy—if it's warm Sunday we'll drive in the country. And we'll open the windshield, and take lunch.

WILLY. No, the windshields don't open on the new cars.

LINDA. But you opened it today.

WILLY. Me? I didn't. (He stops.) Now isn't that peculiar! Isn't that a remarkable . . . (He breaks off in amazement and fright as the flute is heard distantly.)

LINDA. What, darling?

WILLY. That is the most remarkable thing.

LINDA. What, dear?

WILLY. I was thinking of the Chevvy. (Slight pause.) Nineteen twenty-eight . . . when I had that red Chevvy . . . (Breaks off.) That funny? I coulda sworn I was driving that Chevvy today.

LINDA. Well, that's nothing. Something must've reminded you.

WILLY. Remarkable. Ts. Remember those days? The way Biff used to simonize that car? The dealer refused to believe there was eighty thousand miles on it. (He shakes his head.) Heh! (To Linda.) Close your eyes, I'll be right up. (He walks out of the bedroom.)

HAPPY (to BIFF). Jesus, maybe he smashed up the car again!

LINDA (calling after WILLY). Be careful on the stairs, dear! The cheese is on the middle shelf. (She turns, goes over to the bed, takes his jacket, and goes out of the bedroom.)

Light has risen on the boys' room. Unseen, WILLY is heard talking to himself; "Eighty thousand miles," and a little laugh. BIFF gets out of bed, comes downstage a bit, and stands attentively. BIFF is two years older than his brother HAPPY*, well built, but in these days bears a worn air and seems less self-assured. He has succeeded less, and his dreams are stronger and less acceptable than* HAPPY*'s.* HAPPY is tall, powerfully made. Sexuality is like a visible color on him, or a scent that many women have discovered. He, like his brother, is lost, but in a different way, for he has never allowed himself to turn his face toward defeat and is thus more confused and hard-skinned, although seemingly more content.

HAPPY (getting out of bed). He's going to get his license taken away if he keeps that up. I'm getting nervous about him, y'know, Biff?

BIFF. His eyes are going.

HAPPY. No, I've driven with him. He sees all right. He just doesn't keep his mind on it. I drove into the city with him last week. He stops at a green light and then it turns red and he goes. (He laughs.)

BIFF. Maybe he's color-blind.

HAPPY. Pop? Why he's got the finest eye for color in the business. You know that.

BIFF (sitting down on his bed). I'm going to sleep.

HAPPY. You're not still sour on Dad, are you, Biff?

BIFF. He's all right, I guess.

WILLY (underneath them, in the living room). Yes, sir, eighty thousand miles—eighty-two thousand!

BIFF. You smoking?

HAPPY (holding out a pack of cigarettes). Want one?

BIFF (taking a cigarette). I can never sleep when I smell it.

WILLY. What a simonizing job, heh!

HAPPY (with deep sentiment). Funny, Biff, y'know? Us sleeping in here again? The old beds. (He pats his bed affectionately.) All the talk that went across those beds, huh? Our whole lives.

BIFF. Yeah. Lotta dreams and plans.

HAPPY (with a deep and masculine laugh). About five hundred women would like to know what was said in this room. (They share a soft laugh.)

BIFF. Remember that big Betsy something—what the hell was her name—over on Bushwick Avenue?

HAPPY (combing his hair). With the collie dog!

BIFF. That's the one. I got you in there, remember?

HAPPY. Yeah, that was my first time—I think. Boy, there was a pig. (They laugh, almost crudely.) You taught me everything I know about women. Don't forget that.

BIFF. I bet you forgot how bashful you used to be. Especially with girls.

HAPPY. Oh, I still am, Biff.

BIFF. Oh, go on.

HAPPY. I just control it, that's all. I think I got less bashful and you got more so. What happened, Biff? Where's the old humor, the old confidence? (He shakes BIFF*'s knee.* BIFF gets up and moves restlessly about the room.) What's the matter?

BIFF. Why does Dad mock me all the time?

HAPPY. He's not mocking you, he . . .

BIFF. Everything I say there's a twist of mockery on his face. I can't get near him.

HAPPY. He just wants you to make good, that's all. I wanted to talk to you about Dad for a long time, Biff. Something's—happening to him. He—talks to himself.

BIFF. I noticed that this morning. But he always mumbled.

HAPPY. But not so noticeable. It got so embarrassing I sent him to Florida. And you know something? Most of the time he's talking to you.

BIFF. What's he say about me?

HAPPY. I can't make it out.

BIFF. What's he say about me?

HAPPY. I think the fact that you're not settled, that you're still kind of up in the air . . .

BIFF. There's one or two other things depressing him, Happy.

HAPPY. What do you mean?

BIFF. Never mind. Just don't lay it all to me.

HAPPY. But I think if you just got started—I mean—is there any future for you out there?

BIFF. I tell ya, Hap, I don't know what the future is. I don't know—what I'm supposed to want.

HAPPY. What do you mean?

BIFF. Well, I spent six or seven years after high school trying to work myself up. Shipping clerk, salesman, business of one kind or another. And it's a measly manner of existence. To get on that subway on the hot mornings in summer. To devote your whole life to keeping stock, or making phone calls, or selling or buying. To suffer fifty weeks of the year for the sake of a two-week vacation, when all you really desire is to be outdoors, with your shirt off. And always to have to get ahead of the next fella. And still—that's how you build a future.

HAPPY. Well, you really enjoy it on a farm? Are you content out there?

BIFF (with rising agitation). Hap, I've had twenty or thirty different kinds of jobs since I left home before the war, and it always turns out the same. I just realized it lately. In Nebraska when I herded cattle, and the Dakotas, and Arizona, and now in Texas. It's why I came home now, I guess, because I realized it. This farm I work on, it's spring there now, see? And they've got about fifteen new colts. There's nothing more inspiring or—beautiful than the sight of a mare and a new colt. And it's cool there now, see? Texas is cool now, and it's spring. And whenever spring comes to where I am, I suddenly get the feeling, my God, I'm not gettin' anywhere! What the hell am I doing, playing around with horses, twenty-eight dollars a week! I'm thirty-four years old, I oughta be makin' my future. That's when I come running home. And now, I get here, and I don't know what to do with myself. (After a pause.) I've always made a point of not wasting my life, and everytime I come back here I know that all I've done is to waste my life.

HAPPY. You're a poet, you know that, Biff? You're a—you're an idealist!

BIFF. No, I'm mixed up very bad. Maybe I oughta get married. Maybe I oughta get stuck into something. Maybe that's my trouble. I'm like a boy. I'm not married, I'm not in business, I just—I'm like a boy. Are you content, Hap? You're a success, aren't you? Are you content?

HAPPY. Hell, no!

BIFF. Why? You're making money, aren't you?

HAPPY (moving about with energy, expressiveness). All I can do now is wait for the merchandise manager to die. And suppose I get to be merchandise manager? He's a good friend of mine, and he just built a terrific estate on Long Island. And he lived there about two months and sold it, and now he's building another one. He can't enjoy it once it's finished. And I know that's just what I would do. I don't know what the hell I'm workin' for. Sometimes I sit in my apartment—all alone. And I think of the rent I'm paying. And it's crazy. But then, it's what I always wanted. My own apartment, a car, and plenty of women. And still, goddammit, I'm lonely.

BIFF (with enthusiasm). Listen, why don't you come out West with me?

HAPPY. You and I, heh?

BIFF. Sure, maybe we could buy a ranch. Raise cattle, use our muscles. Men built like we are should be working out in the open.

HAPPY (avidly). The Loman Brothers, heh?

BIFF (with vast affection). Sure, we'd be known all over the counties!

HAPPY (enthralled). That's what I dream about, Biff. Sometimes I want to just rip my clothes off in the middle of the store and outbox that goddam merchandise manager. I mean I can outbox, outrun, and outlift anybody in that store, and I have to take orders from those common, petty sons-of-bitches till I can't stand it any more.

BIFF. I'm tellin' you, kid, if you were with me I'd be happy out there.

HAPPY (enthused). See, Biff, everybody around me is so false that I'm constantly lowering my ideals . . .

BIFF. Baby, together we'd stand up for one another, we'd have someone to trust.

HAPPY. If I were around you . . .

BIFF. Hap, the trouble is we weren't brought up to grub for money. I don't know how to do it.

HAPPY. Neither can I!

BIFF. Then let's go!

HAPPY. The only thing is—what can you make out there?

BIFF. But look at your friend. Builds an estate and then hasn't the peace of mind to live in it.

HAPPY. Yeah, but when he walks into the store the waves part in front of him. That's fifty-two thousand dollars a year coming through the revolving door, and I got more in my pinky finger than he's got in his head.

BIFF. Yeah, but you just said . . .

HAPPY. I gotta show some of those pompous, self-important executives over there that Hap Loman can make the grade. I want to walk into the store the way he walks in. Then I'll go with you, Biff. We'll be together yet, I swear. But take those two we had tonight. Now weren't they gorgeous creatures?

BIFF. Yeah, yeah, most gorgeous I've had in years.

HAPPY. I get that any time I want, Biff. Whenever I feel disgusted. The only trouble is, it gets like bowling or something. I just keep knockin' them over and it doesn't mean anything. You still run around a lot?

BIFF. Naa. I'd like to find a girl—steady, somebody with substance.

HAPPY. That's what I long for.

BIFF. Go on! You'd never come home.

HAPPY. I would! Somebody with character, with resistance! Like Mom, y'know? You're gonna call me a bastard when I tell you this. That girl Charlotte I was with tonight is engaged to be married in five weeks. (He tries on his new hat.)

BIFF. No kiddin'!

HAPPY. Sure, the guy's in line for the vice-presidency of the store. I don't know what gets into me, maybe I just have an over-developed sense of competition or something, but I went and ruined her, and furthermore I can't get rid of her. And he's the third executive I've done that to. Isn't that a crummy characteristic? And to top it all, I go to their weddings! (Indignantly, but laughing.) Like I'm not supposed to take bribes. Manufacturers offer me a hundred-dollar bill now and then to throw an order their way. You know how honest I am, but it's like this girl, see. I hate myself for it. Because I don't want the girl, and, still, I take it and—I love it!

BIFF. Let's go to sleep.

HAPPY. I guess we didn't settle anything, heh?

BIFF. I just got one idea that I think I'm going to try.

HAPPY. What's that?

BIFF. Remember Bill Oliver?

HAPPY. Sure, Oliver is very big now. You want to work for him again?

BIFF. No, but when I quit he said something to me. He put his arm on my shoulder, and he said, "Biff, if you ever need anything, come to me."

HAPPY. I remember that. That sounds good.

BIFF. I think I'll go to see him. If I could get ten thousand or even seven or eight thousand dollars I could buy a beautiful ranch.

HAPPY. I bet he'd back you. 'Cause he thought highly of you, Biff. I mean, they all do. You're well liked, Biff. That's why I say to come back here, and we both have the apartment. And I'm tellin' you, Biff, any babe you want . . .

BIFF. No, with a ranch I could do the work I like and still be something. I just wonder though. I wonder if Oliver still thinks I stole that carton of basketballs.

HAPPY. Oh, he probably forgot that long ago. It's almost ten years. You're too sensitive. Anyway, he didn't really fire you.

BIFF. Well, I think he was going to. I think that's why I quit. I was never sure whether he knew or not. I know he thought the world of me, though. I was the only one he'd let lock up the place.

WILLY (below). You gonna wash the engine, Biff?

HAPPY. Shh!

BIFF looks at HAPPY, who is gazing down, listening. WILLY is mumbling in the parlor.

HAPPY. You hear that?

They listen. WILLY laughs warmly.

BIFF (growing angry). Doesn't he know Mom can hear that?

WILLY. Don't get your sweater dirty, Biff!

A look of pain crosses BIFF's face.

HAPPY. Isn't that terrible? Don't leave again, will you? You'll find a job here. You gotta stick around. I don't know what to do about him, it's getting embarrassing.

WILLY. What a simonizing job!

BIFF. Mom's hearing that!

WILLY. No kiddin', Biff, you got a date? Wonderful!

HAPPY. Go on to sleep. But talk to him in the morning, will you?

BIFF (reluctantly getting into bed). With her in the house. Brother!

HAPPY (getting into bed). I wish you'd have a good talk with him.

The light on their room begins to fade.

BIFF (to himself in bed). That selfish, stupid . . .

HAPPY. Sh . . . Sleep, Biff.

Their light is out. Well before they have finished speaking, WILLY's form is dimly seen below in the darkened kitchen. He opens the refrigerator, searches in there, and takes out a bottle of milk. The apartment houses are fading out, and the entire house and surroundings become covered with leaves. Music insinuates itself as the leaves appear.

WILLY. Just wanna be careful with those girls, Biff, that's all. Don't make any promises. No promises of any kind. Because a girl, y'know, they always believe what you tell 'em, and you're very young, Biff, you're too young to be talking seriously to girls.

Light rises on the kitchen. WILLY, talking, shuts the refrigerator door and comes downstage to the kitchen table. He pours milk into a glass. He is totally immersed in himself, smiling faintly.

WILLY. Too young entirely, Biff. You want to watch your schooling first. Then when you're all set, there'll be plenty of girls for a boy like you. (He smiles broadly at a kitchen chair.) That so? The girls pay for you? (He laughs.) Boy, you must really be makin' a hit.

WILLY is gradually addressing—physically—a point offstage, speaking through the wall of the kitchen, and his voice has been rising in volume to that of a normal conversation.

WILLY. I been wondering why you polish the car so careful. Ha! Don't leave the hubcaps, boys. Get the chamois to the hubcaps. Happy, use newspaper on the windows, it's the easiest thing. Show him how to do it, Biff! You see, Happy? Pad it up, use it like a pad. That's it, that's it, good work. You're doin' all right, Hap. (He pauses, then nods in approbation for a few seconds, then looks upward.) Biff, first thing we gotta do when we get time is clip that big branch over the house. Afraid it's gonna fall in a storm and hit the roof. Tell you what. We get a rope and sling her around, and then we climb up there with a couple of saws and take her down. Soon as you finish the car, boys, I wanna see ya. I got a surprise for you, boys.

BIFF (offstage). Whatta ya got, Dad?

WILLY. No, you finish first. Never leave a job till you're finished—remember that. (Looking toward the "big trees.") Biff, up in Albany I saw a beautiful hammock. I think I'll buy it next trip, and we'll hang it right between those two elms. Wouldn't that be something? Just swingin' there under those branches. Boy, that would be . . .

Young BIFF and Young HAPPY appear from the direction WILLY was addressing. HAPPY carries rags and a pail of water. BIFF, wearing a sweater with a block "S," carries a football.

BIFF (pointing in the direction of the car offstage). How's that, Pop, professional?

WILLY. Terrific. Terrific job, boys. Good work, Biff.

HAPPY. Where's the surprise, Pop?

WILLY. In the back seat of the car.

HAPPY. Boy! (He runs off.)

BIFF. What is it, Dad? Tell me, what'd you buy?

WILLY (laughing, cuffs him). Never mind, something I want you to have.

BIFF (turns and starts off). What is it, Hap?

HAPPY (offstage). It's a punching bag!

BIFF. Oh, Pop!

WILLY. It's got Gene Tunney's signature on it!

HAPPY runs onstage with a punching bag.

BIFF. Gee, how'd you know we wanted a punching bag?

WILLY. Well, it's the finest thing for the timing.

HAPPY (lies down on his back and pedals with his feet). I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

WILLY (to HAPPY). Jumping rope is good too.

BIFF. Did you see the new football I got?

WILLY (examining the ball). Where'd you get a new ball?

BIFF. The coach told me to practice my passing.

WILLY. That so? And he gave you the ball, heh?

BIFF. Well, I borrowed it from the locker room. (He laughs confidentially.)

WILLY (laughing with him at the theft). I want you to return that.

HAPPY. I told you he wouldn't like it!

BIFF (angrily). Well, I'm bringing it back!

WILLY (stopping the incipient argument, to HAPPY). Sure, he's gotta practice with a regulation ball, doesn't he? (To BIFF.) Coach'll probably congratulate you on your initiative!

BIFF. Oh, he keeps congratulating my initiative all the time, Pop.

WILLY. That's because he likes you. If somebody else took that ball there'd be an uproar. So what's the report, boys, what's the report?

BIFF. Where'd you go this time, Dad? Gee we were lonesome for you.

WILLY (pleased, puts an arm around each boy and they come down to the apron). Lonesome, heh?

BIFF. Missed you every minute.

WILLY. Don't say? Tell you a secret, boys. Don't breathe it to a soul. Someday I'll have my own business, and I'll never have to leave home any more.

HAPPY. Like Uncle Charley, heh?

WILLY. Bigger than Uncle Charley! Because Charley is not—liked. He's liked, but he's not—well liked.

BIFF. Where'd you go this time, Dad?

WILLY. Well, I got on the road, and I went north to Providence. Met the Mayor.

BIFF. The Mayor of Providence!

WILLY. He was sitting in the hotel lobby.

BIFF. What'd he say?

WILLY. He said, “Morning!” And I said, “Morning!” And I said, “You got a fine city here, Mayor.” And then he had coffee with me. And then I went to Waterbury. Waterbury is a fine city. Big clock city, the famous Waterbury clock. Sold a nice bill there. And then Boston—Boston is the cradle of the Revolution. A fine city. And a couple of other towns in Mass., and on to Portland and Bangor and straight home!

BIFF. Gee, I’d love to go with you sometime, Dad.

WILLY. Soon as summer comes.

HAPPY. Promise?

WILLY. You and Hap and I, and I’ll show you all the towns. America is full of beautiful towns and fine, upstanding people. And they know me, boys, they know me up and down New England. The finest people. And when I bring you fellas up, there’ll be open sesame for all of us, ’cause one thing, boys: I have friends. I can park my car in any street in New En-gland, and the cops protect it like their own. This summer, heh?

BIFF AND HAPPY (together). Yeah! You bet!

WILLY. We’ll take our bathing suits.

HAPPY. We’ll carry your bags, Pop!

WILLY. Oh, won’t that be something! Me comin’ into the Boston stores with you boys carryin’ my bags. What a sensation!

BIFF is prancing around, practicing passing the ball.

WILLY. You nervous, Biff, about the game?

BIFF. Not if you’re gonna be there.

WILLY. What do they say about you in school, now that they made you captain?

HAPPY. There’s a crowd of girls behind him everytime the classes change.

BIFF (taking WILLY*’s hand*). This Saturday, Pop, this Saturday—just for you, I’m going to break through for a touchdown.

HAPPY. You’re supposed to pass.

BIFF. I’m takin’ one play for Pop. You watch me, Pop, and when I take off my helmet, that means I’m breakin’ out. Then you watch me crash through that line!

WILLY (kisses BIFF). Oh, wait'll I tell this in Boston!

BERNARD enters in knickers. He is younger than BIFF, earnest and loyal, a worried boy.

BERNARD. Biff, where are you? You're supposed to study with me today.

WILLY. Hey, looka Bernard. What're you lookin' so anemic about, Bernard?

BERNARD. He's gotta study, Uncle Willy. He's got Regents next week.

HAPPY (tauntingly, spinning BERNARD around). Let's box, Bernard!

BERNARD. Biff! (He gets away from HAPPY.) Listen, Biff, I heard Mr. Birnbaum say that if you don't start studyin' math he's gonna flunk you, and you won't graduate. I heard him!

WILLY. You better study with him, Biff. Go ahead now.

BERNARD. I heard him!

BIFF. Oh, Pop, you didn't see my sneakers! (He holds up a foot for WILLY to look at.)

WILLY. Hey, that's a beautiful job of printing!

BERNARD (wiping his glasses). Just because he printed University of Virginia on his sneakers doesn't mean they've got to graduate him, Uncle Willy!

WILLY (angrily). What're you talking about? With scholarships to three universities they're gonna flunk him?

BERNARD. But I heard Mr. Birnbaum say . . .

WILLY. Don't be a pest, Bernard! (To his boys.) What an anemic!

BERNARD. Okay, I'm waiting for you in my house, Biff.

BERNARD goes off. The LOMANS laugh.

WILLY. Bernard is not well liked, is he?

BIFF. He's liked, but he's not well liked.

HAPPY. That's right, Pop.

WILLY. That's just what I mean. Bernard can get the best marks in school, y'understand, but when he gets out in the business world, y'understand, you are going to be five times ahead of him. That's why I thank Almighty God you're both built like Adonises. Because the man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want. You take me, for instance. I never have to wait in line to see a buyer. “Willy Loman is here!” That’s all they have to know, and I go right through.

biff. Did you knock them dead, Pop?

willy. Knocked ’em cold in Providence, slaughtered ’em in Boston.

happy (on his back, pedaling again). I’m losing weight, you notice, Pop?

linda enters as of old, a ribbon in her hair, carrying a basket of washing.

linda (with youthful energy). Hello, dear!

willy. Sweetheart!

linda. How’d the Chevvy run?

willy. Chevrolet, Linda, is the greatest car ever built. (To the boys.) Since when do you let your mother carry wash up the stairs?

biff. Grab hold there, boy!

happy. Where to, Mom?

linda. Hang them up on the line. And you better go down to your friends, Biff. The cellar is full of boys. They don’t know what to do with themselves.

biff. Ah, when Pop comes home they can wait!

willy (laughs appreciatively). You better go down and tell them what to do, Biff.

biff. I think I’ll have them sweep out the furnace room.

willy. Good work, Biff.

biff (goes through wall-line of kitchen to doorway at back and calls down). Fellas! Everybody sweep out the furnace room! I’ll be right down!

voices. All right! Okay, Biff.

biff. George and Sam and Frank, come out back! We’re hangin’ up the wash! Come on, Hap, on the double! (He and happy carry out the basket.)

linda. The way they obey him!

willy. Well, that’s training, the training. I’m tellin’ you, I was sellin’ thousands and thousands, but I had to come home.

linda. Oh, the whole block’ll be at that game. Did you sell anything?

willy. I did five hundred gross in Providence and seven hundred gross in Boston.

linda. No! Wait a minute. I've got a pencil. (She pulls pencil and paper out of her apron pocket.) That makes your commission . . . Two hundred—my God! Two hundred and twelve dollars!

willy. Well, I didn't figure it yet, but . . .

linda. How much did you do?

willy. Well, I—I did—about a hundred and eighty gross in Providence. Well, no—it came to—roughly two hundred gross on the whole trip.

linda (without hesitation). Two hundred gross. That's . . . (She figures.)

willy. The trouble was that three of the stores were half-closed for inventory in Boston. Otherwise I woulda broke records.

linda. Well, it makes seventy dollars and some pennies. That's very good.

willy. What do we owe?

linda. Well, on the first there's sixteen dollars on the refrigerator . . .

willy. Why sixteen?

linda. Well, the fan belt broke, so it was a dollar eighty.

willy. But it's brand new.

linda. Well, the man said that's the way it is. Till they work themselves in, y'know.

They move through the wall-line into the kitchen.

willy. I hope we didn't get stuck on that machine.

linda. They got the biggest ads of any of them!

willy. I know, it's a fine machine. What else?

linda. Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.

willy. It don't leak, does it?

linda. No, they did a wonderful job. Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.

willy. I'm not going to pay that man! That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!

linda. Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth.

willy. A hundred and twenty dollars! My God, if business don't pick up I don't know what I'm gonna do!

linda. Well, next week you'll do better.

willy. Oh, I'll knock 'em dead next week. I'll go to Hartford. I'm very well liked in Hartford. You know, the trouble is, Linda, people don't seem to take to me.

They move onto the forestage.

linda. Oh, don't be foolish.

willy. I know it when I walk in. They seem to laugh at me.

linda. Why? Why would they laugh at you? Don't talk that way, Willy.

willy moves to the edge of the stage. linda goes into the kitchen and starts to darn stockings.

willy. I don't know the reason for it, but they just pass me by. I'm not noticed.

linda. But you're doing wonderful, dear. You're making seventy to a hundred dollars a week.

willy. But I gotta be at it ten, twelve hours a day. Other men—I don't know—they do it easier. I don't know why—I can't stop myself—I talk too much. A man oughta come in with a few words. One thing about Charley. He's a man of few words, and they respect him.

linda. You don't talk too much, you're just lively.

willy (smiling). Well, I figure, what the hell, life is short, a couple of jokes. (To himself:) I joke too much! (The smile goes.)

linda. Why? You're . . .

willy. I'm fat. I'm very—foolish to look at, Linda. I didn't tell you, but Christmas time I happened to be calling on F. H. Stewarts, and a salesman I know, as I was going in to see the buyer I heard him say something about—walrus. And I—I cracked him right across the face. I won't take that. I simply will not take that. But they do laugh at me. I know that.

linda. Darling . . .

willy. I gotta overcome it. I know I gotta overcome it. I'm not dressing to advantage, maybe.

linda. Willy, darling, you're the handsomest man in the world . . .

willy. Oh, no, Linda.

linda. To me you are. (Slight pause.) The handsomest.

From the darkness is heard the laughter of a woman. willy doesn't turn to it, but it continues through linda's lines.

linda. And the boys, Willy. Few men are idolized by their children the way you are.

Music is heard as behind a scrim, to the left of the house; the woman, dimly seen, is dressing.

willy (with great feeling). You're the best there is. Linda, you're a pal, you know that? On the road—on the road I want to grab you sometimes and just kiss the life outa you.

The laughter is loud now, and he moves into a brightening area at the left, where the woman has come from behind the scrim and is standing, putting on her hat, looking into a "mirror" and laughing.

willy. 'Cause I get so lonely—especially when business is bad and there's nobody to talk to. I get the feeling that I'll never sell anything again, that I won't make a living for you, or a business, a business for the boys. (He talks through the woman's subsiding laughter; the woman primps at the "mirror.") There's so much I want to make for . . .

the woman. Me? You didn't make me, Willy. I picked you.

willy (pleased). You picked me?

the woman (who is quite proper-looking, willy's age). I did. I've been sitting at that desk watching all the salesmen go by, day in, day out. But you've got such a sense of humor, and we do have such a good time together, don't we?

willy. Sure, sure. (He takes her in his arms.) Why do you have to go now?

the woman. It's two o'clock . . .

willy. No, come on in! (He pulls her.)

the woman. . . .my sisters'll be scandalized. When'll you be back?

willy. Oh, two weeks about. Will you come up again?

the woman. Sure thing. You do make me laugh. It's good for me. (She squeezes his arm, kisses him.) And I think you're a wonderful man.

willy. You picked me, heh?

the woman. Sure. Because you're so sweet. And such a kidder.

willy. Well, I'll see you next time I'm in Boston.

the woman. I'll put you right through to the buyers.

willy (slapping her bottom). Right. Well, bottoms up!

the woman (slaps him gently and laughs). You just kill me, Willy. (He suddenly grabs her and kisses her roughly.) You kill me. And thanks for the stockings. I love a lot of stockings. Well, good night.

willy. Good night. And keep your pores open!

the woman. Oh, Willy!

the woman bursts out laughing, and linda's laughter blends in. the woman disappears into the dark. Now the area at the kitchen table brightens. linda is sitting where she was at the kitchen table, but now is mending a pair of her silk stockings.

linda. You are, Willy. The handsomest man. You've got no reason to feel that . . .

willy (coming out of the woman's dimming area and going over to linda). I'll make it all up to you, Linda, I'll . . .

linda. There's nothing to make up, dear. You're doing fine, better than . . .

willy (noticing her mending). What's that?

linda. Just mending my stockings. They're so expensive . . .

willy (angrily, taking them from her). I won't have you mending stockings in this house! Now throw them out!

linda puts the stockings in her pocket.

bernard (entering on the run). Where is he? If he doesn't study!

willy (moving to the forestage, with great agitation). You'll give him the answers!

bernard. I do, but I can't on a Regents! That's a state exam! They're liable to arrest me!

willy. Where is he? I'll whip him, I'll whip him!

linda. And he'd better give back that football, Willy, it's not nice.

willy. Biff! Where is he? Why is he taking everything?

linda. He's too rough with the girls, Willy. All the mothers are afraid of him!

willy. I'll whip him!

bernard. He's driving the car without a license!

the woman's laugh is heard.

willy. Shut up!

linda. All the mothers . . .

willy. Shut up!

bernard (backing quietly away and out). Mr. Birnbaum says he's stuck up.

willy. Get outa here!

bernard. If he doesn't buckle down he'll flunk math! (He goes off.)

linda. He's right, Willy, you've gotta . . .

willy (exploding at her). There's nothing the matter with him! You want him to be a worm like Bernard? He's got spirit, personality . . .

As he speaks, linda, almost in tears, exits into the living room. willy is alone in the kitchen, wilting and staring. The leaves are gone. It is night again, and the apartment houses look down from behind.

willy. Loaded with it. Loaded! What is he stealing? He's giving it back, isn't he? Why is he stealing? What did I tell him? I never in my life told him anything but decent things.

happy in pajamas has come down the stairs; willy suddenly becomes aware of happy's presence.

happy. Let's go now, come on.

willy (sitting down at the kitchen table). Huh! Why did she have to wax the floors herself? Everytime she waxes the floors she keels over. She knows that!

happy. Shh! Take it easy. What brought you back tonight?

willy. I got an awful scare. Nearly hit a kid in Yonkers. God! Why didn't I go to Alaska with my brother Ben that time! Ben! That man was a genius, that man was success incarnate! What a mistake! He begged me to go.

happy. Well, there's no use in . . .

willy. You guys! There was a man started with the clothes on his back and ended up with diamond mines!

happy. Boy, someday I'd like to know how he did it.

willy. What's the mystery? The man knew what he wanted and went out and got it! Walked into a jungle, and comes out, the age of twenty-one, and he's rich! The world is an oyster, but you don't crack it open on a mattress!

happy. Pop, I told you I'm gonna retire you for life.

willy. You'll retire me for life on seventy goddam dollars a week? And your women and your car and your apartment, and you'll retire me for life! Christ's sake, I couldn't get past Yonkers today! Where are you guys, where are you? The woods are burning! I can't drive a car!

charley has appeared in the doorway. He is a large man, slow of speech, laconic, immovable. In all he says, despite what he says, there is pity, and, now, trepidation. He has a robe over pajamas, slippers on his feet. He enters the kitchen.

charley. Everything all right?

happy. Yeah, Charley, everything's . . .

willy. What's the matter?

charley. I heard some noise. I thought something happened. Can't we do something about the walls? You sneeze in here, and in my house hats blow off.

happy. Let's go to bed, Dad. Come on.

charley signals to happy to go.

willy. You go ahead, I'm not tired at the moment.

happy (to willy). Take it easy, huh? (He exits.)

willy. What're you doin' up?

charley (sitting down at the kitchen table opposite willy). Couldn't sleep good. I had a heartburn.

willy. Well, you don't know how to eat.

charley. I eat with my mouth.

willy. No, you're ignorant. You gotta know about vitamins and things like that.

charley. Come on, let's shoot. Tire you out a little.

willy (hesitantly). All right. You got cards?

charley (taking a deck from his pocket). Yeah, I got them. Someplace. What is it with those vitamins?

willy (dealing). They build up your bones. Chemistry.

charley. Yeah, but there's no bones in a heartburn.

willy. What are you talkin' about? Do you know the first thing about it?

charley. Don't get insulted.

willy. Don't talk about something you don't know anything about.

They are playing. Pause.

charley. What're you doin' home?

willy. A little trouble with the car.

charley. Oh. (Pause.) I'd like to take a trip to California.

willy. Don't say.

charley. You want a job?

willy. I got a job, I told you that. (After a slight pause.) What the hell are you offering me a job for?

charley. Don't get insulted.

willy. Don't insult me.

charley. I don't see no sense in it. You don't have to go on this way.

willy. I got a good job. (Slight pause.) What do you keep comin' in here for?

charley. You want me to go?

willy (after a pause, withering). I can't understand it. He's going back to Texas again. What the hell is that?

charley. Let him go.

willy. I got nothin' to give him, Charley, I'm clean, I'm clean.

charley. He won't starve. None a them starve. Forget about him.

willy. Then what have I got to remember?

charley. You take it too hard. To hell with it. When a deposit bottle is broken you don't get your nickel back.

willy. That's easy enough for you to say.

charley. That ain't easy for me to say.

willy. Did you see the ceiling I put up in the living room?

charley. Yeah, that's a piece of work. To put up a ceiling is a mystery to me. How do you do it?

willy. What's the difference?

charley. Well, talk about it.

willy. You gonna put up a ceiling?

charley. How could I put up a ceiling?

willy. Then what the hell are you bothering me for?

charley. You're insulted again.

willy. A man who can't handle tools is not a man. You're disgusting.

charley. Don't call me disgusting, Willy.

uncle ben, carrying a valise and an umbrella, enters the forestage from around the right corner of the house. He is a stolid man, in his sixties, with a mustache and an authoritative air. He is utterly certain of his destiny, and there is an aura of far places about him. He enters exactly as willy speaks.

willy. I'm getting awfully tired, Ben.

ben's music is heard. ben looks around at everything.

charley. Good, keep playing; you'll sleep better. Did you call me Ben?

ben looks at his watch.

willy. That's funny. For a second there you reminded me of my brother Ben.

ben. I only have a few minutes. (He strolls, inspecting the place. willy and charley continue playing.)

charley. You never heard from him again, heh? Since that time?

willy. Didn't Linda tell you? Couple of weeks ago we got a letter from his wife in Africa. He died.

charley. That so.

ben. (chuckling). So this is Brooklyn, eh?

charley. Maybe you're in for some of his money.

willy. Naa, he had seven sons. There's just one opportunity I had with that man . . .

ben. I must make a train, William. There are several properties I'm looking at in Alaska.

willy. Sure, sure! If I'd gone with him to Alaska that time, everything would've been totally different.

charley. Go on, you'd froze to death up there.

willy. What're you talking about?

ben. Opportunity is tremendous in Alaska, William. Surprised you're not up there.

willy. Sure, tremendous.

charley. Heh?

willy. There was the only man I ever met who knew the answers.

charley. Who?

ben. How are you all?

willy (taking a pot, smiling). Fine, fine.

charley. Pretty sharp tonight.

ben. Is Mother living with you?

willy. No, she died a long time ago.

charley. Who?

ben. That's too bad. Fine specimen of a lady, Mother.

willy (to charley). Heh?

ben. I'd hoped to see the old girl.

charley. Who died?

ben. Heard anything from Father, have you?

willy (unnerved). What do you mean, who died?

charley (taking a pot). What're you talkin' about?

ben (looking at his watch). William, it's half-past eight!

willy (as though to dispel his confusion he angrily stops charley's hand).

That's my build!

charley. I put the ace . . .

willy. If you don't know how to play the game I'm not gonna throw my money away on you!

charley (rising). It was my ace, for God's sake!

willy. I'm through, I'm through!

ben. When did Mother die?

willy. Long ago. Since the beginning you never knew how to play cards.

charley (picks up the cards and goes to the door). All right! Next time I'll bring a deck with five aces.

willy. I don't play that kind of game!

charley (turning to him). You ought to be ashamed of yourself!

willy. Yeah?

charley. Yeah! (He goes out.)

willy (slamming the door after him). Ignoramus!

ben (as willy comes toward him through the wall-line of the kitchen). So you're William.

willy (shaking ben's hand). Ben! I've been waiting for you so long! What's the answer? How did you do it?

ben. Oh, there's a story in that.

linda enters the forestage, as of old, carrying the wash basket.

linda. Is this Ben?

ben (gallantly). How do you do, my dear.

linda. Where've you been all these years? Willy's always wondered why you . . .

willy (pulling ben away from her impatiently). Where is Dad? Didn't you follow him? How did you get started?

ben. Well, I don't know how much you remember.

willy. Well, I was just a baby, of course, only three or four years old . . .

ben. Three years and eleven months.

willy. What a memory, Ben!

ben. I have many enterprises, William, and I have never kept books.

willy. I remember I was sitting under the wagon in—was it Nebraska?

ben. It was South Dakota, and I gave you a bunch of wild flowers.

willy. I remember you walking away down some open road.

ben (laughing). I was going to find Father in Alaska.

willy. Where is he?

ben. At that age I had a very faulty view of geography, William. I discovered after a few days that I was heading due south, so instead of Alaska, I ended up in Africa.

linda. Africa!

willy. The Gold Coast!

ben. Principally diamond mines.

linda. Diamond mines!

ben. Yes, my dear. But I've only a few minutes . . .

willy. No! Boys! Boys! (Young biff and happy appear.) Listen to this. This is your Uncle Ben, a great man! Tell my boys, Ben!

ben. Why, boys, when I was seventeen I walked into the jungle, and when I was twenty-one I walked out. (He laughs.) And by God I was rich.

willy (to the boys). You see what I been talking about? The greatest things can happen!

ben (glancing at his watch). I have an appointment in Ketchikan Tuesday week.

willy. No, Ben! Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from. All I remember is a man with a big beard, and I was in Mamma's lap, sitting around a fire, and some kind of high music.

ben. His flute. He played the flute.

willy. Sure, the flute, that's right!

New music is heard, a high, rollicking tune.

ben. Father was a very great and a very wild-hearted man. We would start in Boston, and he'd toss the whole family into the wagon, and then he'd drive the team right across the country; through Ohio, and Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and all the Western states. And we'd stop in the towns and sell the flutes that he'd made on the way. Great inventor, Father. With one gadget he made more in a week than a man like you could make in a lifetime.

willy. That's just the way I'm bringing them up, Ben—rugged, well liked, all-around.

ben. Yeah? (To biff.) Hit that, boy—hard as you can. (He pounds his stomach.)

biff. Oh, no, sir!

ben (taking boxing stance). Come on, get to me! (He laughs.)

willy. Go to it. Biff! Go ahead, show him!

biff. Okay! (He cocks his fists and starts in.)

linda (to willy). Why must he fight, dear?

ben (sparring with biff). Good boy! Good boy!

willy. How's that, Ben, heh?

linda. Why are you fighting?

ben. Good boy! (Suddenly comes in, trips biff, and stands over him, the point of his umbrella poised over biff's eye.)

linda. Look out, Biff!

biff. Gee!

ben (patting biff's knee). Never fight fair with a stranger, boy. You'll never get out of the jungle that way. (Taking linda's hand and bowing.) It was an honor and a pleasure to meet you, Linda.

linda (withdrawing her hand coldly, frightened). Have a nice—trip.

ben (to willy). And good luck with your—what do you do?

willy. Selling.

ben. Yes. Well . . . (He raises his hand in farewell to all.)

willy. No, Ben, I don't want you to think . . . (He takes ben's arm to show him.) It's Brooklyn, I know, but we hunt too.

ben. Really, now.

willy. Oh, sure, there's snakes and rabbits and—that's why I moved out here. Why, Biff can fell any one of these trees in no time! Boys! Go right over to where they're building the apartment house and get some sand. We're gonna rebuild the entire front stoop right now! Watch this, Ben!

biff. Yes, sir! On the double, Hap!

happy (as he and biff run off). I lost weight, Pop, you notice?

charley enters in knickers, even before the boys are gone.

charley. Listen, if they steal any more from that building the watchman'll put the cops on them!

linda (to willy). Don't let Biff . . .

ben laughs lustily.

willy. You shoulda seen the lumber they brought home last week. At least a dozen six-by-tens worth all kinds a money.

charley. Listen, if that watchman . . .

willy. I gave them hell, understand. But I got a couple of fearless characters there.

charley. Willy, the jails are full of fearless characters.

ben (clapping willy on the back, with a laugh at charley). And the stock exchange, friend!

willy (joining in ben's laughter). Where are the rest of your pants?

charley. My wife bought them.

willy. Now all you need is a golf club and you can go upstairs and go to sleep. (To ben.) Great athlete! Between him and his son Bernard they can't hammer a nail!

bernard (rushing in). The watchman's chasing Biff!

willy (angrily). Shut up! He's not stealing anything!

linda (alarmed, hurrying off left). Where is he? Biff, dear! (She exits.)

willy (moving toward the left, away from ben). There's nothing wrong. What's the matter with you?

ben. Nervy boy. Good!

willy (laughing). Oh, nerves of iron, that Biff!

charley. Don't know what it is. My New England man comes back and he's bleedin', they murdered him up there.

willy. It's contacts, Charley, I got important contacts!

charley (sarcastically). Glad to hear it, Willy. Come in later, we'll shoot a little casino. I'll take some of your Portland money. (He laughs at willy and exits.)

willy (turning to ben). Business is bad, it's murderous. But not for me, of course.

ben. I'll stop by on my way back to Africa.

willy (longingly). Can't you stay a few days? You're just what I need, Ben, because I—I have a fine position here, but I—well, Dad left when I was such a baby and I never had a chance to talk to him and I still feel—kind of temporary about myself.

ben. I'll be late for my train.

They are at opposite ends of the stage.

willy. Ben, my boys—can't we talk? They'd go into the jaws of hell for me, see, but I . . .

ben. William, you're being first-rate with your boys. Outstanding, manly chaps!

willy (hanging on to his words). Oh, Ben, that's good to hear! Because sometimes I'm afraid that I'm not teaching them the right kind of—Ben, how should I teach them?

ben (giving great weight to each word, and with a certain vicious audacity). William, when I walked into the jungle, I was seventeen. When I walked out I was twenty-one. And, by God, I was rich! (He goes off into darkness around the right corner of the house.)

willy. . . .was rich! That's just the spirit I want to imbue them with! To walk into a jungle! I was right! I was right! I was right!

ben is gone, but willy is still speaking to him as linda, in nightgown and robe, enters the kitchen, glances around for willy, then goes to the door of the house, looks out and sees him. Comes down to his left. He looks at her.

linda. Willy, dear? Willy?

willy. I was right!

linda. Did you have some cheese? (He can't answer.) It's very late, darling. Come to bed, heh?

willy (looking straight up). Gotta break your neck to see a star in this yard.

linda. You coming in?

willy. Whatever happened to that diamond watch fob? Remember? When Ben came from Africa that time? Didn't he give me a watch fob with a diamond in it?

linda. You pawned it, dear. Twelve, thirteen years ago. For Biff's radio correspondence course.

willy. Gee, that was a beautiful thing. I'll take a walk.

linda. But you're in your slippers.

willy (starting to go around the house at the left). I was right! I was! (Half to linda, as he goes, shaking his head.) What a man! There was a man worth talking to. I was right!

linda (calling after willy). But in your slippers, Willy!

willy is almost gone when biff, in his pajamas, comes down the stairs and enters the kitchen.

biff. What is he doing out there?

linda. Sh!

biff. God Almighty, Mom, how long has he been doing this?

linda. Don't, he'll hear you.

biff. What the hell is the matter with him?

linda. It'll pass by morning.

biff. Shouldn't we do anything?

linda. Oh, my dear, you should do a lot of things, but there's nothing to do, so go to sleep.

happy comes down the stairs and sits on the steps.

happy. I never heard him so loud, Mom.

linda. Well, come around more often; you'll hear him. (She sits down at the table and mends the lining of willy's jacket.)

biff. Why didn't you ever write me about this, Mom?

linda. How would I write to you? For over three months you had no address.

biff. I was on the move. But you know I thought of you all the time. You know that, don't you, pal?

linda. I know, dear, I know. But he likes to have a letter. Just to know that there's still a possibility for better things.

biff. He's not like this all the time, is he?

linda. It's when you come home he's always the worst.

biff. When I come home?

linda. When you write you're coming, he's all smiles, and talks about the future, and—he's just wonderful. And then the closer you seem to come, the more shaky he gets, and then, by the time you get here, he's arguing, and he seems angry at you. I think it's just that maybe he can't bring himself to—to open up to you. Why are you so hateful to each other? Why is that?

biff (evasively). I'm not hateful, Mom.

linda. But you no sooner come in the door than you're fighting!

biff. I don't know why. I mean to change. I'm tryin', Mom, you understand?

linda. Are you home to stay now?

biff. I don't know. I want to look around, see what's doin'.

linda. Biff, you can't look around all your life, can you?

biff. I just can't take hold, Mom. I can't take hold of some kind of a life.

linda. Biff, a man is not a bird, to come and go with the spring time.

biff. Your hair . . . (He touches her hair.) Your hair got so gray.

linda. Oh, it's been gray since you were in high school. I just stopped dyeing it, that's all.

biff. Dye it again, will ya? I don't want my pal looking old. (He smiles.)

linda. You're such a boy! You think you can go away for a year and . . . You've got to get it into your head now that one day you'll knock on this door and there'll be strange people here . . .

biff. What are you talking about? You're not even sixty, Mom.

linda. But what about your father?

biff (lamely). Well, I meant him too.

happy. He admires Pop.

linda. Biff, dear, if you don't have any feeling for him, then you can't have any feeling for me.

biff. Sure I can, Mom.

linda. No. You can't just come to see me, because I love him. (With a threat, but only a threat, of tears.) He's the dearest man in the world to me, and I won't have anyone making him feel unwanted and low and blue. You've got to make up your mind now, darling, there's no leeway any more. Either he's your father and you pay him that respect, or else you're not to come here. I know he's not easy to get along with—nobody knows that better than me—but . . .

biff (starting to go out after willy). What the hell is the matter with him? (happy stops him.)

linda. Don't—don't go near him!

biff. Stop making excuses for him! He always, always wiped the floor with you. Never had an ounce of respect for you.

happy. He's always had respect for . . .

biff. What the hell do you know about it?

happy (surlily). Just don't call him crazy!

biff. He's got no character—Charley wouldn't do this. Not in his own house—spewing out that vomit from his mind.

happy. Charley never had to cope with what he's got to.

biff. People are worse off than Willy Loman. Believe me, I've seen them!

linda. Then make Charley your father, Biff. You can't do that, can you? I don't say he's a great man.

Willy Loman never made a lot of money. His name was never in the paper. He's not the finest character that ever lived. But he's a human being, and a terrible thing is happening to him. So attention must be paid. He's not to be allowed to fall into his grave like an old dog. Attention, attention must be finally paid to such a person. You called him crazy . . .

biff. I didn't mean . . .

linda. No, a lot of people think he's lost his—balance. But you don't have to be very smart to know what his trouble is. The man is exhausted.

happy. Sure!

linda. A small man can be just as exhausted as a great man. He works for a company thirty-six years this March, opens up unheard-of territories to their trademark, and now in his old age they take his salary away.

happy (indignantly). I didn't know that, Mom.

linda. You never asked, my dear! Now that you get your spending money someplace else you don't trouble your mind with him.

happy. But I gave you money last . . .

linda. Christmas time, fifty dollars! To fix the hot water it cost ninety-seven fifty! For five weeks he's been on straight commission, like a beginner, an unknown!

biff. Those ungrateful bastards!

linda. Are they any worse than his sons? When he brought them business, when he was young, they were glad to see him. But now his old friends, the old buyers that loved him so and always found some order to hand him in a pinch—they're all dead, retired. He used to be able to make six, seven calls a day in Boston. Now he takes his valises out of the car and puts them back and takes them out again and he's exhausted. Instead of walking he talks now. He drives seven hundred miles, and when he gets there no one knows him any more, no one welcomes him. And what goes through a man's mind, driving seven hundred miles home without having earned a cent? Why shouldn't he talk to himself? Why? When he has to go to Charley and borrow fifty dollars a week and pretend to me that it's his pay? How long can that go on? How long? You see what I'm sitting here and waiting for? And you tell me he has no character? The man who never worked a day but for your benefit? When does he get the medal for that? Is this his reward—to turn around at the age of sixty-three and find his sons, who he loved better than his life, one a philandering bum . . .

happy. Mom!

linda. That's all you are, my baby! (To biff.) And you! What happened to the love you had for him? You were such pals! How you used to talk to him on the phone every night! How lonely he was till he could come home to you!

biff. All right, Mom. I'll live here in my room, and I'll get a job. I'll keep away from him, that's all.

linda. No, Biff. You can't stay here and fight all the time.

biff. He threw me out of this house, remember that.

linda. Why did he do that? I never knew why.

biff. Because I know he's a fake and he doesn't like anybody around who knows!

linda. Why a fake? In what way? What do you mean?

biff. Just don't lay it all at my feet. It's between me and him—that's all I have to say. I'll chip in from now on. He'll settle for half my paycheck. He'll be all right. I'm going to bed. (He starts for the stairs.)

linda. He won't be all right.

biff (turning on the stairs, furiously). I hate this city and I'll stay here. Now what do you want?

linda. He's dying, Biff.

happy turns quickly to her, shocked.

biff (after a pause). Why is he dying?

linda. He's been trying to kill himself.

biff (with great horror). How?

linda. I live from day to day.

biff. What're you talking about?

linda. Remember I wrote you that he smashed up the car again? In February?

biff. Well?

linda. The insurance inspector came. He said that they have evidence. That all these accidents in the last year—weren't—weren't—accidents.

happy. How can they tell that? That's a lie.

linda. It seems there's a woman . . . (She takes a breath as:)

biff (sharply but contained). What woman?

linda (simultaneously). . . .and this woman . . .

linda. What?

biff. Nothing. Go ahead.

linda. What did you say?

biff. Nothing. I just said what woman?

happy. What about her?

linda. Well, it seems she was walking down the road and saw his car. She says that he wasn't driving fast at all, and that he didn't skid. She says he came to that little bridge, and then deliberately smashed into the railing, and it was only the shallowness of the water that saved him.

biff. Oh, no, he probably just fell asleep again.

linda. I don't think he fell asleep.

biff. Why not?

linda. Last month . . . (With great difficulty.) Oh, boys, it's so hard to say a thing like this! He's just a big stupid man to you, but I tell you there's more good in him than in many other people. (She chokes, wipes her eyes.) I was looking for a fuse. The lights blew out, and I went down the cellar. And behind the fuse box—it happened to fall out—was a length of rubber pipe—just short.

happy. No kidding!

linda. There's a little attachment on the end of it. I knew right away. And sure enough, on the bottom of the water heater there's a new little nipple on the gas pipe.

happy (angrily). That—jerk.

biff. Did you have it taken off?

linda. I'm—I'm ashamed to. How can I mention it to him? Every day I go down and take away that little rubber pipe. But, when he comes home, I put it back where it was. How can I insult him that way? I don't know what to do. I live from day to day, boys. I tell you, I know every thought in his mind. It sounds so old-fashioned and silly, but I tell you he put his whole life into you and you've turned your backs on him. (She is bent over in the chair, weeping, her face in her hands.) Biff, I swear to God! Biff, his life is in your hands!

happy (to biff). How do you like that damned fool!

biff (kissing her). All right, pal, all right. It's all settled now. I've been remiss. I know that, Mom. But now I'll stay, and I swear to you, I'll apply myself. (Kneeling in front of her, in a fever of self-reproach.) It's just—you see, Mom, I don't fit in business. Not that I won't try. I'll try, and I'll make good.

happy. Sure you will. The trouble with you in business was you never tried to please people.

biff. I know, I . . .

happy. Like when you worked for Harrison's. Bob Harrison said you were tops, and then you go and do some damn fool thing like whistling whole songs in the elevator like a comedian.

biff (against happy). So what? I like to whistle sometimes.

happy. You don't raise a guy to a responsible job who whistles in the elevator!

linda. Well, don't argue about it now.

happy. Like when you'd go off and swim in the middle of the day instead of taking the line around.

biff (his resentment rising). Well, don't you run off? You take off sometimes, don't you? On a nice summer day?

happy. Yeah, but I cover myself!

linda. Boys!

happy. If I'm going to take a fade the boss can call any number where I'm supposed to be and they'll swear to him that I just left. I'll tell you something that I hate to say, Biff, but in the business world some of them think you're crazy.

biff (angered). Screw the business world!

happy. All right, screw it! Great, but cover yourself!

linda. Hap, Hap!

biff. I don't care what they think! They've laughed at Dad for years, and you know why? Because we don't belong in this nuthouse of a city! We should be mixing cement on some open plain or—or carpenters. A carpenter is allowed to whistle!

willy. Even your grandfather was better than a carpenter. (Pause. They watch him.) You never grew up. Bernard does not whistle in the elevator, I assure you.

biff (as though to laugh willy out of it). Yeah, but you do, Pop.

willy. I never in my life whistled in an elevator! And who in the business world thinks I'm crazy?

biff. I didn't mean it like that, Pop. Now don't make a whole thing out of it, will ya?

willy. Go back to the West! Be a carpenter, a cowboy, enjoy yourself!

linda. Willy, he was just saying . . .

willy. I heard what he said!

happy (trying to quiet willy). Hey, Pop, come on now . . .

willy (continuing over happy's line). They laugh at me, heh? Go to Filene's, go to the Hub, go to Slattery's, Boston. Call out the name Willy Loman and see what happens! Big shot!

biff. All right, Pop.

willy. Big!

biff. All right!

willy. Why do you always insult me?

biff. I didn't say a word. (To linda.) Did I say a word?

linda. He didn't say anything, Willy.

willy (going to the doorway of the living room). All right, good night, good night.

linda. Willy, dear, he just decided . . .

willy (to biff). If you get tired hanging around tomorrow, paint the ceiling I put up in the living room.

biff. I'm leaving early tomorrow.

happy. He's going to see Bill Oliver, Pop.

willy (interestedly). Oliver? For what?

biff (with reserve, but trying; trying). He always said he'd stake me. I'd like to go into business, so maybe I can take him up on it.

linda. Isn't that wonderful?

willy. Don't interrupt. What's wonderful about it? There's fifty men in the City of New York who'd stake him. (To biff.) Sporting goods?

biff. I guess so. I know something about it and . . .

willy. He knows something about it! You know sporting goods better than Spalding, for God's sake! How much is he giving you?

biff. I don't know, I didn't even see him yet, but . . .

willy. Then what're you talkin' about?

biff (getting angry). Well, all I said was I'm gonna see him, that's all!

willy (turning away). Ah, you're counting your chickens again.

biff (starting left for the stairs). Oh, Jesus, I'm going to sleep!

willy (calling after him). Don't curse in this house!

biff (turning). Since when did you get so clean?

happy (trying to stop them). Wait a . . .

willy. Don't use that language to me! I won't have it!

happy (grabbing biff, shouts). Wait a minute! I got an idea. I got a feasible idea. Come here, Biff, let's talk this over now, let's talk some sense here. When I was down in Florida last time, I thought of a great idea to sell sporting goods. It just came back to me. You and I, Biff—we have a line, the Loman Line. We train a couple of weeks, and put on a couple of exhibitions, see?

willy. That's an idea!

happy. Wait! We form two basketball teams, see? Two water-polo teams. We play each other. It's a million dollars' worth of publicity. Two brothers, see? The Loman Brothers. Displays in the Royal Palms—all the hotels. And banners over the ring and the basketball court: "Loman Brothers." Baby, we could sell sporting goods!

willy. That is a one-million-dollar idea!

linda. Marvelous!

biff. I'm in great shape as far as that's concerned.

happy. And the beauty of it is, Biff, it wouldn't be like a business. We'd be out playin' ball again.

biff (enthused). Yeah, that's . . .

willy. Million-dollar . . .

happy. And you wouldn't get fed up with it, Biff. It'd be the family again. There'd be the old honor, and comradeship, and if you wanted to go off for a swim or somethin'—well, you'd do it! Without some smart cooky gettin' up ahead of you!

willy. Lick the world! You guys together could absolutely lick the civilized world.

biff. I'll see Oliver tomorrow. Hap, if we could work that out . . .

linda. Maybe things are beginning to . . .

willy (wildly enthused, to linda). Stop interrupting! (To biff.) But don't wear sport jacket and slacks when you see Oliver.

biff. No, I'll . . .

willy. A business suit, and talk as little as possible, and don't crack any jokes.

biff. He did like me. Always liked me.

linda. He loved you!

willy (to linda). Will you stop! (To biff.) Walk in very serious. You are not applying for a boy's job. Money is to pass. Be quiet, fine, and serious. Everybody likes a kidder, but nobody lends him money.

happy. I'll try to get some myself, Biff. I'm sure I can.

willy. I see great things for you kids, I think your troubles are over. But remember, start big and you'll end big. Ask for fifteen. How much you gonna ask for?

biff. Gee, I don't know . . .

willy. And don't say "Gee." "Gee" is a boy's word. A man walking in for fifteen thousand dollars does not say "Gee!"

biff. Ten, I think, would be top though.

willy. Don't be so modest. You always started too low. Walk in with a big laugh. Don't look worried. Start off with a couple of your good stories to lighten things up. It's not what you say, it's how you say it—because personality always wins the day.

linda. Oliver always thought the highest of him . . .

willy. Will you let me talk?

biff. Don't yell at her, Pop, will ya?

willy (angrily). I was talking, wasn't I?

biff. I don't like you yelling at her all the time, and I'm tellin' you, that's all.

willy. What're you, takin' over this house?

linda. Willy . . .

willy (turning to her). Don't take his side all the time, goddammit!

biff (furiously). Stop yelling at her!

willy (suddenly pulling on his cheek, beaten down, guilt ridden). Give my best to Bill Oliver—he may remember me. (He exits through the living room doorway.)

linda (her voice subdued). What'd you have to start that for? (biff turns away.) You see how sweet he was as soon as you talked hopefully? (She goes over to biff.) Come up and say good night to him. Don't let him go to bed that way.

happy. Come on, Biff, let's buck him up.

linda. Please, dear. Just say good night. It takes so little to make him happy. Come. (She goes through the living room doorway, calling upstairs from within the living room.) Your pajamas are hanging in the bathroom, Willy!

happy (looking toward where linda went out). What a woman! They broke the mold when they made her. You know that, Biff.

biff. He's off salary. My God, working on commission!

happy. Well, let's face it: he's no hot-shot selling man. Except that sometimes, you have to admit, he's a sweet personality.

biff (deciding). Lend me ten bucks, will ya? I want to buy some new ties.

happy. I'll take you to a place I know. Beautiful stuff. Wear one of my striped shirts tomorrow.

biff. She got gray. Mom got awful old. Gee, I'm gonna go in to Oliver tomorrow and knock him for a . . .

happy. Come on up. Tell that to Dad. Let's give him a whirl. Come on.

biff (steamed up). You know, with ten thousand bucks, boy!

happy (as they go into the living room). That's the talk, Biff, that's the first time I've heard the old confidence out of you! (From within the living room, fading off) You're gonna live with me, kid, and any babe you want just say the word . . . (The last lines are hardly heard. They are mounting the stairs to their parents' bedroom.)

linda (entering her bedroom and addressing willy, who is in the bathroom. She is straightening the bed for him). Can you do anything about the shower? It drips.

willy (from the bathroom). All of a sudden everything falls to pieces. Goddam plumbing, oughta be sued, those people. I hardly finished putting it in and the thing . . . (His words rumble off.)

linda. I'm just wondering if Oliver will remember him. You think he might?

willy (coming out of the bathroom in his pajamas). Remember him? What's the matter with you, you crazy? If he'd've stayed with Oliver he'd be on top by now! Wait'll Oliver gets a look at him. You don't know the average caliber any more. The average young man today—(he is getting into bed)—is got a caliber of zero. Greatest thing in the world for him was to bum around.

biff and happy enter the bedroom. Slight pause.

willy (stops short, looking at biff). Glad to hear it, boy.

happy. He wanted to say good night to you, sport.

willy (to biff). Yeah. Knock him dead, boy. What'd you want to tell me?

biff. Just take it easy, Pop. Good night. (He turns to go.)

willy (unable to resist). And if anything falls off the desk while you're talking to him—like a package or something—don't you pick it up. They have office boys for that.

linda. I'll make a big breakfast . . .

willy. Will you let me finish? (To biff.) Tell him you were in the business in the West. Not farm work.

biff. All right, Dad.

linda. I think everything . . .

willy (going right through her speech). And don't undersell yourself. No less than fifteen thousand dollars.

biff (unable to bear him). Okay. Good night, Mom. (He starts moving.)

willy. Because you got a greatness in you, Biff, remember that. You got all kinds of greatness . . . (He lies back, exhausted. biff walks out.)

linda (calling after biff). Sleep well, darling!

happy. I'm gonna get married, Mom. I wanted to tell you.

linda. Go to sleep, dear.

happy (going). I just wanted to tell you.

willy. Keep up the good work. (happy exits.) God . . . remember that Ebbets Field game? The championship of the city?

linda. Just rest. Should I sing to you?

willy. Yeah. Sing to me. (linda hums a soft lullaby.) When that team came out—he was the tallest, remember?

linda. Oh, yes. And in gold.

biff enters the darkened kitchen, takes a cigarette, and leaves the house. He comes downstage into a golden pool of light. He smokes, staring at the night.

willy. Like a young god. Hercules—something like that. And the sun, the sun all around him. Remember how he waved to me? Right up from the field, with the representatives of three colleges standing by? And the buyers I brought, and the cheers when he came out—Loman, Loman, Loman! God Almighty, he'll be great yet. A star like that, magnificent, can never really fade away!

The light on willy is fading. The gas heater begins to glow through the kitchen wall, near the stairs, a blue flame beneath red coils.

linda (timidly). Willy dear, what has he got against you?

willy. I'm so tired. Don't talk any more.

biff slowly returns to the kitchen. He stops, stares toward the heater.

linda. Will you ask Howard to let you work in New York?

willy. First thing in the morning. Everything'll be all right.

biff reaches behind the heater and draws out a length of rubber tubing. He is horrified and turns his head toward willy's room, still dimly lit, from which the strains of linda's desperate but monotonous humming rise.

willy (staring through the window into the moonlight). Gee, look at the moon moving between the buildings!

biff wraps the tubing around his hand and quickly goes up the stairs.

Act 2

SCENE: Music is heard, gay and bright. The curtain rises as the music fades away. willy, in shirt sleeves, is sitting at the kitchen table, sipping coffee, his hat in his lap. linda is filling his cup when she can.

willy. Wonderful coffee. Meal in itself.

linda. Can I make you some eggs?

willy. No. Take a breath.

linda. You look so rested, dear.

willy. I slept like a dead one. First time in months. Imagine, sleeping till ten on a Tuesday morning. Boys left nice and early, heh?

linda. They were out of here by eight o'clock.

willy. Good work!

linda. It was so thrilling to see them leaving together. I can't get over the shaving lotion in this house!

willy (smiling). Mmm . . .

linda. Biff was very changed this morning. His whole attitude seemed to be hopeful. He couldn't wait to get downtown to see Oliver.

willy. He's heading for a change. There's no question, there simply are certain men that take longer to get—solidified. How did he dress?

linda. His blue suit. He's so handsome in that suit. He could be a—anything in that suit!

willy gets up from the table. linda holds his jacket for him.

willy. There's no question, no question at all. Gee, on the way home tonight I'd like to buy some seeds.

linda (laughing). That'd be wonderful. But not enough sun gets back there. Nothing'll grow any more.

willy. You wait, kid, before it's all over we're gonna get a little place out in the country, and I'll raise some vegetables, a couple of chickens . . .

linda. You'll do it yet, dear.

willy walks out of his jacket. linda follows him.

willy. And they'll get married, and come for a weekend. I'd build a little guest house. 'Cause I got so many fine tools, all I'd need would be a little lumber and some peace of mind.

linda (joyfully). I sewed the lining . . .

willy. I could build two guest houses, so they'd both come. Did he decide how much he's going to ask Oliver for?

linda (getting him into the jacket). He didn't mention it, but I imagine ten or fifteen thousand. You going to talk to Howard today?

willy. Yeah. I'll put it to him straight and simple. He'll just have to take me off the road.

linda. And Willy, don't forget to ask for a little advance, because we've got the insurance premium. It's the grace period now.

willy. That's a hundred . . .?

linda. A hundred and eight, sixty-eight. Because we're a little short again.

willy. Why are we short?

linda. Well, you had the motor job on the car . . .

willy. That goddam Studebaker!

linda. And you got one more payment on the refrigerator . . .

willy. But it just broke again!

linda. Well, it's old, dear.

willy. I told you we should've bought a well-advertised machine. Charley bought a General Electric and it's twenty years old and it's still good, that son-of-a-bitch.

linda. But, Willy . . .

willy. Whoever heard of a Hastings refrigerator? Once in my life I would like to own something outright before it's broken! I'm always in a race with the junkyard! I just finished paying for the car and it's on its last legs. The refrigerator consumes belts like a goddam maniac. They time those things. They time them so when you finally paid for them, they're used up.

linda (buttoning up his jacket as he unbuttons it). All told, about two hundred dollars would carry us, dear. But that includes the last payment on the mortgage. After this payment, Willy, the house belongs to us.

willy. It's twenty-five years!

linda. Biff was nine years old when we bought it.

willy. Well, that's a great thing. To weather a twenty-five year mortgage is . . .

linda. It's an accomplishment.

willy. All the cement, the lumber, the reconstruction I put in this house! There ain't a crack to be found in it any more.

linda. Well, it served its purpose.

willy. What purpose? Some stranger'll come along, move in, and that's that. If only Biff would take this house, and raise a family . . . (He starts to go.) Good-by, I'm late.

linda (suddenly remembering). Oh, I forgot! You're supposed to meet them for dinner.

willy. Me?

linda. At Frank's Chop House on Forty-eighth near Sixth Avenue.

willy. Is that so! How about you?

linda. No, just the three of you. They're gonna blow you to a big meal!

willy. Don't say! Who thought of that?

linda. Biff came to me this morning, Willy, and he said, "Tell Dad, we want to blow him to a big meal." Be there six o'clock. You and your two boys are going to have dinner.

willy. Gee whiz! That's really somethin'. I'm gonna knock Howard for a loop, kid. I'll get an advance, and I'll come home with a New York job. Goddammit, now I'm gonna do it!

linda. Oh, that's the spirit, Willy!

willy. I will never get behind a wheel the rest of my life!

linda. It's changing, Willy, I can feel it changing!

willy. Beyond a question. G'by, I'm late. (He starts to go again.)

linda (calling after him as she runs to the kitchen table for a handkerchief). You got your glasses?

willy (feels for them, then comes back in). Yeah, yeah, got my glasses.

linda (giving him the handkerchief). And a handkerchief.

willy. Yeah, handkerchief.

linda. And your saccharine?

willy. Yeah, my saccharine.

linda. Be careful on the subway stairs.

She kisses him, and a silk stocking is seen hanging from her hand. willy notices it.

willy. Will you stop mending stockings? At least while I'm in the house. It gets me nervous. I can't tell you. Please.

linda hides the stocking in her hand as she follows willy across the forestage in front of the house.

linda. Remember, Frank's Chop House.

willy (passing the apron). Maybe beets would grow out there.

linda (laughing). But you tried so many times.

willy. Yeah. Well, don't work hard today. (He disappears around the right corner of the house.)

linda. Be careful!

As willy vanishes, linda waves to him. Suddenly the phone rings. She runs across the stage and into the kitchen and lifts it.

linda. Hello? Oh, Biff! I'm so glad you called, I just . . . Yes, sure, I just told him. Yes, he'll be there for dinner at six o'clock, I didn't forget. Listen, I was just dying to tell you. You know that little rubber pipe I told you about? That he connected to the gas heater? I finally decided to go down the cellar this morning and take it away and destroy it. But it's gone! Imagine? He took it away himself, it isn't there! (She listens.) When? Oh, then you took it. Oh—nothing, it's just that I'd hoped he'd taken it away himself. Oh, I'm not worried, darling, because this morning he left in such high spirits, it was like the old days! I'm not afraid any more. Did Mr. Oliver see you?. . . Well, you wait there then. And make a nice impression on him, darling. Just don't perspire too much before you see him. And have a nice time with Dad. He may have big news too!. . . That's right, a New York job. And be sweet to him tonight, dear. Be loving to him. Because he's only a little boat looking for a harbor. (She is trembling with sorrow and joy.) Oh, that's wonderful, Biff, you'll save his life. Thanks, darling. Just put your arm around him when he comes into the restaurant. Give him a smile. That's the boy . . . Good-by, dear. . . . You got your comb?. . . That's fine. Good-by, Biff dear.

In the middle of her speech, howard wagner, thirty-six, wheels in a small typewriter table on which is a wire-recording machine and proceeds to plug it in. This is on the left forestage. Light slowly fades on linda as it rises on howard. howard is intent on threading the machine and only glances over his shoulder as willy appears.

willy. Pst! Pst!

howard. Hello, Willy, come in.

willy. Like to have a little talk with you, Howard.

howard. Sorry to keep you waiting. I'll be with you in a minute.

willy. What's that, Howard?

howard. Didn't you ever see one of these? Wire recorder.

willy. Oh. Can we talk a minute?

howard. Records things. Just got delivery yesterday. Been driving me crazy, the most terrific machine I ever saw in my life. I was up all night with it.

willy. What do you do with it?

howard. I bought it for dictation, but you can do anything with it. Listen to this. I had it home last night. Listen to what I picked up. The first one is my daughter. Get this. (He flicks the switch and "Roll out the Barrel" is heard being whistled.) Listen to that kid whistle.

willy. That is lifelike, isn't it?

howard. Seven years old. Get that tone.

willy. Ts, ts. Like to ask a little favor if you . . .

The whistling breaks off, and the voice of howard's daughter is heard.

his daughter. "Now you, Daddy."

howard. She's crazy for me! (Again the same song is whistled.) That's me! Ha! (He winks.)

willy. You're very good!

The whistling breaks off again. The machine runs silent for a moment.

howard. Sh! Get this now, this is my son.

his son. "The capital of Alabama is Montgomery; the capital of Arizona is Phoenix; the capital of Arkansas is Little Rock; the capital of California is Sacramento . . ." (and on, and on.)

howard (holding up five fingers). Five years old, Willy!

willy. He'll make an announcer some day!

his son (continuing). "the capital . . ."

howard. Get that—alphabetical order! (The machine breaks off suddenly.) Wait a minute. The maid kicked the plug out.

willy. It certainly is a . . .

howard. Sh, for God's sake!

his son. "It's nine o'clock, Bulova watch time. So I have to go to sleep."

willy. That really is . . .

howard. Wait a minute! The next is my wife.

They wait.

howard's voice. "Go on, say something." (Pause.) "Well, you gonna talk?"

his wife. "I can't think of anything."

howard's voice. "Well, talk—it's turning."

his wife (shyly, beaten). "Hello." (Silence.) "Oh, Howard, I can't talk into this . . ."

howard (snapping the machine off). That was my wife.

willy. That is a wonderful machine. Can we . . .

howard. I tell you, Willy, I'm gonna take my camera, and my bandsaw, and all my hobbies, and out they go. This is the most fascinating relaxation I ever found.

willy. I think I'll get one myself.

howard. Sure, they're only a hundred and a half. You can't do without it. Supposing you wanna hear Jack Benny, see? But you can't be at home at that hour. So you tell the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio . . .

willy. And when you come home you . . .

howard. You can come home twelve o'clock, one o'clock, any time you like, and you get yourself a Coke and sit yourself down, throw the switch, and there's Jack Benny's program in the middle of the night!

willy. I'm definitely going to get one. Because lots of times I'm on the road, and I think to myself, what I must be missing on the radio!

howard. Don't you have a radio in the car?

willy. Well, yeah, but who ever thinks of turning it on?

howard. Say, aren't you supposed to be in Boston?

willy. That's what I want to talk to you about, Howard. You got a minute? (He draws a chair in from the wing.)

howard. What happened? What're you doing here?

willy. Well . . .

howard. You didn't crack up again, did you?

willy. Oh, no. No . . .

howard. Geez, you had me worried there for a minute. What's the trouble?

willy. Well, tell you the truth, Howard. I've come to the decision that I'd rather not travel any more.

howard. Not travel! Well, what'll you do?

willy. Remember, Christmas time, when you had the party here? You said you'd try to think of some spot for me here in town.

howard. With us?

willy. Well, sure.

howard. Oh, yeah, yeah. I remember. Well, I couldn't think of anything for you, Willy.

willy. I tell ya, Howard. The kids are all grown up, y'know. I don't need much any more. If I could take home—well, sixty-five dollars a week, I could swing it.

howard. Yeah, but Willy, see I . . .

willy. I tell ya why, Howard. Speaking frankly and between the two of us, y'know—I'm just a little tired.

howard. Oh, I could understand that, Willy. But you're a road man, Willy, and we do a road business. We've only got a half-dozen salesmen on the floor here.

willy. God knows, Howard. I never asked a favor of any man. But I was with the firm when your father used to carry you in here in his arms.

howard. I know that, Willy, but . . .

willy. Your father came to me the day you were born and asked me what I thought of the name

Howard, may he rest in peace.

howard. I appreciate that, Willy, but there just is no spot here for you. If I had a spot I'd slam you right in, but I just don't have a single solitary spot.

He looks for his lighter. willy has picked it up and gives it to him. Pause.

willy (with increasing anger). Howard, all I need to set my table is fifty dollars a week.

howard. But where am I going to put you, kid?

willy. Look, it isn't a question of whether I can sell merchandise, is it?

howard. No, but it's business, kid, and everybody's gotta pull his own weight.

willy (desperately). Just let me tell you a story, Howard . . .

howard. 'Cause you gotta admit, business is business.

willy (angrily). Business is definitely business, but just listen for a minute. You don't understand this. When I was a boy—eighteen, nineteen—I was already on the road. And there was a question in my mind as to whether selling had a future for me. Because in those days I had a yearning to go to Alaska. See, there were three gold strikes in one month in Alaska, and I felt like going out. Just for the ride, you might say.

howard (barely interested). Don't say.

willy. Oh, yeah, my father lived many years in Alaska. He was an adventurous man. We've got quite a little streak of self-reliance in our family. I thought I'd go out with my older brother and try to locate him, and maybe settle in the North with the old man. And I was almost decided to go, when I met a salesman in the Parker House. His name was Dave Singleman. And he was eighty-four years old, and he'd drummed merchandise in thirty-one states. And old Dave, he'd go up to his room, y'understand, put on his green velvet slippers—I'll never forget—and pick up his phone and call the buyers, and without ever leaving his room, at the age of eighty-four, he made his living. And when I saw that, I realized that selling was the greatest career a man could want. 'Cause what could be more satisfying than to be able to go, at the age of eighty-four, into twenty or thirty different cities, and pick up a phone, and be remembered and loved and helped by so many different people? Do you know? when he died—and by the way he died the death of a salesman, in his green velvet slippers in the smoker of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, going into Boston—when he died, hundreds of salesmen and buyers were at his funeral. Things were sad on a lotta trains for months after that. (He stands up, howard has not looked at him.) In those days there was personality in it, Howard. There was respect, and comradeship, and gratitude in it. Today, it's all cut and dried, and there's no chance for bringing friendship to bear—or personality. You see what I mean? They don't know me any more.

howard (moving away, to the right). That's just the thing, Willy.

willy. If I had forty dollars a week—that's all I'd need. Forty dollars, Howard.

howard. Kid, I can't take blood from a stone, I . . .

willy (desperation is on him now). Howard, the year Al Smith was nominated, your father came to me and . . .

howard (starting to go off). I've got to see some people, kid.

willy (stopping him). I'm talking about your father! There were promises made across this desk! You mustn't tell me you've got people to see—I put thirty-four years into this firm, Howard, and now I can't pay my insurance! You can't eat the orange and throw the peel away—a man is not a piece of fruit! (After a pause.) Now pay attention. Your father—in 1928 I had a big year. I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in commissions.

howard (impatiently). Now, Willy, you never averaged . . .

willy (banging his hand on the desk). I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in the year of 1928! And your father came to me—or rather, I was in the office here—it was right over this desk—and he put his hand on my shoulder . . .

howard (getting up). You'll have to excuse me, Willy, I gotta see some people. Pull yourself together. (Going out.) I'll be back in a little while.

On howard's exit, the light on his chair grows very bright and strange.

willy. Pull myself together! What the hell did I say to him? My God, I was yelling at him! How could I? (willy breaks off, staring at the light, which occupies the chair, animating it. He approaches this chair, standing across the desk from it.) Frank, Frank, don't you remember what you told me that time? How you put your hand on my shoulder, and Frank . . . (He leans on the desk and as he speaks the dead man's name he accidentally switches on the recorder, and instantly) howard's son. ". . .New York is Albany. The capital of Ohio is Cincinnati, the capital of Rhode Island is . . ." (The recitation continues.)

willy (leaping away with fright, shouting). Ha! Howard! Howard! Howard!

howard (rushing in). What happened?

willy (pointing at the machine, which continues nasally, childishly, with the capital cities). Shut it off! Shut it off!

howard (pulling the plug out). Look, Willy . . .

willy (pressing his hands to his eyes). I gotta get myself some coffee. I'll get some coffee . . .

willy starts to walk out. howard stops him.

howard (rolling up the cord). Willy, look . . .

willy. I'll go to Boston.

howard. Willy, you can't go to Boston for us.

willy. Why can't I go?

howard. I don't want you to represent us. I've been meaning to tell you for a long time now.

willy. Howard, are you firing me?

howard. I think you need a good long rest, Willy.

willy. Howard . . .

howard. And when you feel better, come back, and we'll see if we can work something out.

willy. But I gotta earn money, Howard. I'm in no position to . . .

howard. Where are your sons? Why don't your sons give you a hand?

willy. They're working on a very big deal.

howard. This is no time for false pride, Willy. You go to your sons and you tell them that you're tired. You've got two great boys, haven't you?

willy. Oh, no question, no question, but in the meantime . . .

howard. Then that's that, heh?

willy. All right, I'll go to Boston tomorrow.

howard. No, no.

willy. I can't throw myself on my sons. I'm not a cripple!

howard. Look, kid, I'm busy this morning.

willy (grasping howard's arm). Howard, you've got to let me go to Boston!

howard (hard, keeping himself under control). I've got a line of people to see this morning. Sit down, take five minutes, and pull yourself together, and then go home, will ya? I need the office, Willy. (He starts to go, turns, remembering the recorder, starts to push off the table holding the recorder.) Oh, yeah. Whenever you can this week, stop by and drop off the samples. You'll feel better, Willy, and then come back and we'll talk. Pull yourself together, kid, there's people outside.

howard exits, pushing the table off left. willy stares into space, exhausted. Now the music is heard—ben's music—first distantly, then closer, closer. As willy speaks, ben enters from the right. He carries valise and umbrella.

willy. Oh, Ben, how did you do it? What is the answer? Did you wind up the Alaska deal already?

ben. Doesn't take much time if you know what you're doing. Just a short business trip. Boarding ship in an hour. Wanted to say good-by.

willy. Ben, I've got to talk to you.

ben (glancing at his watch). Haven't the time, William.

willy (crossing the apron to ben). Ben, nothing's working out. I don't know what to do.

ben. Now, look here, William. I've bought timberland in Alaska and I need a man to look after things for me.

willy. God, timberland! Me and my boys in those grand outdoors!

ben. You've a new continent at your doorstep, William. Get out of these cities, they're full of talk and time payments and courts of law. Screw on your fists and you can fight for a fortune up there.

willy. Yes, yes! Linda, Linda!

linda enters as of old, with the wash.

linda. Oh, you're back?

ben. I haven't much time.

willy. No, wait! Linda, he's got a proposition for me in Alaska.

linda. But you've got . . . (To ben.) He's got a beautiful job here.

willy. But in Alaska, kid, I could . . .

linda. You're doing well enough, Willy!

ben (To linda). Enough for what, my dear?

linda (frightened of ben and angry at him). Don't say those things to him! Enough to be happy right here, right now. (To willy, while ben laughs.) Why must everybody conquer the world? You're well liked, and the boys love you, and someday—(To ben)—why, old man Wagner told him just the other day that if he keeps it up he'll be a member of the firm, didn't he, Willy?

willy. Sure, sure. I am building something with this firm, Ben, and if a man is building something he must be on the right track, mustn't he?

ben. What are you building? Lay your hand on it. Where is it?

willy (hesitantly). That's true, Linda, there's nothing.

linda. Why? (To ben.) There's a man eighty-four years old . . .

willy. That's right, Ben, that's right. When I look at that man I say, what is there to worry about?

ben. Bah!

willy. It's true, Ben. All he has to do is go into any city, pick up the phone, and he's making his living and you know why?

ben (picking up his valise). I've got to go.

willy (holding ben back). Look at this boy!

biff, in his high school sweater, enters carrying suitcase. happy carries biff's shoulder guards, gold helmet, and football pants.

willy. Without a penny to his name, three great universities are begging for him, and from there the sky's the limit, because it's not what you do, Ben. It's who you know and the smile on your face! It's contacts, Ben, contacts! The whole wealth of Alaska passes over the lunch table at the Commodore Hotel, and that's the wonder, the wonder of this country, that a man can end with diamonds here on the basis of being liked! (He turns to biff.) And that's why when you get out on that field today it's important. Because thousands of people will be rooting for you and loving you. (To ben, who has again begun to leave.) And Ben! when he walks into a business office his name will sound out like a bell and all the doors will open to him! I've seen it, Ben, I've seen it a thousand times! You can't feel it with your hand like timber, but it's there!

ben. Good-by, William.

willy. Ben, am I right? Don't you think I'm right? I value your advice.

ben. There's a new continent at your doorstep, William. You could walk out rich. Rich! (He is gone.)

willy. We'll do it here, Ben! You hear me? We're gonna do it here!

Young bernard rushes in. The gay music of the Boys is heard.

bernard. Oh, gee, I was afraid you left already!

willy. Why? What time is it?

bernard. It's half-past one!

willy. Well, come on, everybody! Ebbets Field next stop! Where's the pennants? (He rushes through the wall-line of the kitchen and out into the living room.)

linda (to biff). Did you pack fresh underwear?

biff (who has been limbering up). I want to go!

bernard. Biff, I'm carrying your helmet, ain't I?

happy. No, I'm carrying the helmet.

bernard. Oh, Biff, you promised me.

happy. I'm carrying the helmet.

bernard. How am I going to get in the locker room?

linda. Let him carry the shoulder guards. (She puts her coat and hat on in the kitchen.)

bernard. Can I, Biff? 'Cause I told everybody I'm going to be in the locker room.

happy. In Ebbets Field it's the clubhouse.

bernard. I meant the clubhouse. Biff!

happy. Biff!

biff (grandly, after a slight pause). Let him carry the shoulder guards.

happy (as he gives bernard the shoulder guards). Stay close to us now.

willy rushes in with the pennants.

willy (handing them out). Everybody wave when Biff comes out on the field. (happy and bernard run off.) You set now, boy?

The music has died away.

biff. Ready to go, Pop. Every muscle is ready.

willy (at the edge of the apron). You realize what this means?

biff. That's right, Pop.

willy (feeling biff's muscles). You're comin' home this afternoon captain of the All-Scholastic Championship Team of the City of New York.

biff. I got it, Pop. And remember, pal, when I take off my helmet, that touchdown is for you.

willy. Let's go! (He is starting out, with his arm around biff, when charley enters, as of old, in knickers.) I got no room for you, Charley.

charley. Room? For what?

willy. In the car.

charley. You goin' for a ride? I wanted to shoot some casino.

willy (furiously). Casino! (Incredulously.) Don't you realize what today is?

linda. Oh, he knows, Willy. He's just kidding you.

willy. That's nothing to kid about!

charley. No, Linda, what's goin' on?

linda. He's playing in Ebbets Field.

charley. Baseball in this weather?

willy. Don't talk to him. Come on, come on! (He is pushing them out.)

charley. Wait a minute, didn't you hear the news?

willy. What?

charley. Don't you listen to the radio? Ebbets Field just blew up.

willy. You go to hell! (charley laughs. Pushing them out.) Come on, come on! We're late.

charley (as they go). Knock a homer, Biff, knock a homer!

willy (the last to leave, turning to charley). I don't think that was funny, Charley. This is the greatest day of his life.

charley. Willy, when are you going to grow up?

willy. Yeah, heh? When this game is over, Charley, you'll be laughing out of the other side of your face. They'll be calling him another Red Grange. Twenty-five thousand a year.

charley (kidding). Is that so?

willy. Yeah, that's so.

charley. Well, then, I'm sorry, Willy. But tell me something.

willy. What?

charley. Who is Red Grange?

willy. Put up your hands. Goddam you, put up your hands!

charley, chuckling, shakes his head and walks away, around the left corner of the stage. willy follows him. The music rises to a mocking frenzy.

willy. Who the hell do you think you are, better than everybody else? You don't know everything, you big, ignorant, stupid . . . Put up your hands!

Light rises, on the right side of the forestage, on a small table in the reception room of charley's office. Traffic sounds heard. bernard, now mature, sits whistling to himself. A pair of tennis rackets and an old overnight bag are on the floor beside him.

willy (offstage). What are you walking away for? Don't walk away! If you're going to say something say it to my face! I know you laugh at me behind my back. You'll laugh out of the other side of your goddam face after this game. Touchdown! Touchdown! Eighty thousand people! Touchdown! Right between the goal posts.

(bernard is a quiet, earnest, but self-assured young man. willy's voice is coming from right upstage now. bernard lowers his feet off the table and listens. jenny, his father's secretary, enters.)

jenny (distressed). Say, Bernard, will you go out in the hall?

bernard. What is that noise? Who is it?

jenny. Mr. Loman. He just got off the elevator.

bernard (getting up). Who's he arguing with?

jenny. Nobody. There's nobody with him. I can't deal with him any more, and your father gets all upset every time he comes. I've got a lot of typing to do, and your father's waiting to sign it. Will you see him?

willy (entering). Touchdown! Touch—(He sees jenny.) Jenny, Jenny, good to see you. How're ya?

Workin'? Or still honest?

jenny. Fine. How've you been feeling?

willy. Not much any more, Jenny. Ha, ha! (He is surprised to see the rackets.)

bernard. Hello, Uncle Willy.

willy (almost shocked). Bernard! Well, look who's here! (He comes quickly, guiltily, to bernard and warmly shakes his hand.)

bernard. How are you? Good to see you.

willy. What are you doing here?

bernard. Oh, just stopped by to see Pop. Get off my feet till my train leaves. I'm going to Washington in a few minutes.

willy. Is he in?

bernard. Yes, he's in his office with the accountant. Sit down.

willy (sitting down). What're you going to do in Washington?

bernard. Oh, just a case I've got there, Willy.

willy. That so? (Indicating the rackets.) You going to play tennis there?

bernard. I'm staying with a friend who's got a court.

willy. Don't say. His own tennis court. Must be fine people, I bet.

bernard. They are, very nice. Dad tells me Biff's in town.

willy (with a big smile). Yeah, Biff's in. Working on a very big deal, Bernard.

bernard. What's Biff doing?

willy. Well, he's been doing very big things in the West. But he decided to establish himself here. Very big. We're having dinner. Did I hear your wife had a boy?

bernard. That's right. Our second.

willy. Two boys! What do you know!

bernard. What kind of a deal has Biff got?

willy. Well, Bill Oliver—very big sporting-goods man—he wants Biff very badly. Called him in from the West. Long distance, carte blanche, special deliveries. Your friends have their own private tennis court?

bernard. You still with the old firm, Willy?

willy (after a pause). I'm—I'm overjoyed to see how you made the grade, Bernard, overjoyed. It's an encouraging thing to see a young man really—really . . . Looks very good for Biff—very . . . (He breaks off, then.) Bernard . . . (He is so full of emotion, he breaks off again.)

bernard. What is it, Willy?

willy (small and alone). What—what's the secret?

bernard. What secret?

willy. How—how did you? Why didn't he ever catch on?

bernard. I wouldn't know that, Willy.

willy (confidentially, desperately). You were his friend, his boyhood friend. There's something I don't understand about it. His life ended after that Ebbets Field game. From the age of seventeen nothing good ever happened to him.

bernard. He never trained himself for anything.

willy. But he did, he did. After high school he took so many correspondence courses. Radio mechanics; television; God knows what, and never made the slightest mark.

bernard (taking off his glasses). Willy, do you want to talk candidly?

willy (rising, faces bernard). I regard you as a very brilliant man, Bernard. I value your advice.

bernard. Oh, the hell with the advice, Willy. I couldn't advise you. There's just one thing I've always wanted to ask you. When he was supposed to graduate, and the math teacher flunked him . . .

willy. Oh, that son-of-a-bitch ruined his life.

bernard. Yeah, but, Willy, all he had to do was go to summer school and make up that subject.

willy. That's right, that's right.

bernard. Did you tell him not to go to summer school?

willy. Me? I begged him to go. I ordered him to go!

bernard. Then why wouldn't he go?

willy. Why? Why! Bernard, that question has been trailing me like a ghost for the last fifteen years. He flunked the subject, and laid down and died like a hammer hit him!

bernard. Take it easy, kid.

willy. Let me talk to you—I got nobody to talk to. Bernard, Bernard, was it my fault? Y'see? It keeps going around in my mind, maybe I did something to him. I got nothing to give him.

bernard. Don't take it so hard.

willy. Why did he lay down? What is the story there? You were his friend!

bernard. Willy, I remember, it was June, and our grades came out. And he'd flunked math.

willy. That son-of-a-bitch!

bernard. No, it wasn't right then. Biff just got very angry, I remember, and he was ready to enroll in summer school.

willy (surprised). He was?

bernard. He wasn't beaten by it at all. But then, Willy, he disappeared from the block for almost a month. And I got the idea that he'd gone up to New England to see you. Did he have a talk with you then?

willy stares in silence.

bernard. Willy?

willy (with a strong edge of resentment in his voice). Yeah, he came to Boston. What about it?

bernard. Well, just that when he came back—I'll never forget this, it always mystifies me. Because I'd thought so well of Biff, even though he'd always taken advantage of me. I loved him, Willy, y'know? And he came back after that month and took his sneakers—remember those sneakers with "University of Virginia" printed on them? He was so proud of those, wore them every day. And he took them down in the cellar, and burned them up in the furnace. We had a fist fight. It lasted at least half an hour. Just the two of us, punching each other down the cellar, and crying right through it. I've often thought of how strange it was that I knew he'd given up his life. What happened in Boston, Willy?

willy looks at him as at an intruder.

bernard. I just bring it up because you asked me.

willy (angrily). Nothing. What do you mean, "What happened?" What's that got to do with anything?

bernard. Well, don't get sore.

willy. What are you trying to do, blame it on me? If a boy lays down is that my fault?

bernard. Now, Willy, don't get . . .

willy. Well, don't—don't talk to me that way! What does that mean, "What happened?"

charley enters. He is in his vest, and he carries a bottle of bourbon.

charley. Hey, you're going to miss that train. (He waves the bottle.)

bernard. Yeah, I'm going. (He takes the bottle.) Thanks, Pop. (He picks up his rackets and bag.) Good-by, Willy, and don't worry about it. You know, "If at first you don't succeed . . ."

willy. Yes, I believe in that.

bernard. But sometimes, Willy, it's better for a man just to walk away.

willy. Walk away?

bernard. That's right.

willy. But if you can't walk away?

bernard (after a slight pause). I guess that's when it's tough. (Extending his hand.) Good-by, Willy.

willy (shaking bernard's hand). Good-by, boy.

charley (an arm on bernard's shoulder). How do you like this kid? Gonna argue a case in front of the Supreme Court.

bernard (protesting). Pop!

willy (genuinely shocked, pained, and happy). No! The Supreme Court!

bernard. I gotta run. 'By, Dad!

charley. Knock 'em dead, Bernard!

bernard goes off.

willy (as charley takes out his wallet). The Supreme Court! And he didn't even mention it!

charley (counting out money on the desk). He don't have to—he's gonna do it.

willy. And you never told him what to do, did you? You never took any interest in him.

charley. My salvation is that I never took any interest in anything. There's some money—fifty dollars. I got an accountant inside.

willy. Charley, look . . .(with difficulty.) I got my insurance to pay. If you can manage it—I need a hundred and ten dollars.

charley doesn't reply for a moment; merely stops moving.

willy. I'd draw it from my bank but Linda would know, and I . . .

charley. Sit down, Willy.

willy (moving toward the chair). I'm keeping an account of everything, remember. I'll pay every penny back. (He sits.) charley. Now listen to me, Willy.

willy. I want you to know I appreciate . . .

charley (sitting down on the table). Willy, what're you doin'? What the hell is going on in your head?

willy. Why? I'm simply . . .

charley. I offered you a job. You make fifty dollars a week. And I won't send you on the road.

willy. I've got a job.

charley. Without pay? What kind of a job is a job without pay? (He rises.) Now, look, kid, enough is enough. I'm no genius but I know when I'm being insulted.

willy. Insulted!

charley. Why don't you want to work for me?

willy. What's the matter with you? I've got a job.

charley. Then what're you walkin' in here every week for?

willy (getting up). Well, if you don't want me to walk in here . . .

charley. I'm offering you a job.

willy. I don't want your goddam job!

charley. When the hell are you going to grow up?

willy (furiously). You big ignoramus, if you say that to me again I'll rap you one! I don't care how big you are! (He's ready to fight.)

Pause.

charley (kindly, going to him). How much do you need, Willy?

willy. Charley, I'm strapped. I'm strapped. I don't know what to do. I was just fired.

charley. Howard fired you?

willy. That snotnose. Imagine that? I named him. I named him Howard.

charley. Willy, when're you gonna realize that them things don't mean anything? You named him

Howard, but you can't sell that. The only thing you got in this world is what you can sell. And the funny thing is that you're a salesman, and you don't know that.

willy. I've always tried to think otherwise, I guess. I always felt that if a man was impressive, and well liked, that nothing . . .

charley. Why must everybody like you? Who liked J. P. Morgan? Was he impressive? In a Turkish bath he'd look like a butcher. But with his pockets on he was very well liked. Now listen, Willy, I know you don't like me, and nobody can say I'm in love with you, but I'll give you a job because—just for the hell of it, put it that way. Now what do you say?

willy. I—I just can't work for you, Charley.

charley. What're you, jealous of me?

willy. I can't work for you, that's all, don't ask me why.

charley (angered, takes out more bills). You been jealous of me all your life, you damned fool! Here, pay your insurance. (He puts the money in willy's hand.)

willy. I'm keeping strict accounts.

charley. I've got some work to do. Take care of yourself. And pay your insurance.

willy (moving to the right). Funny, y'know? After all the highways, and the trains, and the appointments, and the years, you end up worth more dead than alive.

charley. Willy, nobody's worth nothin' dead. (After a slight pause.) Did you hear what I said?

willy stands still, dreaming.

charley. Willy!

willy. Apologize to Bernard for me when you see him. I didn't mean to argue with him. He's a fine boy. They're all fine boys, and they'll end up big—all of them. Someday they'll all play tennis together. Wish me luck, Charley. He saw Bill Oliver today.

charley. Good luck.

willy (on the verge of tears). Charley, you're the only friend I got. Isn't that a remarkable thing? (He goes out.)

charley. Jesus!

charley stares after him a moment and follows. All light blacks out. Suddenly raucous music is heard, and a red glow rises behind the screen at right. stanley, a young waiter, appears, carrying a table, followed by happy, who is carrying two chairs.

stanley (putting the table down). That's all right, Mr. Loman, I can handle it myself. (He turns and takes the chairs from happy and places them at the table.)

happy (glancing around). Oh, this is better.

stanley. Sure, in the front there you're in the middle of all kinds of noise. Whenever you got a party, Mr. Loman, you just tell me and I'll put you back here. Y'know, there's a lotta people they don't like it private, because when they go out they like to see a lotta action around them because they're sick and tired to stay in the house by theirself. But I know you, you ain't from Hackensack. You know what I mean?

happy (sitting down). So how's it coming, Stanley?

stanley. Ah, it's a dog life. I only wish during the war they'd a took me in the Army. I coulda been dead by now.

happy. My brother's back, Stanley.

stanley. Oh, he come back, heh? From the Far West.

happy. Yeah, big cattle man, my brother, so treat him right. And my father's coming too.

stanley. Oh, your father too!

happy. You got a couple of nice lobsters?

stanley. Hundred percent, big.

happy. I want them with the claws.

stanley. Don't worry, I don't give you no mice. (happy laughs.) How about some wine? It'll put a head on the meal.

happy. No. You remember, Stanley, that recipe I brought you from overseas? With the champagne in it?

stanley. Oh, yeah, sure. I still got it tacked up yet in the kitchen. But that'll have to cost a buck apiece anyways.

happy. That's all right.

stanley. What'd you, hit a number or somethin'?

happy. No, it's a little celebration. My brother is—I think he pulled off a big deal today. I think we're going into business together.

stanley. Great! That's the best for you. Because a family business, you know what I mean?—that's the best.

happy. That's what I think.

stanley. 'Cause what's the difference? Somebody steals? It's in the family. Know what I mean? (Sotto voce.) Like this bartender here. The boss is goin' crazy what kinda leak he's got in the cash register. You put it in but it don't come out.

happy (raising his head). Sh!

stanley. What?

happy. You notice I wasn't lookin' right or left, was I?

stanley. No.

happy. And my eyes are closed.

stanley. So what's the . . .?

happy. Strudel's comin'.

stanley (catching on, looks around). Ah, no, there's no . . .

He breaks off as a furred, lavishly dressed girl enters and sits at the next table. Both follow her with their eyes.

stanley. Geez, how'd ya know?

happy. I got radar or something. (Staring directly at her profile.) Ooooooo . . . Stanley.

stanley. I think that's for you, Mr. Loman.

happy. Look at that mouth. Oh, God. And the binoculars.

stanley. Geez, you got a life, Mr. Loman.

happy. Wait on her.

stanley (going to the girl's table). Would you like a menu, ma'am?

girl. I'm expecting someone, but I'd like a . . .

happy. Why don't you bring her—excuse me, miss, do you mind? I sell champagne, and I'd like you to try my brand. Bring her a champagne, Stanley.

girl. That's awfully nice of you.

happy. Don't mention it. It's all company money. (He laughs.)

girl. That's a charming product to be selling, isn't it?

happy. Oh, gets to be like everything else. Selling is selling, y'know.

girl. I suppose.

happy. You don't happen to sell, do you?

girl. No, I don't sell.

happy. Would you object to a compliment from a stranger? You ought to be on a magazine cover.

girl (looking at him a little archly). I have been.

stanley comes in with a glass of champagne.

happy. What'd I say before, Stanley? You see? She's a cover girl.

stanley. Oh, I could see, I could see.

happy (to the girl). What magazine?

girl. Oh, a lot of them. (She takes the drink.) Thank you.

happy. You know what they say in France, don't you? "Champagne is the drink of the complexion"—

Hya, Biff!

biff has entered and sits with happy.

biff. Hello, kid. Sorry I'm late.

happy. I just got here. Uh, Miss . . .?

girl. Forsythe.

happy. Miss Forsythe, this is my brother.

biff. Is Dad here?

happy. His name is Biff. You might've heard of him. Great football player.

girl. Really? What team?

happy. Are you familiar with football?

girl. No, I'm afraid I'm not.

happy. Biff is quarterback with the New York Giants.

girl. Well, that is nice, isn't it? (She drinks.)

happy. Good health.

girl. I'm happy to meet you.

happy. That's my name. Hap. It's really Harold, but at West Point they called me Happy.

girl (now really impressed). Oh, I see. How do you do? (She turns her profile.)

biff. Isn't Dad coming?

happy. You want her?

biff. Oh, I could never make that.

happy. I remember the time that idea would never come into your head. Where's the old confidence, Biff?

biff. I just saw Oliver . . .

happy. Wait a minute. I've got to see that old confidence again. Do you want her? She's on call.

biff. Oh, no. (He turns to look at the girl.)

happy. I'm telling you. Watch this. (Turning to the girl.) Honey? (She turns to him.) Are you busy?

girl. Well, I am . . . but I could make a phone call.

happy. Do that, will you, honey? And see if you can get a friend. We'll be here for a while. Biff is one of the greatest football players in the country.

girl (standing up). Well, I'm certainly happy to meet you.

happy. Come back soon.

girl. I'll try.

happy. Don't try, honey, try hard.

The girl exits. stanley follows, shaking his head in bewildered admiration.

happy. Isn't that a shame now? A beautiful girl like that? That's why I can't get married. There's not a good woman in a thousand. New York is loaded with them, kid!

biff. Hap, look . . .

happy. I told you she was on call!

biff (strangely unnerved). Cut it out, will ya? I want to say something to you.

happy. Did you see Oliver?

biff. I saw him all right. Now look, I want to tell Dad a couple of things and I want you to help me.

happy. What? Is he going to back you?

biff. Are you crazy? You're out of your goddam head, you know that?

happy. Why? What happened?

biff (breathlessly). I did a terrible thing today, Hap. It's been the strangest day I ever went through. I'm all numb, I swear.

happy. You mean he wouldn't see you?

biff. Well, I waited six hours for him, see? All day. Kept sending my name in. Even tried to date his secretary so she'd get me to him, but no soap.

happy. Because you're not showin' the old confidence, Biff. He remembered you, didn't he?

biff (stopping happy with a gesture). Finally, about five o'clock, he comes out. Didn't remember who I was or anything. I felt like such an idiot, Hap.

happy. Did you tell him my Florida idea?

biff. He walked away. I saw him for one minute. I got so mad I could've torn the walls down! How the hell did I ever get the idea I was a salesman there? I even believed myself that I'd been a salesman for him! And then he gave me one look and—I realized what a ridiculous lie my whole life has been! We've been talking in a dream for fifteen years. I was a shipping clerk.

happy. What'd you do?

biff (with great tension and wonder). Well, he left, see. And the secretary went out. I was all alone in the waiting room. I don't know what came over me, Hap. The next thing I know I'm in his office—paneled walls, everything. I can't explain it. I—Hap. I took his fountain pen.

happy. Geez, did he catch you?

biff. I ran out. I ran down all eleven flights. I ran and ran and ran.

happy. That was an awful dumb—what'd you do that for?

biff (agonized). I don't know, I just—wanted to take something, I don't know. You gotta help me, Hap. I'm gonna tell Pop.

happy. You crazy? What for?

biff. Hap, he's got to understand that I'm not the man somebody lends that kind of money to. He thinks I've been spiting him all these years and it's eating him up.

happy. That's just it. You tell him something nice.

biff. I can't.

happy. Say you got a lunch date with Oliver tomorrow.

biff. So what do I do tomorrow?

happy. You leave the house tomorrow and come back at night and say Oliver is thinking it over. And he thinks it over for a couple of weeks, and gradually it fades away and nobody's the worse.

biff. But it'll go on forever!

happy. Dad is never so happy as when he's looking forward to something!

willy enters.

happy. Hello, scout!

willy. Gee, I haven't been here in years!

stanley has followed willy in and sets a chair for him. stanley starts off but happy stops him.

happy. Stanley!

stanley stands by, waiting for an order.

biff (going to willy with guilt, as to an invalid). Sit down, Pop. You want a drink?

willy. Sure, I don't mind.

biff. Let's get a load on.

willy. You look worried.

biff. N-no. (To stanley.) Scotch all around. Make it doubles.

stanley. Doubles, right. (He goes.)

willy. You had a couple already, didn't you?

biff. Just a couple, yeah.

willy. Well, what happened, boy? (Nodding affirmatively, with a smile.) Everything go all right?

biff (takes a breath, then reaches out and grasps willy's hand). Pal . . . (He is smiling bravely, and willy is smiling too.) I had an experience today.

happy. Terrific, Pop.

willy. That so? What happened?

biff (high, slightly alcoholic, above the earth). I'm going to tell you everything from first to last. It's been a strange day. (Silence. He looks around, composes himself as best he can, but his breath keeps breaking the rhythm of his voice.) I had to wait quite a while for him, and . . .

willy. Oliver?

biff. Yeah, Oliver. All day, as a matter of cold fact. And a lot of—instances—facts, Pop, facts about my life came back to me. Who was it, Pop? Who ever said I was a salesman with Oliver?

willy. Well, you were.

biff. No, Dad, I was a shipping clerk.

willy. But you were practically . . .

biff (with determination). Dad, I don't know who said it first, but I was never a salesman for Bill Oliver.

willy. What're you talking about?

biff. Let's hold on to the facts tonight, Pop. We're not going to get anywhere bullin' around. I was a shipping clerk.

willy (angrily). All right, now listen to me . . .

biff. Why don't you let me finish?

willy. I'm not interested in stories about the past or any crap of that kind because the woods are burning, boys, you understand? There's a big blaze going on all around. I was fired today.

biff (shocked). How could you be?

willy. I was fired, and I'm looking for a little good news to tell your mother, because the woman has waited and the woman has suffered. The gist of it is that I haven't got a story left in my head, Biff. So don't give me a lecture about facts and aspects. I am not interested. Now what've you got to say to me?

stanley enters with three drinks. They wait until he leaves.

willy. Did you see Oliver?

biff. Jesus, Dad!

willy. You mean you didn't go up there?

happy. Sure he went up there.

biff. I did. I—saw him. How could they fire you?

willy (on the edge of his chair). What kind of a welcome did he give you?

biff. He won't even let you work on commission?

willy. I'm out! (Driving.) So tell me, he gave you a warm welcome?

happy. Sure, Pop, sure!

biff (driven). Well, it was kind of . . .

willy. I was wondering if he'd remember you. (To happy.) Imagine, man doesn't see him for ten, twelve years and gives him that kind of a welcome!

happy. Damn right!

biff (trying to return to the offensive). Pop, look . . .

willy. You know why he remembered you, don't you? Because you impressed him in those days.

biff. Let's talk quietly and get this down to the facts, huh?

willy (as though biff had been interrupting). Well, what happened? It's great news, Biff. Did he take you into his office or'd you talk in the waiting room?

biff. Well, he came in, see, and . . .

willy (with a big smile). What'd he say? Betcha he threw his arm around you.

biff. Well, he kinda . . .

willy. He's a fine man. (To happy.) Very hard man to see, y'know.

happy (agreeing). Oh, I know.

willy (to biff). Is that where you had the drinks?

biff. Yeah, he gave me a couple of—no, no!

happy (cutting in). He told him my Florida idea.

willy. Don't interrupt. (To biff.) How'd he react to the Florida idea?

biff. Dad, will you give me a minute to explain?

willy. I've been waiting for you to explain since I sat down here! What happened? He took you into his office and what?

biff. Well—I talked. And—and he listened, see.

willy. Famous for the way he listens, y'know. What was his answer?

biff. His answer was—(He breaks off, suddenly angry.) Dad, you're not letting me tell you what I want to tell you!

willy (accusing, angered). You didn't see him, did you?

biff. I did see him!

willy. What'd you insult him or something? You insulted him, didn't you?

biff. Listen, will you let me out of it, will you just let me out of it!

happy. What the hell!

willy. Tell me what happened!

biff (to happy). I can't talk to him!

A single trumpet note jars the ear. The light of green leaves stains the house, which holds the air of night and a dream. young bernard enters and knocks on the door of the house.

young bernard (frantically). Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

happy. Tell him what happened!

biff (to happy.) Shut up and leave me alone!

willy. No, no! You had to go and flunk math!

biff. What math? What're you talking about?

young bernard. Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

linda appears in the house, as of old.

willy (wildly). Math, math, math!

biff. Take it easy, Pop!

young bernard. Mrs. Loman!

willy (furiously). If you hadn't flunked you'd've been set by now!

biff. Now, look, I'm gonna tell you what happened, and you're going to listen to me.

young bernard. Mrs. Loman!

biff. I waited six hours . . .

happy. What the hell are you saying?

biff. I kept sending in my name but he wouldn't see me. So finally he . . . (He continues unheard as light fades low on the restaurant.)

young bernard. Biff flunked math!

linda. No!

young bernard. Birnbaum flunked him! They won't graduate him!

linda. But they have to. He's gotta go to the university. Where is he? Biff! Biff!

young bernard. No, he left. He went to Grand Central.

linda. Grand—You mean he went to Boston!

young bernard. Is Uncle Willy in Boston?

linda. Oh, maybe Willy can talk to the teacher. Oh, the poor, poor boy!

Light on house area snaps out.

biff (at the table, now audible, holding up a gold fountain pen). . . .so I'm washed up with Oliver, you understand? Are you listening to me?

willy (at a loss). Yeah, sure. If you hadn't flunked . . .

biff. Flunked what? What're you talking about?

willy. Don't blame everything on me! I didn't flunk math—you did! What pen?

happy. That was awful dumb, Biff, a pen like that is worth—willy (seeing the pen for the first time). You took Oliver's pen?

biff (weakening). Dad, I just explained it to you.

willy. You stole Bill Oliver's fountain pen!

biff. I didn't exactly steal it! That's just what I've been explaining to you!

happy. He had it in his hand and just then Oliver walked in, so he got nervous and stuck it in his pocket!

willy. My God, Biff!

biff. I never intended to do it, Dad!

operator's voice. Standish Arms, good evening!

willy (shouting). I'm not in my room!

biff (frightened). Dad, what's the matter? (He and happy stand up.)

operator. Ringing Mr. Loman for you!

willy. I'm not there, stop it!

biff (horrified, gets down on one knee before willy). Dad, I'll make good, I'll make good. (willy tries to get to his feet. biff holds him down.) Sit down now.

willy. No, you're no good, you're no good for anything.

biff. I am, Dad, I'll find something else, you understand? Now don't worry about anything. (He holds up willy's face.) Talk to me, Dad.

operator. Mr. Loman does not answer. Shall I page him?

willy (attempting to stand, as though to rush and silence the operator). No, no, no!

happy. He'll strike something, Pop.

willy. No, no . . .

biff (desperately, standing over willy). Pop, listen! Listen to me! I'm telling you something good. Oliver talked to his partner about the Florida idea. You listening? He—he talked to his partner, and he came to me . . . I'm going to be all right, you hear? Dad, listen to me, he said it was just a question of the amount!

willy. Then you . . . got it?

happy. He's gonna be terrific, Pop!

willy (trying to stand). Then you got it, haven't you? You got it! You got it!

biff (agonized, holds willy down). No, no. Look, Pop. I'm supposed to have lunch with them tomorrow. I'm just telling you this so you'll know that I can still make an impression, Pop. And I'll make good somewhere, but I can't go tomorrow, see.

willy. Why not? You simply . . .

biff. But the pen, Pop!

willy. You give it to him and tell him it was an oversight!

happy. Sure, have lunch tomorrow!

biff. I can't say that . . .

willy. You were doing a crossword puzzle and accidentally used his pen!

biff. Listen, kid, I took those balls years ago, now I walk in with his fountain pen? That clinches it, don't you see? I can't face him like that! I'll try elsewhere.

page's voice. Paging Mr. Loman!

willy. Don't you want to be anything?

biff. Pop, how can I go back?

willy. You don't want to be anything, is that what's behind it?

biff (now angry at willy for not crediting his sympathy). Don't take it that way! You think it was easy walking into that office after what I'd done to him? A team of horses couldn't have dragged me back to Bill Oliver!

willy. Then why'd you go?

biff. Why did I go? Why did I go! Look at you! Look at what's become of you!

Off left, the woman laughs.

willy. Biff, you're going to go to that lunch tomorrow, or . . .

biff. I can't go. I've got no appointment!

happy. Biff, for . . .!

willy. Are you spiting me?

biff. Don't take it that way! Goddammit!

willy (strikes biff and falters away from the table). You rotten little louse! Are you spiting me?

the woman. Someone's at the door, Willy!

biff. I'm no good, can't you see what I am?

happy (separating them). Hey, you're in a restaurant! Now cut it out, both of you! (The girls enter.) Hello, girls, sit down.

miss forsythe. I guess we might as well. This is Letta.

the woman. Willy, are you going to wake up?

biff (ignoring willy). How're ya, miss, sit down. What do you drink?

miss forsythe. Letta might not be able to stay long.

letta. I gotta get up very early tomorrow. I got jury duty. I'm so excited! Were you fellows ever on a jury?

biff. No, but I been in front of them! (The girls laugh.) This is my father.

letta. Isn't he cute? Sit down with us, Pop.

happy. Sit him down, Biff!

biff (going to him). Come on, slugger, drink us under the table. To hell with it! Come on, sit down, pal.

On biff's last insistence, willy is about to sit.

the woman (now urgently). Willy, are you going to answer the door!

the woman's call pulls willy back. He starts right, befuddled.

biff. Hey, where are you going?

willy. Open the door.

biff. The door?

willy. The washroom . . . the door . . . where's the door?

biff (leading willy to the left). Just go straight down.

the woman. Willy, Willy, are you going to get up, get up, get up, get up?

letta. I think it's sweet you bring your daddy along.

miss forsythe. Oh, he isn't really your father!

biff (at left, turning to her resentfully). Miss Forsythe, you've just seen a prince walk by. A fine, troubled prince. A hardworking, unappreciated prince. A pal, you understand? A good companion. Always for his boys.

letta. That's so sweet.

happy. Well, girls, what's the program? We're wasting time. Come on, Biff. Gather round. Where would you like to go?

biff. Why don't you do something for him?

happy. Me!

biff. Don't you give a damn for him, Hap?

happy. What're you talking about? I'm the one who . . .

biff. I sense it, you don't give a good goddam about him. (He takes the rolled-up hose from his pocket and puts it on the table in front of happy.) Look what I found in the cellar, for Christ's sake. How can you bear to let it go on?

happy. Me? Who goes away? Who runs off and . . .

biff. Yeah, but he doesn't mean anything to you. You could help him—I can't! Don't you understand what I'm talking about? He's going to kill himself, don't you know that?

happy. Don't I know it! Me!

biff. Hap, help him! Jesus . . . help him . . . Help me, help me, I can't bear to look at his face! (Ready to weep, he hurries out, up right.)

happy (starting after him). Where are you going?

miss forsythe. What's he so mad about?

happy. Come on, girls, we'll catch up with him.

miss forsythe (as happy pushes her out). Say, I don't like that temper of his!

happy. He's just a little overstrung, he'll be all right!

willy (off left, as the woman laughs). Don't answer! Don't answer!

letta. Don't you want to tell your father . . .

happy. No, that's not my father. He's just a guy. Come on, we'll catch Biff, and, honey, we're going to paint this town! Stanley, where's the check! Hey, Stanley!

They exit. stanley looks toward left.

stanley (calling to happy indignantly). Mr. Loman! Mr. Loman!

stanley picks up a chair and follows them off. Knocking is heard off left. the woman enters, laughing. willy follows her. She is in a black slip; he is buttoning his shirt. Raw, sensuous music accompanies their speech:

willy. Will you stop laughing? Will you stop?

the woman. Aren't you going to answer the door? He'll wake the whole hotel.

willy. I'm not expecting anybody.

the woman. Whyn't you have another drink, honey, and stop being so damn self-centered?

willy. I'm so lonely.

the woman. You know you ruined me, Willy? From now on, whenever you come to the office, I'll see that you go right through to the buyers. No waiting at my desk anymore, Willy. You ruined me.

willy. That's nice of you to say that.

the woman. Gee, you are self-centered! Why so sad? You are the saddest, self-centeredest soul I ever did see-saw. (She laughs. He kisses her.) Come on inside, drummer boy. It's silly to be dressing in the middle of the night. (As knocking is heard.) Aren't you going to answer the door?

willy. They're knocking on the wrong door.

the woman. But I felt the knocking. And he heard us talking in here. Maybe the hotel's on fire!

willy (his terror rising). It's a mistake.

the woman. Then tell him to go away!

willy. There's nobody there.

the woman. It's getting on my nerves, Willy. There's somebody standing out there and it's getting on my nerves!

willy (pushing her away from him). All right, stay in the bathroom here, and don't come out. I think there's a law in Massachusetts about it, so don't come out. It may be that new room clerk. He looked very mean. So don't come out. It's a mistake, there's no fire.

The knocking is heard again. He takes a few steps away from her, and she vanishes into the wing. The light follows him, and now he is facing young biff, who carries a suitcase. biff steps toward him. The music is gone.

biff. Why didn't you answer?

willy. Biff! What are you doing in Boston?

biff. Why didn't you answer? I've been knocking for five minutes, I called you on the phone . . .

willy. I just heard you. I was in the bathroom and had the door shut. Did anything happen home?

biff. Dad—I let you down.

willy. What do you mean?

biff. Dad . . .

willy. Biffo, what's this about? (Putting his arm around biff.) Come on, let's go downstairs and get you a malted.

biff. Dad, I flunked math.

willy. Not for the term?

biff. The term. I haven't got enough credits to graduate.

willy. You mean to say Bernard wouldn't give you the answers?

biff. He did, he tried, but I only got a sixty-one.

willy. And they wouldn't give you four points?

biff. Birnbaum refused absolutely. I begged him, Pop, but he won't give me those points. You gotta talk to him before they close the school. Because if he saw the kind of man you are, and you just talked to him in your way, I'm sure he'd come through for me. The class came right before practice, see, and I didn't go enough. Would you talk to him? He'd like you, Pop. You know the way you could talk.

willy. You're on. We'll drive right back.

biff. Oh, Dad, good work! I'm sure he'll change it for you!

willy. Go downstairs and tell the clerk I'm checkin' out. Go right down.

biff. Yes, sir! See, the reason he hates me, Pop—one day he was late for class so I got up at the blackboard and imitated him. I crossed my eyes and talked with a lithp.

willy (laughing). You did? The kids like it?

biff. They nearly died laughing!

willy. Yeah? What'd you do?

biff. The thquare root of thixthy twee is . . .(willy bursts out laughing; biff joins.) And in the middle of it he walked in!

willy laughs and the woman joins in offstage.'

willy (without hesitation). Hurry downstairs and . . .

biff. Somebody in there?

willy. No, that was next door.

the woman laughs offstage.

biff. Somebody got in your bathroom!

willy. No, it's the next room, there's a party . . .

the woman (enters, laughing; she lisps this). Can I come in? There's something in the bathtub, Willy, and it's moving!

willy looks at biff, who is staring open-mouthed and horrified at the woman.

willy. Ah—you better go back to your room. They must be finished painting by now. They're painting her room so I let her take a shower here. Go back, go back . . .(He pushes her.)

the woman (resisting). But I've got to get dressed, Willy, I can't . . .

willy. Get out of here! Go back, go back . . . (Suddenly striving for the ordinary.) This is Miss Francis, Biff, she's a buyer. They're painting her room. Go back, Miss Francis, go back . . .

the woman. But my clothes, I can't go out naked in the hall!

willy (pushing her offstage). Get outa here! Go back, go back!

(biff slowly sits down on his suitcase as the argument continues offstage.)

the woman. Where's my stockings? You promised me stockings, Willy!

willy. I have no stockings here!

the woman. You had two boxes of size nine sheers for me, and I want them!

willy. Here, for God's sake, will you get outa here!

the woman (enters holding a box of stockings). I just hope there's nobody in the hall. That's all I hope. (To biff.) Are you football or baseball?

biff. Football.

the woman (angry, humiliated). That's me too. G'night. (She snatches her clothes from willy, and walks out.)

willy (after a pause). Well, better get going. I want to get to the school first thing in the morning. Get my suits out of the closet. I'll get my valise. (biff doesn't move.) What's the matter! (biff remains motionless, tears falling.) She's a buyer. Buys for J. H. Simmons. She lives down the hall—they're painting. You don't imagine—(He breaks off. After a pause.) Now listen, pal, she's just a buyer. She sees merchandise in her room and they have to keep it looking just so . . . (Pause. Assuming command.) All right, get my suits. (biff doesn't move.) Now stop crying and do as I say. I gave you an order. Biff, I gave you an order! Is that what you do when I give you an order? How dare you cry! (Putting his arm around biff.) Now look, Biff, when you grow up you'll understand about these things. You mustn't—you mustn't overemphasize a thing like this. I'll see Birnbaum first thing in the morning.

biff. Never mind.

willy (getting down beside biff). Never mind! He's going to give you those points. I'll see to it.

biff. He wouldn't listen to you.

willy. He certainly will listen to me. You need those points for the U. of Virginia.

biff. I'm not going there.

willy. Heh? If I can't get him to change that mark you'll make it up in summer school. You've got all summer to . . .

biff (his weeping breaking from him). Dad . . .

willy (infected by it). Oh, my boy . . .

biff. Dad . . .

willy. She's nothing to me, Biff. I was lonely, I was terribly lonely.

biff. You—you gave her Mama's stockings! (His tears break through and he rises to go.)

willy (grabbing for biff). I gave you an order!

biff. Don't touch me, you—liar!

willy. Apologize for that!

biff. You fake! You phony little fake! You fake! (Overcome, he turns quickly and weeping fully goes out with his suitcase. willy is left on the floor on his knees.)

willy. I gave you an order! Biff, come back here or I'll beat you! Come back here! I'll whip you!

stanley comes quickly in from the right and stands in front of willy.

willy (shouts at stanley). I gave you an order . . .

stanley. Hey, let's pick it up, pick it up, Mr. Loman. (He helps willy to his feet.) Your boys left with the chippies. They said they'll see you home.

A second waiter watches some distance away.

willy. But we were supposed to have dinner together.

Music is heard, willy's theme.

stanley. Can you make it?

willy. I'll—sure, I can make it. (Suddenly concerned about his clothes.) Do I—I look all right?

stanley. Sure, you look all right. (He flicks a speck off willy's lapel.)

willy. Here—here's a dollar.

stanley. Oh, your son paid me. It's all right.

willy (putting it in stanley's hand). No, take it. You're a good boy.

stanley. Oh, no, you don't have to . . .

willy. Here—here's some more, I don't need it any more. (After a slight pause.) Tell me—is there a seed store in the neighborhood?

stanley. Seeds? You mean like to plant?

As willy turns, stanley slips the money back into his jacket pocket.

willy. Yes. Carrots, peas . . .

stanley. Well, there's hardware stores on Sixth Avenue, but it may be too late now.

willy (anxiously). Oh, I'd better hurry. I've got to get some seeds. (He starts off to the right.) I've got to get some seeds, right away. Nothing's planted. I don't have a thing in the ground.

willy hurries out as the light goes down. stanley moves over to the right after him, watches him off. The other waiter has been staring at willy.

stanley (to the waiter). Well, whatta you looking at?

The waiter picks up the chairs and moves off right. stanley takes the table and follows him. The light fades on this area. There is a long pause, the sound of the flute coming over. The light gradually rises on the kitchen, which is empty. happy appears at the door of the house, followed by biff. happy is carrying a large bunch of long-stemmed roses. He enters the kitchen, looks around for linda. Not seeing her, he turns to biff, who is just outside the house door, and makes a gesture with his hands, indicating "Not here, I guess." He looks into the living room and freezes. Inside, linda, unseen, is seated, willy's coat on her lap. She rises ominously and quietly and moves toward happy, who backs up into the kitchen, afraid.

happy. Hey, what're you doing up? (linda says nothing but moves toward him implacably.) Where's Pop? (He keeps backing to the right, and now linda is in full view in the doorway to the living room.) Is he sleeping?

linda. Where were you?

happy (trying to laugh it off). We met two girls, Mom, very fine types. Here, we brought you some flowers. (Offering them to her.) Put them in your room, Ma.

She knocks them to the floor at biff's feet. He has now come inside and closed the door behind him. She stares at biff, silent.

happy. Now what'd you do that for? Mom, I want you to have some flowers . . .

linda (cutting happy off, violently to biff). Don't you care whether he lives or dies?

happy (going to the stairs). Come upstairs, Biff.

biff (with a flare of disgust, to happy). Go away from me! (To linda.) What do you mean, lives or dies? Nobody's dying around here, pal.

linda. Get out of my sight! Get out of here!

biff. I wanna see the boss.

linda. You're not going near him!

biff. Where is he? (He moves into the living room and linda follows.)

linda (shouting after biff). You invite him for dinner. He looks forward to it all day—(biff appears in his parents' bedroom, looks around, and exits)—and then you desert him there. There's no stranger you'd do that to!

happy. Why? He had a swell time with us. Listen, when I—(linda comes back into the kitchen)—desert him I hope I don't outlive the day!

linda. Get out of here!

happy. Now look, Mom . . .

linda. Did you have to go to women tonight? You and your lousy rotten whores!

biff re-enters the kitchen.

happy. Mom, all we did was follow Biff around trying to cheer him up! (To biff.) Boy, what a night you gave me!

linda. Get out of here, both of you, and don't come back! I don't want you tormenting him any more. Go on now, get your things together! (To biff.) You can sleep in his apartment. (She starts to pick up the flowers and stops herself.) Pick up this stuff, I'm not your maid any more. Pick it up, you bum, you!

happy turns his back to her in refusal. biff slowly moves over and gets down on his knees, picking up the flowers.

linda. You're a pair of animals! Not one, not another living soul would have had the cruelty to walk out on that man in a restaurant!

biff (not looking at her). Is that what he said?

linda. He didn't have to say anything. He was so humiliated he nearly limped when he came in.

happy. But, Mom, he had a great time with us . . .

biff (cutting him off violently). Shut up!

Without another word, happy goes upstairs.

linda. You! You didn't even go in to see if he was all right!

biff (still on the floor in front of linda, the flowers in his hand; with self-loathing). No. Didn't. Didn't do a damned thing. How do you like that, heh? Left him babbling in a toilet.

linda. You louse. You . . .

biff. Now you hit it on the nose! (He gets up, throws the flowers in the wastebasket.) The scum of the earth, and you're looking at him!

linda. Get out of here!

biff. I gotta talk to the boss, Mom. Where is he?

linda. You're not going near him. Get out of this house!

biff (with absolute assurance, determination). No. We're gonna have an abrupt conversation, him and me.

linda. You're not talking to him.

Hammering is heard from outside the house, off right. biff turns toward the noise.

linda (suddenly pleading). Will you please leave him alone?

biff. What's he doing out there?

linda. He's planting the garden!

biff (quietly). Now? Oh, my God!

biff moves outside, linda following. The light dies down on them and comes up on the center of the apron as willy walks into it. He is carrying a flashlight, a hoe, and a handful of seed packets. He raps the top of the hoe sharply to fix it firmly, and then moves to the left, measuring off the distance with his foot. He holds the flashlight to look at the seed packets, reading off the instructions. He is in the blue of night.

willy. Carrots . . . quarter-inch apart. Rows . . . one-foot rows. (He measures it off.) One foot. (He puts down a package and measures off.) Beets. (He puts down another package and measures again.) Lettuce. (He reads the package, puts it down.) One foot—(He breaks off as ben appears at the right and moves slowly down to him.) What a proposition, ts, ts. Terrific, terrific. 'Cause she's suffered, Ben, the woman has suffered. You understand me? A man can't go out the way he came in, Ben, a man has got to add up to something. You can't, you can't—(ben moves toward him as though to interrupt.) You gotta consider now. Don't answer so quick. Remember, it's a guaranteed twenty-thousand-dollar proposition. Now look, Ben, I want you to go through the ins and outs of this thing with me. I've got nobody to talk to, Ben, and the woman has suffered, you hear me?

ben (standing still, considering). What's the proposition?

willy. It's twenty thousand dollars on the barrelhead. Guaranteed, gilt-edged, you understand?

ben. You don't want to make a fool of yourself. They might not honor the policy.

willy. How can they dare refuse? Didn't I work like a coolie to meet every premium on the nose? And now they don't pay off? Impossible!

ben. It's called a cowardly thing, William.

willy. Why? Does it take more guts to stand here the rest of my life ringing up a zero?

ben (yielding). That's a point, William. (He moves, thinking, turns.) And twenty thousand—that is something one can feel with the hand, it is there.

willy (now assured, with rising power). Oh, Ben, that's the whole beauty of it! I see it like a diamond, shining in the dark, hard and rough, that I can pick up and touch in my hand. Not like—like an appointment! This would not be another damned-fool appointment, Ben, and it changes all the aspects. Because he thinks I'm nothing, see, and so he spites me. But the funeral . . . (Straightening up.) Ben, that funeral will be massive! They'll come from Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire! All the old-timers with the strange license plates—that boy will be thunderstruck, Ben, because he never realized—I am known! Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey—I am known, Ben, and he'll see it with his eyes once and for all. He'll see what I am, Ben! He's in for a shock, that boy!

ben (coming down to the edge of the garden). He'll call you a coward.

willy (suddenly fearful). No, that would be terrible.

ben. Yes. And a damned fool.

willy. No, no, he mustn't, I won't have that! (He is broken and desperate.)

ben. He'll hate you, William.

The gay music of the Boys is heard.

willy. Oh, Ben, how do we get back to all the great times? Used to be so full of light, and comradeship, the sleigh-riding in winter, and the ruddiness on his cheeks. And always some kind of good news coming up, always something nice coming up ahead. And never even let me carry the valises in the house, and simonizing, simonizing that little red car! Why, why can't I give him something and not have him hate me?

ben. Let me think about it. (He glances at his watch.) I still have a little time. Remarkable proposition, but you've got to be sure you're not making a fool of yourself.

ben drifts off upstage and goes out of sight. biff comes down from the left.

willy (suddenly conscious of biff, turns and looks up at him, then begins picking up the packages of seeds in confusion). Where the hell is that seed? (Indignantly.) You can't see nothing out here! They boxed in the whole goddam neighborhood!

biff. There are people all around here. Don't you realize that?

willy. I'm busy. Don't bother me.

biff (taking the hoe from willy). I'm saying good-by to you, Pop. (willy looks at him, silent, unable to move.) I'm not coming back any more.

willy. You're not going to see Oliver tomorrow?

biff. I've got no appointment, Dad.

willy. He put his arm around you, and you've got no appointment?

biff. Pop, get this now, will you? Everytime I've left it's been a—fight that sent me out of here. Today I realized something about myself and I tried to explain it to you and I—I think I'm just not smart enough to make any sense out of it for you. To hell with whose fault it is or anything like that. (He takes willy's arm.) Let's just wrap it up, heh? Come on in, we'll tell Mom. (He gently tries to pull willy to left.)

willy (frozen, immobile, with guilt in his voice). No, I don't want to see her.

biff. Come on! (He pulls again, and willy tries to pull away.)

willy (highly nervous). No, no, I don't want to see her.

biff (tries to look into willy's face, as if to find the answer there). Why don't you want to see her?

willy (more harshly now). Don't bother me, will you?

biff. What do you mean, you don't want to see her? You don't want them calling you yellow, do you? This isn't your fault; it's me, I'm a bum. Now come inside! (willy strains to get away.) Did you hear what I said to you?

willy pulls away and quickly goes by himself into the house. biff follows.

linda (to willy). Did you plant, dear?

biff (at the door, to linda). All right, we had it out. I'm going and I'm not writing any more.

linda (going to willy in the kitchen). I think that's the best way, dear. 'Cause there's no use drawing it out, you'll just never get along.

willy doesn't respond.

biff. People ask where I am and what I'm doing, you don't know, and you don't care. That way it'll be off your mind and you can start brightening up again. All right? That clears it, doesn't it? (willy is silent, and biff goes to him.) You gonna wish me luck, scout? (He extends his hand.) What do you say?

linda. Shake his hand, Willy.

willy (turning to her, seething with hurt). There's no necessity—to mention the pen at all, y'know.

biff (gently). I've got no appointment, Dad.

willy (erupting fiercely). He put his arm around . . .?

biff. Dad, you're never going to see what I am, so what's the use of arguing? If I strike oil I'll send you a check. Meantime forget I'm alive.

willy (to linda). Spite, see?

biff. Shake hands, Dad.

willy. Not my hand.

biff. I was hoping not to go this way.

willy. Well, this is the way you're going. Good-by.

biff looks at him a moment, then turns sharply and goes to the stairs.

willy (stops him with). May you rot in hell if you leave this house!

biff (turning). Exactly what is it that you want from me?

willy. I want you to know, on the train, in the mountains, in the valleys, wherever you go, that you cut down your life for spite!

biff. No, no.

willy. Spite, spite, is the word of your undoing! And when you're down and out, remember what did it. When you're rotting somewhere beside the railroad tracks, remember, and don't you dare blame it on me!

biff. I'm not blaming it on you!

willy. I won't take the rap for this, you hear?

happy comes down the stairs and stands on the bottom step, watching.

biff. That's just what I'm telling you!

willy (sinking into a chair at a table, with full accusation). You're trying to put a knife in me—don't think I don't know what you're doing!

biff. All right, phony! Then let's lay it on the line. (He whips the rubber tube out of his pocket and puts it on the table.)

happy. You crazy . . .

linda. Biff! (She moves to grab the hose, but biff holds it down with his hand.)

biff. Leave it there! Don't move it!

willy (not looking at it). What is that?

biff. You know goddam well what that is.

willy (caged, wanting to escape). I never saw that.

biff. You saw it. The mice didn't bring it into the cellar! What is this supposed to do, make a hero out of you? This supposed to make me sorry for you?

willy. Never heard of it.

biff. There'll be no pity for you, you hear it? No pity!

willy (to linda). You hear the spite!

biff. No, you're going to hear the truth—what you are and what I am!

linda. Stop it!

willy. Spite!

happy (coming down toward biff). You cut it now!

biff (to happy). The man don't know who we are! The man is gonna know! (To willy.) We never told the truth for ten minutes in this house!

happy. We always told the truth!

biff (turning on him). You big blow, are you the assistant buyer? You're one of the two assistants to the assistant, aren't you?

happy. Well, I'm practically . . .

biff. You're practically full of it! We all are! and I'm through with it. (To willy.) Now hear this, Willy, this is me.

willy. I know you!

biff. You know why I had no address for three months? I stole a suit in Kansas City and I was in jail. (To linda, who is sobbing.) Stop crying. I'm through with it.

linda turns away from them, her hands covering her face.

willy. I suppose that's my fault!

biff. I stole myself out of every good job since high school!

willy. And whose fault is that?

biff. And I never got anywhere because you blew me so full of hot air I could never stand taking orders from anybody! That's whose fault it is!

willy. I hear that!

linda. Don't, Biff!

biff. It's goddam time you heard that! I had to be boss big shot in two weeks, and I'm through with it!

willy. Then hang yourself! For spite, hang yourself!

biff. No! Nobody's hanging himself, Willy! I ran down eleven flights with a pen in my hand today.

And suddenly I stopped, you hear me? And in the middle of that office building, do you hear this? I stopped in the middle of that building and I saw—the sky. I saw the things that I love in this world. The work and the food and time to sit and smoke. And I looked at the pen and said to myself, what the hell am I grabbing this for? Why am I trying to become what I don't want to be? What am I doing in an office, making a contemptuous, begging fool of myself, when all I want is out there, waiting for me the minute I say I know who I am! Why can't I say that, Willy? (He tries to make willy face him, but willy pulls away and moves to the left.)

willy (with hatred, threateningly). The door of your life is wide open!

biff. Pop! I'm a dime a dozen, and so are you!

willy (turning on him now in an uncontrolled outburst). I am not a dime a dozen! I am Willy Loman, and you are Biff Loman!

biff starts for willy, but is blocked by happy. In his fury, biff seems on the verge of attacking his father.

biff. I am not a leader of men, Willy, and neither are you. You were never anything but a hard-working drummer who landed in the ash can like all the rest of them! I'm one dollar an hour, Willy! I tried seven states and couldn't raise it. A buck an hour! Do you gather my meaning? I'm not bringing home any prizes any more, and you're going to stop waiting for me to bring them home!

willy (directly to biff). You vengeful, spiteful mutt!

biff breaks from happy. willy, in fright, starts up the stairs. biff grabs him.

biff (at the peak of his fury). Pop! I'm nothing! I'm nothing, Pop. Can't you understand that? There's no spite in it any more. I'm just what I am, that's all.

biff's fury has spent itself and he breaks down, sobbing, holding on to willy, who dumbly fumbles for biff's face.

willy (astonished). What're you doing? What're you doing? (To linda.) Why is he crying?

biff (crying, broken). Will you let me go, for Christ's sake? Will you take that phony dream and burn it before something happens? (Struggling to contain himself he pulls away and moves to the stairs.) I'll go in the morning. Put him—put him to bed. (Exhausted, biff moves up the stairs to his room.)

willy (after a long pause, astonished, elevated). Isn't that—isn't that remarkable? Biff—he likes me!

linda. He loves you, Willy!

happy (deeply moved). Always did, Pop.

willy. Oh, Biff! (Staring wildly.) He cried! Cried to me. (He is choking with his love, and now cries out his promise.) That boy—that boy is going to be magnificent!

ben appears in the light just outside the kitchen.

ben. Yes, outstanding, with twenty thousand behind him.

linda (sensing the racing of his mind, fearfully, carefully.) Now come to bed, Willy. It's all settled now.

willy (finding it difficult not to rush out of the house). Yes, we'll sleep. Come on. Go to sleep, Hap.

ben. And it does take a great kind of a man to crack the jungle.

In accents of dread, ben's idyllic music starts up.

happy (his arm around linda). I'm getting married, Pop, don't forget it. I'm changing everything. I'm gonna run that department before the year is up. You'll see, Mom. (He kisses her.)

ben. The jungle is dark but full of diamonds, Willy.

willy turns, moves, listening to ben.

linda. Be good. You're both good boys, just act that way, that's all.

happy. 'Night, Pop. (He goes upstairs.)

linda (to willy). Come, dear.

ben (with greater force). One must go in to fetch a diamond out.

willy (to linda, as he moves slowly along the edge of the kitchen, toward the door). I just want to get settled down, Linda. Let me sit alone for a little.

linda (almost uttering her fear). I want you upstairs.

willy (taking her in his arms). In a few minutes, Linda. I couldn't sleep right now. Go on, you look awful tired. (He kisses her.)

ben. Not like an appointment at all. A diamond is rough and hard to the touch.

willy. Go on now. I'll be right up.

linda. I think this is the only way, Willy.

willy. Sure, it's the best thing.

ben. Best thing!

willy. The only way. Everything is gonna be—go on, kid, get to bed. You look so tired.

linda. Come right up.

willy. Two minutes.

linda goes into the living room, then reappears in her bedroom. willy moves just outside the kitchen door.

willy. Loves me. (Wonderingly.) Always loved me. Isn't that a remarkable thing? Ben, he'll worship me for it!

ben (with promise). It's dark there, but full of diamonds.

willy. Can you imagine that magnificence with twenty thousand dollars in his pocket?

linda (calling from her room). Willy! Come up!

willy (calling into the kitchen). Yes! Yes. Coming! It's very smart, you realize that, don't you, sweetheart? Even Ben sees it. I gotta go, baby. 'By! 'By! (Going over to ben, almost dancing.) Imagine? When the mail comes he'll be ahead of Bernard again!

ben. A perfect proposition all around.

willy. Did you see how he cried to me? Oh, if I could kiss him, Ben!

ben. Time, William, time!

willy. Oh, Ben, I always knew one way or another we were gonna make it, Biff and I.

ben (looking at his watch). The boat. We'll be late. (He moves slowly off into the darkness.)

willy (elegiacally, turning to the house). Now when you kick off, boy, I want a seventy-yard boot, and get right down the field under the ball, and when you hit, hit low and hit hard, because it's important, boy. (He swings around and faces the audience.) There's all kinds of important people in the stands, and the first thing you know . . . (Suddenly realizing he is alone.) Ben! Ben, where do I . . .? (He makes a sudden movement of search.) Ben, how do I . . .?

linda (calling). Willy, you coming up?

willy (uttering a gasp of fear, whirling about as if to quiet her). Sh! (He turns around as if to find his way; sounds, faces, voices, seem to be swarming in upon him and he flicks at them, crying.) Sh! Sh! (Suddenly music, faint and high, stops him. It rises in intensity, almost to an unbearable scream. He goes up and down on his toes, and rushes off around the house.) Shhh!

linda. Willy?

There is no answer. linda waits. biff gets up off his bed. He is still in his clothes. happy sits up. biff stands listening.

linda (with real fear). Willy, answer me! Willy!

There is the sound of a car starting and moving away at full speed.

linda. No!

biff (rushing down the stairs). Pop!

As the car speeds off the music crashes down in a frenzy of sound, which becomes the soft pulsation of a single cello string. biff slowly returns to his bedroom. He and happy gravely don their jackets. linda slowly walks out of her room. The music has developed into a dead march. The leaves of day are appearing over everything. charley and bernard, somberly dressed, appear and knock on the kitchen door. biff and happy slowly descend the stairs to the kitchen as charley and bernard enter. All stop a moment when linda, in clothes of mourning, bearing a little bunch of roses, comes through the draped doorway into the kitchen. She goes to charley and takes his arm. Now all move toward the audience, through the wall-line of the kitchen. At the limit of the apron, linda lays down the flowers, kneels, and sits back on her heels. All stare down at the grave.

Requiem

charley. It’s getting dark, Linda.

linda doesn’t react. She stares at the grave.

biff. How about it, Mom? Better get some rest, heh? They’ll be closing the gate soon.

linda makes no move. Pause.

happy (deeply angered). He had no right to do that. There was no necessity for it. We would’ve helped him.

charley (grunting). Hmmm.

biff. Come along, Mom.

linda. Why didn’t anybody come?

charley. It was a very nice funeral.

linda. But where are all the people he knew? Maybe they blame him.

charley. Naa. It’s a rough world, Linda. They wouldn’t blame him.

linda. I can’t understand it. At this time especially. First time in thirty-five years we were just about free and clear. He only needed a little salary. He was even finished with the dentist.

charley. No man only needs a little salary.

linda. I can’t understand it.

biff. There were a lot of nice days. When he’d come home from a trip; or on Sundays, making the stoop; finishing the cellar; putting on the new porch; when he built the extra bathroom; and put up the garage. You know something, Charley, there’s more of him in that front stoop than in all the sales he ever made.

charley. Yeah. He was a happy man with a batch of cement.

linda. He was so wonderful with his hands.

biff. He had the wrong dreams. All, all, wrong.

happy (almost ready to fight biff). Don’t say that!

biff. He never knew who he was.

charley (stopping happy’s movement and reply; to biff). Nobody dast blame this man. You don’t understand: Willy was a salesman. And for a salesman, there is no rock bottom to the life. He don’t put a bolt to a nut, he don’t tell you the law or give you medicine. He’s a man way out there in the blue, riding on a smile and a shoeshine. And when they start not smiling back—that’s an earthquake. And then you get yourself a couple of spots on your hat, and you’re finished. Nobody dast blame this man. A salesman is got to dream, boy. It comes with the territory.

biff. Charley, the man didn’t know who he was.

happy (infuriated). Don’t say that!

biff. Why don’t you come with me, Happy?

happy. I’m not licked that easily. I’m staying right in this city, and I’m gonna beat this racket! (He looks at biff, his chin set.) The Loman Brothers!

biff. I know who I am, kid.

happy. All right, boy. I'm gonna show you and everybody else that Willy Loman did not die in vain. He had a good dream. It's the only dream you can have—to come out number-one man. He fought it out here, and this is where I'm gonna win it for him.

biff (with a hopeless glance at happy, bends toward his mother). Let's go, Mom.

linda. I'll be with you in a minute. Go on, Charley. (He hesitates.) I want to, just for a minute. I never had a chance to say good-by.

charley moves away, followed by happy. biff remains a slight distance up and left of linda. She sits there, summoning herself. The flute begins, not far away, playing behind her speech.

linda. Forgive me, dear. I can't cry. I don't know what it is, but I can't cry. I don't understand it. Why did you ever do that? Help me, Willy, I can't cry. It seems to me that you're just on another trip. I keep expecting you. Willy, dear, I can't cry. Why did you do it? I search and search and I search, and I can't understand it, Willy. I made the last payment on the house today. Today, dear. And there'll be nobody home. (A sob rises in her throat.) We're free and clear. (Sobbing mournfully, released.) We're free. (biff comes slowly toward her.) We're free . . . We're free . . .

biff lifts her to her feet and moves out up right with her in his arms. linda sobs quietly. bernard and charley come together and follow them, followed by happy. Only the music of the flute is left on the darkening stage as over the house the hard towers of the apartment buildings rise into sharp focus and the curtain falls.

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. -Miller said in the New York Times (February 27, 1949, Sec. II, p. 1) that tragedy shows man's struggle to secure "his sense of personal dignity" and that "his destruction in the attempt posits a wrong or an evil in his environment." Does this make sense when applied to some earlier tragedy (for example, Oedipus Rex or Hamlet), and does it apply convincingly to Death of a Salesman? Is this the tragedy of an individual's own making? Or is society at fault for corrupting and exploiting Willy? Or both?

2. -Is Willy pathetic rather than tragic? If pathetic, does this imply that the play is less worthy than if he is tragic?

3. -Do you feel that Miller is straining too hard to turn a play about a little man into a big, impressive play? For example, do the musical themes, the unrealistic setting, the appearances of Ben, and the speech at the grave seem out of keeping in a play about the death of a salesman?

4. -We don't know what Willy sells, and we don't know whether or not the insurance will be paid after his death. Do you consider these uncertainties to be faults in the play?

5. -Is Howard a villain?

6. -Characterize Linda.

The Play on the Stage

7. -It is sometimes said that in this realistic play that includes symbolic and expressionistic elements, Biff and Happy can be seen as two aspects of Willy. In this view, Biff more or less represents Willy's spiritual needs, and Happy represents his materialism and his sexuality. If you were directing the play, would you adopt this point of view? Whatever your interpretation, how would you costume the brothers?

8. -Although Miller envisioned Willy as a small man (literally small), the role was first performed by Lee J. Cobb, a large man. If you were casting the play, what actor would you select? Why? Whom would you choose for Linda, Biff, Happy, Bernard, and Charley?

9. -Select roughly thirty lines of dialogue, and discuss the movements (gestures and blocking) that as a director you would suggest to the performers.

A CONTEXT FOR DEATH OF A SALESMAN

ARTHUR MILLER

The following essay appeared in the New York Times in 1949, while Death of a Salesman was running on Broadway.

Tragedy and the Common Man [1949]

In this age few tragedies are written. It has often been held that the lack is due to a paucity of heroes among us, or else that modern man has had the blood drawn out of his organs of belief by the skepticism of science, and the heroic attack on life cannot feed on an attitude of reserve and circumspection. For one reason or another, we are often held to be below tragedy—or tragedy above us. The inevitable conclusion is, of course, that the tragic mode is archaic, fit only for the very highly placed, the kings or the kingly, and where this admission is not made in so many words it is most often implied.

I believe that the common man is as apt a subject for tragedy in its highest sense as kings were. On the face of it this ought to be obvious in the light of modern psychiatry, which bases its analysis upon classic formulations, such as the Oedipus and Orestes complexes, for instances, which were enacted by royal beings, but which apply to everyone in similar emotional situations.

More simply, when the question of tragedy in art is not at issue, we never hesitate to attribute to the well-placed and the exalted the very same mental processes as the lowly. And finally, if the exaltation of tragic action were truly a property of the high-bred character alone, it is inconceivable that the mass of mankind should cherish tragedy above all other forms, let alone be capable of understanding it.

As a general rule, to which there may be exceptions unknown to me, I think the tragic feeling is evoked in us when we are in the presence of a character who is ready to lay down his life, if need be, to secure one thing—his sense of personal dignity. From Orestes to Hamlet, Medea to Macbeth, the underlying struggle is that of the individual attempting to gain his “rightful” position in his society.

Sometimes he is one who has been displaced from it, sometimes one who seeks to attain it for the first time, but the fateful wound from which the inevitable events spiral is the wound of indignity, and its dominant force is indignation. Tragedy, then, is the consequence of a man’s total compulsion to evaluate himself justly.

In the sense of having been initiated by the hero himself, the tale always reveals what has been called his “tragic flaw,” a failing that is not peculiar to grand or elevated characters. Nor is it necessarily a weakness. The flaw, or crack in the character, is really nothing—and need be nothing, but his inherent unwillingness to remain passive in the face of what he conceives to be a challenge to his dignity, his image of his rightful status. Only the passive, only those who accept their lot without active retaliation, are “flawless.” Most of us are in that category.

But there are among us today, as there always have been, those who act against the scheme of things that degrades them, and in the process of action everything we have accepted out of fear or insensitivity or ignorance is shaken before us and examined, and from this total onslaught by an individual against the seemingly stable cosmos surrounding us—from this total examination of the "unchangeable" environment—comes the terror and the fear that is classically associated with tragedy.

More important, from this total questioning of what has previously been unquestioned, we learn. And such a process is not beyond the common man. In revolutions around the world, these past thirty years, he has demonstrated again and again this inner dynamic of all tragedy.

Insistence upon the rank of the tragic hero, or the so-called nobility of his character, is really but a clinging to the outward forms of tragedy. If rank or nobility of character was indispensable, then it would follow that the problems of those with rank were the particular problems of tragedy. But surely the right of one monarch to capture the domain from another no longer raises our passions, nor are our concepts of justice what they were to the mind of an Elizabethan king.

The quality in such plays that does shake us, however, derives from the underlying fear of being displaced, the disaster inherent in being torn away from our chosen image of what and who we are in this world. Among us today this fear is as strong, and perhaps stronger, than it ever was. In fact, it is the common man who knows this fear best.

Now, if it is true that tragedy is the consequence of a man's total compulsion to evaluate himself justly, his destruction in the attempt posits a wrong or an evil in his environment. And this is precisely the morality of tragedy and its lesson. The discovery of the moral law, which is what the enlightenment of tragedy consists of, is not the discovery of some abstract or metaphysical quantity.

The tragic right is a condition of life, a condition in which the human personality is able to flower and realize itself. The wrong is the condition which suppresses man, perverts the flowing out of his love and creative instinct. Tragedy enlightens—and it must, in that it points the heroic finger at the enemy of man's freedom. The thrust for freedom is the quality in tragedy which exalts. The revolutionary questioning of the stable environment is what terrifies. In no way is the common man debarred from such thoughts or such actions.

Seen in this light, our lack of tragedy may be partially accounted for by the turn which modern literature has taken toward the purely psychiatric view of life, or the purely sociological. If all our miseries, our indignities, are born and bred within our minds, then all action, let alone the heroic action, is obviously impossible.

And if society alone is responsible for the cramping of our lives, then the protagonist must needs be so pure and faultless as to force us to deny his validity as a character. From neither of these views can tragedy derive, simply because neither represents a balanced concept of life. Above all else, tragedy requires the finest appreciation by the writer of cause and effect.

No tragedy can therefore come about when its author fears to question absolutely everything, when he regards any institution, habit or custom as being either everlasting, immutable or inevitable. In the tragic view the need of man to wholly realize himself is the only fixed star, and whatever it is that hedges his nature and lowers it is ripe for attack and examination. Which is not to say that tragedy must preach revolution.

The Greeks could probe the very heavenly origin of their ways and return to confirm the rightness of laws. And Job could face God in anger, demanding his right and end in submission. But for a moment everything is in suspension, nothing is accepted, and in this stretching and tearing apart of the cosmos, in the very action of so doing, the character gains "size," the tragic stature which is spuriously attached to the royal or the highborn in our minds. The commonest of men may take on that stature to the extent of his willingness to throw all he has into the contest, the battle to secure his rightful place in his world.

There is a misconception of tragedy with which I have been struck in review after review, and in many conversations with writers and readers alike. It is the idea that tragedy is of necessity allied to pessimism. Even the dictionary says nothing more about the word than that it means a story with a sad or unhappy ending. This impression is so firmly fixed that I almost hesitate to claim that in truth tragedy implies more optimism in its author than does comedy, and that its final result ought to be the reinforcement of the onlooker's brightest opinions of the human animal.

For, if it is true to say that in essence the tragic hero is intent upon claiming his whole due as a personality, and if this struggle must be total and without reservation, then it automatically demonstrates the indestructible will of man to achieve his humanity.

The possibility of victory must be there in tragedy. Where pathos rules, where pathos is finally derived, a character has fought a battle he could not possibly have won. The pathetic is achieved when the protagonist is, by virtue of his witlessness, his insensitivity or the very air he gives off, incapable of grappling with a much superior force.

Pathos truly is the mode for the pessimist. But tragedy requires a nicer balance between what is possible and what is impossible. And it is curious, although edifying, that the plays we revere, century after century, are the tragedies. In them, and in them alone, lies the belief—optimistic, if you will—in the perfectibility of man.

It is time, I think, that we who are without kings, took up this bright thread of our history and followed it to the only place it can possibly lead in our time—the heart and spirit of the average man.

EVE MERRIAM, PAULA WAGNER, AND JACK HOFSISS

When the actress Paula Wagner expressed dissatisfaction with some of the roles she had played, Eve Merriam suggested that Wagner do a one-woman show drawing on Merriam's anthology of journals and letters, Growing Up Female (1971). Merriam and Wagner together made the selection for the performance, and then, in collaboration with the director Jack Hofsiss, decided to convert the work, now titled Out of Our Fathers' House, into a play for three actresses and several musicians. It was first produced in 1975.

Eve Merriam (1916–1992) wrote plays, poetry, fiction, and nonfiction. Among her awards is an Obie for The Club. Paula Wagner, now a film agent in Hollywood, has played major roles in classical and modern dramas. Jack Hofsiss, director of many productions, won a Tony award for his direction of The Elephant Man.

Out of Our Fathers' House

CHARACTERS

eliza southgate (1783–1809), schoolgirl elizabeth cady stanton (1815–1902), founder of the Women's Suffrage Movement

maria mitchell (1818–1889), astronomer

"mother" mary jones (1830–1930), labor organizer

dr. anna howard shaw (1847–1919), minister and doctor

elizabeth gertrude stern (1890–1954), in the Jewish ghetto

Three actresses play all six women and the minor characters. Musicians perform the songs (number of singers and instruments used are at the discretion of the director). actress #1 plays eliza southgate and gertrude stern; actress #2 plays maria mitchell and anna howard shaw; actress #3 plays elizabeth cady stanton and mother mary jones. Out of Our Fathers' House may also be performed by six actresses.

Out of Our Fathers' House, while taken from the actual writings of the characters portrayed, takes the theatrical form of a hypothetical conversation among the different woman characters. This is historically impossible, since these women could never have had such a conversation, but it is valid for the purposes of the piece. This is a timeless interaction in which these women act out for both themselves and each other the stories of their lives—in particular the accounts of their emergence "out of their fathers' house." It is essential that the piece be personal and conversational. The characters are not retelling but rather reliving their experiences. Both together and alone they make the journey into a world of self-sufficiency and the "solitude of self."

The stage is an abandoned summerhouse; there is a carousel horse, battered and broken, upstage right; a wicker table upstage center, or possibly an old coatrack, and another coatrack upstage left. Down center are three chairs placed in a semicircle in which musicians sit playing as the audience enters. The mood should be warm and comfortable. This is the secret place where one would run off to think and be alone.

As the lights dim, the musicians begin to sing.

Song: "Built My Lady a Fine Brick House"

I built my lady a fine brick house,
I built it in a garden.
I put her in, but she jumped out,
Oh, fare thee well, my darling.
I built my lady a high stone wall,
I built it in a garden.
I put her in, but she jumped out,
Oh, fare thee well, my darling.
I built my lady a gate with a lock,

I built it in a garden.

I put her in, but she jumped out,

So fare thee well, my darling.

(actress #1. has entered during the last part of the song and states the first of the rules of etiquette for young ladies of the late eighteenth century in America. Others follow and take lines in sequence. The actresses carry with them lanterns and large wicker baskets which contain any props and costumes they might need for the show. It has the effect of running away from home. Rules of etiquette:)

actress #1. Bite not thy bread, but break it.

actress #2. Look not earnestly at any other that is eating.

actress #3. Never sit down at the table until asked, and after the blessing.

actress #1. When moderately satisfied, leave the table.

actress #2. Sing not, hum not, wriggle not.

actress #3. When any speak to thee, stand up.

actress #2. Say not "I have heard it before."

actress #1. Never endeavor to help him out if he tell it not right.

actress #3. Snigger not. Never question the truth of it.

actress #2. Do not remove the gloves.

actress #3. Do not make a call of ceremony on a wet day . . . Always have an umbrella beside you and overshoes.

actress #1. Getting wet seldom fails to produce a cold.

actress #2. To lose your dinner is not half so dangerous.

actress #3. Wet feet and wet clothes have sent thousands to eternity before their time.

actress #1. Avoid unnecessary exposure to the evening air.

actress #2. Do not touch the piano unless asked.

actress #3. Do not call upon a gentleman unless he is a confirmed invalid.

(The musicians are offstage by now)

Song: "Little Bird"

(Theme for Gertrude Stern)

I'm as free a little bird as I can be

I'm as free a little bird as I can be

I will build my nest in the sour apple tree

Where those bad boys will never bother me.

voice. Elizabeth Gertrude Stern, born in 1890 in a Jewish ghetto of a large Midwestern city, growing up to obey her father's commandments.

Oh, who will shoe your little foot?

And who will glove your little hand?

(Pause.)

gertrude (Sings).

Oh, it's papa will shoe my little foot

And it's mama will glove my little hand

(Spoken)

I remember looking down at the face of my father, beautiful and still in death, and for a brief moment, feeling my heart rise up . . . Surely it was in a strange suffocating relief . . . Now I am free!

(Sings)

And it's you who'll kiss my red-rosy cheek

When you come from that far-distant land.

Song: "Molly Hare"

(Theme for Mother Jones)

Old Molly Hare, what are you doing there?

Running through a cotton patch as fast as I can tear.

Riding of a goat, leading of a sheep,

I won't be back till the middle of the week.

voice. Mary Harris Jones, born in 1830, lived to be one hundred years old and became known to children and adults alike as "Mother Jones."

mary. I asked a man in prison once how he happened to be there, and he said that he had stolen a pair of shoes. I told him if he had stolen a railroad he would be a United States Senator.

Song: “My Horses Ain’t Hungry”

(Theme for Anna Shaw)

My horses ain’t hungry, they won’t eat your hay,
So I’ll get on my pony, I’m going away.
With all our belongings we’ll ride till we come To a lonely little cabin, we’ll call it our home.

voice. Anna Howard Shaw, at age twelve, moved from a manufacturing town in Massachusetts to the wild woods of Michigan in 1859.

anna. Once when I was fourteen, I had been in the woods all day, buried in my books, and when I returned home at night, still in the dream world these books had opened to me, Father was awaiting my coming, dark with disapproval . . . I was an idler who wasted time. He ended a long arraignment by predicting that with such tendencies I would make nothing of my life.

Song: “What’ll We Do with the Baby?”

(Theme for Elizabeth)

What’ll we do with the baby?
What’ll we do with the baby?
What’ll we do with the baby-o?
We’ll wrap it up in calico!
Wrap it up in calico and send it to its pappy-o.

voice. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, born in New York State in 1815 . . . The same year her father was elected to Congress.

elizabeth. The custom of calling women Mrs. John This and Mrs. Tom That, and colored men Sambo and Zip-coon, is founded on the principle that white men are the lords of all. I cannot acknowledge this principle, and therefore I cannot bear the name of another. If the nineteenth century is to be governed by the opinions of the eighteenth, and the twentieth by the nineteenth, then the world will always be governed by dead men. I would rather make a few slanders from a superabundance of life than to have all the proprieties of a well-embalmed mummy.

Song: “Rose, Rose and Up She Rises”

(Theme for Maria Mitchell)

Rose, rose and up she rises,

Rose, rose and up she rises,

Rose, rose and up she rises

So early in the morning.

I wonder where Maria’s gone?

I wonder where Maria’s gone?

I wonder where Maria’s gone?

So early in the morning?

voice. Maria Mitchell, born on Nantucket Island in 1818. Her father was devoted to astronomy, and all the children were drafted into the service of counting seconds by the chronometer during his observations.

maria. Once a lady asked me if I told fortunes, and when I replied in the negative, she asked me if I weren’t an astronomer. I admitted that I made efforts in that direction. She then asked me what could I tell if not fortunes. I told her that I could tell when the moon would rise, and when the sun would set. She said, “Oh,” in a tone which plainly implied “Is that all?”

Song: “Young Maid”

(Theme for Eliza Southgate)

When I was a young maid, young maid,

When I was a young maid, then oh then

It was ha, ha, this-a-way, ha, ha, that-a-way

This-a-way, that-a-way, then.

voice. Eliza Southgate, born in 1783 in Scarborough, Maine . . . sent by her parents to finishing school near Boston when she was fourteen.

eliza. You may justly say, my best of fathers, that every letter of mine is one which is asking for something more; never contented . . . I only ask. If you refuse me, I know you do what you think best, and I am sure I ought not to complain, for you have never yet refused me anything that I have asked, my best of parents, how shall I repay you?

Song: “Listen to the Voices”

Listen to the voices

Out of darkness into daybreak

Making their lives.

(At this point, the actresses sit in the chairs that are placed center, and begin to knit, and write, and comb their hair. A musician sings. The song is “Monday Morning.”) musician.

How old are you, my fair young maid?

I’m going to be sixteen next Monday morning.

eliza. Such a frolic! Such a chain of adventures I never before met with. For two days it had been storming so much that the snow drifts were very large; however, as it was the last assembly, I could not resist the temptation of going, as I knew all the world would be there. About seven I went downstairs and immediately slipt on my socks and coat, and met Mr. Motley in the entry. The snow was deep, but Mr. Motley took me up in his arms, and sat me in the carriage without difficulty. I found a full assembly, many married ladies, and every one disposed to end the winter in good spirits. At one we left dancing. It stormed dreadfully, we could not get a coach until three o’clock. There were now twenty in waiting, the gentlemen scolding and fretting, the ladies murmuring and complaining as they all flocked to engage a seat. Luckily I was one of the first. Mr. Motley took me up in his arms and carried me till my weight pressed him so far into the snow that he had no power to move his feet. I rolled out of his arms and wallowed till I reached the gate; then rising to shake off the snow, I turned and beheld my beau fixed and immovable; he could not get his feet out to take another step! At length, making a great exertion to spring his whole length forward, he made out to reach the poor horse, who lay in a worse condition than his master. By this time all the family had gathered to the window. Indeed they saw the whole frolic. I was perfectly convulsed with laughter.

maria. I was up before six, made the fire in the kitchen and made coffee. Then I set the table in the dining room, and made the fire there. Toasted the bread and trimmed the lamps. Rang the breakfast bell at seven. After breakfast, made my bed, and "put up" the room. Then I came down to the library and looked over my comet computations till noon. I am just beginning to notice the different colors of the stars. I wonder that I have been so long insensible to this charm in the skies. The tints of different stars are so delicate in their variety . . . Before dinner I did some tatting, and made seven button-holes for K. I dressed and then dined.

elizabeth. The first event engraved on my memory was the birth of a sister when I was four years old. I heard so many friends remark, "What a pity it is she is a girl!" that I felt a kind of compassion for the little baby. True, our family consisted of five girls and only one boy, but I did not understand at the time that girls were considered an inferior order of beings.

eliza. Mother dear: You mentioned in yours of the sixteenth that it was a long time since you had received a letter from me; but it was owing to my studies. Now, Mama, what do you think I am going to ask you for? A wig. Eleanor Coffin has got a new one just like my hair, and it's only five dollars. I must either cut my hair or have one—I cannot dress it at all stylish. How much time it will save. In one year's time we could save it in pins and paper, besides the trouble. At the assembly I was quite ashamed of my head, for nobody has long hair. If you will consent to my having one, do send me a five-dollar bill by the post immediately after you receive this, for I am in hopes to have it for the next assembly.

maria. Came back again to the library at one-thirty . . . and looked over another set of computations, which took me until four o'clock. I was pretty tired by that time, and rested by reading "Cosmos." Lizzie E. came in, and I gossiped for half an hour. I went home to tea, and that over, I made a loaf of bread. Then I went up to my room and read through—partly writing—two exercises in German, which took me thirty-five minutes. It was stormy, and I had no observing to do, so I sat down to my tatting. Lizzie E. came in and I took a new lesson in tatting, so as to make the pearl-edge. I made about half a yard during the evening. What a pity that we cannot take dye stuff from the stars, so as to create a new brilliancy in fashion . . . At a little after nine I went home with Lizzie, and carried to the post office. I had kept steadily at work for sixteen hours when I went to bed.

(At this point, the actresses begin to act out what they are saying. They can move around the

elizabeth. A student in my father's office told me one day, after conning my features carefully, that I had one defect that he could remedy. "Your eyebrows should be darker and heavier," he said, "and if you will let me shave them once or twice, you will be much improved." I consented, and slight as my eyebrows were, they seemed to have a handsome expression, for the loss of them had a most singular effect on my appearance. Everybody, including the shaver, laughed at my odd-looking face, and I was in the depths of humiliation while my eyebrows were growing out again. Needless to say, I never permitted the young man to repeat the experiment, although strongly urged to do so.

maria. I swept the sky two hours last night. Not a fringe of a cloud, all clear, all beautiful. I really enjoy that kind of work, but my back soon becomes tired, long before the cold chills me. I saw two nebulae in Leo with which I was not familiar, and that repaid me for the time . . . There will come with the greater love of science greater love to one another. We cannot see how impartially Nature gives of her riches to all without loving all, and helping all.

elizabeth. When I was eleven years old, my only brother, who had just graduated from Union College, came home to die. A young man of great talent and promise, he was the pride of my father's heart. I recall going into the large darkened parlor and finding the casket, mirrors and pictures all draped in white, and my father seated, pale and immovable as he took no notice of me. After standing a long while, I climbed upon his knee, when he mechanically put his arm about me, and with my head resting against his beating heart, we both sat in silence, he thinking of the wreck of all his hopes in the loss of a dear son—and I wondering what could be said or done to fill the void in his breast. At length he heaved a deep sigh and said, "Oh, my daughter, I wish you were a boy!" Throwing my arms about his neck, I replied, "I will try to be all my brother was." All that day, and far into the night I pondered the problems of boyhood. I thought that the chief thing to be done in order to equal boys was to be learned and courageous. So I decided to study Greek and learn to manage a horse. I learned to leap a fence on horseback. I began to study Latin, Greek and mathematics with a class of boys in the Academy, many of whom were much older than I. For three years one boy kept his place at the head of the class, and I always stood next. Two prizes were offered in Greek. I strove for one and took the second. One thought alone filled my mind. "Now," said I, "my father will be satisfied with me." I rushed into his office, laid the new Greek testament, which was my prize, on his table, and exclaimed: "I got it!" He took up the book, asked me some questions about the class, and evidently pleased, handed it back to me. Then he kissed me on the forehead and exclaimed with a sigh, "You should have been a boy!"

eliza. I thank heaven I was born a woman. I have now only patiently to wait till some clever fellow shall take a fancy to me and place me in a situation, I am determined to make the best of it, let it be what it will. We ladies, you know, possess that "sweet pliability of temper." But remember, I desire to be thankful I am not a man—I should not be content with mediocrity in any thing, but as a woman I am equal to the generality of my sex, and I do not feel that great desire of fame I think I should if I was a man. Were I a man, the law would be my choice. When I might hope to arrive at an eminence which would be gratifying to my feelings, I should then hope to be a public character, respected and admired. To be an eloquent speaker would be the delight of my heart.

elizabeth. As my father's office joined the house, I spent much of my time there, when out of school, talking with the students, and reading the laws in regard to women. One Christmas morning I went into the office to show them, among others of my presents, a new coral necklace and bracelets. They all admired the jewelry and then began to tease me with hypothetical cases of future ownership. "Now," said one, "if in due time you should be my wife, those ornaments would be mine. I could take them and lock them up, and you could never wear them except with my permission. I could even exchange them for a box of cigars, and you could watch them evaporate in smoke." When my attention was called to these odious laws, I would mark them in my father's books with a pencil, and I resolved to seize the first opportunity, when alone in the office, to cut every one of them out of the books; supposing my father and his library were the beginning and end of the law . . . However, this mutilation of his volumes was never accomplished. He explained to me one evening how laws were made, and that if his library should burn up it would make no difference in woman's condition. "When you are grown up, and able to prepare a speech," said he, "you must go down to Albany and talk to the legislators; tell them all you have seen in this office; the sufferings of women, robbed of their inheritance and left dependent on their unworthy sons, and if you can persuade them to pass new laws, the old ones will be a dead letter." Thus was the future object of my life foreshadowed and my duty plainly outlined by him who was most opposed to my public career when, in due time, I entered upon it.

maria. It seems to me that the needle is the chain of woman and has fettered her more than the laws of the country.

elizabeth. Sewing as an amusement is contemptible. It should be the study of every woman to do as little of it as possible.

maria. Once you emancipate her from the stitch-stitch-stitch, she would have time for studies which engross as never the needle can. I have a hunger of the mind which longs for knowledge of all around. Astronomy seems to me particularly fitted to women. A girl's eye is trained from early childhood to be keen, trained to the nicety of color. The eye that directs a needle in the delicate meshes of embroidery will equally bisect a star with the spider web of the micrometer.

elizabeth. When a woman pulls a cotton washrag from her pocket and begins to knit with a bowed head, fixing her eyes and concentrating her thoughts on a rag one foot square, it is impossible for conversation to rise above the washrag level. Think of the optic nerves being concentrated on a cotton rag. One can buy a whole dozen of these useful appliances with red borders and fringed for twenty-five cents. I beseech you, knit no more!

anna. Like most men, my dear father should have never married. In practical matters he remained a child. To him, an acorn was not an acorn, but a forest of young oaks; thus when he took up his claim of three hundred and sixty acres of land in the wilderness of northern Michigan, and sent my mother and five young children to live there alone until he could join us, he gave no thought to the matter in which we were to make the struggle and survive the hardships before us. From his viewpoint, he was doing a man's duty. He had furnished us with land and the four walls of a log cabin. Some day, he reasoned, the place would be a fine estate which his sons would inherit, and in the course of time pass on to their sons. But to the present, we were one hundred miles from a railroad, forty miles from the nearest post office, and half a dozen miles from any neighbors, save Indians, wolves and wildcats; we were wholly unlearned in the ways of the woods, yet we faced our situation with clear and unalarmed eyes the morning after our arrival. We held a family council after breakfast and in this, though I was only twelve, I took an eager and determined part. I loved work—it has always been my favorite form of recreation—and my spirit rose to the opportunities of it which smiled on us from every side. You see, I knew I was doing my share for the family, and already too, I had begun to feel the call of my career. For some reason I wanted to preach . . . to talk to people, to tell them things. Just why, just what, I did not yet know, but I had begun to preach in the silent woods—to stand upon tree stumps and address the unresponsive trees—to feel the stir of aspiration within me. Some day I am going to college. And before I die I shall be worth ten thousand dollars.

gertrude. The first clear impression of my childhood is a summer day.

voice. Elizabeth Gertrude Stern, born in 1890 in a Jewish ghetto of a large Midwestern city, growing up to obey her father's commandments.

gertrude. My mother, in her puffed sleeves and tight-fitting dress, walked near my father, in his long coat and high hat: for he was assistant to the rabbi in our city. We children trudged behind. We came at last to the river's edge. Our father stood, waited a moment, and then prayed that his sins should be washed away by the river. I looked into the muddy waters below us, and at my father. All my life I had believed that, even when I resisted him, he was right. But today it seemed to me childish and perhaps even silly to be standing there, chanting that beautiful old tongue, the Hebrew, that I too had been taught, and asking that our sins be washed away. Most of the people who lived near us were Catholics. They believed that if you told the priest what you had done, you would not be punished for your misdeeds. When I told my father one day of the Catholics, he looked down at me from his tall height, and said, "You can see how foolish and childish ignorant people are. A priest tells them that if they go to him, and confess, he can forgive them. Can a sin be undone by confession?" And yet here was my father, grave and pleading, sending our own sins down the waters of the Ohio. I looked at him, opened my mouth, but did not speak. I knew he would be angry. From that day, however, I did not accept anything he told me about our faith until maria. How can we dispute authority which has come down to us all established for ages? We cannot accept anything as granted beyond the first mathematical formula. Question everything else.

I analyzed it myself.

mary. My husband was an iron moulder and a staunch member of the Iron Moulders' Union. We were living in Memphis when a yellow fever epidemic swept the city. Its victims were mainly among the poor and the workers. The rich and the well-to-do fled the city. Schools and churches were closed. People were not permitted to enter the house of a yellow fever victim without permits. The poor could not afford nurses. Across the street from me, ten persons lay dead from the plague. The dead surrounded us. They were buried at night, quickly and without ceremony. All about my house I could hear weeping and the cries of delirium. One by one, my four little children sickened and died. I washed their little bodies and got them ready for burial.

My husband caught the fever and died. I sat alone through nights of grief. No one came to me. No one could. Other homes were as stricken as mine. All day long, all night long, I heard the grating of the wheels of the death cart.

After the union had buried my husband I got a permit to nurse the sufferers. This I did until the plague was stamped out. I returned to Chicago and went again into the dress-making business. I became more and more engrossed with the labor struggle and I decided to take an active part in the efforts of the working people to better the conditions under which they worked and lived. I became a member of the Knights of Labor. From that time on, I became wholly engrossed in the labor movement.

gertrude. My father did not approve of my continuing high school. It was time for me to think of marrying a pious man. He and Mother disagreed about it—their one quarrel. It was perhaps due to my going to high school, Mother said, gently and dubiously, that I wanted something new. I wanted to dance, to play, to have fun. I didn't mean to go to work at fourteen or fifteen, marry at sixteen, be a mother at eighteen, and an old woman at thirty. My mother drew her fine dark brows together. She took my face in her little hands, round and soft, in spite of her constant work. "You shall learn to dance, my daughter." And dance I did. I learned to dance in what, I suppose, was a dreadful public dance hall, for I paid a quarter a lesson there once every Wednesday night, and I danced with the lady instructor whenever she thought of me. But I faithfully put my foot out . . . one-two-three and turn . . . as the long line of men and women learned the steps of the waltz. I learned to two-step, and to Schottische, and even—wild days those—to do the barn dance. I wanted a new thing: happiness.

elizabeth. "What to do with a baby!" Though motherhood is the most important of all the professions, requiring more knowledge than any other department in human affairs, there was no attention given to preparation for this office. When my baby was four days old, we discovered that his collarbone was bent. The physician, wishing to get a pressure on the shoulder, braced the bandage round the wrist.

first doctor. Leave that ten days, and then it will be all right.

elizabeth. Soon after he left, I noticed that the baby's hand was blue, showing that the circulation had been impeded. This will never do. Nurse, take it off.

nurse. No, indeed. I shall never interfere with the doctor.

elizabeth. So I took it on myself to send for another doctor. He expressed great surprise that the first should have put on so severe a bandage.

second doctor. That would do for a grown man, but ten days of it on a child would make him a cripple.

elizabeth. However, he did nearly the same thing, only fastening it round the hand, instead of the wrist. I soon saw that the ends of the fingers were all purple. So I took it off. What we want is a little pressure on that bone; that is what both those men have aimed at. How can we get it without involving the arm is the question.

nurse. I'm sure I don't know.

elizabeth. Well, bring me three strips of linen rolled double. I then folded one, wet in arnica and water, and laid it on the collarbone. I put two other bands, like a pair of suspenders, over the shoulders, crossing them both in front and behind, pinning the ends to the diaper, which gave the needed pressure without impeding the circulation anywhere. Several times night and day, we wet the compress and readjusted the bands, until the inflammation had subsided. At the end of ten days, the doctors appeared and made their examination. All was right. Whereupon I told them how badly their bandages worked, and what I had done myself. They smiled at each other and said:

first doctor. Well . . .

second doctor. Well . . .

first doctor. Well . . .

second doctor. Well . . .

first doctor. After all, a mother's instinct . . .

second doctor. . . . is better than a man's reason.

elizabeth. Thank you, gentlemen, there was no instinct about it. I did some hard thinking before I saw how I could get pressure on the shoulder without impeding the circulation, as you did. . . . I trusted neither men nor books completely after this, either in regard to the heavens above or the earth below, but continued to use my "mother's instinct," if "reason" is too dignified a term to apply to a woman's thoughts.

maria. People have to learn sometimes not only how much the heart, but how much the head can bear.

anna. As an aid to public speaking I was taught to "elocute," and I remember in every mournful detail the occasion on which I gave my first recitation. We were having our monthly "public exhibition night," and the audience included not only my classmates, but their parents and friends as well. The selection I intended to recite was a poem entitled "No Sects in Heaven." But, when I faced my audience, I was so appalled by its size and by the sudden realization of my own temerity, that I fainted during the delivery of the first verse. Sympathetic classmates carried me into an anteroom and revived me, after which they naturally assumed that the entertainment I furnished was over for the evening. I, however, felt that if I let that failure stand against me I could never afterward speak in public; and within ten minutes, notwithstanding the protests of my friends, I was back in the hall and beginning my recitation a second time. The audience gave me its eager attention. Possibly it hoped to see me topple off the platform again, but nothing of the sort occurred. I went through the recitation with self-possession and even received some friendly applause at the end.

mary. I organized an army of women housekeepers. On a given day they were to bring their mops and brooms and "the Army" would charge the scabs up at the mines. The general manager, the sheriff, and the corporation hirelings heard of our plans and were on hand. The day came and the women came with the mops and brooms and pails of water. I decided not to go up to the drip mouth myself, for I knew they would arrest me and that might rout the Army. I selected as leader an Irish woman who had a most picturesque appearance. She had slept late and her husband had told her to hurry up and get into the Army. She had grabbed a red petticoat and slipped it over a thick cotton nightgown. She wore a black stocking and a white one. She had tied a little red fringed shawl over her wild red hair. Her face was red and her eyes were mad. I looked at her and felt that she could raise a rumpus. I said, "You lead the Army up to the drip mouth, take that tin dishpan you have with you and your hammer, and when the scabs and the mules come up, begin to hammer and howl. Then all of you hammer and howl and be ready to chase the scabs with your mops and brooms. Don't be afraid of anyone!" Up the mountainside, yelling and hollering, she led the women, and when the mules came up with the scabs and the coal, she began beating on the dishpan and hollering, and all the Army joined in with her. The sheriff tapped her on the shoulder. "My dear lady," said he, "remember the mules. Don't frighten them." She took the old tin pan and she hit him with it and she hollered, "To hell with you and the mules!" He fell over and dropped into the creek. Then the mules began to rebel against scabbing. They bucked and kicked the scab drivers and started off for the barn. The scabs started running down the hill, followed by the army of women with their mops and pails and brooms. A poll parrot in a nearby shack screamed at the superintendent, "Ya got hell, did you? Ya got hell?" There was a great big doctor in the crowd, a company lap dog. He had a little satchel in his hand, and he said to me, "Mrs. Jones, I have a warrant for your arrest." "All right," said I, "keep it in your pill bag until I call for it. I am going to hold a meeting now." From that day on the women kept continual watch of the mines to see that the company did not bring in scabs. Every day women with brooms or mops in one hand and babies in the other arm, wrapped in little blankets, went to the mines and watched that no one went in. And all night long they kept watch.

There had been no bloodshed. There had been no riots. And the victory was due to the army of women with their mops and brooms.

gertrude. I had known for months that I loved Dr. Morton. That was why I could speak to him of those things I felt most deeply, and why I felt the peace of my work. We were young, and we were well. We were mysterious and beautiful to one another. I had, all my life, thought of the womanhood in me as something to be deprecated. I knew that a man of my faith must absent himself from his wife, as from defilement at certain holy times of his life. And always she must humbly beg God to pardon her that she is a woman. Had I not read in the prayer book the words my brothers and my father spoke daily . . . thanking God they were not women?

But my husband was modern. He said I must do anything I wanted to do, just as he did what he chose. Only, he must earn our living. Whatever I did I could do without thinking whether it was successful or not, only whether it made me happy. I took his hands in mine. I kissed him. But as I did, I know I wished he had said that my work was as practical a need to me as his. He thought I might do social work as a volunteer, without pay. I was, however, determined not to be an amateur. I wanted to work just as he did. I would not be happy otherwise. “So you want a career,” he smiled, “and a husband tacked on?” “Haven’t you one with me tacked on?” He kissed me then and laughed very tenderly indeed. “I like to work,” I then said quietly. “I enjoy being important.” He laughed then, relieved. He was delighted that I spoke like a child about my work. He kissed me and held me close.

maria. I put some wires into my telescope this morning. I dreaded it so much when I found yesterday that it must be done, that it disturbed my sleep. It was much easier than I expected. I took out the little collimating screws first, then I drew out the tube, and in that I found a brass plate which contained the lines . . . I was at first a little puzzled to know which screws held this in its place, and as I was very anxious not to unscrew the wrong ones, I took time to consider and found I need turn only two. Then out slipped the little plate with its three wires where five should have been, two having been broken. I took the hairs from my own head, taking care to pick out white ones because I have no dark ones to spare. I put in the two, by sticking them with sealing wax dissolved in alcohol into the little grooved lines which I had found. When I had, with great labor, adjusted these, as I thought, firmly, I perceived that some of the wax was still on the hairs and would make them yet coarser, and they were already too coarse: so I washed them with clear alcohol. Almost at once I washed out another wire and soon another. I went to work patiently and put in the five perpendicular ones besides the horizontal one, which like the others, had frizzled up and appeared to melt away. With another hour’s labor I got in the five, when a rude motion raised them all again and I began over.

elizabeth. When I married Mr. Stanton, he announced to me that his business would occupy all his time, and that I must take charge of the housekeeping.

It is a proud moment in a woman's life to reign supreme within four walls. I studied up everything pertaining to housekeeping. Even washing day had its charms for me. The clean clothes on the lines and on the grass looked so white and smelled so sweet. I inspired my laundress with an ambition to get the clothes out earlier than our neighbors, and to have them ironed and put away sooner. I also felt the same ambition to excel in all departments of the culinary arts that I did at school in the different branches of learning. My love of order and cleanliness was carried throughout, from parlor to kitchen, from front door to back. I even gave the man an extra shilling to pile the logs of firewood with their smooth ends outward.

maria. There is an article on the study of medicine by women that states it would be better for the husband always to be superior to the wife. Why? And if so, doesn't this condemn the ablest of women to a single life? It is sad to see a woman sacrificing the ties of affection, even to do good.

gertrude. During the influenza epidemic of 1917 my husband came down with the sickness. We already had two children. I knew that I must get work. Not, now, work to fill the time, or to express myself, but to earn the living of my family. What could I do?

One day it came to me. A big store needed a personnel director. The store manager spoke to me, smiled to hear I was a college woman, was interested but not antagonistic when he heard I was married. "Now, if you prove to be what we're looking for, there is a big job ahead of you, but first, you must know the work. First you must be a saleswoman." I was sent to the linen department, then to the dress department. From there I was promoted to hats, and then to jewelry and books.

I had a problem not different from those many others were facing. I learned how to adjust things a bit. I prepared breakfast the night before. I taught my young daughter how to feed her little brother. I arranged for lunches for my children with a woman who lived near the school. Sometimes, I would run out to my home at noon, missing my own lunch, but having the peace of seeing that everything went well with my husband. He was tired and lonely, but he said nothing.

He would sit, waiting till the children came home. After months I was promoted to the position of personnel director. I was a woman with a career for certain now. I was shown to my office. A pretty little thing with a real desk, a telephone, and a tray . . . for what? . . . for business letters. It looked just like the wire tray in which I drained dishes.

maria. Just at one o'clock I had got them all back in again. I attempted to put the plate back into its place. The sealing wax was not dry, and with a sudden motion I sent the wires all agog . . .

elizabeth. My second son was born, and a third. We moved from Boston to Seneca Falls, where our residence was on the outskirts of town . . . roads often muddy and no sidewalks most of the way. Mr. Stanton was frequently away from home. I had poor servants, and a fourth son was born. I have so much care with all these boys on my hands. How much I long to be free from housekeeping and children so as to have some time to read and think and write.

maria. Endow the already established institution with money. Endow the woman who shows genius with time.

Song: "Housewife's Lament"

With grease and with grime from corner to corner,
Forever at war and forever alert,
No rest for a day lest the enemy enter,
I spend my whole life in a struggle with dirt.
Oh, life is a toil and love is a trouble,
Beauty will fade and riches will flee,
Pleasures they dwindle and prices they double.
And nothing is as I would wish it to be.

This time they did not come out of the little grooved lines into which they were put, and I hastened to set them in parallel lines. I gave up then for the day, but, as they looked well and were certainly in firmly, I did not consider that I had made an entire failure.

I thought it nice ladylike work to manage such slight threads and turn such delicate screws; but fine as are the hairs on one's head, I shall seek something finer, for I can see how clumsy they will appear when I get on with the eyepiece and magnify their imperfections. They look parallel to the eye, but with a little magnifying power a very little crook will seem a billowy wave, and a faint star will hide itself in one of the yawning abysses.

I remembered at once that I had seen some cocoons in the library which I had carefully refrained from disturbing. I found them perfect, and unrolled them. I made the perpendicular wires of the spider's web, breaking them and doing the work over again a great many times.

gertrude. My husband got well. Well enough to go to work again. I believed in my equal rights as a woman, but I was happy that day because he was head of our life and of our home. That was something I yielded to him. As I gave my love to him. I left the store. I was thirty-eight years old. More than half of my life had been lived. I was doing nothing: I went to my desk, and there, like an old friend, stood a typewriter. I could write . . . Sometimes it seemed to me my fingers burned with the need to write. I realized that all that I had been living through all these years—the years of my work, of my past, were a mine on which I could draw. I went to see a magazine editor. I received a first assignment, and then another. At the end of the first year, I had earned almost three thousand dollars. I earned it so easily it seemed criminal to be so successful, for I was so happy in this work.

maria. I at length got all the wires in—crossing the five perpendicular ones with a horizontal one . . . After twenty-four hours' exposure to the weather, I looked at them. The spider webs had not changed. They were plainly used to a chill and made to endure changes of temperature.

eliza. Among the many gentlemen I have become acquainted with and who have been attentive, one I believe is serious. I know not how to introduce this subject, yet, as I fear you may hear it from others and feel anxious for my welfare, I consider it a duty to tell you all. I felt cautious of encouraging his attentions tho' I did not wish to discourage them . . . He is a man of business, uniform in his conduct and very much respected. He is a man in whom I could place the most unbounded confidence. Nothing rash or impetuous in his disposition, but weighs maturely every circumstance: He appeared as solicitous that I should act with strict propriety as one of my most disinterested friends. He advises me like a friend and would not discourage his addresses till he had an opportunity of making known to my parents his character and wishes—this I promised, but the decision must rest with my parents, their wishes were my law. He insisted upon coming on immediately: that I refused to consent to. He is coming in October. And now, my dearest mother, I submit myself wholly to the wishes of my father and you, convinced that my happiness is your warmest wish, and to promote it has ever been your study. That I feel deeply interested in Mr. Bowne I candidly acknowledge. He is a firm, steady, serious man, there is nothing light or trifling in his character.

Song: “Monday Morning”

And now I am determined to have my own way and I’m Going to be married next Monday morning.

Here we are at Mrs. Carter’s boarding house, and though we have endeavored to keep ourselves as much out of the way as possible, a great many people have called to pay their respects to Mr. and Mrs. Bowne. When I hear an old acquaintance call me Mrs. Bowne, it really makes me stare at first, it sounds so very odd. I am enraptured with New York. You cannot imagine anything half so beautiful as Broadway. Mr. Bowne brings me a pocket full of fruit every day he comes home. I eat as many as I want, and I’m thinking how much I would give to get them to you. But this early fruit won’t keep at all. As to news, New York is not so gay as last winter, few balls, but a great many tea parties. The city air has not stolen my country bloom yet, for everyone says, “I need not ask how you do, Mrs. Bowne, you look in such fine health.”

elizabeth. My fifth child is a girl. The particulars I must give you. On Wednesday morning at six I awoke with a little pain which I well understood. Thereupon I jumped up, bathed and dressed myself, hurried the breakfast, eating none myself, of course, and got the house and all things in order, working bravely between the pains. I neither sat down nor lay down until half past nine, when I gave up all my vocations and avocations, secular and domestic, and devoted myself wholly to the one matter then brought before my mind. At ten o’clock the whole work was completed—the nurse and Amelia our housekeeper alone officiating. I had no doctor, and Mr. Stanton was away on business. When the baby was twenty-four hours old, I got up, bathed, making a sponge and sitz bath, put on my wet bandage, dressed, ate my breakfast, walked on the piazza, and the day being beautiful, I took a ride of three miles on the old plank road. Then I came home, rested an hour or so, read the newspaper and wrote a long letter to Mama . . . My joy in being the mother of a precious little girl is more than I can tell you. The baby is very large and plump, and her head is covered with black curly hair. Oh, how I do rejoice in her!

eliza. Walter Bowne, Junior. He is so hearty and well, he has not had a day's sickness. I am just starting to leave off his caps, I want his hair to grow before his grandmama sees him. He won't look so pretty without his caps. He creeps so much I find it hard to keep him so nice as I used to.

anna. The first notice of me ever printed in the newspaper. This was instigated by my brother-in-law, and was brief, but pointed. It read, "A young girl named Anna Shaw preached her first sermon at Ashton yesterday. Her real friends deprecate the course she is pursuing."

The members of my family, meeting in solemn conclave, sent for me. They had a proposition to make. If I gave up my preaching, they would send me to college and pay for the entire course. We had a long evening together, and it was a very unhappy one. At the end of it, I was given twenty-four hours in which to decide whether I would choose my people and college, or my pulpit and the Arctic loneliness of a life that held no family circle. It did not take me twenty-four hours of reflection to convince me that I must go my solitary way.

eliza. You are anxious, my dear mother, to hear from my own hand how I am. My cough is extremely obstinate, I have occasionally a little fever, tho' quite irregular and sometimes a week without any. I have a new physician to attend me: he keeps me on a milk diet, but allows me to eat eggs and oysters. I am much better already, my cough seems to be my only disorder, he thinks he can cure that. Indeed he speaks with perfect confidence and says he has no doubt that as soon as I leave this severe New York winter and get to warmer weather in South Carolina, my cough will soon leave me. You will hear from me often, my dear mother. At present my mind seems so occupied: leaving my children, preparing to go, making arrangements to shut up my house. 'Tis quite a trial to leave my little ones . . . My little Mary has a wet nurse, she is a fine lively child . . . Adieu, my dear mother, I did not think I could have written half so much. Love to all my friends.

mary. I went to Kensington, Pennsylvania, where seventy-five thousand textile workers were on strike. Of this number, more than ten thousand were little children. They were all stooped little things, round shouldered and skinny, some with their fingers off at the knuckles. Many of them were not yet ten years of age. I asked the newspapermen why they hadn't published the facts about child labor in Pennsylvania. They said that they couldn't because all ten mill owners had stock in the papers. "Well, I've got stock in these little children, and I'll arrange a little publicity." I decided that the children and I would go on a tour. I asked some of the parents if they'd let me have their little boys and girls for a week or ten days. I promised to bring them back safe and sound. They consented. The children carried knapsacks on their backs. They each had a knife and fork, a tin cup and plate. One little girl had a fife, and her brother had a drum. That was our band. The children were very happy, having plenty to eat, taking baths in the streams and rivers every day. I thought, When this strike is over and they go back to the mills, they will never have another holiday like this one. We marched to Jersey City, Hoboken, Princeton and into New York. Our march was doing its work. We were bringing to the attention of the nation the crime of child labor. In Coney Island, after the wild animal show, I put my little children into the empty iron cages and they clung to the bars while I talked. "You see those monkeys in those cages over there? The professors are trying to teach them to talk. The monkeys are too smart, for they fear that the manufacturers would buy them for slaves in their factories. And you see those little boys in those cages? Well, we are told that every American boy has the chance of being President. I tell you that those little boys would sell their chances any day for good square meals and a chance to play."

maria. A few evenings ago a meteor flashed upon me suddenly, very bright, very short-lived. It seemed to me that it was sent just for me especially, for it greeted me almost the first instant I looked up and was gone in a second, fleeting and beautiful. I am but a woman. For women there are, undoubtedly, great difficulties in the path, but so much the more to overcome. First, no woman should say, "I am but a woman." But a woman—what more can you ask to be?

eliza. I send a little pair of shoes for Mary, a little cuckoo toy for Walter, and a tumbler of orange marmalade. I have had only one letter from New York since I have been here . . . not one line from my husband. I can tell you nothing flattering of my health. I am very miserable at present. How are my dear little ones? I hope not too troublesome. I hardly trust myself to think of them, precious children—how they bind me to life. Adieu. I have a bad headache and am low-spirited today.

Song: “When the Train Comes Along”

When the train comes along, when the train comes along,
I’m going to meet you at the station when the train comes along.
If my mother asks for me, tell her death doth summon me,
I’m going to meet her at the station when the train comes along.
If my father asks for me, tell him death doth summon me,
I’m going to meet him at the station when the train comes along.

voice under music. Inscription on the monument in Archdale Churchyard, Charleston, South Carolina . . . “Sacred to the memory of Eliza Southgate Bowne, wife of Walter Bowne of New York, daughter of Robert Southgate Esquire of Scarborough, District of Maine, who departed this life on the nineteenth day of February, aged twenty-five years.”

anna. The stagecoach took me within twenty-two miles of my destination. To my dismay, however, when I arrived Saturday evening, I found that the rest of the journey lay through a dense woods, and that I could reach my pulpit in time the next morning only by having someone drive me through the woods that night. It was not a pleasant prospect, for I had heard appalling tales of the stockades in this region and of the women who were kept prisoners there. But to miss the engagement was not to be thought of, and when, after I had made several vain efforts to find a driver, a man appeared in a two-seated wagon and offered to take me to my destination, I felt that I had to go with him, though I did not like his appearance. He was a huge, muscular person, with a protruding jaw and singularly evasive eye; but I reflected that his forbidding expression might be due, in part at least, to the prospect of the long night drive through the woods, to which possibly he objected as much as I did. It was already growing dark when we started, and within a few moments we were out of the little settlement and entering the woods. With me I had a revolver I had long since learned to use, but which I very rarely carried. I had hesitated to bring it now—had even left home without it; and then, impelled by some impulse I never afterward ceased to bless, had returned for it and dropped it into my handbag. I sat on the back seat of the wagon, directly behind the driver, and for a time, as we entered the darkening woods, his great shoulders blotted out all perspective as he drove on in stolid silence. Soon the darkness folded around us like a garment. I could see neither the driver nor his horses. I could hear only the sibilant whisper of the trees and the creak of our slow wheels in the rough forest road. Suddenly the driver began to talk, and at first I was glad to hear the reassuring human tones, for the experience had begun to seem like a bad dream. I replied readily, and at once regretted that I had done so, for the man's choice of topics was most unpleasant. He began to tell me stories of the stockades—grim stories with horrible details, repeated so fully and with such gusto that I soon realized he was deliberately affronting my ears. I told him I could not listen to such talk. He replied with a series of oaths and shocking vulgarities, stopping his horses that he might turn and fling the words into my face. He ended by snarling that I must think him a fool to imagine he did not know the kind of woman I was. What was I doing in that rough country, and why was I alone with him in those dark woods at night? I tried to answer him calmly. "You know perfectly well who I am, and you understand that I am making this journey tonight because I am to preach tomorrow morning and there is no other way to keep my appointment." He uttered a laugh which was a most unpleasant sound. "Well," he said, coolly, "I'm damned if I'll take you. I've got you here, and I'm going to keep you here!" I slipped my hand into the satchel in my lap, and it touched my revolver. No touch of human fingers ever brought such comfort. With a deep breath of thanksgiving I drew it out and cocked it. "Here! What have you got there?" "I have a revolver," I replied, as steadily as I could. "And it is cocked and aimed straight at your back. Now, drive on. If you stop again, or speak, I'll shoot you." For an instant or two he blustered. "By God," he cried, "you wouldn't dare." "Wouldn't I?" I asked. "Try me by speaking just once more." Even as I spoke I felt my hair rise on my scalp with the horror of the moment, which seemed worse than any nightmare a woman could experience.

But the man was conquered by the knowledge of the waiting, willing weapon just behind him. He laid his whip savagely on the backs of his horses, and they responded with a leap that almost knocked me out of the wagon. He did not speak again, nor stop, but I dared not relax my caution for an instant. Hour after hour crawled toward day, and still I sat in the unpierced darkness, the revolver ready. I knew he was inwardly raging, and that at any instant he might make a sudden jump and try to get the revolver away from me. I decided that at his slightest movement I must shoot. But dawn came at last, and just as its bluish light touched the dark tips of the pines we drove up to the log hotel in the settlement that was our destination. Here my driver spoke. “Get down,” he said gruffly. “This is the place.” I sat still. Even yet I dared not trust him. Moreover, I was so stiff after my vigil that I was not sure I could move. “You get down, and wake up the landlord. Bring him out here.” He sullenly obeyed and aroused the hotel owner, and when the latter appeared I climbed out of the wagon with some effort but without explanation. That morning I preached in my friend’s pulpit as I had promised to do, and the rough building was packed with lumber men who had come in from the neighboring camp. Their appearance caused a great stir. There were forty or fifty of them, and when we took up our collection it was the largest that had ever been taken in the history of the settlement, but I soon learned that it wasn’t spiritual comfort that I offered which appealed to the men. My driver of the night before, who was one of their number, had told his pals of his experience, and the whole camp had poured into town to see the woman minister who carried a revolver. “Her sermon?” I overheard one of them say. “I dunno what she preached. But, sure don’t make no mistake about one thing, the little lady preacher has sure got grit!”

(All the characters alternate the lines of “Solitude of Self.”)

all. (alternating): We must make the voyage of life alone.

It matters not whether the solitary voyager be a man or a woman.

We come into the world alone, unlike all who have gone before us: we leave it alone under circumstances peculiar to ourselves.

No mortal ever has been, no mortal ever will be like the soul just launched on the sea of life.

Nature never repeats herself, and the possibilities of one human soul will never be found in another.

The same individual is not the same at all times. Each individual has a middle self, which is not the one of today, nor of yesterday, nor of tomorrow, but among these different selves.

In youth our most bitter disappointments, our brightest hopes and ambitions are known only to ourselves. Even our friendship and love we never fully share with another.

The solitude of individual life: its pains, its penalties, its responsibilities.

The solitude of self. It is the height of cruelty to rob the individual of a single natural right.

Our inner being, which we call our self, no eye nor touch has ever pierced.

Such is individual life. Who can take/ . . . dare take/ . . . on himself/herself/the rights,/the responsibilities, the duties/of another human soul?

(During the course of the preceding section, the actresses have moved their chairs into a close-knit semicircle downstage center: They place their lanterns on the floor in front of them. When they are done speaking, they stare out at the audience for the first time, seemingly to ask the audience to make its own choice. They stay looking at the audience as the lights dim slowly to darkness.)

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

The Play on the Page

1. -Take one character and trace, through her speeches, the forces that impede her development as an individual.
2. -Take another character and summarize her personality.
3. -What do you think Eliza Southgate contributes to the play? What would be lost if she were omitted?
4. -Exactly what is the attitude toward work revealed by Gertrude's husband? What is Gertrude's attitude toward work?
5. -The play is certainly serious, but it also includes some comic passages, for instance the responses of the doctors to Elizabeth Cady Stanton when she corrects them. Do you find other amusing passages in this serious play? If so, specify a few.

The Play on the Stage

6. -What sort of structure does the play have? To what extent are speeches related to previous speeches? Does the play have any significant organization? Explain.

7. -Discuss the use of music in the play. Are some—or all—of the songs relevant? What, if anything, would be lost if they were omitted?

8. -Three actresses play the six women, and the authors specify which two roles each actress is to perform. Are the pairings significant? If so, how? If you were producing Out of Our Fathers' House, would you use three actresses or (also acceptable, the authors say) six actresses? Why?

9. -The longest speech in the play is Anna's, about her ride in a two-seated wagon, which comes just before the alternating lines spoken by all of the women at the end of the play. What is the point of her speech? Why do you suppose it comes so late in the play?

Chapter 34 / American Voices: Drama for a Diverse Nation

Gina Lund as Dr. Ann Howard Shaw (1847–1919), in a Barnard College production in 1984. Dr. Shaw, an ordained Methodist minister, in 1885 earned a medical degree at Boston University. In 1888 she met Susan B. Anthony and from then onward she devoted her life to social issues, notably to woman's suffrage. In the Barnard production the performers entered the stage wearing contemporary clothing such as sweatpants and T-shirts (notice the figures in the background), and then, in the presence of the audience, they became the roles they played. The women helped to costume each other but their hair styles remained contemporary, thus suggesting the interpenetration of past and present. (Photo by Lowell Handler.)

Mother [Mary] Jones (1837–1930) devoted most of her adult life to the labor movement. Among her notable fights was a battle in 1902 in which she inspired the wives of striking Pennsylvania coal miners to drive out—with mops amd brooms—the strikebreakers. (See pages 1646–47). Peggy Penniman, in her 1989 production of Out of Our Fathers' House at Towson University, used mops amd brooms also in scene (shown here) with the song "Housewife's Lament" (page 1649), in order to convey the interlocking relationships between the women in their struggle against daily oppression.

LUIS VALDEZ

Luis Valdez was born into a family of migrant farm workers in Delano, California, in 1940. After completing high school he entered San Jose State College on a scholarship. He wrote his first plays while still an undergraduate, and after receiving his degree (in English and drama) from San Jose in 1964 he joined the San Francisco Mime Troupe, a left-wing group that performed in parks and streets. Revolutionary in technique as well as in political content, the Mime Troupe rejected the traditional forms of drama and instead drew on the traditions of the circus and the carnival.

In 1965 Valdez returned to Delano, California, where Cesar Chavez had organized a strike of farm workers and a boycott against grape growers. It was here, under the wing of the United Farm Workers, that he established El Teatro Campesino (the Farm Workers' Theater), which at first specialized in doing short, improvised, satirical skits called actos. When the teatro moved to Del Rey, California, it expanded its repertoire beyond farm issues, and it became part of a cultural center that gave workshops (in English and Spanish) in such subjects as history, drama, and politics.

The actos, performed by amateurs on college campuses and on flatbed trucks and at the edges of vineyards, were highly political. Making use of stereotypes (the boss, the scab), the actos sought not to present the individual thoughts of a gifted playwright but to present the social vision of ordinary people—the pueblo—though it was acknowledged that in an oppressive society the playwright might have to help guide the people to see their own best interests.

Valdez moved from actos to mitos (myths)—plays that drew on Aztec mythology, Mexican folklore, and Christianity—and then to Zoot Suit, a play that ran for many months in California and that became the first Mexican- American play to be produced on Broadway. More recently he wrote and directed a hit movie, La Bamba, and in 1991 received an award from the A.T.&T. Foundation for his musical, Bandido, presented by El Teatro Campesino.

Los Vendidos was written in 1967, when Ronald Reagan was governor of California.

Scene: HONEST SANCHO's Used Mexican Lot and Mexican Curio Shop. Three models are on display in HONEST SANCHO's shop: to the right, there is a REVOLUCIONARIO, complete with sombrero, carrilleras1 and carabina 30-30. At center, on the floor, there is the FARM WORKER, under a broad straw sombrero. At stage left is the PACHUCO,2 filero3 in hand.

(HONEST SANCHO is moving among his models, dusting them off and preparing for another day of business.)

SANCHO. Bueno, bueno, mis monos, vamos a ver a quien vendemos ahora, ¿no?4 (To audience.) ¡Quihubo! I'm Honest Sancho and this is my shop. Antes fui contratista pero ahora logré tener mi negocito.5 All I need now is a customer. (A bell rings offstage.) Ay, a customer!

SECRETARY (Entering). Good morning, I'm Miss Jiménez from—

SANCHO. ¡Ah, una chicana! Welcome, welcome Señorita Jiménez.

SECRETARY (Anglo pronunciation). JIM-enez.

SANCHO. ¿Qué?

SECRETARY. My name is Miss JIM-enez. Don't you speak English? What's wrong with you?

SANCHO. Oh, nothing, Señorita JIM-enez. I'm here to help you.

SECRETARY. That's better. As I was starting to say, I'm a secretary from Governor Reagan's office, and we're looking for a Mexican type for the administration.

SANCHO. Well, you come to the right place, lady. This is Honest Sancho's Used Mexican lot, and we got all types here. Any particular type you want?

SECRETARY. Yes, we were looking for somebody suave—

SANCHO. Suave.

SECRETARY. Debonair.

SANCHO. De buen aire.

SECRETARY. Dark.

SANCHO. Prieto.

SECRETARY. But of course not too dark.

SANCHO. No muy prieto.

SECRETARY. Perhaps, beige.

SANCHO. Beige, just the tone. Así como cafecito con leche,6 ¿no?

SECRETARY. One more thing. He must be hard-working.

SANCHO. That could only be one model. Step right over here to the center of the shop, lady. (They cross to the FARM WORKER.) This is our standard farm worker model. As you can see, in the words of our beloved Senator George Murphy, he is "built close to the ground." Also take special notice of his four-ply Goodyear huaraches, made from the rain tire. This wide-brimmed sombrero is an extra added feature—keeps off the sun, rain, and dust.

SECRETARY. Yes, it does look durable.

SANCHO. And our farm worker model is friendly. Muy amable.7 Watch. (Snaps his fingers.)

FARM WORKER (Lifts up head). Buenos días, señorita. (His head drops.)

SECRETARY. My, he's friendly.

SANCHO. Didn't I tell you? Loves his patrones! But his most attractive feature is that he's hard working. Let me show you. (Snaps fingers. FARM WORKER stands.)

FARM WORKER. ¡El jale!8 (He begins to work.)

SANCHO. As you can see, he is cutting grapes.

SECRETARY. Oh, I wouldn't know.

SANCHO. He also picks cotton. (Snap. FARM WORKER begins to pick cotton.)

SECRETARY. Versatile isn't he?

SANCHO. He also picks melons. (Snap. FARM WORKER picks melons.) That's his slow speed for late in the season. Here's his fast speed. (Snap. FARM WORKER picks faster.)

SECRETARY. ¡Chihuahua! . . . I mean, goodness, he sure is a hard worker.

SANCHO (Pulls the FARM WORKER to his feet). And that isn't the half of it. Do you see these little holes on his arms that appear to be pores? During those hot sluggish days in the field, when the vines or the branches get so entangled, it's almost impossible to move; these holes emit a certain grease that allow our model to slip and slide right through the crop with no trouble at all.

SECRETARY. Wonderful. But is he economical?

SANCHO. Economical? Señorita, you are looking at the Volkswagen of Mexicans. Pennies a day is all it takes. One plate of beans and tortillas will keep him going all day. That, and chile. Plenty of chile. Chile jalapeños, chile verde, chile colorado. But, of course, if you do give him chile (Snap. FARM WORKER turns left face. Snap. FARM WORKER bends over.) then you have to change his oil filter once a week.

SECRETARY. What about storage?

SANCHO. No problem. You know these new farm labor camps our Honorable Governor Reagan has built out by Parlier or Raisin City? They were designed with our model in mind. Five, six, seven, even ten in one of those shacks will give you no trouble at all. You can also put him in old barns, old cars, river banks. You can even leave him out in the field overnight with no worry!

SECRETARY. Remarkable.

SANCHO. And here's an added feature: Every year at the end of the season, this model goes back to Mexico and doesn't return, automatically, until next Spring.

SECRETARY. How about that. But tell me: does he speak English?

SANCHO. Another outstanding feature is that last year this model was programmed to go out on STRIKE! (Snap.)

FARM WORKER. ¡HUELGA! ¡HUELGA! Hermanos, sálganse de esos files.9 (Snap. He stops.)

SECRETARY. No! Oh no, we can't strike in the State Capitol.

SANCHO. Well, he also scabs. (Snap.)

FARM WORKER. Me vendo barato, ¿y qué?10 (Snap.)

SECRETARY. That's much better, but you didn't answer my question. Does he speak English?

SANCHO. Bueno . . . no, pero11 he has other—

SECRETARY. No.

SANCHO. Other features.

SECRETARY. NO! He just won't do!

SANCHO. Okay, okay pues. We have other models.

SECRETARY. I hope so. What we need is something a little more sophisticated.

SANCHO. Sophisti—¿qué?

SECRETARY. An urban model.

SANCHO. Ah, from the city! Step right back. Over here in this corner of the shop is exactly what you're looking for. Introducing our new 1969 JOHNNY PACHUCO model! This is our fast-back model. Streamlined. Built for speed, low-riding, city life. Take a look at some of these features. Mag shoes, dual exhausts, green chartreuse paint-job, dark-tint windshield, a little poof on top. Let me just turn him on. (Snap. JOHNNY walks to stage center with a pachuco bounce.)

SECRETARY. What was that?

SANCHO. That, señorita, was the Chicano shuffle.

SECRETARY. Okay, what does he do?

SANCHO. Anything and everything necessary for city life. For instance, survival: He knife fights. (Snap. JOHNNY pulls out switchblade and swings at SECRETARY.)

*(*SECRETARY screams.)

SANCHO. He dances. (Snap.)

JOHNNY (Singing). "Angel Baby, my Angel Baby . . ." (Snap.)

SANCHO. And here's a feature no city model can be without. He gets arrested, but not without resisting, of course. (Snap.)

JOHNNY. ¡En la madre, la placa!12 I didn't do it! I didn't do it! (JOHNNY turns and stands up against an imaginary wall, legs spread out, arms behind his back.)

SECRETARY. Oh no, we can't have arrests! We must maintain law and order.

SANCHO. But he's bilingual!

SECRETARY. Bilingual?

SANCHO. Simón que yes.13 He speaks English! Johnny, give us some English. (Snap.)

JOHNNY (Comes downstage). Fuck-you!

SECRETARY (Gasps). Oh! I've never been so insulted in my whole life!

SANCHO. Well, he learned it in your school.

SECRETARY. I don't care where he learned it.

SANCHO. But he's economical!

SECRETARY. Economical?

SANCHO. Nickels and dimes. You can keep Johnny running on hamburgers, Taco Bell tacos, Lucky Lager beer, Thunderbird wine, yesca—

SECRETARY. Yesca?

SANCHO. Mota.

SECRETARY. Mota?

SANCHO. Leños14 . . . Marijuana. (Snap; JOHNNY inhales on an imaginary joint.)

SECRETARY. That's against the law!

JOHNNY (Big smile, holding his breath). Yeah.

SANCHO. He also sniffs glue. (Snap. JOHNNY inhales glue, big smile.)

JOHNNY. That's too much man, ése.15

SECRETARY. No, Mr. Sancho, I don't think this—

SANCHO. Wait a minute, he has other qualities I know you'll love. For example, an inferiority complex. (Snap.)

JOHNNY (To SANCHO). You think you're better than me, huh ése? (Swings switchblade.)

SANCHO. He can also be beaten and he bruises, cut him and he bleeds; kick him and he—(He beats, bruises and kicks PACHUCO.) would you like to try it?

SECRETARY. Oh, I couldn't.

SANCHO. Be my guest. He's a great scapegoat.

SECRETARY. No, really.

SANCHO. Please.

SECRETARY. Well, all right. Just once. (She kicks PACHUCO.) Oh, he's so soft.

SANCHO. Wasn't that good? Try again.

SECRETARY (Kicks PACHUCO). Oh, he's so wonderful! (She kicks him again.)

SANCHO. Okay, that's enough, lady. You ruin the merchandise. Yes, our Johnny Pachuco model can give you many hours of pleasure. Why, the L.A.P.D. just bought twenty of these to train their rookie cops on. And talk about maintenance. Señorita, you are looking at an entirely self-supporting machine. You're never going to find our Johnny Pachuco model on the relief rolls. No, sir, this model knows how to liberate.

SECRETARY. Liberate?

SANCHO. He steals. (Snap. JOHNNY rushes the SECRETARY and steals her purse.)

JOHNNY. ¡Dame esa bolsa, vieja!16 (He grabs the purse and runs. Snap by SANCHO. He stops.)

*(*SECRETARY runs after JOHNNY and grabs purse away from him, kicking him as she goes.)

SECRETARY. No, no, no! We can't have any more thieves in the State Administration. Put him back.

SANCHO. Okay, we still got other models. Come on, Johnny, we'll sell you to some old lady. (SANCHO takes JOHNNY back to his place.)

SECRETARY. Mr. Sancho, I don't think you quite understand what we need. What we need is something that will attract the women voters. Something more traditional, more romantic.

SANCHO. Ah, a lover. (He smiles meaningfully.) Step right over here, señorita. Introducing our standard Revolucionario and/or Early California Bandit type. As you can see he is well-built, sturdy, durable. This is the International Harvester of Mexicans.

SECRETARY. What does he do?

SANCHO. You name it, he does it. He rides horses, stays in the mountains, crosses deserts, plains, rivers, leads revolutions, follows revolutions, kills, can be killed, serves as a martyr, hero, movie star—did I say movie star? Did you ever see Viva Zapata? Viva Villa? Villa Rides? Pancho Villa Returns? Pancho Villa Goes Back? Pancho Villa Meets Abbott and Costello—

SECRETARY. I've never seen any of those.

SANCHO. Well, he was in all of them. Listen to this. (Snap.)

REVOLUCIONARIO (Scream). ¡VIVA VILLAAAAA!

SECRETARY. That's awfully loud.

SANCHO. He has a volume control. (He adjusts volume. Snap.)

REVOLUCIONARIO (Mousey voice). ¡Viva Villa!

SECRETARY. That's better.

SANCHO. And even if you didn't see him in the movies, perhaps you saw him on TV. He makes commercials. (Snap.)

REVOLUCIONARIO. Is there a Frito Bandito in your house?

SECRETARY. Oh yes, I've seen that one!

SANCHO. Another feature about this one is that he is economical. He runs on raw horsemeat and tequila!

SECRETARY. Isn't that rather savage?

SANCHO. Al contrario,17 it makes him a lover. (Snap.)

REVOLUCIONARIO (To SECRETARY). ¡Ay, mamasota, cochota, ven pa'ca!18 (He grabs SECRETARY and folds her back—Latin-Lover style.)

SANCHO (Snap. REVOLUCIONARIO goes back upright). Now wasn't that nice?

SECRETARY. Well, it was rather nice.

SANCHO. And finally, there is one outstanding feature about this model I KNOW the ladies are going to love: He's a GENUINE antique! He was made in Mexico in 1910!

SECRETARY. Made in Mexico?

SANCHO. That's right. Once in Tijuana, twice in Guadalajara, three times in Cuernavaca.

SECRETARY. Mr. Sancho, I thought he was an American product.

SANCHO. No, but—

SECRETARY. No, I'm sorry. We can't buy anything but American-made products. He just won't do.

SANCHO. But he's an antique!

SECRETARY. I don't care. You still don't understand what we need. It's true we need Mexican models such as these, but it's more important that he be American.

SANCHO. American?

SECRETARY. That's right, and judging from what you've shown me, I don't think you have what we want. Well, my lunch hour's almost over: I better—

SANCHO. Wait a minute! Mexican but American?

SECRETARY. That's correct.

SANCHO. Mexican but . . . (A sudden flash.) AMERICAN! Yeah, I think we've got exactly what you want. He just came in today! Give me a minute. (He exits. Talks from backstage.) Here he is in the shop. Let me just get some papers off. There. Introducing our new 1970 Mexican-American! Ta-ra-ra-ra-ra-ra-RA-RAAA!

*(*SANCHO brings out the MEXICAN-AMERICAN model, a clean-shaven middle-class type in a business suit, with glasses.)

SECRETARY (Impressed). Where have you been hiding this one?

SANCHO. He just came in this morning. Ain't he a beauty? Feast your eyes on him! Sturdy US STEEL frame, streamlined, modern. As a matter of fact, he is built exactly like our Anglo models except that he comes in a variety of darker shades: naugahyde, leather, or leatherette.

SECRETARY. Naugahyde.

SANCHO. Well, we'll just write that down. Yes, señorita, this model represents the apex of American engineering! He is bilingual, college educated, ambitious! Say the word "acculturate" and he accelerates. He is intelligent, well-mannered, clean—did I say clean? (Snap. MEXICAN-AMERICAN raises his arm.) Smell.

SECRETARY (Smells). Old Sobaco, my favorite.

SANCHO (Snap. MEXICAN-AMERICAN turns toward SANCHO). Eric! (To SECRETARY.) We call him Eric García. (To ERIC.) I want you to meet Miss JIM-enez, Eric.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. Miss JIM-enez, I am delighted to make your acquaintance. (He kisses her hand.)

SECRETARY. Oh, my, how charming!

SANCHO. Did you feel the suction? He has seven especially engineered suction cups right behind his lips. He's a charmer all right!

SECRETARY. How about boards? Does he function on boards?

SANCHO. You name them, he is on them. Parole boards, draft boards, school boards, taco quality control boards, surf boards, two-by-fours.

SECRETARY. Does he function in politics?

SANCHO. Señorita, you are looking at a political MACHINE. Have you ever heard of the OEO, EOC, COD, WAR ON POVERTY? That's our model! Not only that, he makes political speeches.

SECRETARY. May I hear one?

SANCHO. With pleasure. (Snap.) Eric, give us a speech.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. Mr. Congressman, Mr. Chairman, members of the board, honored guests, ladies and gentlemen. (SANCHO and SECRETARY applaud.) Please, please. I come before you as a Mexican-American to tell you about the problems of the Mexican. The problems of the Mexican stem from one thing and one thing alone: He's stupid. He's uneducated. He needs to stay in school. He needs to be ambitious, forward-looking, harder-working. He needs to think American, American, American, AMERICAN, AMERICAN, AMERICAN. GOD BLESS AMERICA! GOD BLESS AMERICA! GOD BLESS AMERICA!! (He goes out of control.)

(SANCHO snaps frantically and the MEXICAN-AMERICAN finally slumps forward, bending at the waist.)

SECRETARY. Oh my, he's patriotic too!

SANCHO. Sí, señorita, he loves his country. Let me just make a little adjustment here. (Stands MEXICAN-AMERICAN up.)

SECRETARY. What about upkeep? Is he economical?

SANCHO. Well, no, I won't lie to you. The Mexican-American costs a little bit more, but you get what you pay for. He's worth every extra cent. You can keep him running on dry Martinis, Langendorf bread.

SECRETARY. Apple pie?

SANCHO. Only Mom's. Of course, he's also programmed to eat Mexican food on ceremonial functions, but I must warn you: an overdose of beans will plug up his exhaust.

SECRETARY. Fine! There's just one more question: HOW MUCH DO YOU WANT FOR HIM?

SANCHO. Well, I tell you what I'm gonna do. Today and today only, because you've been so sweet, I'm gonna let you steal this model from me! I'm gonna let you drive him off the lot for the simple price of—let's see taxes and license included—$15,000.

SECRETARY. Fifteen thousand DOLLARS? For a MEXICAN!

SANCHO. Mexican? What are you talking, lady? This is a Mexican-AMERICAN! We had to melt down two pachucos, a farm worker and three gabachos19 to make this model! You want quality, but you gotta pay for it! This is no cheap run-about. He's got class!

SECRETARY. Okay, I'll take him.

SANCHO. You will?

SECRETARY. Here's your money.

SANCHO. You mind if I count it?

SECRETARY. Go right ahead.

SANCHO. Well, you'll get your pink slip in the mail. Oh, do you want me to wrap him up for you? We have a box in the back.

SECRETARY. No, thank you. The Governor is having a luncheon this afternoon, and we need a brown face in the crowd. How do I drive him?

SANCHO. Just snap your fingers. He'll do anything you want.

(SECRETARY snaps. MEXICAN-AMERICAN steps forward.)

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. RAZA QUERIDA, ¡VAMOS LEVANTANDO ARMAS PARA LIBERARNOS DE ESTOS DESGRACIADOS GABACHOS QUE NOS EXPLOTAN! VAMOS.20

SECRETARY. What did he say?

SANCHO. Something about lifting arms, killing white people, etc.

SECRETARY. But he's not supposed to say that!

SANCHO. Look, lady, don't blame me for bugs from the factory. He's your Mexican-American; you bought him, now drive him off the lot!

SECRETARY. But he's broken!

SANCHO. Try snapping another finger.

(SECRETARY snaps. MEXICAN-AMERICAN comes to life again.)

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. ¡ESTA GRAN HUMANIDAD HA DICHO BASTA! Y SE HA PUESTO EN MARCHA! ¡BASTA! ¡BASTA! ¡VIVA LA RAZA! ¡VIVA LA CAUSA! ¡VIVA LA HUELGA! ¡VIVAN LOS BROWN BERETS! ¡VIVAN LOS ESTUDIANTES!21 ¡CHICANO POWER!

(The MEXICAN-AMERICAN turns toward the SECRETARY, who gasps and backs up. He keeps turning toward the PACHUCO, FARM WORKER, and REVOLUCIONARIO, snapping his fingers and turning each of them on, one by one.)

PACHUCO (Snap. To SECRETARY). I'm going to get you, baby! ¡Viva La Raza!

FARM WORKER (Snap. To SECRETARY). ¡Viva la huelga! ¡Viva la Huelga! ¡VIVA LA HUELGA!

REVOLUCIONARIO (Snap. To SECRETARY). ¡Viva la revolución! ¡VIVA LA REVOLUCIÓN!

(The three models join together and advance toward the SECRETARY who backs up and runs out of the shop screaming. SANCHO is at the other end of the shop holding his money in his hand. All freeze. After a few seconds of silence, the PACHUCO moves and stretches, shaking his arms and loosening up. The FARM WORKER and REVOLUCIONARIO do the same. SANCHO stays where he is, frozen to his spot.)

JOHNNY. Man, that was a long one, ése.22 (Others agree with him.)

FARM WORKER. How did we do?

JOHNNY. Perty good, look at all that lana,23 man! (He goes over to SANCHO and removes the money from his hand. SANCHO stays where he is.)

REVOLUCIONARIO. En la madre, look at all the money.

JOHNNY. We keep this up, we're going to be rich.

FARM WORKER. They think we're machines.

REVOLUCIONARIO. Burros.

JOHNNY. Puppets.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. The only thing I don't like is—how come I always got to play the godamn Mexican-American?

JOHNNY. That's what you get for finishing high school.

FARM WORKER. How about our wages, ése?

JOHNNY. Here it comes right now. $3,000 for you, $3,000 for you, $3,000 for you, and $3,000 for me. The rest we put back into the business.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. Too much, man. Heh, where you vatos24 going tonight?

FARM WORKER. I'm going over to Concha's. There's a party.

JOHNNY. Wait a minute, vatos. What about our salesman? I think he needs an oil job.

REVOLUCIONARIO. Leave him to me.

(The PACHUCO, FARM WORKER, and MEXICAN-AMERICAN exit, talking loudly about their plans for the night. The REVOLUCIONARIO goes over to SANCHO, removes his derby hat and cigar, lifts him up and throws him over his shoulder. SANCHO hangs loose, lifeless.)

REVOLUCIONARIO (To audience). He's the best model we got! ¡Ajua!25

(Exit.)

THE END

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. -If you are an Anglo (shorthand for a Caucasian with traditional Northern European values), do you find the play deeply offensive? Why, or why not? If you are a Mexican-American, do you find the play entertaining or do you find parts of it offensive? What might Anglos enjoy in the play, and what might Mexican-Americans find offensive?
2. -What stereotypes of Mexican-Americans are presented here? At the end of the play, what image of the Mexican-American is presented? How does it compare with the stereotypes?
3. -Putting aside the politics of the play (and your own politics), what do you think are the strengths of Los Vendidos? What do you think are the weaknesses?
4. -The play was written in 1967. Putting aside a few specific references—for instance, to Governor Reagan—do you find it dated? If not, why not?
5. -In his short essay "The Actos," Valdez says that actos achieve the following: "Inspire the audience to social action. Illuminate specific points about social problems. Satirize the opposition. Show or hint at a solution. Express what people are feeling." How much of this do you think Los Vendidos does?
6. -Many people assume that politics gets in the way of serious art. That is, they assume that artists ought to be concerned with issues that transcend politics. Does this point make any sense to you? Why or why not?

The Play on the Stage

7. -In 1971 when Los Vendidos was produced by El Teatro de la Esperanza, the group altered the ending by having the men decide to use the money to build a community center. Evaluate this ending.

8. -Jorge Huerta, who directed the 1971 El Teatro de la Esperanza production of Los Vendidos, suggests that it was a mistake for Jane Fonda to be cast as Miss Jimenes in the videotape of the play. "Something is lost," he says, "in the realization that this woman is not pretending to be white. . . ." Do you agree? Explain.

9. -When the play was videotaped by KNBC in Los Angeles for broadcast in 1973, Valdez changed the ending. In the revised version we discover that a scientist (played by Valdez) masterminds the operation, placing Mexican-American models wherever there are persons of Mexican descent. These models soon will become Chicanos (as opposed to persons with Anglo values) and will aid rather than work against their fellows. Evaluate this ending.

A CONTEXT FOR LOS VENDIDOS

LUIS VALDEZ

The Actos [1970]

Nothing represents the work of El Teatro Campesino (and other teatros Chicanos) better than the acto. In a sense, the acto is Chicano theatre, though we are now moving into a new, more mystical dramatic form we have begun to call the mito. The two forms are, in fact, cuates1 that complement and balance each other as day goes into night, el sol la sombra, la vida la muerte, el pájaro la serpiente.2 Our rejection of white western European (gabacho) proscenium theatre makes the birth of new Chicano forms necessary, thus, los actos y los mitos; one through the eyes of man, the other through the eyes of God.

The actos were born quite matter of factly in Delano. Nacieron hambrientos de la realidad. Anything and everything that pertained to the daily life, la vida cotidiana, of the huelguistas3 became food for thought, material for actos. The reality of campesinos on strike had become dramatic (and theatrical as reflected by newspapers, TV newscasts, films, etc.), and so the actos merely reflected the reality. Huelguistas portrayed huelguistas, drawing their improvised dialogue from real words they exchanged with the esquiroles (scabs) in the fields every day.4

"Hermanos, compañeros, sálganse de esos files."

"Tenemos comida y trabajo para ustedes afuera de la huelga."

"Esquirol, ten vergüenza."

"Unidos venceremos."

"¡Sal de ahí barrigón!"

The first huelguista to portray an esquirol in the teatro did it to settle a score with a particularly stubborn scab he had talked with in the fields that day. Satire became a weapon that was soon aimed at known and despised contractors, growers and mayordomos. The effect of those early actos on the huelguistas de Delano packed into Filipino Hall was immediate, intense and cathartic. The actos rang true to the reality of the huelga.

Looking back at those early, crude, vital, beautiful, powerful actos of 1965, certain things have now become clear about the dramatic form we were just beginning to develop. There was, of course, no conscious deliberate plan to develop the acto as such. Even the name we gave our small presentations reflects the hard pressing expediency under which we worked from day to day. We could have called them "skits," but we lived and talked in San Joaquin Valley Spanish (with a strong Tejano influence), so we needed a name that made sense to the raza. Cuadros, pasquines, autos, entremeses5 all seemed too highly intellectualized. We began to call them actos for lack of a better word, lack of time and lack of interest in trying to sound like classical Spanish scholars. De todos modos éramos raza, ¿quién se iba a fijar?6

The acto, however, developed its own structure through five years of experimentation. It evolved into a short dramatic form now used primarily by los teatros de Aztlán, but utilized to some extent by other non-Chicano guerrilla theatre companies throughout the U.S., including the San Francisco Mime Troupe and the Bread and Puppet Theatre. (Considerable creative crossfeeding has occurred on other levels, I might add, between the Mime Troupe, the Bread and Puppet, and the Campesino.) Each of these groups may have their own definition of the acto, but the following are some of the guidelines we have established for ourselves over the years:

Actos: Inspire the audience to social action. Illuminate specific points about social problems.

Satirize the opposition. Show or hint at a solution. Express what people are feeling.

So what's new, right? Plays have been doing that for thousands of years. True, except that the major emphasis in the acto is the social vision, as opposed to the individual artist or playwright's vision. Actos are not written; they are created collectively, through improvisation by a group. The reality reflected in an acto is thus a social reality, whether it pertains to campesinos or to batos locos, not psychologically deranged self-projections, but rather, group archetypes. Don Sotaco, Don Coyote, Johnny Pachuco, Juan Raza, Jorge el Chingón, la Chicana, are all group archetypes that have appeared inactos.

The usefulness of the acto extended well beyond the huelga into the Chicano movement, because Chicanos in general want to identify themselves as a group. The teatro archetypes symbolize the desire for unity and group identity through Chicano heroes and heroines. One character can thus represent the entire Raza, and the Chicano audience will gladly respond to his triumphs or defeats. What to a non-Chicano audience may seem like oversimplification in an acto, is to the Chicano a true expression of his social state and therefore reality.

HARVEY FIERSTEIN

Harvey Fierstein was born in Brooklyn, New York, the son of parents who had emigrated from Eastern Europe. While studying painting at Pratt Institute he acted in plays and revues, and one of his plays was produced in1973, but he did not achieve fame until his Torch Song Trilogy (1976–1979) moved from Off Broadway to Broadway in 1982. Torch Song Trilogy won the Theatre World Award, the Tony Award, and the Drama Desk Award. In addition, Fierstein won the Best Actor Tony Award and the Best Actor Drama Desk Award. He later received a third Tony Award for his work on the musical version of La Cage aux Folles (1983).

ON TIDY ENDINGS [1987]

The curtain rises on a deserted, modern Upper West Side apartment. In the bright daylight that pours in through the windows we can see the living room of the apartment. Far Stage Right is the galley kitchen, next to it the multilocked front door with intercom. Stage Left reveals a hallway that leads to the two bedrooms and baths.

Though the room is still fully furnished (couch, coffee table, etc.), there are boxes stacked against the wall and several photographs and paintings are on the floor, leaving shadows on the wall where they once hung. Obviously someone is moving out. From the way the boxes are neatly labeled and stacked, we know that this is an organized person.

From the hallway just outside the door we hear the rattling of keys and two arguing voices:

JIM (offstage). I've got to be home by four. I've got practice.

MARION (offstage). I'll get you to practice, don't worry.

JIM (offstage). I don't want to go in there.

MARION (offstage). Jimmy, don't make Mommy crazy, alright? We'll go inside, I'll call Aunt Helen and see if you can go down and play with Robbie.

(The door opens. MARION is a handsome woman of forty. Dressed in a business suit, her hair conservatively combed, she appears to be going to a business meeting. JIM is a boy of eleven. His playclothes are typical, but someone has obviously just combed his hair. MARION recovers the key from the lock.)

JIM. Why can't I just go down and ring the bell?

MARION. Because I said so.

(As MARION steps into the room she is struck by some unexpected emotion. She freezes in her path and stares at the empty apartment. JIM lingers by the door.)

JIM. I'm going downstairs.

MARION. Jimmy, please.

JIM. This place gives me the creeps.

MARION. This was your father's apartment. There's nothing creepy about it.

JIM. Says you.

MARION. You want to close the door, please?

(Jim reluctantly obeys.)

MARION. Now, why don't you go check your room and make sure you didn't leave anything.

JIM. It's empty.

MARION. Go look.

JIM. I looked last time.

MARION (trying to be patient). Honey, we sold the apartment. You're never going to be here again. Go make sure you have everything you want.

JIM. But Uncle Arthur packed everything.

MARION (less patiently). Go make sure.

JIM. There's nothing in there.

MARION (exploding). I said make sure!

(JIM jumps, then realizing that she's not kidding, obeys.)

MARION. Everything's an argument with that one. (She looks around the room and breathes deeply. There is sadness here. Under her breath:) I can still smell you. (Suddenly not wanting to be alone.) Jimmy? Are you okay?

JIM (returning). Nothing. Told you so.

MARION. Uncle Arthur must have worked very hard. Make sure you thank him.

JIM. What for? Robbie says, (fey mannerisms) "They love to clean up things!"

MARION. Sometimes you can be a real joy.

JIM. Did you call Aunt Helen?

MARION. Do I get a break here? (Approaching the boy understandingly.) Wouldn't you like to say good-bye?

JIM. To who?

MARION. To the apartment. You and your daddy spent a lot of time here together. Don't you want to take one last look around?

JIM. Ma, get a real life.

MARION. "Get a real life." (Going for the phone.) Nice. Very nice.

JIM. Could you call already?

MARION (dialing). Jimmy, what does this look like I'm doing?

(JIM kicks at the floor impatiently. Someone answers the phone at the other end.)

MARION (into the phone). Helen? Hi, we're upstairs. . . . No, we just walked in the door. Jimmy wants to know if he can come down. . . . Oh, thanks.

(Hearing that, JIM breaks for the door.)

MARION (yelling after him). Don't run in the halls! And don't play with the elevator buttons!

(The door slams shut behind him.)

MARION (back to the phone). Hi. . . . No, I'm okay. It's a little weird being here. . . . No. Not since the funeral, and then there were so many people. Jimmy told me to get "a real life." I don't think I could handle anything realer. . . . No, please. Stay where you are. I'm fine. The doorman said Arthur would be right back and my lawyer should have been here already. . . . Well, we've got the papers to sign and a few other odds and ends to clean up. Shouldn't take long.

(The intercom buzzer rings.)

MARION. Hang on, that must be her. (MARION goes to the intercom and speaks.) Yes?. . . . Thank you. (Back to the phone.) Helen? Yeah, it's the lawyer. I'd better go. . . . Well, I could use a stiff drink, but I drove down. Listen, I'll stop by on my way out. Okay? Okay. 'Bye.

(She hangs up the phone, looks around the room. That uncomfortable feeling returns to her quickly. She gets up and goes to the front door, opens it and looks out. No one there yet. She closes the door, shakes her head knowing that she's being silly and starts back into the room. She looks around, can't make it and retreats to the door. She opens it, looks out, closes it, but stays right there, her hand on the doorknob. The bell rings. She throws open the door.)

MARION. That was quick.

(JUNE LOWELL still has her finger on the bell. Her arms are loaded with contracts. MARION's contemporary, JUNE is less formal in appearance and more hyper in her manner.)

JUNE. That was quicker. What, were you waiting by the door?

MARION (embarrassed). No. I was just passing it. Come on in.

JUNE. Have you got your notary seal?

MARION. I think so.

JUNE. Great. Then you can witness. I left mine at the office and thanks to gentrification I'm double-parked downstairs. (Looking for a place to dump her load.) Where?

MARION (definitely pointing to the coffee table). Anywhere. You mean you're not staying?

JUNE. If you really think you need me I can go down and find a parking lot. I think there's one over on Columbus. So, I can go down, park the car in the lot and take a cab back if you really think you need me.

MARION. Well . . . ?

JUNE. But you shouldn't have any problems. The papers are about as straightforward as papers get. Arthur is giving you power of attorney to sell the apartment and you're giving him a check for half the purchase price. Everything else is just signing papers that state that you know that you signed the other papers. Anyway, he knows the deal, his lawyers have been over it all with him, it's just a matter of signatures.

MARION (not fine). Oh, fine.

JUNE. Unless you just don't want to be alone with him . . . ?

MARION. With Arthur? Don't be silly.

JUNE (laying out the papers). Then you'll handle it solo? Great. My car thanks you, the parking lot thanks you, and the cab driver that wouldn't have gotten a tip thanks you. Come have a quick look-see.

MARION (joining her on the couch). There are a lot of papers here.

JUNE. Copies. Not to worry. Start here.

(MARION starts to read.)

JUNE. I ran into Jimmy playing Elevator Operator.

(MARION jumps.)

JUNE. I got him off at the sixth floor. Read on.

MARION. This is definitely not my day for dealing with him.

(JUNE gets up and has a look around.)

JUNE. I don't believe what's happening to this neighborhood. You made quite an investment when you bought this place.

MARION. Collin was always very good at figuring out those things.

JUNE. Well, he sure figured this place right. What, have you tripled your money in ten years?

MARION. More.

JUNE. It's a shame to let it go.

MARION. We're not ready to be a two-dwelling family.

JUNE. So, sublet it again.

MARION. Arthur needs the money from the sale.

JUNE. Arthur got plenty already. I'm not crying for Arthur.

MARION. I don't hear you starting in again, do I?

JUNE. Your interests and your wishes are my only concern.

MARION. Fine.

JUNE. I still say we should contest Collin's will.

MARION. June . . . !

JUNE. You've got a child to support.

MARION. And a great job, and a husband with a great job. Tell me what Arthur's got.

JUNE. To my thinking, half of everything that should have gone to you. And more. All of Collin's personal effects, his record collection . . .

MARION. And I suppose their three years together meant nothing.

JUNE. When you compare them to your sixteen-year marriage? Not nothing, but not half of everything.

MARION (trying to change the subject). June, who gets which copies?

JUNE. Two of each to Arthur. One you keep. The originals and anything else come back to me. (Looking around.) I still say you should've sublet the apartment for a year and then sold it. You would've gotten an even better price. Who wants to buy an apartment when they know someone died in it. No one. And certainly no one wants to buy an apartment when they know the person died of AIDS.

MARION (snapping). June. Enough!

JUNE (catching herself). Sorry. That was out of line. Sometimes my mouth does that to me. Hey, that's why I'm a lawyer. If my brain worked as fast as my mouth I would have gotten a real job.

MARION (holding out a stray paper). What's this?

JUNE. I forgot. Arthur's lawyer sent that over yesterday. He found it in Collin's safety-deposit box. It's an insurance policy that came along with some consulting job he did in Japan. He either forgot about it when he made out his will or else he wanted you to get the full payment. Either way, it's yours.

MARION. Are you sure we don't split this?

JUNE. Positive.

MARION. But everything else . . . ?

JUNE. Hey, Arthur found it, his lawyer sent it to me. Relax, it's all yours. Minus my commission, of course. Go out and buy yourself something. Anything else before I have to use my cut to pay the towing bill?

MARION. I guess not.

JUNE (starting to leave). Great. Call me when you get home. (Stopping at the door and looking back.) Look, I know that I'm attacking this a little coldly. I am aware that someone you loved has just died. But there's a time and place for everything. This is about tidying up loose ends, not holding hands. I hope you'll remember that when Arthur gets here. Call me.

(And she's gone.)

*(*MARION looks ill at ease to be alone again. She nervously straightens the papers into neat little piles, looks at them and then remembers:)

MARION. Pens. We're going to need pens.

(At last a chore to be done. She looks in her purse and finds only one. She goes to the kitchen and opens a drawer where she finds two more. She starts back to the table with them but suddenly remembers something else. She returns to the kitchen and begins going through the cabinets until she finds what she's looking for: a blue Art Deco teapot. Excited to find it, she takes it back to the couch. Guilt strikes. She stops, considers putting it back, wavers, then:)

MARION (to herself). Oh, he won't care. One less thing to pack.

(She takes the teapot and places it on the couch next to her purse. She is happier. Now she searches the room with her eyes for any other treasures she may have overlooked. Nothing here. She wanders off into the bedroom. We hear keys outside the front door. ARTHUR lets himself into the apartment carrying a load of empty cartons and a large shopping bag. ARTHUR is in his mid-thirties, pleasant looking though sloppily dressed in work clothes and slightly overweight. ARTHUR enters the apartment just as MARION comes out of the bedroom carrying a framed watercolor painting. They jump at the sight of each other.)

MARION. Oh, hi, Arthur. I didn't hear the door.

ARTHUR (staring at the painting). Well hello, Marion.

MARION (guiltily). I was going to ask you if you were thinking of taking this painting because if you're not going to then I'll take it. Unless, of course, you want it.

ARTHUR. No. You can have it.

MARION. I never really liked it, actually. I hate cats. I didn't even like the show. I needed something for my college dorm room. I was never the rock star poster type. I kept it in the back of a closet for years until Collin moved in here and took it. He said he liked it.

ARTHUR. I do too.

MARION. Well, then you keep it.

ARTHUR. No. Take it.

MARION. We've really got no room for it. You keep it.

ARTHUR. I don't want it.

MARION. Well, if you're sure.

ARTHUR (seeing the teapot). You want the teapot?

MARION. If you don't mind.

ARTHUR. One less thing to pack.

MARION. Funny, but that's exactly what I thought. One less thing to pack. You know, my mother gave it to Collin and me when we moved into our first apartment. Silly sentimental piece of junk, but you know.

ARTHUR. That's not the one.

MARION. Sure it is. Hall used to make them for Westinghouse back in the thirties. I see them all the time at antiques shows and I always wanted to buy another, but they ask such a fortune for them.

ARTHUR. We broke the one your mother gave you a couple of years ago. That's a reproduction. You can get them almost anywhere in the Village for eighteen bucks.

MARION. Really? I'll have to pick one up.

ARTHUR. Take this one. I'll get another.

MARION. No, it's yours. You bought it.

ARTHUR. One less thing to pack.

MARION. Don't be silly. I didn't come here to raid the place.

ARTHUR. Well, was there anything else of Collin's that you thought you might like to have?

MARION. Now I feel so stupid, but actually I made a list. Not for me. But I started thinking about different people; friends, relatives, you know, that might want to have something of Collin's to remember him by. I wasn't sure just what you were taking and what you were throwing out. Anyway, I brought the list. (Gets it from her purse.) Of course these are only suggestions. You probably thought of a few of these people yourself. But I figured it couldn't hurt to write it all down. Like I said, I don't know what you are planning on keeping.

ARTHUR (taking the list). I was planning on keeping it all.

MARION. Oh, I know. But most of these things are silly. Like his high school yearbooks. What would you want with them?

ARTHUR. Sure. I'm only interested in his Gay period.

MARION. I didn't mean it that way. Anyway, you look it over. They're only suggestions. Whatever you decide to do is fine with me.

ARTHUR (folding the list). It would have to be, wouldn't it. I mean, it's all mine now. He did leave this all to me.

(MARION is becoming increasingly nervous, but tries to keep a light approach as she takes a small bundle of papers from her bag.)

MARION. While we're on the subject of what's yours. I brought a batch of condolence cards that were sent to you care of me. Relatives mostly.

ARTHUR (taking them). More cards? I'm going to have to have another printing of thank-you notes done.

MARION. I answered these last week, so you don't have to bother. Unless you want to.

ARTHUR. Forge my signature?

MARION. Of course not. They were addressed to both of us and they're mostly distant relatives or friends we haven't seen in years. No one important.

ARTHUR. If they've got my name on them, then I'll answer them myself.

MARION. I wasn't telling you not to, I was only saying that you don't have to.

ARTHUR. I understand.

(MARION picks up the teapot and brings it to the kitchen.)

MARION. Let me put this back.

ARTHUR. I ran into Jimmy in the lobby.

MARION. Tell me you're joking.

ARTHUR. I got him to Helen's.

MARION. He's really racking up the points today.

ARTHUR. You know, he still can't look me in the face.

MARION. He's reacting to all of this in strange ways. Give him time. He'll come around. He's really very fond of you.

ARTHUR. I know. But he's at that awkward age: under thirty. I'm sure in twenty years we'll be the best of friends.

MARION. It's not what you think.

ARTHUR. What do you mean?

MARION. Well, you know.

ARTHUR. No I don't know. Tell me.

MARION. I thought that you were intimating something about his blaming you for Collin's illness and I was just letting you know that it's not true. (Foot in mouth, she braves on.) We discussed it a lot and . . . uh . . . he understands that his father was sick before you two ever met.

ARTHUR. I don't believe this.

MARION. I'm just trying to say that he doesn't blame you.

ARTHUR. First of all, who asked you? Second of all, that's between him andme. And third and most importantly, of course he blames me. Marion, he's eleven years old. You can discuss all you want, but the fact isthat his father died of a "fag" disease and I'm the only fag around to finger.

MARION. My son doesn't use that kind of language.

ARTHUR. Forget the language. I'm talking about what he's been through. Can you imagine the kind of crap he's taken from his friends? That poor kid's been chased and chastised from one end of town to the other. He's got to have someone to blame just to survive. He can't blame you, you're all he's got. He can't blame his father; he's dead. So, Uncle Arthur gets the shaft. Fine, I can handle it.

MARION. You are so wrong, Arthur. I know my son and that is not the way his mind works.

ARTHUR. I don't know what you know. I only know what I know. And all I know is what I hear and see. The snide remarks, the little smirks . . . And it's not just the illness. He's been looking for a scapegoat since the day you and Collin first split up. Finally he has one.

MARION (getting very angry now). Wait. Are you saying that if he's going to blame someone it should be me?

ARTHUR. I think you should try to see things from his point of view.

MARION. Where do you get off thinking you're privy to my son's point of view?

ARTHUR. It's not that hard to imagine. Life's rolling right along, he's having a happy little childhood, when suddenly one day his father's moving out. No explanations, no reasons, none of the fights that usually accompany such things. Divorce is hard enough for a kid to understand when he's listened to years of battles, but yours?

MARION. So what should we have done? Faked a few months' worth of fights before Collin moved out?

ARTHUR. You could have told him the truth, plain and simple.

MARION. He was seven years old at the time. How the hell do you tell a seven-year-old that his father is leaving his mother to go sleep with other men?

ARTHUR. Well, not like that.

MARION. You know, Arthur, I'm going to say this as nicely as I can: Butt out. You're not his mother and you're not his father.

ARTHUR. Thank you. I wasn't acutely aware of that fact. I will certainly keep that in mind from now on.

MARION. There's only so much information a child that age can handle.

ARTHUR. So it's best that he reach his capacity on the street.

MARION. He knew about the two of you. We talked about it.

ARTHUR. Believe me, he knew before you talked about it. He's young, not stupid.

MARION. It's very easy for you to stand here and criticize, but there are aspects that you will just never be able to understand. You weren't there. You have no idea what it was like for me. You're talking to someone who thought that a girl went to college to meet a husband. I went to protest rallies because I liked the music. I bought a guitar because I thought it looked good on the bed! This lifestyle, this knowledge that you take for granted, was all a little out of left field for me.

ARTHUR. I can imagine.

MARION. No, I don't think you can. I met Collin in college, married him right after graduation and settled down for a nice quiet life of Kids and Careers. You think I had any idea about this? Talk about life's little surprises. You live with someone for sixteen years, you share your life, your bed, you have a child together, and then you wake up one day and he tells you that to him it's all been a lie. A lie. Try that on for size. Here you are the happiest couple you know, fulfilling your every life fantasy and he tells you he's living a lie.

ARTHUR. I'm sure he never said that.

MARION. Don't be so sure. There was a lot of new ground being broken back then and plenty of it was muddy.

ARTHUR. You know that he loved you.

MARION. What's that supposed to do, make things easier? It doesn't. I was brought up to believe, among other things, that if you had love that was enough. So what if I wasn't everything he wanted. Maybe he wasn't exactly everything I wanted either. So, you know what? You count your blessings and you settle.

ARTHUR. No one has to settle. Not him. Not you.

MARION. Of course not. You can say, "Up yours!" to everything and everyone who depends and needs you, and go off to make yourself happy.

ARTHUR. It's not that simple.

MARION. No. This is simpler. Death is simpler. (Yelling out:) Happy now?

(They stare at each other. MARION calms the rage and catches her breath. ARTHUR holds his emotions in check.)

ARTHUR. How about a nice hot cup of coffee? Tea with lemon? Hot cocoa with a marshmallow floating in it?

MARION (laughs). I was wrong. You are a mother.

(ARTHUR goes into the kitchen and starts preparing things. Marion loafs by the doorway.)

MARION. I lied before. He was everything I ever wanted.

(ARTHUR stops, looks at her, and then changes the subject as he goes on with his work.)

ARTHUR. When I came into the building and saw Jimmy in the lobby I absolutely freaked for a second. It's amazing how much they look alike. It was like seeing a little miniature Collin standing there.

MARION. I know. He's like Collin's clone. There's nothing of me in him.

ARTHUR. I always kinda hoped that when he grew up he'd take after me. Not much chance, I guess.

MARION. Don't do anything fancy in there.

ARTHUR. Please. Anything we can consume is one less thing to pack.

MARION. So you've said.

ARTHUR. So we've said.

MARION. I want to keep seeing you and I want you to see Jim. You're still part of this family. No one's looking to cut you out.

ARTHUR. Ah, who'd want a kid to grow up looking like me anyway. I had enough trouble looking like this. Why pass on the misery?

MARION. You're adorable.

ARTHUR. Is that like saying I have a good personality?

MARION. I think you are one of the most naturally handsome men I know.

ARTHUR. Natural is right, and the bloom is fading.

MARION. All you need is a few good nights' sleep to kill those rings under your eyes.

ARTHUR. Forget the rings under my eyes, (grabbing his middle) . . . how about the rings around my moon?

MARION. I like you like this.

ARTHUR. From the time that Collin started using the wheelchair until he died, about six months, I lost twenty-three pounds. No gym, no diet. In the last seven weeks I've gained close to fifty.

MARION. You're exaggerating.

ARTHUR. I'd prove it on the bathroom scale, but I sold it in working order.

MARION. You'd never know.

ARTHUR. Marion, you'd never know, but ask my belt. Ask my pants. Ask my underwear. Even my stretch socks have stretch marks. I called the ambulance at five A.M., he was gone at nine and by nine-thirty, I was on a first-name basis with Sara Lee. I can quote the business hours of every ice-cream parlor, pizzeria and bakery on the island of Manhattan. I know the location of every twenty-four-hour grocery in the greater New York area, and I have memorized the phone numbers of every Mandarin, Szechuan and Hunan restaurant with free delivery.

MARION. At least you haven't wasted your time on useless hobbies.

ARTHUR. Are you kidding? I'm opening my own Overeater's Hotline. We'll have to start small, but expansion is guaranteed.

MARION. You're the best, you know that? If I couldn't be everything that Collin wanted then I'm grateful that he found someone like you.

ARTHUR (turning on her without missing a beat). Keep your goddamned gratitude to yourself. I didn't go through any of this for you. So your thanks are out of line. And he didn't find "someone like" me. It was me.

MARION (frightened). I didn't mean . . .

ARTHUR. And I wish you'd remember one thing more: He died in my arms, not yours.

(MARION is totally caught off guard. She stares disbelieving, open-mouthed. ARTHUR walks past her as he leaves the kitchen with place mats. He puts them on the coffee table. As he arranges the papers and place mats he speaks, never looking at her.)

ARTHUR. Look, I know you were trying to say something supportive. Don't waste your breath. There's nothing you can say that will make any of this easier for me. There's no way for you to help me get through this. And that's your fault. After three years you still have no idea or understanding of who I am. Or maybe you do know but refuse to accept it. I don't know and I don't care. But at least understand, from my point of view, who you are: You are my husband's ex-wife. If you like, the mother of my stepson. Don't flatter yourself into thinking you're any more than that. And whatever you are, you're certainly not my friend.

(He stops, looks up at her, then passes her again as he goes back to the kitchen. MARION is shaken, working hard to control herself. She moves toward the couch.)

MARION. Why don't we just sign these papers and I'll be out of your way.

ARTHUR. Shouldn't you say I'll be out of your way? After all, I'm not just signing papers. I'm signing away my home.

MARION (resolved not to fight, she gets her purse). I'll leave the papers here. Please have them notarized and returned to my lawyer.

ARTHUR. Don't forget my painting.

MARION (exploding). What do you want from me, Arthur?

ARTHUR (yelling back). I want you the hell out of my apartment! I want you out of my life! And I want you to leave Collin alone!

MARION. The man's dead. I don't know how much more alone I can leave him.

*(*ARTHUR laughs at the irony, but behind the laughter is something much more desperate.)

ARTHUR. Lots more, Marion. You've got to let him go.

MARION. For the life of me, I don't know what I did or what you think I did, for you to treat me like this. But you're not going to get away with it. You will not take your anger out on me. I will not stand here and be badgered and insulted by you. I know you've been hurt and I know you're hurting but you're not the only one who lost someone here.

ARTHUR (topping her). Yes I am! You didn't just lose him. I did! You lost him five years ago when he divorced you. This is not your moment of grief and loss, it's mine! (Picking up the bundle of cards and throwing it toward her.) These condolences do not belong to you, they're mine. (Tossing her list back to her.) His things are not yours to give away, they're mine! This death does not belong to you, it's mine! Bought and paid for outright. I suffered for it, I bled for it.

I was the one who cooked his meals. I was the one who spoon-fed him. I pushed his wheelchair. I carried and bathed him. I wiped his backside and changed his diapers. I breathed life into and wrestled fear out of his heart. I kept him alive for two years longer than any doctor thought possible and when it was time I was the one who prepared him for death.

I paid in full for my place in his life and I will not share it with you. We are not the two widows of Collin Redding. Your life was not here. Your husband didn't just die. You've got a son and a life somewhere else. Your husband's sitting, waiting for you at home, wondering, as I am, what the hell you're doing here and why you can't let go.

(MARION leans back against the couch. She's blown away. ARTHUR stands staring at her.)

ARTHUR (quietly). Let him go, Marion. He's mine. Dead or alive; mine.

(The teakettle whistles. ARTHUR leaves the room, goes to the kitchen and pours the water as MARION pulls herself together. ARTHUR carries the loaded tray back into the living room and sets it down on the coffee table. He sits and pours a cup.)

ARTHUR. One marshmallow or two?

(MARION stares, unsure as to whether the attack is really over or not.)

ARTHUR (placing them in her cup). Take three, they're small.

(MARION smiles and takes the offered cup.)

ARTHUR (campily). Now let me tell you how I really feel.

(MARION jumps slightly, then they share a small laugh. Silence as they each gather themselves and sip their refreshments.)

MARION (calmly). Do you think that I sold the apartment just to throw you out?

ARTHUR. I don't care about the apartment . . .

MARION. ...Because I really didn't. Believe me.

ARTHUR. I know.

MARION. I knew the expenses here were too much for you, and I knew you couldn't afford to buy out my half . . . I figured if we sold it, that you'd at least have a nice chunk of money to start over with.

ARTHUR. You could've given me a little more time.

MARION. Maybe. But I thought the sooner you were out of here, the sooner you could go on with your life.

ARTHUR. Or the sooner you could go on with yours.

MARION. Maybe. (Pauses to gather her thoughts.) Anyway, I'm not going to tell you that I have no idea what you're talking about. I'd have to be worse than deaf and blind not to have seen the way you've been treated. Or mistreated. When I read Collin's obituary in the newspaper and saw my name and Jimmy's name and no mention of you . . . (Shakes her head, not knowing what to say.) You know that his secretary was the one who wrote that up and sent it in. Not me. But I should have done something about it and I didn't. I know.

ARTHUR. Wouldn't have made a difference. I wrote my own obituary for him and sent it to the smaller papers. They edited me out.

MARION. I'm sorry. I remember, at the funeral, I was surrounded by all of Collin's family and business associates while you were left with your friends. I knew it was wrong. I knew I should have said something but it felt good to have them around me and you looked like you were holding up. . . . Wrong. But saying that it's all my fault for not letting go . . . ? There were other people involved.

ARTHUR. Who took their cue from you.

MARION. Arthur, you don't understand. Most people that we knew as a couple had no idea that Collin was Gay right up to his death. And even those that did know only found out when he got sick and the word leaked out that it was AIDS. I don't think I have to tell you how stupid and ill-informed most people are about homosexuality. And AIDS . . . ? The kinds of insane behavior that word inspires . . . ?

Those people at the funeral, how many times did they call to see how he was doing over these years? How many of them ever went to see him in the hospital? Did any of them even come here? So, why would you expect them to act any differently after his death?

So, maybe that helps to explain their behavior, but what about mine, right? Well, maybe there is no explanation. Only excuses. And excuse number one is that you're right, I have never really let go of him. And I am jealous of you. Hell, I was jealous of anyone that Collin ever talked to, let alone slept with . . . let alone loved.

The first year, after he moved out, we talked all the time about the different men he was seeing. And I always listened and advised. It was kind of fun. It kept us close. It kept me a part of his intimate life. And the bottom line was always that he wasn't happy with the men he was meeting. So, I was always allowed to hang on to the hope that one day he'd give it all up and come home. Then he got sick.

He called me, told me he was in the hospital and asked if I'd come see him. I ran. When I got to his door there was a sign, INSTRUCTIONS FOR VISITORS OF AN AIDS PATIENT. I nearly died.

ARTHUR. He hadn't told you?

MARION. No. And believe me, a sign is not the way to find these things out. I was so angry. . . . And he was so sick . . . I was sure that he'd die right then. If not from the illness then from the hospital staff's neglect. No one wanted to go near him and I didn't bother fighting with them because I understood that they were scared. I was scared. That whole month in the hospital I didn't let Jimmy visit him once.

You learn.

Well, as you know, he didn't die. And he asked if he could come stay with me until he was well. And I said yes. Of course, yes. Now, here's something I never thought I'd ever admit to anyone: had he asked to stay with me for a few weeks I would have said no. But he asked to stay with me until he was well and knowing there was no cure I said yes. In my craziness I said yes because to me that meant forever. That he was coming back to me forever. Not that I wanted him to die, but I assumed from everything I'd read. . . . And we'd be back together for whatever time he had left. Can you understand that?

(ARTHUR nods.)

MARION (gathers her thoughts again). Two weeks later he left. He moved in here. Into this apartment that we had bought as an investment. Never to live in. Certainly never to live apart in. Next thing I knew, the name Arthur starts appearing in every phone call, every dinner conversation.

"Did you see the doctor?"

"Yes. Arthur made sure I kept the appointment."

"Are you going to your folks for Thanksgiving?"

"No. Arthur and I are having some friends over."

I don't know which one of us was more of a coward, he for not telling or me for not asking about you. But eventually you became a given. Then, of course, we met and became what I had always thought of as friends.

(ARTHUR winces in guilt.)

MARION. I don't care what you say, how could we not be friends with someone so great in common: love for one of the most special human beings there ever was. And don't try and tell me there weren't times when you enjoyed me being around as an ally. I can think of a dozen occasions when we ganged up on him, teasing him with our intimate knowledge of his personal habits.

(ARTHUR has to laugh.)

MARION. Blanket stealing? Snoring? Excess gas, no less? (Takes a moment to enjoy this truce.) I don't think that my loving him threatened your relationship. Maybe I'm not being truthful with myself. But I don't. I never tried to step between you. Not that I ever had the opportunity. Talk about being joined at the hip! And that's not to say I wasn't jealous. I was. Terribly. Hatefully. But always lovingly. I was happy for Collin because there was no way to deny that he was happy. With everything he was facing, he was happy. Love did that. You did that.

He lit up with you. He came to life. I envied that and all the time you spent together, but more, I watched you care for him (sometimes overcare for him), and I was in awe. I could never have done what you did. I never would have survived. I really don't know how you did.

ARTHUR. Who said I survived?

MARION. Don't tease. You did an absolutely incredible thing. It's not as if you met him before he got sick. You entered a relationship that you knew in all probability would end this way and you never wavered.

ARTHUR. Of course I did. Don't have me sainted, Marion. But sometimes you have no choice. Believe me, if I could've gotten away from him I would've. But I was a prisoner of love.

(He makes a campy gesture and pose.)

MARION. Stop.

ARTHUR. And there were lots of pluses. I got to quit a job I hated, stay home all day and watch game shows. I met a lot of doctors and learned a lot of big words. (ARTHUR jumps up and goes to the pile of boxes where he extracts one and brings it back to the couch.)

And then there was all the exciting traveling I got to do. This box has a souvenir from each one of our trips. Wanna see? (MARION nods. Heopens the box and pulls things out one by one. Holding up an old bottle.)

This is from the house we rented in Reno when we went to clear out his lungs. (Holding handmade potholders.)

This is from the hospital in Reno. Collin made them. They had a great arts and crafts program. (Copper bracelets.)

These are from a faith healer in Philly. They don't do much for a fever, but they look great with a green sweater. (Glass ashtrays.)

These are from our first visit to the clinic in France. Such lovely people. (A Bible.)

This is from our second visit to the clinic in France. (A bead necklace.)

A Voodoo doctor in New Orleans. Next time we'll have to get there earlier in the year. I think he sold all the pretty ones at Mardi Gras. (A tiny piñata.)

Then there was Mexico. Black market drugs and empty wallets. (Now pulling things out at random.)

L.A., San Francisco, Houston, Boston . . . We traveled everywhere they offered hope for sale and came home with souvenirs. (ARTHUR quietly pulls a few more things out and then begins to put them all back into the box slowly. Softly as he works:) Marion, I would have done anything, traveled anywhere to avoid . . . or delay. . . . Not just because I loved him so desperately, but when you've lived the way we did for three years . . . the battle becomes your life. (He looks at her and then away.) His last few hours were beyond any scenario I had imagined. He hadn't walked in nearly six months. He was totally incontinent. If he spoke two words in a week I was thankful. Days went by without his eyes ever focusing on me. He just stared out at I don't know what. Not the meals as I fed him. Not the TV I played constantly for company. Just out. Or maybe in.

It was the middle of the night when I heard his breathing become labored. His lungs were filling with fluid again. I knew the sound. I'd heard it a hundred times before. So, I called the ambulance and got him to the hospital.

They hooked him up to the machines, the oxygen, shot him with morphine and told me that they would do what they could to keep him alive.

But, Marion, it wasn't the machines that kept him breathing. He did it himself. It was that incredible will and strength inside him. Whether it came from his love of life or fear of death, who knows. But he'd been counted out a hundred times and a hundred times he fought his way back.

I got a magazine to read him, pulled a chair up to the side of his bed and holding his hand, I wondered whether I should call Helen to let the cleaning lady in or if he'd fall asleep and I could sneak home for an hour. I looked up from the page and he was looking at me. Really looking right into my eyes. I patted his cheek and said, "Don't worry, honey, you're going to be fine."

But there was something else in his eyes. He wasn't satisfied with that. And I don't know why, I have no idea where it came from, I just heard the words coming out of my mouth, "Collin, do you want to die?"

His eyes filled and closed, he nodded his head.

I can't tell you what I was thinking, I'm not sure I was. I slipped off my shoes, lifted his blanket and climbed into bed next to him. I helped him to put his arms around me, and mine around him, and whispered as gently as I could into his ear, "It's alright to let go now. It's time to go on." And he did.

Marion, you've got your life and your son. All I have is an intangible place in a man's history. Leave me that. Respect that.

MARION. I understand.

(ARTHUR suddenly comes to life, running to get the shopping bag that he'd left at the front door.)

ARTHUR. Jeez! With all the screamin' and sad storytelling I forgot something. (He extracts a bouquet of flowers from the bag.) I brung you flowers and everything.

MARION. You brought me flowers?

ARTHUR. Well, I knew you'd never think to bring me flowers and I felt that on an occasion such as this somebody oughta get flowers from somebody.

MARION. You know, Arthur, you're really making me feel like a worthless piece of garbage.

ARTHUR. So what else is new? (He presents the flowers.) Just promise me one thing: Don't press one in a book. Just stick them in a vase and when they fade just toss them out. No more memorabilia.

MARION. Arthur, I want to do something for you and I don't know what. Tell me what you want.

ARTHUR. I want little things. Not much. I want to be remembered. If you get a Christmas card from Collin's mother make sure she sent me one too. If his friends call to see how you are, ask if they've called me. Have me to dinner so I can see Jimmy. Let me take him out now and then. Invite me to his wedding. (They both laugh.)

MARION. You've got it.

ARTHUR (clearing the table). Let me get all this cold cocoa out of the way. We still have the deed to do.

MARION (checking her watch). And I've got to get Jimmy home in time for practice.

ARTHUR. Band practice?

MARION. Baseball. (Picking her list off the floor.) About this list, you do what you want.

ARTHUR. Believe me, I will. But I promise to consider your suggestions. Just don't rush me. I'm not ready to give it all away. (ARTHUR is off to the kitchen with his tray and the phone rings. He answers in the kitchen.) Hello? . . . Just a minute. (Calling out.) It's your eager Little Leaguer.

MARION (into phone). Hello, honey. . . . I'll be down in five minutes. No. You know what? You come up here and get me. . . . No, I said you should come up here. . . . I said I want you to come up here. . . . Because I said so. . . . Thank you. (She hangs the receiver.)

ARTHUR (rushing to the papers). Alright, where do we start on these?

MARION (getting out her seal). I guess you should just start signing everything and I'll stamp along with you. Keep one of everything on the side for yourself.

ARTHUR. Now I feel so rushed. What am I signing?

MARION. You want to do this another time?

ARTHUR. No. Let's get it over with. I wouldn't survive another session like this.

(He starts to sign and she starts her job.)

MARION. I keep meaning to ask you; how are you?

ARTHUR (at first puzzled and then:) Oh, you mean my health? Fine. No. I'm fine. I've been tested, and nothing. We were very careful. We took many precautions. Collin used to make jokes about how we should invest in rubber futures.

MARION. I'll bet.

ARTHUR (stops what he's doing). It never occurred to me until now. How about you?

MARION (not stopping). Well, we never had sex after he got sick.

ARTHUR. But before?

MARION (stopping but not looking up). I have the antibodies in my blood. No signs that it will ever develop into anything else. And it's been five years so my chances are pretty good that I'm just a carrier.

ARTHUR. I'm so sorry. Collin never told me.

MARION. He didn't know. In fact, other than my husband and the doctors, you're the only one I've told.

ARTHUR. You and your husband . . . ?

MARION. Have invested in rubber futures. There'd only be a problem if we wanted to have a child. Which we do. But we'll wait. Miracles happen every day.

ARTHUR. I don't know what to say.

MARION. Tell me you'll be there if I ever need you.

(ARTHUR gets up, goes to her and puts his arm around her. They hold each other. He gently pushes her away to make a joke.)

ARTHUR. Sure! Take something else that should have been mine.

MARION. Don't even joke about things like that.

(The doorbell rings. They pull themselves together.)

ARTHUR. You know we'll never get these done today.

MARION. So, tomorrow.

(ARTHUR goes to open the door as MARION gathers her things. He opens the door and JIMMY is standing in the hall.)

JIM. C'mon, Ma. I'm gonna be late.

ARTHUR. Would you like to come inside?

JIM. We've gotta go.

MARION. Jimmy, come on.

JIM. Ma!

(She glares. He comes in. ARTHUR closes the door.)

MARION (holding out the flowers). Take these for Mommy.

JIM (taking them). Can we go?

MARION (picking up the painting). Say good-bye to your Uncle Arthur.

JIM. 'Bye, Arthur. Come on.

MARION. Give him a kiss.

ARTHUR. Marion, don't.

MARION. Give your uncle a kiss good-bye.

JIM. He's not my uncle.

MARION. No. He's a hell of a lot more than your uncle.

ARTHUR (offering his hand). A handshake will do.

MARION. Tell Uncle Arthur what your daddy told you.

JIM. About what?

MARION. Stop playing dumb. You know.

ARTHUR. Don't embarrass him.

MARION. Jimmy, please.

JIM (he regards his mother's softer tone and then speaks). He said that after me and Mommy he loved you the most.

MARION (standing behind him). Go on.

JIM. And that I should love you too. And make sure that you're not lonely or very sad.

ARTHUR. Thank you.

*(*ARTHUR reaches down to the boy and they hug. JIM gives him a little peck on the cheek and then breaks away.)

MARION (going to open the door). Alright, kid, you done good. Now let's blow this joint before you muck it up.

*(*JIM rushes out the door. MARION turns to ARTHUR.)

MARION. A child's kiss is magic. Why else would they be so stingy with them? I'll call you.

(ARTHUR nods understanding. MARION pulls the door closed behind her. ARTHUR stands quietly as the lights fade to black.)

THE END

NOTE: If being performed on film, the final image should be of ARTHUR leaning his back against the closed door on the inside of the apartment and MARION leaning on the outside of the door. A moment of thought and then they both move on.*

U TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. -We first hear about AIDS on page 1672. Were you completely surprised, or did you think the play might introduce the subject? That is, did the author in any way prepare you for the subject? If so, how?
2. -As far as the basic story goes, June (the lawyer) is not necessary. Marion could have brought the papers with her. Why do you suppose Fierstein introduces June? What function or functions does she serve? How would you characterize her?
3. -On page 1673 Marion says of the teapot, "One less thing to pack." Arthur says the same words a moment later, and then he repeats them yet again. A little later, while drinking cocoa, he repeats the words, and Marion says, "So you've said," to which Arthur replies, "So we've said." Exactly what tone do you think should be used when Marion first says these words? When Arthur says them? What significance, if any, do you attach to the fact that both characters speak these words?
4. -Arthur says that Jimmy blames him for Collin's death, but Marion denies it. Who do you think is right? Can a reader be sure? Why or why not?
5. -When Arthur tells Marion that she should have told Jimmy why Collin left her, Marion says, "How the hell do you tell a seven-year-old that his father is leaving his mother to go sleep with other men?" Arthur replies, "[W]ell, not like that." What does Arthur mean? How might Marion have told Jimmy? Do you think she should have told Jimmy?
6. -Do you agree with a reader who found Marion an unconvincing character because she is "so passive and unquestioningly loving in her regard for her ex-husband"? If you disagree, how would you argue your case?

7. -During the course of the play, what (if anything) does Marion learn? What (if anything) does Arthur learn? What (if anything) does Jimmy learn? What (if anything) does the reader or viewer learn from the play?

8. -One reader characterized the play as "propaganda." Do you agree? Why or why not? And if you think On Tidy Endings is propaganda, are you implying that it is, therefore, deficient as a work of art?

The Play on the Stage

9. -A reviewer of the play said that Arthur is "bitchy" in many of his responses to Marion. What do you suppose the reviewer meant by this? Does the term imply that Fierstein presents a stereotype of the homosexual? If so, what is this stereotype? If you think that the term applies (even though you might not use such a word yourself), do you think that Fierstein's portrayal of Arthur is stereotypical? If it is stereotypical, is this a weakness in the play?

10. -What well-known actors would you cast in the roles? Explain your choices.

AUGUST WILSON

August Wilson was born in Pittsburgh in 1945, the son of a black woman and a white man. After dropping out of school at the age of 15, Wilson took various odd jobs, such as stock clerk and short-order cook, in his spare time educating himself in the public library, chiefly by reading works by such black writers as Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, Langston Hughes, and Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones). In 1978 the director of a black theater in St. Paul, Minnesota, who had known Wilson in Pittsburgh, invited him to write a play for the theater. Six months later Wilson moved permanently to St. Paul.

The winner of the Pulitzer Prize for drama in 1987, Wilson's Fences was first presented as a staged reading in 1983 and was later performed in Chicago, Seattle, Rochester (New York), and New Haven (Connecticut) before reaching New York City in 1987. An earlier play, Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, was voted Best Play of the Year 1984–1985 by the New York Drama Critics' Circle. In 1981 when Ma Rainey was first read at the O'Neill Center in Waterford, Connecticut, Wilson met Lloyd Richards, an African-American director with whom he hascontinued to work closely. The Piano Lesson, directed by Richards, won Wilson a second Pulitzer Prize in 1990.

Fences [1987]

for Lloyd Richards,

who adds to whatever he touches

When the sins of our fathers visit us

We do not have to play host.

We can banish them with forgiveness

As God, in His Largeness and Laws.

LIST OF CHARACTERS

TROY MAXSON

JIM BONO, Troy's friend

ROSE, Troy's wife

LYONS, Troy's oldest son by previous marriage

GABRIEL, Troy's brother

CORY, Troy and Rose's son

RAYNELL, Troy's daughter

SETTING: The setting is the yard which fronts the only entrance to the Maxson household, an ancient two-story brick house set back off a small alley in a big-city neighborhood. The entrance to the house is gained by two or three steps leading to a wooden porch badly in need of paint.

A relatively recent addition to the house and running its full width, the porch lacks congruence. It is a sturdy porch with a flat roof. One or two chairs of dubious value sit at one end where the kitchen window opens onto the porch. An old-fashioned icebox stands silent guard at the opposite end.

The yard is a small dirt yard, partially fenced, except for the last scene, with a wooden saw horse, a pile of lumber, and other fence-building equipment set off to the side. Opposite is a tree from which hangs a ball made of rags. A baseball bat leans against the tree. Two oil drums serve as garbage receptacles and sit near the house at right to complete the setting.

THE PLAY: Near the turn of the century, the destitute of Europe sprang on the city with tenacious claws and an honest and solid dream. The city devoured them. They swelled its belly until it burst into a thousand furnaces and sewing machines, a thousand butcher shops and bakers' ovens, a thousand churches and hospitals and funeral parlors and money-lenders. The city grew. It nourished itself and offered each man a partnership limited only by his talent, his guile, and his willingness and capacity for hard work. For the immigrants of Europe, a dream dared and won true.

The descendants of African slaves were offered no such welcome or participation. They came from places called the Carolinas and the Virginias, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee. They came strong, eager, searching. The city rejected them and they fled and settled along the riverbanks and under bridges in shallow, ramshackle houses made of sticks and tarpaper. They collected rags and wood. They sold the use of their muscles and their bodies. They cleaned houses and washed clothes, they shined shoes, and in quiet desperation and vengeful pride, they stole, and lived in pursuit of their own dream. That they could breathe free, finally, and stand to meet life with the force of dignity and whatever eloquence the heart could call upon.

By 1957, the hard-won victories of the European immigrants had solidified the industrial might of America. War had been confronted and won with new energies that used loyalty and patriotism as its fuel. Life was rich, full, and flourishing. The Milwaukee Braves won the World Series, and the hot winds of change that would make the sixties a turbulent, racing, dangerous, and provocative decade had not yet begun to blow full.

Scene 1

It is 1957. TROY and BONO enter the yard, engaged in conversation. TROY is fifty-three years old, a large man with thick, heavy hands; it is this largeness that he strives to fill out and make an accommodation with. Together with his blackness, his largeness informs his sensibilities and the choices he has made in his life.

Of the two men, BONO is obviously the follower. His commitment to their friendship of thirty-odd years is rooted in his admiration of TROY*'s honesty, capacity for hard work, and his strength, which* BONO seeks to emulate.

It is Friday night, payday, and the one night of the week the two men engage in a ritual of talk and drink. TROY is usually the most talkative and at times he can be crude and almost vulgar, though he is capable of rising to profound heights of expression. The men carry lunch buckets and wear or carry burlap aprons and are dressed in clothes suitable to their jobs as garbage collectors.

BONO. Troy, you ought to stop that lying!

TROY. I ain't lying! The nigger had a watermelon this big. (He indicates with his hands.) Talking about . . . "What watermelon, Mr. Rand?" I liked to fell out! "What watermelon, Mr. Rand?" . . . And it sitting there big as life.

BONO. What did Mr. Rand say?

TROY. Ain't said nothing. Figure if the nigger too dumb to know he carrying a watermelon, he wasn't gonna get much sense out of him. Trying to hide that great big old watermelon under his coat. Afraid to let the white man see him carry it home.

BONO. I'm like you . . . I ain't got no time for them kind of people.

TROY. Now what he look like getting mad cause he see the man from the union talking to Mr. Rand?

BONO. He come to me talking about . . . "Maxson gonna get us fired." I told him to get away from me with that. He walked away from me calling you a troublemaker. What Mr. Rand say?

TROY. Ain't said nothing. He told me to go down the Commissioner's office next Friday. They called me down there to see them.

BONO. Well, as long as you got your complaint filed, they can't fire you. That's what one of them white fellows tell me.

TROY. I ain't worried about them firing me. They gonna fire me cause I asked a question? That's all I did. I went to Mr. Rand and asked him, "Why? Why you got the white mens driving and the colored lifting?" Told him, "what's the matter, don't I count? You think only white fellows got sense enough to drive a truck. That ain't no paper job! Hell, anybody can drive a truck. How come you got all whites driving and the colored lifting?" He told me "take it to the union." Well, hell, that's what I done! Now they wanna come up with this pack of lies.

BONO. I told Brownie if the man come and ask him any questions . . . just tell the truth! It ain't nothing but something they done trumped up on you cause you filed a complaint on them.

TROY. Brownie don't understand nothing. All I want them to do is change the job description. Give everybody a chance to drive the truck. Brownie can't see that. He ain't got that much sense.

BONO. How you figure he be making out with that gal be up at Taylor's all the time . . . that Alberta gal?

TROY. Same as you and me. Getting just as much as we is. Which is to say nothing.

BONO. It is, huh? I figure you doing a little better than me . . . and I ain't saying what I'm doing.

TROY. Aw, nigger, look here . . . I know you. If you had got anywhere near that gal, twenty minutes later you be looking to tell somebody. And the first one you gonna tell . . . that you gonna want to brag to . . . is me.

BONO. I ain't saying that. I see where you be eyeing her.

TROY. I eye all the women. I don't miss nothing. Don't never let nobody tell you Troy Maxson don't eye the women.

BONO. You been doing more than eyeing her. You done bought her a drink or two.

TROY. Hell yeah, I bought her a drink! What that mean? I bought you one, too. What that mean cause I buy her a drink? I'm just being polite.

BONO. It's all right to buy her one drink. That's what you call being polite. But when you wanna be buying two or three . . . that's what you call eyeing her.

TROY. Look here, as long as you known me . . . you ever known me to chase after women?

BONO. Hell yeah! Long as I done known you. You forgetting I knew you when.

TROY. Naw, I'm talking about since I been married to Rose?

BONO. Oh, not since you been married to Rose. Now, that's the truth, there. I can say that.

TROY. All right then! Case closed.

BONO. I see you be walking up around Alberta's house. You supposed to be at Taylors' and you be walking up around there.

TROY. What you watching where I'm walking for? I ain't watching after you.

BONO. I seen you walking around there more than once.

TROY. Hell, you liable to see me walking anywhere! That don't mean nothing cause you see me walking around there.

BONO. Where she come from anyway? She just kinda showed up one day.

TROY. Tallahassee. You can look at her and tell she one of them Florida gals. They got some big healthy women down there. Grow them right up out the ground. Got a little bit of Indian in her. Most of them niggers down in Florida got some Indian in them.

BONO. I don't know about that Indian part. But she damn sure big and healthy. Woman wear some big stockings. Got them great big old legs and hips as wide as the Mississippi River.

TROY. Legs don't mean nothing. You don't do nothing but push them out of the way. But them hips cushion the ride!

BONO. Troy, you ain't got no sense.

TROY. It's the truth! Like you riding on Goodyears!

-ROSE enters from the house. She is ten years younger than TROY, her devotion to him stems from her recognition of the possibilities of her life without him: a succession of abusive men and their babies, a life of partying and running the streets, the Church, or aloneness with its attendant pain and frustration. She recognizes TROY's spirit as a fine and illuminating one and she either ignores or forgives his faults, only some of which she recognizes. Though she doesn't drink, her presence is an integral part of the Friday night rituals. She alternates between the porch and the kitchen, where supper preparations are under way.

ROSE. What you all out here getting into?

TROY. What you worried about what we getting into for? This is men talk, woman.

ROSE. What I care what you all talking about? Bono, you gonna stay for supper?

BONO. No, I thank you, Rose. But Lucille say she cooking up a pot of pigfeet.

TROY. Pigfeet! Hell, I'm going home with you! Might even stay the night if you got some pigfeet. You got something in there to top them pigfeet, Rose?

ROSE. I'm cooking up some chicken. I got some chicken and collard greens.

TROY. Well, go on back in the house and let me and Bono finish what we was talking about. This is men talk. I got some talk for you later. You know what kind of talk I mean. You go on and powder it up.

ROSE. Troy Maxson, don't you start that now!

TROY (puts his arm around her). Aw, woman . . . come here. Look here, Bono . . . when I met this woman . . . I got out that place, say, "Hitch up my pony, saddle up my mare . . . there's a woman out there for me somewhere. I looked here. Looked there. Saw Rose and latched on to her." I latched on to her and told her—I'm gonna tell you the truth—I told her, "Baby, I don't wanna marry, I just wanna be your man." Rose told me . . . tell him what you told me, Rose.

ROSE. I told him if he wasn't the marrying kind, then move out the way so the marrying kind could find me.

TROY. That's what she told me. "Nigger, you in my way. You blocking the view! Move out the way so I can find me a husband." I thought it over two or three days. Come back—

ROSE. Ain't no two or three days nothing. You was back the same night.

TROY. Come back, told her . . . "Okay, baby . . . but I'm gonna buy me a banty rooster and put him out there in the backyard . . . and when he see a stranger come, he'll flap his wings and crow . . . " Look here, Bono, I could watch the front door by myself . . . it was that back door I was worried about.

ROSE. Troy, you ought not talk like that. Troy ain't doing nothing but telling a lie.

TROY. Only thing is . . . when we first got married . . . forget the rooster . . . we ain't had no yard!

BONO. I hear you tell it. Me and Lucille was staying down there on Logan Street. Had two rooms with the outhouse in the back. I ain't mind the outhouse none. But when that goddamn wind blow through there in the winter . . . that's what I'm talking about! To this day I wonder why in the hell I ever stayed down there for six long years. But see, I didn't know I could do no better. I thought only white folks had inside toilets and things.

ROSE. There's a lot of people don't know they can do no better than they doing now. That's just something you got to learn. A lot of folks still shop at Bella's.

TROY. Ain't nothing wrong with shopping at Bella's. She got fresh food.

ROSE. I ain't said nothing about if she got fresh food. I'm talking about what she charge. She charge ten cents more than the A&P.

TROY. The A&P ain't never done nothing for me. I spends my money where I'm treated right. I go down to Bella, say, “I need a loaf of bread, I’ll pay you Friday.” She give it to me. What sense that make when I got money to go and spend it somewhere else and ignore the person who done right by me? That ain’t in the Bible.

ROSE. We ain’t talking about what’s in the Bible. What sense it make to shop there when she overcharge?

TROY. You shop where you want to. I’ll do my shopping where the people been good to me.

ROSE. Well, I don’t think it’s right for her to overcharge. That’s all I was saying.

BONO. Look here . . . I got to get on. Lucille going be raising all kind of hell.

TROY. Where you going, nigger? We ain’t finished this pint. Come here, finish this pint.

BONO. Well, hell, I am . . . if you ever turn the bottle loose.

TROY (hands him the bottle). The only thing I say about the A&P is I’m glad Cory got that job down there. Help him take care of his school clothes and things. Gabe done moved out and things getting tight around here. He got that job . . . He can start to look out for himself.

ROSE. Cory done went and got recruited by a college football team.

TROY. I told that boy about that football stuff. The white man ain’t gonna let him get nowhere with that football. I told him when he first come to me with it. Now you come telling me he done went and got more tied up in it. He ought to go and get recruited in how to fix cars or something where he can make a living.

ROSE. He ain’t talking about making no living playing football. It’s just something the boys in school do. They gonna send a recruiter by to talk to you. He’ll tell you he ain’t talking about making no living playing football. It’s a honor to be recruited.

TROY. It ain’t gonna get him nowhere. Bono’ll tell you that.

BONO. If he be like you in the sports . . . he’s gonna be all right. Ain’t but two men ever played baseball as good as you. That’s Babe Ruth and Josh Gibson.[1] Them’s the only two men ever hit more home runs than you.

TROY. What it ever get me? Ain’t got a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of.

ROSE. Times have changed since you was playing baseball, Troy. That was before the war. Times have changed a lot since then.

TROY. How in hell they done changed?

ROSE. They got lots of colored boys playing ball now. Baseball and football.

BONO. You right about that, Rose. Times have changed, Troy. You just come along too early.

TROY. There ought not never have been no time called too early! Now you take that fellow . . . what's that fellow they had playing right field for the Yankees back then? You know who I'm talking about, Bono. Used to play right field for the Yankees.

ROSE. Selkirk?

TROY. Selkirk! That's it! Man batting .269, understand? .269. What kind of sense that make? I was hitting .432 with thirty-seven home runs! Man batting .269 and playing right field for the Yankees! I saw Josh Gibson's daughter yesterday. She walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet. Now I bet you Selkirk's daughter ain't walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet! I bet you that!

ROSE. They got a lot of colored baseball players now. Jackie Robinson2 was the first. Folks had to wait for Jackie Robinson.

TROY. I done seen a hundred niggers play baseball better than Jackie Robinson. Hell, I know some teams Jackie Robinson couldn't even make! What you talking about Jackie Robinson. Jackie Robinson wasn't nobody. I'm talking about if you could play ball then they ought to have let you play. Don't care what color you were. Come telling me I come along too early. If you could play . . . then they ought to have let you play.

TROY takes a long drink from the bottle.

ROSE. You gonna drink yourself to death. You don't need to be drinking like that.

TROY. Death ain't nothing. I done seen him. Done wrassled with him. You can't tell me nothing about death. Death ain't nothing but a fastball on the outside corner. And you know what I'll do to that! Lookee here, Bono . . . am I lying? You get one of them fastballs, about waist high, over the outside corner of the plate where you can get the meat of the bat on it . . . and good god! You can kiss it goodbye. Now, am I lying?

BONO. Naw, you telling the truth there. I seen you do it.

TROY. If I'm lying . . . that 450 feet worth of lying! (Pause.) That's all death is to me. A fastball on the outside corner.

ROSE. I don't know why you want to get on talking about death.

TROY. Ain't nothing wrong with talking about death. That's part of life. Everybody gonna die. You gonna die, I'm gonna die. Bono's gonna die. Hell, we all gonna die.

ROSE. But you ain't got to talk about it. I don't like to talk about it.

TROY. You the one brought it up. Me and Bono was talking about baseball . . . you tell me I'm gonna drink myself to death. Ain't that right, Bono? You know I don't drink this but one night out of the week. That's Friday night. I'm gonna drink just enough to where I can handle it. Then I cuts it loose. I leave it alone. So don't you worry about me drinking myself to death. 'Cause I ain't worried about Death. I done seen him. I done wrestled with him.

Look here, Bono . . . I looked up one day and Death was marching straight at me. Like Soldiers on Parade! The Army of Death was marching straight at me. The middle of July, 1941. It got real cold just like it be winter. It seem like Death himself reached out and touched me on the shoulder. He touch me just like I touch you. I got cold as ice and Death standing there grinning at me.

ROSE. Troy, why don't you hush that talk.

TROY. I say . . . what you want, Mr. Death? You be wanting me? You done brought your army to be getting me? I looked him dead in the eye. I wasn't fearing nothing. I was ready to tangle. Just like I'm ready to tangle now. The Bible say be ever vigilant. That's why I don't get but so drunk. I got to keep watch.

ROSE. Troy was right down there in Mercy Hospital. You remember he had pneumonia? Laying there with a fever talking plumb out of his head.

TROY. Death standing there staring at me . . . carrying that sickle in his hand. Finally he say, "You want bound over for another year?" See, just like that . . . "You want bound over for another year?" I told him, "Bound over hell! Let's settle this now!"

It seem like he kinda fell back when I said that, and all the cold went out of me. I reached down and grabbed that sickle and threw it just as far as I could throw it . . . and me and him commenced to wrestling.

We wrestled for three days and three nights. I can't say where I found the strength from. Everytime it seemed like he was gonna get the best of me, I'd reach way down deep inside myself and find the strength to do him one better.

ROSE. Everytime Troy tell that story he find different ways to tell it. Different things to make up about it.

TROY. I ain't making up nothing. I'm telling you the facts of what happened. I wrestled with Death for three days and three nights and I'm standing here to tell you about it. (Pause.) All right. At the end of the third night we done weakened each other to where we can't hardly move. Death stood up, throwed on his robe . . . had him a white robe with a hood on it. He throwed on that robe and went off to look for his sickle. Say, "I'll be back." Just like that. "I'll be back." I told him, say, "Yeah, but . . . you gonna have to find me!" I wasn't no fool. I wasn't going looking for him. Death ain't nothing to play with. And I know he's gonna get me. I know I got to join his army . . . his camp followers. But as long as I keep my strength and see him coming . . . as long as I keep up my vigilance . . . he's gonna have to fight to get me. I ain't going easy.

BONO. Well, look here, since you got to keep up your vigilance . . . let me have the bottle.

TROY. Aw hell, I shouldn't have told you that part. I should have left out that part.

ROSE. Troy be talking that stuff and half the time don't even know what he be talking about.

TROY. Bono know me better than that.

BONO. That's right. I know you. I know you got some Uncle Remus3 in your blood. You got more stories than the devil got sinners.

TROY. Aw hell, I done seen him too! Done talked with the devil.

ROSE. Troy, don't nobody wanna be hearing all that stuff.

LYONS enters the yard from the street. Thirty-four years old, TROY's son by a previous marriage, he sports a neatly trimmed goatee, sport coat, white shirt, tieless and buttoned at the collar. Though he fancies himself a musician, he is more caught up in the rituals and "idea" of being a musician than in the actual practice of the music. He has come to borrow money from TROY, and while he knows he will be successful, he is uncertain as to what extent his lifestyle will be held up to scrutiny and ridicule.

LYONS. Hey, Pop.

TROY. What you come “Hey, Popping” me for?

LYONS. How you doing, Rose? (He kisses her.) Mr. Bono. How you doing?

BONO. Hey, Lyons . . . how you been?

TROY. He must have been doing all right. I ain’t seen him around here last week.

ROSE. Troy, leave your boy alone. He come by to see you and you wanna start all that nonsense.

TROY. I ain’t bothering Lyons. (Offers him the bottle.) Here . . . get you a drink. We got an understanding. I know why he come by to see me and he know I know.

LYONS. Come on, Pop . . . I just stopped by to say hi . . . see how you was doing.

TROY. You ain’t stopped by yesterday.

ROSE. You gonna stay for supper, Lyons? I got some chicken cooking in the oven.

LYONS. No, Rose . . . thanks. I was just in the neighborhood and thought I’d stop by for a minute.

TROY. You was in the neighborhood all right, nigger. You telling the truth there. You was in the neighborhood cause it’s my payday.

LYONS. Well, hell, since you mentioned it . . . let me have ten dollars.

TROY. I’ll be damned! I’ll die and go to hell and play blackjack with the devil before I give you ten dollars.

BONO. That’s what I wanna know about . . . that devil you done seen.

LYONS. What . . . Pop done seen the devil? You too much, Pops.

TROY. Yeah, I done seen him. Talked to him too!

ROSE. You ain’t seen no devil. I done told you that man ain’t had nothing to do with the devil. Anything you can’t understand, you want to call it the devil.

TROY. Look here, Bono . . . I went down to see Hertzberger about some furniture. Got three rooms for two-ninety-eight. That what it say on the radio. “Three rooms . . . two-ninety-eight.” Even made up a little song about it. Go down there . . . man tell me I can’t get no credit. I’m working every day and can’t get no credit. What to do? I got an empty house with some raggedy furniture in it. Cory ain’t got no bed. He’s sleeping on a pile of rags on the floor. Working every day and can’t get no credit. Come back here—Rose’ll tell you—madder than hell. Sit down . . . try to figure what I'm gonna do. Come a knock on the door. Ain't been living here but three days. Who know I'm here? Open the door . . . devil standing there bigger than life. White fellow . . . white fellow . . . got on good clothes and everything. Standing there with a clipboard in his hand. I ain't had to say nothing. First words come out of his mouth was . . . "I understand you need some furniture and can't get no credit." I liked to fell over. He say, "I'll give you all the credit you want, but you got to pay the interest on it." I told him, "Give me three rooms worth and charge whatever you want." Next day a truck pulled up here and two men unloaded them three rooms. Man what drove the truck give me a book. Say send ten dollars, first of every month to the address in the book and every thing will be all right. Say if I miss a payment the devil was coming back and it'll be hell to pay. That was fifteen years ago. To this day . . . the first of the month I send my ten dollars, Rose'll tell you.

ROSE. Troy lying.

TROY. I ain't never seen that man since. Now you tell me who else that could have been but the devil? I ain't sold my soul or nothing like that, you understand. Naw, I wouldn't have truck with the devil about nothing like that. I got my furniture and pays my ten dollars the first of the month just like clockwork.

BONO. How long you say you been paying this ten dollars a month?

TROY. Fifteen years!

BONO. Hell, ain't you finished paying for it yet? How much the man done charged you?

TROY. Ah hell, I done paid for it. I done paid for it ten times over! The fact is I'm scared to stop paying it.

ROSE. Troy lying. We got that furniture from Mr. Glickman. He ain't paying no ten dollars a month to nobody.

TROY. Aw hell, woman. Bono know I ain't that big a fool.

LYONS. I was just getting ready to say . . . I know where there's a bridge for sale.

TROY. Look here, I'll tell you this . . . it don't matter to me if he was the devil. It don't matter if the devil give credit. Somebody has got to give it.

ROSE. It ought to matter. You going around talking about having truck with the devil . . . God's the one you gonna have to answer to. He's the one gonna be at the Judgment.

LYONS. Yeah, well, look here, Pop . . . Let me have that ten dollars. I'll give it back to you. Bonnie got a job working at the hospital.

TROY. What I tell you, Bono? The only time I see this nigger is when he wants something. That's the only time I see him.

LYONS. Come on, Pop, Mr. Bono don't want to hear all that. Let me have the ten dollars. I told you Bonnie working.

TROY. What that mean to me? "Bonnie working." I don't care if she working. Go ask her for the ten dollars if she working. Talking about "Bonnie working." Why ain't you working?

LYONS. Aw, Pop, you know I can't find no decent job. Where am I gonna get a job at? You know I can't get no job.

TROY. I told you I know some people down there. I can get you on the rubbish if you want to work. I told you that the last time you came by here asking me for something.

LYONS. Naw, Pop . . . thanks. That ain't for me. I don't wanna be carrying nobody's rubbish. I don't wanna be punching nobody's time clock.

TROY. What's the matter, you too good to carry people's rubbish? Where you think that ten dollars you talking about come from? I'm just supposed to haul people's rubbish and give my money to you cause you too lazy to work. You too lazy to work and wanna know why you ain't got what I got.

ROSE. What hospital Bonnie working at? Mercy?

LYONS. She's down at Passavant working in the laundry.

TROY. I ain't got nothing as it is. I give you that ten dollars and I got to eat beans the rest of the week. Naw . . . you ain't getting no ten dollars here.

LYONS. You ain't got to be eating no beans. I don't know why you wanna say that.

TROY. I ain't got no extra money. Gabe done moved over to Miss Pearl's paying her the rent and things done got tight around here. I can't afford to be giving you every payday.

LYONS. I ain't asked you to give me nothing. I asked you to loan me ten dollars. I know you got ten dollars.

TROY. Yeah, I got it. You know why I got it? Cause I don't throw my money away out there in the streets. You living the fast life . . . wanna be a musician . . . running around in them clubs and things . . . then, you learn to take care of yourself. You ain't gonna find me going and asking nobody for nothing. I done spent too many years without.

LYONS. You and me is two different people, Pop.

TROY. I done learned my mistake and learned to do what's right by it. You still trying to get something for nothing. Life don't owe you nothing. You owe it to yourself. Ask Bono. He'll tell you I'm right.

LYONS. You got your way of dealing with the world . . . I got mine. The only thing that matters to me is the music.

TROY. Yeah, I can see that! It don't matter how you gonna eat . . . where your next dollar is coming from. You telling the truth there.

LYONS. I know I got to eat. But I got to live too. I need something that gonna help me to get out of the bed in the morning. Make me feel like I belong in the world. I don't bother nobody. I just stay with the music cause that's the only way I can find to live in the world. Otherwise there ain't no telling what I might do. Now I don't come criticizing you and how you live. I just come by to ask you for ten dollars. I don't wanna hear all that about how I live.

TROY. Boy, your mamma did a hell of a job raising you.

LYONS. You can't change me, Pop. I'm thirty-four years old. If you wanted to change me, you should have been there when I was growing up. I come by to see you . . . ask for ten dollars and you want to talk about how I was raised. You don't know nothing about how I was raised.

ROSE. Let the boy have ten dollars, Troy.

TROY (to LYONS). What the hell you looking at me for? I ain't got no ten dollars. You know what I do with my money. (To ROSE.) Give him ten dollars if you want him to have it.

ROSE. I will. Just as soon as you turn it loose.

TROY (handing ROSE the money). There it is. Seventy-six dollars and forty-two cents. You see this, Bono? Now, I ain't gonna get but six of that back.

ROSE. You ought to stop telling that lie. Here, Lyons. (She hands him the money.)

LYONS. Thanks, Rose. Look . . . I got to run . . . I'll see you later.

TROY. Wait a minute. You gonna say, “thanks, Rose” and ain’t gonna look to see where she got that ten dollars from? See how they do me, Bono?

LYONS. I know she got it from you, Pop. Thanks. I’ll give it back to you.

TROY. There he go telling another lie. Time I see that ten dollars . . . he’ll be owing me thirty more.

LYONS. See you, Mr. Bono.

BONO. Take care, Lyons!

LYONS. Thanks, Pop. I’ll see you again.

LYONS exits the yard.

TROY. I don’t know why he don’t go and get him a decent job and take care of that woman he got.

BONO. He’ll be all right, Troy. The boy is still young.

TROY. The boy is thirty-four years old.

ROSE. Let’s not get off into all that.

BONO. Look here . . . I got to be going. I got to be getting on. Lucille gonna be waiting.

TROY (puts his arm around ROSE). See this woman, Bono? I love this woman. I love this woman so much it hurts. I love her so much . . . I done run out of ways of loving her. So I got to go back to basics. Don’t you come by my house Monday morning talking about time to go to work . . . ’cause I’m still gonna be stroking!

ROSE. Troy! Stop it now!

BONO. I ain’t paying him no mind, Rose. That ain’t nothing but gin-talk. Go on, Troy. I’ll see you Monday.

TROY. Don’t you come by my house, nigger! I done told you what I’m gonna be doing.

The lights go down to black.

Scene 2

The lights come up on ROSE hanging up clothes. She hums and sings softly to herself. It is the following morning.

ROSE (sings).

Jesus, be a fence all around me every day

Jesus, I want you to protect me as I travel on my way.

Jesus, be a fence all around me every day.

TROY enters from the house.

Jesus, I want you to protect me

As I travel on my way.

(To TROY.) 'Morning. You ready for breakfast? I can fix it soon as I finish hanging up these clothes.

TROY. I got the coffee on. That'll be all right. I'll just drink some of that this morning.

ROSE. That 651 hit yesterday. That's the second time this month. Miss Pearl hit for a dollar . . . seem like those that need the least always get lucky. Poor folks can't get nothing.

TROY. Them numbers don't know nobody. I don't know why you fool with them. You and Lyons both.

ROSE. It's something to do.

TROY. You ain't doing nothing but throwing your money away.

ROSE. Troy, you know I don't play foolishly. I just play a nickel here and a nickel there.

TROY. That's two nickels you done thrown away.

ROSE. Now I hit sometimes . . . that makes up for it. It always comes in handy when I do hit. I don't hear you complaining then.

TROY. I ain't complaining now. I just say it's foolish. Trying to guess out of six hundred ways which way the number gonna come. If I had all the money niggers, these Negroes, throw away on numbers for one week—just one week—I'd be a rich man.

ROSE. Well, you wishing and calling it foolish ain't gonna stop folks from playing numbers. That's one thing for sure. Besides . . . some good things come from playing numbers. Look where Pope done bought him that restaurant off of numbers.

TROY. I can't stand niggers like that. Man ain't had two dimes to rub together. He walking around with his shoes all run over bumming money for cigarettes. All right. Got lucky there and hit the numbers . . .

ROSE. Troy, I know all about it.

TROY. Had good sense, I'll say that for him. He ain't throwed his money away. I seen niggers hit the numbers and go through two thousand dollars in four days. Man bought him that restaurant down there . . . fixed it up real nice . . . and then didn't want nobody to come in it! A Negro go in there and can't get no kind of service. I seen a white fellow come in there and order a bowl of stew. Pope picked all the meat out of the pot for him. Man ain't had nothing but a bowl of meat! Negro come behind him and ain't got nothing but the potatoes and carrots. Talking about what numbers do for people, you picked a wrong example. Ain't done nothing but make a worser fool out of him than he was before.

ROSE. Troy, you ought to stop worrying about what happened at work yesterday.

TROY. I ain't worried. Just told me to be down there at the Commissioner's office on Friday. Everybody think they gonna fire me. I ain't worried about them firing me. You ain't got to worry about that. (Pause.) Where's Cory? Cory in the house? (Calls.) Cory?

ROSE. He gone out.

TROY. Out, huh? He gone out 'cause he know I want him to help me with this fence. I know how he is. That boy scared of work.

GABRIEL enters. He comes halfway down the alley and, hearing TROY's voice, stops.

TROY (continues). He ain't done a lick of work in his life.

ROSE. He had to go to football practice. Coach wanted them to get in a little extra practice before the season start.

TROY. I got his practice . . . running out of here before he get his chores done.

ROSE. Troy, what is wrong with you this morning? Don't nothing set right with you. Go on back in there and go to bed . . . get up on the other side.

TROY. Why something got to be wrong with me? I ain't said nothing wrong with me.

ROSE. You got something to say about everything. First it's the numbers . . . then it's the way the man runs his restaurant . . . then you done got on Cory. What's it gonna be next? Take a look up there and see if the weather suits you . . . or is it gonna be how you gonna put up the fence with the clothes hanging in the yard?

TROY. You hit the nail on the head then.

ROSE. I know you like I know the back of my hand. Go on in there and get you some coffee . . . see if that straighten you up. 'Cause you ain't right this morning.

TROY starts into the house and sees GABRIEL. GABRIEL starts singing. TROY's brother, he is seven years younger than TROY. Injured in World War II, he has a metal plate in his head. He carries an old trumpet tied around his waist and believes with every fiber of his being that he is the Archangel Gabriel. He carries a chipped basket with an assortment of discarded fruits and vegetables he has picked up in the strip district and which he attempts to sell.

GABRIEL (singing).

Yes, ma'am I got plums

You ask me how I sell them

Oh ten cents apiece

Three for a quarter

Come and buy now

'Cause I'm here today

And tomorrow I'll be gone

GABRIEL enters.

Hey, Rose!

ROSE. How you doing, Gabe?

GABRIEL. There's Troy . . . Hey, Troy!

TROY. Hey, Gabe.

Exit into kitchen.

ROSE (to GABRIEL). What you got there?

GABRIEL. You know what I got, Rose. I got fruits and vegetables.

ROSE (looking in basket). Where's all these plums you talking about?

GABRIEL. I ain't got no plums today, Rose. I was just singing that. Have some tomorrow. Put me in a big order for plums. Have enough plums tomorrow for St. Peter and everybody.

TROY reenters from kitchen, crosses to steps.

(To ROSE.) Troy's mad at me.

TROY. I ain't mad at you. What I got to be mad at you about? You ain't done nothing to me.

GABRIEL. I just moved over to Miss Pearl's to keep out from in your way. I ain't mean no harm by it.

TROY. Who said anything about that? I ain't said anything about that.

GABRIEL. You ain't mad at me, is you?

TROY. Naw . . . I ain't mad at you, Gabe. If I was mad at you I'd tell you about it.

GABRIEL. Got me two rooms. In the basement. Got my own door too. Wanna see my key? (He holds up a key.) That's my own key! My two rooms!

TROY. Well, that's good, Gabe. You got your own key . . . that's good.

ROSE. You hungry, Gabe? I was just fixing to cook Troy his breakfast.

GABRIEL. I'll take some biscuits. You got some biscuits? Did you know when I was in heaven . . . every morning me and St. Peter would sit down by the gate and eat some big fat biscuits? Oh, yeah! We had us a good time. We'd sit there and eat us them biscuits and then St. Peter would go off to sleep and tell me to wake him up when it's time to open the gates for the judgment.

ROSE. Well, come on . . . I'll make up a batch of biscuits.

ROSE exits into the house.

GABRIEL. Troy . . . St. Peter got your name in the book. I seen it. It say . . . Troy Maxson. I say . . . I know him! He got the same name like what I got. That's my brother!

TROY. How many times you gonna tell me that, Gabe?

GABRIEL. Ain't got my name in the book. Don't have to have my name. I done died and went to heaven. He got your name though. One morning St. Peter was looking at his book . . . marking it up for the judgment . . . and he let me see your name. Got it in there under M. Got Rose's name . . . I ain't seen it like I seen yours . . . but I know it's in there. He got a great big book. Got everybody's name what was ever been born. That's what he told me. But I seen your name. Seen it with my own eyes.

TROY. Go on in the house there. Rose going to fix you something to eat.

GABRIEL. Oh, I ain't hungry. I done had breakfast with Aunt Jemimah. She come by and cooked me up a whole mess of flapjacks. Remember how we used to eat them flapjacks?

TROY. Go on in the house and get you something to eat now.

GABRIEL. I got to sell my plums. I done sold some tomatoes. Got me two quarters. Wanna see? (He shows TROY his quarters.) I'm gonna save them and buy me a new horn so St. Peter can hear me when it's time to open the gates. (GABRIEL stops suddenly. Listens.) Hear that? That's the hellhounds. I got to chase them out of here. Go on get out of here! Get out!

GABRIEL exits singing.

Better get ready for the judgment

Better get ready for the judgment

My Lord is coming down

ROSE enters from the house.

TROY. He's gone off somewhere.

GABRIEL (offstage).

Better get ready for the judgment

Better get ready for the judgment morning

Better get ready for the judgment

My God is coming down

ROSE. He ain't eating right. Miss Pearl say she can't get him to eat nothing.

TROY. What you want me to do about it, Rose? I done did everything I can for the man. I can't make him get well. Man got half his head blown away . . . what you expect?

ROSE. Seem like something ought to be done to help him.

TROY. Man don't bother nobody. He just mixed up from that metal plate he got in his head. Ain't no sense for him to go back into the hospital.

ROSE. Least he be eating right. They can help him take care of himself.

TROY. Don't nobody wanna be locked up, Rose. What you wanna lock him up for? Man go over there and fight the war . . . messin' around with them Japs, get half his head blown off . . . and they give him a lousy three thousand dollars. And I had to swoop down on that.

ROSE. Is you fixing to go into that again?

TROY. That's the only way I got a roof over my head . . . cause of that metal plate.

ROSE. Ain't no sense you blaming yourself for nothing. Gabe wasn't in no condition to manage that money. You done what was right by him. Can't nobody say you ain't done what was right by him.

Look how long you took care of him . . . till he wanted to have his own place and moved over there with Miss Pearl.

TROY. That ain't what I'm saying, woman! I'm just stating the facts. If my brother didn't have that metal plate in his head . . . I wouldn't have a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of. And I'm fifty-three years old. Now see if you can understand that!

TROY gets up from the porch and starts to exit the yard.

ROSE. Where you going off to? You been running out of here every Saturday for weeks. I thought you was gonna work on this fence?

TROY. I'm gonna walk down to Taylors'. Listen to the ball game. I'll be back in a bit. I'll work on it when I get back.

He exits the yard. The lights go to black.

Scene 3

The lights come up on the yard. It is four hours later. ROSE is taking down the clothes from the line. CORY enters carrying his football equipment.

ROSE. Your daddy like to had a fit with you running out of here this morning without doing your chores.

CORY. I told you I had to go to practice.

ROSE. He say you were supposed to help him with this fence.

CORY. He been saying that the last four or five Saturdays, and then he don't never do nothing, but go down to Taylors'. Did you tell him about the recruiter?

ROSE. Yeah, I told him.

CORY. What he say?

ROSE. He ain't said nothing too much. You get in there and get started on your chores before he gets back. Go on and scrub down them steps before he gets back here hollering and carrying on.

CORY. I'm hungry. What you got to eat, Mama?

ROSE. Go on and get started on your chores. I got some meat loaf in there. Go on and make you a sandwich . . . and don't leave no mess in there.

CORY exits into the house. ROSE continues to take down the clothes. TROY enters the yard and sneaks up and grabs her from behind.

Troy! Go on, now. You liked to scared me to death. What was the score of the game? Lucille had me on the phone and I couldn't keep up with it.

TROY. What I care about the game? Come here, woman. (He tries to kiss her.)

ROSE. I thought you went down Taylors' to listen to the game. Go on, Troy! You supposed to be putting up this fence.

TROY (attempting to kiss her again). I'll put it up when I finish with what is at hand.

ROSE. Go on, Troy. I ain't studying you.

TROY (chasing after her). I'm studying you . . . fixing to do my homework!

ROSE. Troy, you better leave me alone.

TROY. Where's Cory? That boy brought his butt home yet?

ROSE. He's in the house doing his chores.

TROY (calling). Cory! Get your butt out here, boy!

ROSE exits into the house with the laundry. TROY goes over to the pile of wood, picks up a board, and starts sawing. CORY enters from the house.

TROY. You just now coming in here from leaving this morning?

CORY. Yeah, I had to go to football practice.

TROY. Yeah, what?

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. I ain't but two seconds off you noway. The garbage sitting in there overflowing . . . you ain't done none of your chores . . . and you come in here talking about "Yeah."

CORY. I was just getting ready to do my chores now, Pop . . .

TROY. Your first chore is to help me with this fence on Saturday. Everything else come after that. Now get that saw and cut them boards.

CORY takes the saw and begins cutting the boards. TROY continues working. There is a long pause.

CORY. Hey, Pop . . . why don't you buy a TV?

TROY. What I want with a TV? What I want one of them for?

CORY. Everybody got one. Earl, Ba Bra . . . Jesse!

TROY. I ain't asked you who had one. I say what I want with one?

CORY. So you can watch it. They got lots of things on TV. Baseball games and everything. We could watch the World Series.

TROY. Yeah . . . and how much this TV cost?

CORY. I don't know. They got them on sale for around two hundred dollars.

TROY. Two hundred dollars, huh?

CORY. That ain't that much, Pop.

TROY. Naw, it's just two hundred dollars. See that roof you got over your head at night? Let me tell you something about that roof. It's been over ten years since that roof was last tarred. See now . . . the snow come this winter and sit up there on that roof like it is . . . and it's gonna seep inside. It's just gonna be a little bit . . . ain't gonna hardly notice it. Then the next thing you know, it's gonna be leaking all over the house. Then the wood rot from all that water and you gonna need a whole new roof. Now, how much you think it cost to get that roof tarred?

CORY. I don't know.

TROY. Two hundred and sixty-four dollars . . . cash money. While you thinking about a TV, I got to be thinking about the roof . . . and whatever else go wrong here. Now if you had two hundred dollars, what would you do . . . fix the roof or buy a TV?

CORY. I'd buy a TV. Then when the roof started to leak . . . when it needed fixing . . . I'd fix it.

TROY. Where you gonna get the money from? You done spent it for a TV. You gonna sit up and watch the water run all over your brand new TV.

CORY. Aw, Pop. You got money. I know you do.

TROY. Where I got it at, huh?

CORY. You got it in the bank.

TROY. You wanna see my bankbook? You wanna see that seventy-three dollars and twenty-two cents I got sitting up in there?

CORY. You ain't got to pay for it all at one time. You can put a down payment on it and carry it on home with you.

TROY. Not me. I ain't gonna owe nobody nothing if I can help it. Miss a payment and they come and snatch it right out of your house. Then what you got? Now, soon as I get two hundred dollars clear, then I'll buy a TV. Right now, as soon as I get two hundred and sixty-four dollars, I'm gonna have this roof tarred.

CORY. Aw . . . Pop!

TROY. You go on and get you two hundred dollars and buy one if ya want it. I got better things to do with my money.

CORY. I can't get no two hundred dollars. I ain't never seen two hundred dollars.

TROY. I'll tell you what . . . you get you a hundred dollars and I'll put the other hundred with it.

CORY. All right, I'm gonna show you.

TROY. You gonna show me how you can cut them boards right now.

CORY begins to cut the boards. There is a long pause.

CORY. The Pirates won today. That makes five in a row.

TROY. I ain't thinking about the Pirates. Got an all-white team. Got that boy . . . that Puerto Rican boy . . . Clemente. Don't even half-play him. That boy could be something if they give him a chance. Play him one day and sit him on the bench the next.

CORY. He gets a lot of chances to play.

TROY. I'm talking about playing regular. Playing every day so you can get your timing. That's what I'm talking about.

CORY. They got some white guys on the team that don't play every day. You can't play everybody at the same time.

TROY. If they got a white fellow sitting on the bench . . . you can bet your last dollar he can't play! The colored guy got to be twice as good before he get on the team. That's why I don't want you to get all tied up in them sports. Man on the team and what it get him? They got colored on the team and don't use them. Same as not having them. All them teams the same.

CORY. The Braves got Hank Aaron and Wes Covington. Hank Aaron hit two home runs today. That makes forty-three.

TROY. Hank Aaron ain't nobody. That what you supposed to do. That's how you supposed to play the game. Ain't nothing to it. It's just a matter of timing . . . getting the right follow-through. Hell, I can hit forty-three home runs right now!

CORY. Not off no major-league pitching, you couldn't.

TROY. We had better pitching in the Negro leagues. I hit seven home runs off of Satchel Paige.4 You can't get no better than that!

CORY. Sandy Koufax. He's leading the league in strikeouts.

TROY. I ain't thinking of no Sandy Koufax.

CORY. You got Warren Spahn and Lew Burdette. I bet you couldn't hit no home runs off of Warren Spahn.

TROY. I'm through with it now. You go on and cut them boards. (Pause.) Your mama tell me you done got recruited by a college football team? Is that right?

CORY. Yeah. Coach Zellman say the recruiter gonna be coming by to talk to you. Get you to sign the permission papers.

TROY. I thought you supposed to be working down there at the A&P. Ain't you suppose to be working down there after school?

CORY. Mr. Stawicki say he gonna hold my job for me until after the football season. Say starting next week I can work weekends.

TROY. I thought we had an understanding about this football stuff? You suppose to keep up with your chores and hold that job down at the A&P. Ain't been around here all day on a Saturday. Ain't none of your chores done . . . and now you telling me you done quit your job.

CORY. I'm going to be working weekends.

TROY. You damn right you are! And ain't no need for nobody coming around here to talk to me about signing nothing.

CORY. Hey, Pop . . . you can't do that. He's coming all the way from North Carolina.

TROY. I don't care where he coming from. The white man ain't gonna let you get nowhere with that football noway. You go on and get your book-learning so you can work yourself up in that A&P or learn how to fix cars or build houses or something, get you a trade. That way you have something can't nobody take away from you. You go on and learn how to put your hands to some good use. Besides hauling people's garbage.

CORY. I get good grades, Pop. That's why the recruiter wants to talk with you. You got to keep up your grades to get recruited. This way I'll be going to college. I'll get a chance . . .

TROY. First you gonna get your butt down there to the A&P and get your job back.

CORY. Mr. Stawicki done already hired somebody else 'cause I told him I was playing football.

TROY. You a bigger fool than I thought . . . to let somebody take away your job so you can play some football. Where you gonna get your money to take out your girlfriend and whatnot? What kind of foolishness is that to let somebody take away your job?

CORY. I'm still gonna be working weekends.

TROY. Naw . . . naw. You getting your butt out of here and finding you another job.

CORY. Come on, Pop! I got to practice. I can't work after school and play football too. The team needs me. That's what Coach Zellman say . . .

TROY. I don't care what nobody else say. I'm the boss . . . you understand? I'm the boss around here. I do the only saying what counts.

CORY. Come on, Pop!

TROY. I asked you . . . did you understand?

CORY. Yeah . . .

TROY. What?!

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. You go on down there to that A&P and see if you can get your job back. If you can't do both . . . then you quit the football team. You've got to take the crookeds with the straights.

CORY. Yessir. (Pause.) Can I ask you a question?

TROY. What the hell you wanna ask me? Mr. Stawicki the one you got the questions for.

CORY. How come you ain't never liked me?

TROY. Liked you? Who the hell say I got to like you? What law is there say I got to like you? Wanna stand up in my face and ask a damn foolass question like that. Talking about liking somebody. Come here, boy, when I talk to you.

CORY comes over to where TROY is working. He stands slouched over and TROY shoves him on his shoulder.

Straighten up, goddammit! I asked you a question . . . what law is there say I got to like you?

CORY. None.

TROY. Well, all right then! Don't you eat every day? (Pause.) Answer me when I talk to you! Don't you eat every day?

CORY. Yeah.

TROY. Nigger, as long as you in my house, you put that sir on the end of it when you talk to me.

CORY. Yes . . . sir.

TROY. You eat every day.

CORY. Yessir!

TROY. Got a roof over your head.

CORY. Yessir!

TROY. Got clothes on your back.

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. Why you think that is?

CORY. Cause of you.

TROY. Ah, hell I know it's cause of me . . . but why do you think that is?

CORY (hesitant). Cause you like me.

TROY. Like you? I go out of here every morning . . . bust my butt . . . putting up with them crackers every day . . . cause I like you? You are the biggest fool I ever saw. (Pause.) It's my job. It's my responsibility! You understand that? A man got to take care of his family. You live in my house . . . sleep you behind on my bedclothes . . . fill you belly up with my food . . . cause you my son. You my flesh and blood. Not cause I like you! Cause it's my duty to take care of you. I owe a responsibility to you! Let's get this straight right here . . . before it go along any further . . . I ain't got to like you. Mr. Rand don't give me my money come payday cause he likes me. He give me cause he owe me. I done give you everything I had to give you. I gave you your life! Me and your mama worked that out between us. And liking your black ass wasn't part of the bargain. Don't you try and go through life worrying about if somebody like you or not. You best be making sure they doing right by you. You understand what I'm saying, boy?

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. Then get the hell out of my face, and get on down to that A&P.

ROSE has been standing behind the screen door for much of the scene. She enters as CORY exits.

ROSE. Why don't you let the boy go ahead and play football, Troy? Ain't no harm in that. He's just trying to be like you with the sports.

TROY. I don't want him to be like me! I want him to move as far away from my life as he can get. You the only decent thing that ever happened to me. I wish him that. But I don't wish him a thing else from my life. I decided seventeen years ago that boy wasn't getting involved in no sports. Not after what they did to me in the sports.

ROSE. Troy, why don't you admit you was too old to play in the major leagues? For once . . . why don't you admit that?

TROY. What do you mean too old? Don't come telling me I was too old. I just wasn't the right color. Hell, I'm fifty-three years old and can do better than Selkirk's .269 right now!

ROSE. How's was you gonna play ball when you were over forty? Sometimes I can't get no sense out of you.

TROY. I got good sense, woman. I got sense enough not to let my boy get hurt over playing no sports. You been mothering that boy too much. Worried about if people like him.

ROSE. Everything that boy do . . . he do for you. He wants you to say "Good job, son." That's all.

TROY. Rose, I ain't got time for that. He's alive. He's healthy. He's got to make his own way. I made mine. Ain't nobody gonna hold his hand when he get out there in that world.

ROSE. Times have changed from when you was young, Troy. People change. The world's changing around you and you can't even see it.

TROY (slow, methodical). Woman . . . I do the best I can do. I come in here every Friday. I carry a sack of potatoes and a bucket of lard. You all line up at the door with your hands out. I give you the lint from my pockets. I give you my sweat and my blood. I ain't got no tears. I done spent them. We go upstairs in that room at night . . . and I fall down on you and try to blast a hole into forever. I get up Monday morning . . . find my lunch on the table. I go out. Make my way. Find my strength to carry me through to the next Friday. (Pause.) That's all I got, Rose. That's all I got to give. I can't give nothing else.

TROY exits into the house. The lights go down to black.

Scene 4

It is Friday. Two weeks later. CORY starts out of the house with his football equipment. The phone rings.

CORY (calling). I got it! (He answers the phone and stands in the screen door talking.) Hello? Hey, Jesse. Naw . . . I was just getting ready to leave now.

ROSE (calling). Cory!

CORY. I told you, man, them spikes is all tore up. You can use them if you want, but they ain't no good. Earl got some spikes.

ROSE (calling). Cory!

CORY (calling to ROSE). Mam? I'm talking to Jesse. (Into phone.) When she say that? (Pause.) Aw, you lying, man. I'm gonna tell her you said that.

ROSE (calling). Cory, don't you go nowhere!

CORY. I got to go to the game, Ma! (Into the phone.) Yeah, hey, look, I'll talk to you later. Yeah, I'll meet you over Earl's house. Later. Bye, Ma.

CORY exits the house and starts out the yard.

ROSE. Cory, where you going off to? You got that stuff all pulled out and thrown all over your room.

CORY (in the yard). I was looking for my spikes. Jesse wanted to borrow my spikes.

ROSE. Get up there and get that cleaned up before your daddy get back in here.

CORY. I got to go to the game! I'll clean it up when I get back.

CORY exits.

ROSE. That's all he need to do is see that room all messed up.

ROSE exits into the house. TROY and BONO enter the yard. TROY is dressed in clothes other than his work clothes.

BONO. He told him the same thing he told you. Take it to the union.

TROY. Brownie ain't got that much sense. Man wasn't thinking about nothing. He wait until I confront them on it . . . then he wanna come crying seniority. (Calls.) Hey, Rose!

BONO. I wish I could have seen Mr. Rand's face when he told you.

TROY. He couldn't get it out of his mouth! Liked to bit his tongue! When they called me down there to the Commissioner's office . . . he thought they was gonna fire me. Like everybody else.

BONO. I didn't think they was gonna fire you. I thought they was gonna put you on the warning paper.

TROY. Hey, Rose! (To BONO.) Yeah, Mr. Rand like to bit his tongue.

TROY breaks the seal on the bottle, takes a drink, and hands it to BONO.

BONO. I see you run right down to Taylors' and told that Alberta gal.

TROY (calling). Hey, Rose! (To BONO.) I told everybody. Hey, Rose! I went down there to cash my check.

ROSE (entering from the house). Hush all that hollering, man! I know you out here. What they say down there at the Commissioner's office?

TROY. You supposed to come when I call you, woman. Bono'll tell you that. (To BONO.) Don't Lucille come when you call her?

ROSE. Man, hush your mouth. I ain't no dog . . . talk about "come when you call me."

TROY (puts his arm around ROSE). You hear this, Bono? I had me an old dog used to get uppity like that. You say, "C'mere, Blue!" . . . and he just lay there and look at you. End up getting a stick and chasing him away trying to make him come.

ROSE. I ain't studying you and your dog. I remember you used to sing that old song.

TROY (he sings).

Hear it ring! Hear it ring! I had a dog his name was Blue.

ROSE. Don't nobody wanna hear you sing that old song.

TROY (sings).

You know Blue was mighty true.

ROSE. Used to have Cory running around here singing that song.

BONO. Hell, I remember that song myself.

TROY (sings).

You know Blue was a good old dog.

Blue treed a possum in a hollow log.

That was my daddy's song. My daddy made up that song.

ROSE. I don't care who made it up. Don't nobody wanna hear you sing it.

TROY (makes a song like calling a dog). Come here, woman.

ROSE. You come in here carrying on, I reckon they ain't fired you. What they say down there at the Commissioner's office?

TROY. Look here, Rose . . . Mr. Rand called me into his office today when I got back from talking to them people down there . . . it come from up top . . . he called me in and told me they was making me a driver.

ROSE. Troy, you kidding!

TROY. No I ain't. Ask Bono.

ROSE. Well, that's great, Troy. Now you don't have to hassle them people no more.

LYONS enters from the street.

TROY. Aw hell, I wasn't looking to see you today. I thought you was in jail. Got it all over the front page of the Courier about them raiding Sefus's place . . . where you be hanging out with all them thugs.

LYONS. Hey, Pop . . . that ain't got nothing to do with me. I don't go down there gambling. I go down there to sit in with the band. I ain't got nothing to do with the gambling part. They got some good music down there.

TROY. They got some rogues . . . is what they got.

LYONS. How you been, Mr. Bono? Hi, Rose.

BONO. I see where you playing down at the Crawford Grill tonight.

ROSE. How come you ain't brought Bonnie like I told you? You should have brought Bonnie with you, she ain't been over in a month of Sundays.

LYONS. I was just in the neighborhood . . . thought I'd stop by.

TROY. Here he come . . .

BONO. Your daddy got a promotion on the rubbish. He's gonna be the first colored driver. Ain't got to do nothing but sit up there and read the paper like them white fellows.

LYONS. Hey, Pop . . . if you knew how to read you'd be all right.

BONO. Naw . . . naw . . . you mean if the nigger knew how to drive he'd be all right. Been fighting with them people about driving and ain't even got a license. Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license?

TROY. Driving ain't nothing. All you do is point the truck where you want it to go. Driving ain't nothing.

BONO. Do Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license? That's what I'm talking about. I ain't asked if driving was easy. I asked if Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license.

TROY. He ain't got to know. The man ain't got to know my business. Time he find out, I have two or three driver's licenses.

LYONS (going into his pocket). Say, look here, Pop . . .

TROY. I knew it was coming. Didn't I tell you, Bono? I know what kind of "Look here, Pop" that was. The nigger fixing to ask me for some money. It's Friday night. It's my payday. All them rogues down there on the avenue . . . the ones that ain't in jail . . . and Lyons is hopping in his shoes to get down there with them.

LYONS. See, Pop . . . if you give somebody else a chance to talk sometimes, you'd see that I was fixing to pay you back your ten dollars like I told you. Here . . . I told you I'd pay you when Bonnie got paid.

TROY. Naw . . . you go ahead and keep that ten dollars. Put it in the bank. The next time you feel like you wanna come by here and ask me for something . . . you go on down there and get that.

LYONS. Here's your ten dollars, Pop. I told you I don't want you to give me nothing. I just wanted to borrow ten dollars.

TROY. Naw . . . you go on and keep that for the next time you want to ask me.

LYONS. Come on, Pop . . . here go your ten dollars.

ROSE. Why don't you go on and let the boy pay you back, Troy?

LYONS. Here you go, Rose. If you don't take it I'm gonna have to hear about it for the next six months. (He hands her the money.)

ROSE. You can hand yours over here too, Troy.

TROY. You see this, Bono. You see how they do me.

BONO. Yeah, Lucille do me the same way.

GABRIEL is heard singing off stage. He enters.

GABRIEL. Better get ready for the Judgment! Better get ready for . . . Hey! . . . Hey! . . . There's Troy's boy!

LYONS. How are you doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL. Lyons . . . The King of the Jungle! Rose . . . hey, Rose. Got a flower for you. (He takes a rose from his pocket.) Picked it myself. That's the same rose like you is!

ROSE. That's right nice of you, Gabe.

LYONS. What you been doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL. Oh, I been chasing hellhounds and waiting on the time to tell St. Peter to open the gates.

LYONS. You been chasing hellhounds, huh? Well . . . you doing the right thing, Uncle Gabe. Somebody got to chase them.

GABRIEL. Oh, yeah . . . I know it. The devil's strong. The devil ain't no pushover. Hellhounds snipping at everybody's heels. But I got my trumpet waiting on the judgment time.

LYONS. Waiting on the Battle of Armageddon, huh?

GABRIEL. Ain't gonna be too much of a battle when God get to waving that Judgment sword. But the people's gonna have a hell of a time trying to get into heaven if them gates ain't open.

LYONS (putting his arm around GABRIEL). You hear this, Pop. Uncle Gabe, you all right!

GABRIEL (laughing with LYONS). Lyons! King of the Jungle.

ROSE. You gonna stay for supper, Gabe? Want me to fix you a plate?

GABRIEL. I'll take a sandwich, Rose. Don't want no plate. Just wanna eat with my hands. I'll take a sandwich.

ROSE. How about you, Lyons? You staying? Got some short ribs cooking.

LYONS. Naw, I won't eat nothing till after we finished playing. (Pause.) You ought to come down and listen to me play, Pop.

TROY. I don't like that Chinese music. All that noise.

ROSE. Go on in the house and wash up, Gabe . . . I'll fix you a sandwich.

GABRIEL (to LYONS, as he exits). Troy's mad at me.

LYONS. What you mad at Uncle Gabe for, Pop?

ROSE. He thinks Troy's mad at him cause he moved over to Miss Pearl's.

TROY. I ain't mad at the man. He can live where he want to live at.

LYONS. What he move over there for? Miss Pearl don't like nobody.

ROSE. She don't mind him none. She treats him real nice. She just don't allow all that singing.

TROY. She don't mind that rent he be paying . . . that's what she don't mind.

ROSE. Troy, I ain't going through that with you no more. He's over there cause he want to have his own place. He can come and go as he please.

TROY. Hell, he could come and go as he please here. I wasn't stopping him. I ain't put no rules on him.

ROSE. It ain't the same thing, Troy. And you know it.

GABRIEL comes to the door.

Now, that's the last I wanna hear about that. I don't wanna hear nothing else about Gabe and Miss Pearl. And next week . . .

GABRIEL. I'm ready for my sandwich, Rose.

ROSE. And next week . . . when that recruiter come from that school . . . I want you to sign that paper and go on and let Cory play football. Then that'll be the last I have to hear about that.

TROY (to ROSE as she exits into the house). I ain't thinking about Cory nothing.

LYONS. What . . . Cory got recruited? What school he going to?

TROY. That boy walking around here smelling his piss . . . thinking he's grown. Thinking he's gonna do what he want, irrespective of what I say. Look here, Bono . . . I left the Commissioner's office and went down to the A&P . . . that boy ain't working down there. He lying to me. Telling me he got his job back . . . telling me he working weekends . . . telling me he working after school . . . Mr. Stawicki tell me he ain't working down there at all!

LYONS. Cory just growing up. He's just busting at the seams trying to fill out your shoes.

TROY. I don't care what he's doing. When he get to the point where he wanna disobey me . . . then it's time for him to move on. Bono'll tell you that. I bet he ain't never disobeyed his daddy without paying the consequences.

BONO. I ain't never had a chance. My daddy came on through . . . but I ain't never knew him to see him . . . or what he had on his mind or where he went. Just moving on through. Searching out the New Land. That's what the old folks used to call it. See a fellow moving around from place to place . . . woman to woman . . . called it searching out the New Land. I can't say if he ever found it. I come along, didn't want no kids. Didn't know if I was gonna be in one place long enough to fix on them right as their daddy. I figured I was going searching too. As it turned out I been hooked up with Lucille near about as long as your daddy been with Rose. Going on sixteen years.

TROY. Sometimes I wish I hadn't known my daddy. He ain't cared nothing about no kids. A kid to him wasn't nothing. All he wanted was for you to learn how to walk so he could start you to working. When it come time for eating . . . he ate first. If there was anything left over, that's what you got. Man would sit down and eat two chickens and give you the wing.

LYONS. You ought to stop that, Pop. Everybody feed their kids. No matter how hard times is . . . everybody care about their kids. Make sure they have something to eat.

TROY. The only thing my daddy cared about was getting them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin. That's the only thing that mattered to him. Sometimes I used to wonder why he was living. Wonder why the devil hadn't come and got him. "Get them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin" and find out he owe him money . . .

LYONS. He should have just went on and left when he saw he couldn't get nowhere. That's what I would have done.

TROY. How he gonna leave with eleven kids? And where he gonna go? He ain't knew how to do nothing but farm. No, he was trapped and I think he knew it. But I'll say this for him . . . he felt a responsibility toward us. Maybe he ain't treated us the way I felt he should have . . . but without that responsibility he could have walked off and left us . . . made his own way.

BONO. A lot of them did. Back in those days what you talking about . . . they walk out their front door and just take on down one road or another and keep on walking.

LYONS. There you go! That's what I'm talking about.

BONO. Just keep on walking till you come to something else. Ain't you never heard of nobody having the walking blues? Well, that's what you call it when you just take off like that.

TROY. My daddy ain't had them walking blues! What you talking about? He stayed right there with his family. But he was just as evil as he could be. My mama couldn't stand him. Couldn't stand that evilness. She run off when I was about eight. She sneaked off one night after he had gone tosleep. Told me she was coming back for me. I ain't never seen her no more. All his women run off and left him. He wasn't good for nobody.

When my turn come to head out, I was fourteen and got to sniffing around Joe Canewell's daughter. Had us an old mule we called Greyboy. My daddy sent me out to do some plowing and I tied up Greyboy and went to fooling around with Joe Canewell's daughter. We done found us a nice little spot, got real cozy with each other. She about thirteen and we done figured we was grown anyway . . . so we down there enjoying ourselves . . . ain't thinking about nothing. We didn't know Greyboy had got loose and wandered back to the house and my daddy was looking for me. We down there by the creek enjoying ourselves when my daddy come up on us. Surprised us. He had them leather straps off the mule and commenced to whupping me like there was no tomorrow. I jumped up, mad and embarrassed. I was scared of my daddy. When he commenced to whupping on me . . . quite naturally I run to get out of the way. (Pause.) Now I thought he was mad cause I ain't done my work. But I see where he was chasing me off so he could have the gal for himself. When I see what the matter of it was, I lost all fear of my daddy. Right there is where I become a man . . . at fourteen years of age. (Pause.) Now it was my turn to run him off. I picked up them same reins that he had used on me. I picked up them reins and commenced to whupping on him. The gal jumped up and run off . . . and when my daddy turned to face me, I could see why the devil had never come to get him . . . cause he was the devil himself. I don't know what happened. When I woke up, I was laying right there by the creek, and Blue . . . this old dog we had . . . was licking my face. I thought I was blind. I couldn't see nothing. Both my eyes were swollen shut. I laid there and cried. I didn't know what I was gonna do. The only thing I knew was the time had come for me to leave my daddy's house. And right there the world suddenly got big. And it was a long time before I could cut it down to where I could handle it.

Part of that cutting down was when I got to the place where I could feel him kicking in my blood and knew that the only thing that separated us was the matter of a few years.

GABRIEL enters from the house with a sandwich.

LYONS. What you got there, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL. Got me a ham sandwich. Rose gave me a ham sandwich.

TROY. I don't know what happened to him. I done lost touch with everybody except Gabriel. But I hope he's dead. I hope he found some peace.

LYONS. That's a heavy story, Pop. I didn't know you left home when you was fourteen.

TROY. And didn't know nothing. The only part of the world I knew was the forty-two acres of Mr. Lubin's land. That's all I knew about life.

LYONS. Fourteen's kinda young to be out on your own. (Phone rings.) I don't even think I was ready to be out on my own at fourteen. I don't know what I would have done.

TROY. I got up from the creek and walked on down to Mobile. I was through with farming. Figured I could do better in the city. So I walked the two hundred miles to Mobile.

LYONS. Wait a minute . . . you ain't walked no two hundred miles, Pop. Ain't nobody gonna walk no two hundred miles. You talking about some walking there.

BONO. That's the only way you got anywhere back in them days.

LYONS. Shhh. Damn if I wouldn't have hitched a ride with somebody!

TROY. Who you gonna hitch it with? They ain't had no cars and things like they got now. We talking about 1918.

ROSE (entering). What you all out here getting into?

TROY (to ROSE). I'm telling Lyons how good he got it. He don't know nothing about this I'm talking.

ROSE. Lyons, that was Bonnie on the phone. She say you supposed to pick her up.

LYONS. Yeah, okay, Rose.

TROY. I walked on down to Mobile and hitched up with some of them fellows that was heading this way. Got up here and found out . . . not only couldn't you get a job . . . you couldn't find no place to live. I thought I was in freedom. Shhh. Colored folks living down there on the riverbanks in whatever kind of shelter they could find for themselves. Right down there under the Brady Street Bridge. Living in shacks made of sticks and tarpaper. Messed around there and went from bad to worse. Started stealing. First it was food. Then I figured, hell, if I steal money I can buy me some food. Buy me some shoes too! One thing led to another. Met your mama. I was young and anxious to be a man. Met your mama and had you. What I do that for? Now I got to worry about feeding you and her. Got to steal three times as much. Went out one day looking for somebody to rob . . . that's what I was, a robber. I'll tell you the truth. I'm ashamed of it today. But it's the truth. Went to rob this fellow . . . pulled out my knife . . . and he pulled out a gun. Shot me in the chest. I felt just like somebody had taken a hot branding iron and laid it on me. When he shot me I jumped at him with my knife. They told me I killed him and they put me in the penitentiary and locked me up for fifteen years. That's where I met Bono. That's where I learned how to play baseball. Got out that place and your mama had taken you and went on to make life without me. Fifteen years was a long time for her to wait. But that fifteen years cured me of that robbing stuff. Rose'll tell you. She asked me when I met her if I had gotten all that foolishness out of my system. And I told her, "Baby, it's you and baseball all what count with me." You hear me, Bono? I meant it too. She say, "Which one comes first?" I told her, "Baby, ain't no doubt it's baseball . . . but you stick and get old with me and we'll both outlive this baseball." Am I right, Rose? And it's true.

ROSE. Man, hush your mouth. You ain't said no such thing. Talking about, "Baby you know you'll always be number one with me." That's what you was talking.

TROY. You hear that, Bono. That's why I love her.

BONO. Rose'll keep you straight. You get off the track, she'll straighten you up.

ROSE. Lyons, you better get on up and get Bonnie. She waiting on you.

LYONS (gets up to go). Hey, Pop, why don't you come on down to the Grill and hear me play?

TROY. I ain't going down there. I'm too old to be sitting around in them clubs.

BONO. You got to be good to play down at the Grill.

LYONS. Come on, Pop . . .

TROY. I got to get up in the morning.

LYONS. You ain't got to stay long.

TROY. Naw, I'm gonna get my supper and go on to bed.

LYONS. Well, I got to go. I'll see you again.

TROY. Don't you come around my house on my payday.

ROSE. Pick up the phone and let somebody know you coming. And bring Bonnie with you. You know

I'm always glad to see her.

LYONS. Yeah, I'll do that, Rose. You take care now. See you, Pop. See you, Mr. Bono. See you, Uncle Gabe.

GABRIEL. Lyons! King of the Jungle!

LYONS exits.

TROY. Is supper ready, woman? Me and you got some business to take care of. I'm gonna tear it up too.

ROSE. Troy, I done told you now!

TROY (puts his arm around BONO). Aw hell, woman . . . this is Bono. Bono like family. I done known this nigger since . . . how long I done know you?

BONO. It's been a long time.

TROY. I done know this nigger since Skippy was a pup. Me and him done been through some times.

BONO. You sure right about that.

TROY. Hell, I done know him longer than I known you. And we still standing shoulder to shoulder. Hey, look here, Bono . . . a man can't ask for no more than that. (Drinks to him.) I love you, nigger.

BONO. Hell, I love you too . . . I got to get home see my woman. You got yours in hand. I got to get mine.

BONO starts to exit as CORY enters the yard, dressed in his football uniform. He gives TROY a hard, uncompromising look.

CORY. What you do that for, Pop?

He throws his helmet down in the direction of TROY.

ROSE. What's the matter? Cory . . . what's the matter?

CORY. Papa done went up to the school and told Coach Zellman I can't play football no more. Wouldn't even let me play the game. Told him to tell the recruiter not to come.

ROSE. Troy . . .

TROY. What you Troying me for. Yeah, I did it. And the boy know why I did it.

CORY. Why you wanna do that to me? That was the one chance I had.

ROSE. Ain't nothing wrong with Cory playing football, Troy.

TROY. The boy lied to me. I told the nigger if he wanna play football . . . to keep up his chores and hold down that job at the A&P. That was the conditions. Stopped down there to see Mr. Stawicki . . .

CORY. I can't work after school during the football season, Pop! I tried to tell you that Mr. Stawicki's holding my job for me. You don't never want to listen to nobody. And then you wanna go and do this to me!

TROY. I ain't done nothing to you. You done it to yourself.

CORY. Just cause you didn't have a chance! You just scared I'm gonna be better than you, that's all.

TROY. Come here.

ROSE. Troy . . .

CORY reluctantly crosses over to TROY.

TROY. All right! See. You done made a mistake.

CORY. I didn't even do nothing!

TROY. I'm gonna tell you what your mistake was. See . . . you swung at the ball and didn't hit it. That's strike one. See, you in the batter's box now. You swung and you missed. That's strike one. Don't you strike out!

Lights fade to black.

Act 2

Scene 1

The following morning. CORY is at the tree hitting the ball with the bat. He tries to mimic TROY, but his swing is awkward, less sure. ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. Cory, I want you to help me with this cupboard.

CORY. I ain't quitting the team. I don't care what Poppa say.

ROSE. I'll talk to him when he gets back. He had to go see about your Uncle Gabe. The police done arrested him. Say he was disturbing the peace. He'll be back directly. Come on in here and help me clean out the top of this cupboard.

CORY exits into the house. ROSE sees TROY and BONO coming down the alley.

Troy . . . what they say down there?

TROY. Ain't said nothing. I give them fifty dollars and they let him go. I'll talk to you about it. Where's Cory?

ROSE. He's in there helping me clean out these cupboards.

TROY. Tell him to get his butt out here.

TROY and BONO go over to the pile of wood. BONO picks up the saw and begins sawing.

TROY (to BONO). All they want is the money. That makes six or seven times I done went down there and got him. See me coming they stick out their hands.

BONO. Yeah. I know what you mean. That's all they care about . . . that money. They don't care about what's right. (Pause.) Nigger, why you got to go and get some hard wood? You ain't doing nothing but building a little old fence. Get you some soft pine wood. That's all you need.

TROY. I know what I'm doing. This is outside wood. You put pine wood inside the house. Pine wood is inside wood. This here is outside wood. Now you tell me where the fence is gonna be?

BONO. You don't need this wood. You can put it up with pine wood and it'll stand as long as you gonna be here looking at it.

TROY. How you know how long I'm gonna be here, nigger? Hell, I might just live forever. Live longer than old man Horsely.

BONO. That's what Magee used to say.

TROY. Magee's a damn fool. Now you tell me who you ever heard of gonna pull their own teeth with a pair of rusty pliers.

BONO. The old folks . . . my granddaddy used to pull his teeth with pliers. They ain't had no dentists for the colored folks back then.

TROY. Get clean pliers! You understand? Clean pliers! Sterilize them! Besides we ain't living back then. All Magee had to do was walk over to Doc Goldblum's.

BONO. I see where you and that Tallahassee gal . . . that Alberta . . . I see where you all done got tight.

TROY. What you mean "got tight"?

BONO. I see where you be laughing and joking with her all the time.

TROY. I laughs and jokes with all of them, Bono. You know me.

BONO. That ain't the kind of laughing and joking I'm talking about.

CORY enters from the house.

CORY. How you doing, Mr. Bono?

TROY. Cory? Get that saw from Bono and cut some wood. He talking about the wood's too hard to cut. Stand back there, Jim, and let that young boy show you how it's done.

BONO. He's sure welcome to it.

CORY takes the saw and begins to cut the wood.

Whew-e-e! Look at that. Big old strong boy. Look like Joe Louis. Hell, must be getting old the way I'm watching that boy whip through that wood.

CORY. I don't see why Mama want a fence around the yard noways.

TROY. Damn if I know either. What the hell she keeping out with it? She ain't got nothing nobody want.

BONO. Some people build fences to keep people out . . . and other people build fences to keep people in. Rose wants to hold on to you all. She loves you.

TROY. Hell, nigger, I don't need nobody to tell me my wife loves me. Cory . . . go on in the house and see if you can find that other saw.

CORY. Where's it at?

TROY. I said find it! Look for it till you find it!

CORY exits into the house.

What's that supposed to mean? Wanna keep us in?

BONO. Troy . . . I done known you seem like damn near my whole life. You and Rose both. I done know both of you all for a long time. I remember when you met Rose. When you was hitting them baseball out the park. A lot of them old gals was after you then. You had the pick of the litter. When you picked Rose, I was happy for you. That was the first time I knew you had any sense. I said . . . My man Troy knows what he's doing . . . I'm gonna follow this nigger . . . he might take me somewhere. I been following you too. I done learned a whole heap of things about life watching you. I done learned how to tell where the shit lies. How to tell it from the alfalfa. You done learned me a lot of things. You showed me how to not make the same mistakes . . . to take life as it comes along and keep putting one foot in front of the other. (Pause.) Rose a good woman, Troy.

TROY. Hell, nigger, I know she a good woman. I been married to her for eighteen years. What you got on your mind, Bono?

BONO. I just say she a good woman. Just like I say anything. I ain't got to have nothing on my mind.

TROY. You just gonna say she a good woman and leave it hanging out there like that? Why you telling me she a good woman?

BONO. She loves you, Troy. Rose loves you.

TROY. You saying I don't measure up. That's what you trying to say. I don't measure up cause I'm seeing this other gal. I know what you trying to say.

BONO. I know what Rose means to you, Troy. I'm just trying to say I don't want to see you mess up.

TROY. Yeah, I appreciate that, Bono. If you was messing around on Lucille I'd be telling you the same thing.

BONO. Well, that's all I got to say. I just say that because I love you both.

TROY. Hell, you know me . . . I wasn't out there looking for nothing. You can't find a better woman than Rose. I know that. But seems like this woman just stuck onto me where I can't shake her loose. I done wrestled with it, tried to throw her off me . . . but she just stuck on tighter. Now she's stuck on for good.

BONO. You's in control . . . that's what you tell me all the time. You responsible for what you do.

TROY. I ain't ducking the responsibility of it. As long as it sets right in my heart . . . then I'm okay. Cause that's all I listen to. It'll tell me right from wrong every time. And I ain't talking about doing Rose no bad turn. I love Rose. She done carried me a long ways and I love and respect her for that.

BONO. I know you do. That's why I don't want to see you hurt her. But what you gonna do when she find out? What you got then? If you try and jugle both of them . . . sooner or later you gonna drop one of them. That's common sense.

TROY. Yeah, I hear what you saying, Bono. I been trying to figure a way to work it out.

BONO. Work it out right, Troy. I don't want to be getting all up between you and Rose's business . . .

but work it so it come out right.

TROY. Ah hell, I get all up between you and Lucille's business. When you gonna get that woman that refrigerator she been wanting? Don't tell me you ain't got no money now. I know who your banker is. Mellon don't need that money bad as Lucille want that refrigerator. I'll tell you that.

BONO. Tell you what I'll do . . . when you finish building this fence for Rose . . . I'll buy Lucille that refrigerator.

TROY. You done stuck your foot in your mouth now!

TROY grabs up a board and begins to saw. BONO starts to walk out the yard.

Hey, nigger . . . where you going?

BONO. I'm going home. I know you don't expect me to help you now. I'm protecting my money. I wanna see you put that fence up by yourself. That's what I want to see. You'll be here another six months without me.

TROY. Nigger, you ain't right.

BONO. When it comes to my money . . . I'm right as fireworks on the Fourth of July.

TROY. All right, we gonna see now. You better get out your bankbook.

BONO exits, and TROY continues to work. ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. What they say down there? What's happening with Gabe?

TROY. I went down there and got him out. Cost me fifty dollars. Say he was disturbing the peace. Judge set up a hearing for him in three weeks. Say to show cause why he shouldn't be recommitted.

ROSE. What was he doing that cause them to arrest him?

TROY. Some kids was teasing him and he run them off home. Say he was howling and carrying on. Some folks seen him and called the police. That's all it was.

ROSE. Well, what's you say? What'd you tell the judge?

TROY. Told him I'd look after him. It didn't make no sense to recommit the man. He stuck out his big greasy palm and told me to give him fifty dollars and take him on home.

ROSE. Where's he at now? Where'd he go off to?

TROY. He's gone about his business. He don't need nobody to hold his hand.

ROSE. Well, I don't know. Seem like that would be the best place for him if they did put him into the hospital. I know what you're gonna say. But that's what I think would be best.

TROY. The man done had his life ruined fighting for what? And they wanna take and lock him up. Let him be free. He don't bother nobody.

ROSE. Well, everybody got their own way of looking at it I guess. Come on and get your lunch. I got a bowl of lima beans and some cornbread in the oven. Come and get something to eat. Ain't no sense you fretting over Gabe.

ROSE turns to go into the house.

TROY. Rose . . . got something to tell you.

ROSE. Well, come on . . . wait till I get this food on the table.

TROY. Rose!

She stops and turns around.

I don't know how to say this. (Pause.) I can't explain it none. It just sort of grows on you till it gets out of hand. It starts out like a little bush . . . and the next thing you know it's a whole forest.

ROSE. Troy . . . what is you talking about?

TROY. I'm talking, woman, let me talk. I'm trying to find a way to tell you . . . I'm gonna be a daddy. I'm gonna be somebody's daddy.

ROSE. Troy . . . you're not telling me this? You're gonna be . . . what?

TROY. Rose . . . now . . . see . . .

ROSE. You telling me you gonna be somebody's daddy? You telling your wife this?

GABRIEL enters from the street. He carries a rose in his hand.

GABRIEL. Hey, Troy! Hey, Rose!

ROSE. I have to wait eighteen years to hear something like this.

GABRIEL. Hey, Rose . . . I got a flower for you. (He hands it to her.) That's a rose. Same rose like you is.

ROSE. Thanks, Gabe.

GABRIEL. Troy, you ain't mad at me is you? Them bad mens come and put me away. You ain't mad at me is you?

TROY. Naw, Gabe, I ain't mad at you.

ROSE. Eighteen years and you wanna come with this.

GABRIEL (takes a quarter out of his pocket). See what I got? Got a brand new quarter.

TROY. Rose . . . it's just . . .

ROSE. Ain't nothing you can say, Troy. Ain't no way of explaining that.

GABRIEL. Fellow that give me this quarter had a whole mess of them. I'm gonna keep this quarter till it stop shining.

ROSE. Gabe, go on in the house there. I got some watermelon in the Frigidaire. Go on and get you a piece.

GABRIEL. Say, Rose . . . you know I was chasing hellhounds and them bad mens come and get me and take me away. Troy helped me. He come down there and told them they better let me go before he beat them up. Yeah, he did!

ROSE. You go on and get you a piece of watermelon, Gabe. Them bad mens is gone now.

GABRIEL. Okay, Rose . . . gonna get me some watermelon. The kind with the stripes on it.

GABRIEL exits into the house.

ROSE. Why, Troy? Why? After all these years to come dragging this in to me now. It don't make no sense at your age. I could have expected this ten or fifteen years ago, but not now.

TROY. Age ain't got nothing to do with it, Rose.

ROSE. I done tried to be everything a wife should be. Everything a wife could be. Been married eighteen years and I got to live to see the day you tell me you been seeing another woman and done fathered a child by her. And you know I ain't never wanted no half nothing in my family. My whole family is half. Everybody got different fathers and mothers . . . my two sisters and my brother. Can't hardly tell who's who. Can't never sit down and talk about Papa and Mama. It's your papa and your mama and my papa and my mama . . .

TROY. Rose . . . stop it now.

ROSE. I ain't never wanted that for none of my children. And now you wanna drag your behind in here and tell me something like this.

TROY. You ought to know. It's time for you to know.

ROSE. Well, I don't want to know, goddamn it!

TROY. I can't just make it go away. It's done now. I can't wish the circumstance of the thing away.

ROSE. And you don't want to either. Maybe you want to wish me and my boy away. Maybe that's what you want? Well, you can't wish us away. I've got eighteen years of my life invested in you. You ought to have stayed upstairs in my bed where you belong.

TROY. Rose . . . now listen to me . . . we can get a handle on this thing. We can talk this out . . . come to an understanding.

ROSE. All of a sudden it's "we." Where was "we" at when you was down there rolling around with some godforsaken woman? "We" should have come to an understanding before you started making a damn fool of yourself. You're a day late and a dollar short when it comes to an understanding with me.

TROY. It's just . . . She gives me a different idea . . . a different understanding about myself. I can step out of this house and get away from the pressures and problems . . . be a different man. I ain't got to wonder how I'm gonna pay the bills or get the roof fixed. I can just be a part of myself that I ain't never been.

ROSE. What I want to know . . . is do you plan to continue seeing her. That's all you can say to me.

TROY. I can sit up in her house and laugh. Do you understand what I'm saying. I can laugh out loud . . . and it feels good. It reaches all the way down to the bottom of my shoes. (Pause.) Rose, I can't give that up.

ROSE. Maybe you ought to go on and stay down there with her . . . if she's a better woman than me.

TROY. It ain't about nobody being a better woman or nothing. Rose, you ain't the blame. A man couldn't ask for no woman to be a better wife than you've been. I'm responsible for it. I done locked myself into a pattern trying to take care of you all that I forgot about myself.

ROSE. What the hell was I there for? That was my job, not somebody else's.

TROY. Rose, I done tried all my life to live decent . . . to live a clean . . . hard . . . useful life. I tried to be a good husband to you. In every way I knew how. Maybe I come into the world backwards, I don't know. But . . . you born with two strikes on you before you come to the plate. You got to guard it closely . . . always looking for the curve ball on the inside corner. You can't afford to let none get past you. You can't afford a call strike. If you going down . . . you going down swinging. Everything lined up against you. What you gonna do. I fooled them, Rose. I bunted. When I found you and Cory and a halfway decent job . . . I was safe. Couldn't nothing touch me. I wasn't gonna strike out no more. I wasn't going back to the penitentiary. I wasn't gonna lay in the streets with a bottle of wine. I was safe. I had me a family. A job. I wasn't gonna get that last strike. I was on first looking for one of them boys to knock me in. To get me home.

ROSE. You should have stayed in my bed, Troy.

TROY. Then when I saw that gal . . . she firmed up my backbone. And I got to thinking that if I tried . . . I just might be able to steal second. Do you understand after eighteen years I wanted to steal second.

ROSE. You should have held me tight. You should have grabbed me and held on.

TROY. I stood on first base for eighteen years and I thought . . . well, goddamn it . . . go on for it!

ROSE. We're not talking about baseball! We're talking about you going off to lay in bed with another woman . . . and then bring it home to me. That's what we're talking about. We ain't talking about no baseball.

TROY. Rose, you're not listening to me. I'm trying the best I can to explain it to you. It's not easy for me to admit that I been standing in the same place for eighteen years.

ROSE. I been standing with you! I been right here with you, Troy. I got a life too. I gave eighteen years of my life to stand in the same spot with you. Don't you think I ever wanted other things? Don't you think I had dreams and hopes? What about my life? What about me. Don't you think it ever crossed my mind to want to know other men? That I wanted to lay up somewhere and forget about my responsibilities? That I wanted someone to make me laugh so I could feel good? You not the only one who's got wants and needs. But I held on to you, Troy. I took all my feelings, my wants and needs, my dreams . . . and I buried them inside you. I planted a seed and watched and prayed over it. I planted myself inside you and waited to bloom. And it didn't take me no eighteen years to find out the soil was hard and rocky and it wasn't never gonna bloom.

But I held on to you, Troy. I held you tighter. You was my husband. I owed you everything I had. Every part of me I could find to give you. And upstairs in that room . . . with the darkness falling in on me . . . I gave everything I had to try and erase the doubt that you wasn't the finest man in the world. And wherever you was going . . . I wanted to be there with you. Cause you was my husband. Cause that's the only way I was gonna survive as your wife. You always talking about what you give . . . and what you don't have to give. But you take too. You take . . . and don't even know nobody's giving!

ROSE turns to exit into the house; TROY grabs her arm.

TROY. You say I take and don't give!

ROSE. Troy! You're hurting me!

TROY. You say I take and don't give!

ROSE. Troy . . . you're hurting my arm! Let go!

TROY. I done give you everything I got. Don't you tell that lie on me.

ROSE. Troy!

TROY. Don't you tell that lie on me!

CORY enters from the house.

CORY. Mama!

ROSE. Troy. You're hurting me.

TROY. Don't you tell me about no taking and giving.

CORY comes up behind TROY and grabs him. TROY, surprised, is thrown off balance just as CORY throws a glancing blow that catches him on the chest and knocks him down. TROY is stunned, as is CORY.

ROSE. Troy. Troy. No!

TROY gets to his feet and starts at CORY.

Troy . . . no. Please! Troy!

ROSE pulls on TROY to hold him back. TROY stops himself.

TROY (to CORY). All right. That's strike two. You stay away from around me, boy. Don't you strike out. You living with a full count. Don't you strike out.

TROY exits out the yard as the lights go down.

Scene 2

It is six months later, early afternoon. TROY enters from the house and starts to exit the yard. ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. Troy, I want to talk to you.

TROY. All of a sudden, after all this time, you want to talk to me, huh? You ain't wanted to talk to me for months. You ain't wanted to talk to me last night. You ain't wanted no part of me then. What you wanna talk to me about now?

ROSE. Tomorrow's Friday.

TROY. I know what day tomorrow is. You think I don't know tomorrow's Friday? My whole life I ain't done nothing but look to see Friday coming and you got to tell me it's Friday.

ROSE. I want to know if you're coming home.

TROY. I always come home, Rose. You know that. There ain't never been a night I ain't come home.

ROSE. That ain't what I mean . . . and you know it. I want to know if you're coming straight home after work.

TROY. I figure I'd cash my check . . . hang out at Taylors' with the boys . . . maybe play a game of checkers . . .

ROSE. Troy, I can't live like this. I won't live like this. You livin' on borrowed time with me. It's been going on six months now you ain't been coming home.

TROY. I be here every night. Every night of the year. That's 365 days.

ROSE. I want you to come home tomorrow after work.

TROY. Rose . . . I don't mess up my pay. You know that now. I take my pay and I give it to you. I don't have no money but what you give me back. I just want to have a little time to myself . . . a little time to enjoy life.

ROSE. What about me? When's my time to enjoy life?

TROY. I don't know what to tell you, Rose. I'm doing the best I can.

ROSE. You ain't been home from work but time enough to change your clothes and run out . . . and you wanna call that the best you can do?

TROY. I'm going over to the hospital to see Alberta. She went into the hospital this afternoon. Look like she might have the baby early. I won't be gone long.

ROSE. Well, you ought to know. They went over to Miss Pearl's and got Gabe today. She said you told them to go ahead and lock him up.

TROY. I ain't said no such thing. Whoever told you that is telling a lie. Pearl ain't doing nothing but telling a big fat lie.

ROSE. She ain't had to tell me. I read it on the papers.

TROY. I ain't told them nothing of the kind.

ROSE. I saw it right there on the papers.

TROY. What it say, huh?

ROSE. It said you told them to take him.

TROY. Then they screwed that up, just the way they screw up everything. I ain't worried about what they got on the paper.

ROSE. Say the government send part of his check to the hospital and the other part to you.

TROY. I ain't got nothing to do with that if that's the way it works. I ain't made up the rules about how it work.

ROSE. You did Gabe just like you did Cory. You wouldn't sign the paper for Cory . . . but you signed for Gabe. You signed that paper.

The telephone is heard ringing inside the house.

TROY. I told you I ain't signed nothing, woman! The only thing I signed was the release form. Hell, I can't read, I don't know what they had on that paper! I ain't signed nothing about sending Gabe away.

ROSE. I said send him to the hospital . . . you said let him be free . . . now you done went down there and signed him to the hospital for half his money. You went back on yourself, Troy. You gonna have to answer for that.

TROY. See now . . . you been over there talking to Miss Pearl. She done got mad cause she ain't getting Gabe's rent money. That's all it is. She's liable to say anything.

ROSE. Troy, I seen where you signed the paper.

TROY. You ain't seen nothing I signed. What she doing got papers on my brother anyway? Miss Pearl telling a big fat lie. And I'm gonna tell her about it too! You ain't seen nothing I signed. Say . . .

you ain't seen nothing I signed.

ROSE exits into the house to answer the telephone. Presently she returns.

ROSE. Troy . . . that was the hospital. Alberta had the baby.

TROY. What she have? What is it?

ROSE. It's a girl.

TROY. I better get on down to the hospital to see her.

ROSE. Troy . . .

TROY. Rose . . . I got to go see her now. That's only right . . . what's the matter . . . the baby's all right, ain't it?

ROSE. Alberta died having the baby.

TROY. Died . . . you say she's dead? Alberta's dead?

ROSE. They said they done all they could. They couldn't do nothing for her.

TROY. The baby? How's the baby?

ROSE. They say it's healthy. I wonder who's gonna bury her.

TROY. She had family, Rose. She wasn't living in the world by herself.

ROSE. I know she wasn't living in the world by herself.

TROY. Next thing you gonna want to know if she had any insurance.

ROSE. Troy, you ain't got to talk like that.

TROY. That's the first thing that jumped out your mouth. "Who's gonna bury her?" Like I'm fixing to take on that task for myself.

ROSE. I am your wife. Don't push me away.

TROY. I ain't pushing nobody away. Just give me some space. That's all. Just give me some room to breathe.

ROSE exits into the house. TROY walks about the yard.

TROY (with a quiet rage that threatens to consume him). All right . . . Mr. Death. See now . . . I'm gonna tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna take and build me a fence around this yard. See? I'm gonna build me a fence around what belongs to me. And then I want you to stay on the other side. See? You stay over there until you're ready for me. Then you come on. Bring your army.

Bring your sickle. Bring your wrestling clothes. I ain't gonna fall down on my vigilance this time. You ain't gonna sneak up on me no more. When you ready for me . . . when the top of your list say Troy Maxson . . . that's when you come around here. You come up and knock on the front door. Ain't nobody else got nothing to do with this. This is between you and me. Man to man. You stay on the other side of that fence until you ready for me. Then you come up and knock on the front door. Anytime you want. I'll be ready for you.

The lights go down to black.

Scene 3

The lights come up on the porch. It is late evening three days later. ROSE sits listening to the ball game waiting for TROY. The final out of the game is made and ROSE switches off the radio. TROY enters the yard carrying an infant wrapped in blankets. He stands back from the house and calls.

ROSE enters and stands on the porch. There is a long, awkward silence, the weight of which grows heavier with each passing second.

TROY. Rose . . . I'm standing here with my daughter in my arms. She ain't but a wee bittie little old thing. She don't know nothing about grownups' business. She innocent . . . and she ain't got no mama.

ROSE. What you telling me for, Troy?

She turns and exits into the house.

TROY. Well . . . I guess we'll just sit out here on the porch.

He sits down on the porch. There is an awkward indelicateness about the way he handles the baby. His largeness engulfs and seems to swallow it. He speaks loud enough for ROSE to hear.

A man's got to do what's right for him. I ain't sorry for nothing I done. It felt right in my heart. (To the baby.) What you smiling at? Your daddy's a big man. Got these great big old hands. But sometimes he's scared. And right now your daddy's scared cause we sitting out here and ain't got no home. Oh, I been homeless before. I ain't had no little baby with me. But I been homeless. You just be out on the road by your lonesome and you see one of them trains coming and you just kinda go like this . . .

He sings as a lullaby.

Please, Mr. Engineer let a man ride the line

Please, Mr. Engineer let a man ride the line

I ain't got no ticket please let me ride the blinds

ROSE enters from the house. TROY, hearing her steps behind him, stands and faces her.

She's my daughter, Rose. My own flesh and blood. I can't deny her no more than I can deny them boys. (Pause.) You and them boys is my family. You and them and this child is all I got in the world. So I guess what I'm saying is . . . I'd appreciate it if you'd help me take care of her.

ROSE. Okay, Troy . . . you're right. I'll take care of your baby for you . . . cause . . . like you say . . . she's innocent . . . and you can't visit the sins of the father upon the child. A motherless child has got a hard time. (She takes the baby from him.) From right now . . . this child got a mother. But you a womanless man.

ROSE turns and exits into the house with the baby. Lights go down to black.

Scene 4

It is two months later. LYONS enters the street. He knocks on the door and calls.

LYONS. Hey, Rose! (Pause.) Rose!

ROSE (from inside the house). Stop that yelling. You gonna wake up Raynell. I just got her to sleep.

LYONS. I just stopped by to pay Papa this twenty dollars I owe him. Where's Papa at?

ROSE. He should be here in a minute. I'm getting ready to go down to the church. Sit down and wait on him.

LYONS. I got to go pick up Bonnie over her mother's house.

ROSE. Well, sit it down there on the table. He'll get it.

LYONS (enters the house and sets the money on the table). Tell Papa I said thanks. I'll see you again.

ROSE. All right, Lyons. We'll see you.

LYONS starts to exit as CORY enters.

CORY. Hey, Lyons.

LYONS. What's happening, Cory? Say man, I'm sorry I missed your graduation. You know I had a gig and couldn't get away. Otherwise, I would have been there, man. So what you doing?

CORY. I'm trying to find a job.

LYONS. Yeah I know how that go, man. It's rough out here. Jobs are scarce.

CORY. Yeah, I know.

LYONS. Look here, I got to run. Talk to Papa . . . he know some people. He'll be able to help get you a job. Talk to him . . . see what he say.

CORY. Yeah . . . all right, Lyons.

LYONS. You take care. I'll talk to you soon. We'll find some time to talk.

LYONS exits the yard. CORY wanders over to the tree, picks up the bat, and assumes a batting stance. He studies an imaginary pitcher and swings. Dissatisfied with the result, he tries again. TROY enters. They eye each other for a beat. CORY puts the bat down and exits the yard. TROY starts into the house as ROSE exits with RAYNELL. She is carrying a cake.

TROY. I'm coming in and everybody's going out.

ROSE. I'm taking this cake down to the church for the bake sale. Lyons was by to see you. He stopped by to pay you your twenty dollars. It's laying in there on the table.

TROY (going into his pocket). Well . . . here go this money.

ROSE. Put it in there on the table, Troy. I'll get it.

TROY. What time you coming back?

ROSE. Ain't no use in you studying me. It don't matter what time I come back.

TROY. I just asked you a question, woman. What's the matter . . . can't I ask you a question?

ROSE. Troy, I don't want to go into it. Your dinner's in there on the stove. All you got to do is heat it up. And don't you be eating the rest of them cakes in there. I'm coming back for them. We having a bake sale at the church tomorrow.

ROSE exits the yard. TROY sits down on the steps, takes a pint bottle from his pocket, opens it, and drinks. He begins to sing.

TROY. Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

Had an old dog his name was Blue

You know Blue was mighty true

You know Blue as a good old dog

Blue trees a possum in a hollow log

You know from that he was a good old dog

BONO enters the yard.

BONO. Hey, Troy.

TROY. Hey, what's happening, Bono?

BONO. I just thought I'd stop by to see you.

TROY. What you stop by and see me for? You ain't stopped by in a month of Sundays. Hell, I must owe you money or something.

BONO. Since you got your promotion I can't keep up with you. Used to see you every day. Now I don't even know what route you working.

TROY. They keep switching me around. Got me out in Greentree now . . . hauling white folks' garbage.

BONO. Greentree, huh? You lucky, at least you ain't got to be lifting them barrels. Damn if they ain't getting heavier. I'm gonna put in my two years and call it quits.

TROY. I'm thinking about retiring myself.

BONO. You got it easy. You can drive for another five years.

TROY. It ain't the same, Bono. It ain't like working the back of the truck. Ain't got nobody to talk to . . . feel like you working by yourself. Naw, I'm thinking about retiring. How's Lucille?

BONO. She all right. Her arthritis get to acting up on her sometime. Saw Rose on my way in. She going down to the church, huh?

TROY. Yeah, she took up going down there. All them preachers looking for somebody to fatten their pockets. (Pause.) Got some gin here.

BONO. Naw, thanks. I just stopped by to say hello.

TROY. Hell, nigger . . . you can take a drink. I ain't never known you to say no to a drink. You ain't got to work tomorrow.

BONO. I just stopped by. I'm fixing to go over to Skinner's. We got us a domino game going over his house every Friday.

TROY. Nigger, you can't play no dominoes. I used to whup you four games out of five.

BONO. Well, that learned me. I'm getting better.

TROY. Yeah? Well, that's all right.

BONO. Look here . . . I got to be getting on. Stop by sometime, huh?

TROY. Yeah, I'll do that, Bono. Lucille told Rose you bought her a new refrigerator.

BONO. Yeah, Rose told Lucille you had finally built your fence . . . so I figured we'd call it even.

TROY. I knew you would.

BONO. Yeah . . . okay. I'll be talking to you.

TROY. Yeah, take care, Bono. Good to see you. I'm gonna stop over.

BONO. Yeah. Okay, Troy.

BONO exits. TROY drinks from the bottle.

TROY.

Old Blue died and I dug his grave

Let him down with a golden chain

Every night when I hear old Blue bark

I know Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

CORY enters the yard. They eye each other for a beat. TROY is sitting in the middle of the steps. CORY walks over.

CORY. I got to get by.

TROY. Say what? What's you say?

CORY. You in my way. I got to get by.

TROY. You got to get by where? This is my house. Bought and paid for. In full. Took me fifteen years. And if you wanna go in my house and I'm sitting on the steps . . . you say excuse me. Like your mama taught you.

CORY. Come on, Pop . . . I got to get by.

CORY starts to maneuver his way past TROY. TROY grabs his leg and shoves him back.

TROY. You just gonna walk over top of me?

CORY. I live here too!

TROY (advancing toward him). You just gonna walk over top of me in my own house?

CORY. I ain't scared of you.

TROY. I ain't asked if you was scared of me. I asked you if you was fixing to walk over top of me in my own house? That's the question. You ain't gonna say excuse me? You just gonna walk over top of me?

CORY. If you wanna put it like that.

TROY. How else am I gonna put it?

CORY. I was walking by you to go into the house cause you sitting on the steps drunk, singing to yourself. You can put it like that.

TROY. Without saying excuse me???

CORY doesn't respond.

I asked you a question. Without saying excuse me???

CORY. I ain't got to say excuse me to you. You don't count around here no more.

TROY. Oh, I see . . . I don't count around here no more. You ain't got to say excuse me to your daddy. All of a sudden you done got so grown that your daddy don't count around here no more . . . Around here in his own house and yard that he done paid for with the sweat of his brow. You done got so grown to where you gonna take over. You gonna take over my house. Is that right? You gonna wear my pants. You gonna go in there and stretch out on my bed. You ain't got to say excuse me cause I don't count around here no more. Is that right?

CORY. That's right. You always talking this dumb stuff. Now, why don't you just get out my way?

TROY. I guess you got someplace to sleep and something to put in your belly. You got that, huh? You got that? That's what you need. You got that, huh?

CORY. You don't know what I got. You ain't got to worry about what I got.

TROY. You right! You one hundred percent right! I done spent the last seventeen years worrying about what you got. Now it's your turn, see? I'll tell you what to do. You grown . . . we done established that. You a man. Now, let's see you act like one. Turn your behind around and walk out this yard. And when you get out there in the alley . . . you can forget about this house. See? Cause this is my house. You go on and be a man and get your own house. You can forget about this. Cause this is mine. You go on and get yours cause I'm through with doing for you.

CORY. You talking about what you did for me . . . what'd you ever give me?

TROY. Them feet and bones! That pumping heart, nigger! I give you more than anybody else is ever gonna give you.

CORY. You ain't never gave me nothing! You ain't never done nothing but hold me back. Afraid I was gonna be better than you. All you ever did was try and make me scared of you. I used to tremble every time you called my name. Every time I heard your footsteps in the house. Wondering all the time . . . what's Papa gonna say if I do this? . . . What's he gonna say if I do that? . . . What's Papa gonna say if I turn on the radio? And Mama, too . . . she tries . . . but she's scared of you.

TROY. You leave your mama out of this. She ain't got nothing to do with this.

CORY. I don't know how she stand you . . . after what you did to her.

TROY. I told you to leave your mama out of this!

He advances toward CORY.

CORY. What you gonna do . . . give me a whupping? You can't whup me no more. You're too old. You just an old man.

TROY (shoves him on his shoulder). Nigger! That's what you are. You just another nigger on the street to me!

CORY. You crazy! You know that?

TROY. Go on now! You got the devil in you. Get on away from me!

CORY. You just a crazy old man . . . talking about I got the devil in me.

TROY. Yeah, I'm crazy! If you don't get on the other side of that yard . . . I'm gonna show you how crazy I am! Go on . . . get the hell out of my yard.

CORY. It ain't your yard. You took Uncle Gabe's money he got from the army to buy this house and then you put him out.

TROY (advances on CORY). Get your black ass out of my yard!

TROY's advance backs CORY up against the tree. CORY grabs up the bat.

CORY. I ain't going nowhere! Come on . . . put me out! I ain't scared of you.

TROY. That's my bat!

CORY. Come on!

TROY. Put my bat down!

CORY. Come on, put me out.

CORY swings at TROY, who backs across the yard.

What's the matter? You so bad . . . put me out!

TROY advances toward CORY.

CORY (backing up). Come on! Come on!

TROY. You're gonna have to use it! You wanna draw that bat back on me . . . you're gonna have to use it.

CORY. Come on! . . . Come on!

CORY swings the bat at TROY a second time. He misses. TROY continues to advance toward him.

TROY. You're gonna have to kill me! You wanna draw that bat back on me. You're gonna have to kill me.

CORY, backed up against the tree, can go no farther. TROY taunts him. He sticks out his head and offers him a target.

Come on! Come on!

CORY is unable to swing the bat. TROY grabs it.

TROY. Then I'll show you.

CORY and TROY struggle over the bat. The struggle is fierce and fully engaged. TROY ultimately is the stronger and takes the bat from CORY and stands over him ready to swing. He stops himself.

Go on and get away from around my house.

CORY, stung by his defeat, picks himself up, walks slowly out of the yard and up the alley.

CORY. Tell Mama I'll be back for my things.

TROY. They'll be on the other side of that fence.

CORY exits.

TROY. I can't taste nothing. Helluljah! I can't taste nothing no more. (TROY assumes a batting posture and begins to taunt Death, the fastball on the outside corner.) Come on! It's between you and me now! Come on! Anytime you want! Come on! I be ready for you . . . but I ain't gonna be easy.

The lights go down on the scene.

Scene 5

The time is 1965. The lights come up in the yard. It is the morning of TROY'S funeral. A funeral plaque with a light hangs beside the door. There is a small garden plot off to the side. There is noise and activity in the house as ROSE, LYONS, and BONO have gathered. The door opens and RAYNELL, seven years old, enters dressed in a flannel nightgown. She crosses to the garden and pokes around with a stick. ROSE calls from the house.

ROSE. Raynell!

RAYNELL. Mam?

ROSE. What you doing out there?

RAYNELL. Nothing.

ROSE comes to the door.

ROSE. Girl, get in here and get dressed. What you doing?

RAYNELL. Seeing if my garden growed.

ROSE. I told you it ain't gonna grow overnight. You got to wait.

RAYNELL. It don't look like it never gonna grow. Dag!

ROSE. I told you a watched pot never boils. Get in here and get dressed.

RAYNELL. This ain't even no pot, Mama.

ROSE. You just have to give it a chance. It'll grow. Now you come on and do what I told you. We got to be getting ready. This ain't no morning to be playing around. You hear me?

RAYNELL. Yes, mam.

ROSE exits into the house. RAYNELL continues to poke at her garden with a stick. CORY enters. He is dressed in a Marine corporal's uniform, and carries a duffelbag. His posture is that of a military man, and his speech has a clipped sternness.

CORY (to RAYNELL). Hi. (Pause.) I bet your name is Raynell.

RAYNELL. Uh huh.

CORY. Is your mama home?

RAYNELL runs up on the porch and calls through the screen door.

RAYNELL. Mama . . . there's some man out here. Mama?

ROSE comes to the door.

ROSE. Cory? Lord have mercy! Look here, you all!

ROSE and CORY embrace in a tearful reunion as BONO and LYONS enter from the house dressed in funeral clothes.

BONO. Aw, looka here . . .

ROSE. Done got all grown up!

CORY. Don't cry, Mama. What you crying about?

ROSE. I'm just so glad you made it.

CORY. Hey Lyons. How you doing, Mr. Bono.

LYONS goes to embrace CORY.

LYONS. Look at you, man. Look at you. Don't he look good, Rose. Got them Corporal stripes.

ROSE. What took you so long?

CORY. You know how the Marines are, Mama. They got to get all their paperwork straight before they let you do anything.

ROSE. Well, I'm sure glad you made it. They let Lyons come. Your Uncle Gabe's still in the hospital. They don't know if they gonna let him out or not. I just talked to them a little while ago.

LYONS. A Corporal in the United States Marines.

BONO. Your daddy knew you had it in you. He used to tell me all the time.

LYONS. Don't he look good, Mr. Bono?

BONO. Yeah, he remind me of Troy when I first met him. (Pause.) Say, Rose, Lucille's down at the church with the choir. I'm gonna go down and get the pallbearers lined up. I'll be back to get you all.

ROSE. Thanks, Jim.

CORY. See you, Mr. Bono.

LYONS (with his arm around RAYNELL). Cory . . . look at Raynell. Ain't she precious? She gonna break a whole lot of hearts.

ROSE. Raynell, come and say hello to your brother. This is your brother, Cory. You remember Cory.

RAYNELL. No, Mam.

CORY. She don't remember me, Mama.

ROSE. Well, we talk about you. She heard us talk about you. (To RAYNELL.) This is your brother, Cory. Come on and say hello.

RAYNELL. Hi.

CORY. Hi. So you're Raynell. Mama told me a lot about you.

ROSE. You all come on into the house and let me fix you some breakfast. Keep up your strength.

CORY. I ain't hungry, Mama.

LYONS. You can fix me something, Rose. I'll be in there in a minute.

ROSE. Cory, you sure you don't want nothing? I know they ain't feeding you right.

CORY. No, Mama . . . thanks. I don't feel like eating. I'll get something later.

ROSE. Raynell . . . get on upstairs and get that dress on like I told you.

ROSE and RAYNELL exit into the house.

LYONS. So . . . I hear you thinking about getting married.

CORY. Yeah, I done found the right one, Lyons. It's about time.

LYONS. Me and Bonnie been split up about four years now. About the time Papa retired. I guess she just got tired of all them changes I was putting her through. (Pause.) I always knew you was gonna make something out yourself. Your head was always in the right direction. So . . . you gonna stay in . . . make it a career . . . put in your twenty years?

CORY. I don't know. I got six already, I think that's enough.

LYONS. Stick with Uncle Sam and retire early. Ain't nothing out here. I guess Rose told you what happened with me. They got me down the workhouse. I thought I was being slick cashing other people's checks.

CORY. How much time you doing?

LYONS. They give me three years. I got that beat now. I ain't got but nine more months. It ain't so bad. You learn to deal with it like anything else. You got to take the crookeds with the straights. That's what Papa used to say. He used to say that when he struck out. I seen him strike out three times in a row . . . and the next time up he hit the ball over the grandstand. Right out there in Homestead Field. He wasn't satisfied hitting in the seats . . . he want to hit it over everything! After the game he had two hundred people standing around waiting to shake his hand. You got to take the crookeds with the straights. Yeah, Papa was something else.

CORY. You still playing?

LYONS. Cory . . . you know I'm gonna do that. There's some fellows down there we got us a band . . . we gonna try and stay together when we get out . . . but yeah, I'm still playing. It still helps me to get out of bed in the morning. As long as it do that I'm gonna be right there playing and trying to make some sense out of it.

ROSE (calling). Lyons, I got these eggs in the pan.

LYONS. Let me go on and get these eggs, man. Get ready to go bury Papa. (Pause.) How you doing? You doing all right?

CORY nods. LYONS touches him on the shoulder and they share a moment of silent grief. LYONS exits into the house. CORY wanders about the yard. RAYNELL enters.

RAYNELL. Hi.

CORY. Hi.

RAYNELL. Did you used to sleep in my room?

CORY. Yeah . . . that used to be my room.

RAYNELL. That's what Papa call it. "Cory's room." It got your football in the closet.

ROSE comes to the door.

ROSE. Raynell, get in there and get them good shoes on.

RAYNELL. Mama, can't I wear these? Them other one hurt my feet.

ROSE. Well, they just gonna have to hurt your feet for a while. You ain't said they hurt your feet when you went down to the store and got them.

RAYNELL. They didn't hurt then. My feet done got bigger.

ROSE. Don't you give me no backtalk now. You get in there and get them shoes on.

RAYNELL exits into the house.

Ain't too much changed. He still got that piece of rag tied to that tree. He was out here swinging that bat. I was just ready to go back in the house. He swung that bat and then he just fell over. Seem like he swung it and stood there with this grin on his face . . . and then he just fell over. They carried him on down to the hospital, but I knew there wasn't no need . . . why don't you come on in the house?

CORY. Mama . . . I got something to tell you. I don't know how to tell you this . . . but I've got to tell you . . . I'm not going to Papa's funeral.

ROSE. Boy, hush your mouth. That's your daddy you talking about. I don't want hear that kind of talk this morning. I done raised you to come to this? You standing there all healthy and grown talking about you ain't going to your daddy's funeral?

CORY. Mama . . . listen . . .

ROSE. I don't want to hear it, Cory. You just get that thought out of your head.

CORY. I can't drag Papa with me everywhere I go. I've got to say no to him. One time in my life I've got to say no.

ROSE. Don't nobody have to listen to nothing like that. I know you and your daddy ain't seen eye to eye, but I ain't got to listen to that kind of talk this morning. Whatever was between you and your daddy . . . the time has come to put it aside. Just take it and set it over there on the shelf and forget about it. Disrespecting your daddy ain't gonna make you a man, Cory. You got to find a way to come to that on your own. Not going to your daddy's funeral ain't gonna make you a man.

CORY. The whole time I was growing up . . . living in his house . . . Papa was like a shadow that followed you everywhere. It weighed on you and sunk into your flesh. It would wrap around you and lay there until you couldn't tell which one was you anymore. That shadow digging in your flesh. Trying to crawl in. Trying to live through you. Everywhere I looked, Troy Maxson was staring back at me . . . hiding under the bed . . . in the closet. I'm just saying I've got to find a way to get rid of that shadow, Mama.

ROSE. You just like him. You got him in you good.

CORY. Don't tell me that, Mama.

ROSE. You Troy Maxson all over again.

CORY. I don't want to be Troy Maxson. I want to be me.

ROSE. You can't be nobody but who you are, Cory. That shadow wasn't nothing but you growing into yourself. You either got to grow into it or cut it down to fit you. But that's all you got to make life with. That's all you got to measure yourself against that world out there. Your daddy wanted you to be everything he wasn't . . . and at the same time he tried to make you into everything he was. I don't know if he was right or wrong . . . but I do know he meant to do more good than he meant to do harm. He wasn't always right. Sometimes when he touched he bruised. And sometimes when he took me in his arms he cut.

When I first met your daddy I thought . . . Here is a man I can lay down with and make a baby. That's the first thing I thought when I seen him. I was thirty years old and had done seen my share of men. But when he walked up to me and said, "I can dance a waltz that'll make you dizzy," I thought, Rose Lee, here is a man that you can open yourself up to and be filled to bursting. Here is a man that can fill all them empty spaces you been tipping around the edges of. One of them empty spaces was being somebody's mother.

I married your daddy and settled down to cooking his supper and keeping clean sheets on the bed. When your daddy walked through the house he was so big he filled it up. That was my first mistake. Not to make him leave some room for me. For my part in the matter. But at that time I wanted that. I wanted a house that I could sing in. And that's what your daddy gave me. I didn't know to keep up his strength I had to give up little pieces of mine. I did that. I took on his life as mine and mixed up the pieces so that you couldn't hardly tell which was which anymore. It was my choice. It was my life and I didn't have to live it like that. But that's what life offered me in the way of being a woman and I took it. I grabbed hold of it with both hands.

By the time Raynell came into the house, me and your daddy had done lost touch with one another. I didn't want to make my blessing off of nobody's misfortune . . . but I took on to Raynell like she was all them babies I had wanted and never had.

The phone rings.

Like I'd been blessed to relive a part of my life. And if the Lord see fit to keep up my strength . . . I'm gonna do her just like your daddy did you . . . I'm gonna give her the best of what's in me.

RAYNELL (entering, still with her old shoes). Mama . . . Reverend Tollivier on the phone.

ROSE exits into the house.

RAYNELL. Hi.

CORY. Hi.

RAYNELL. You in the Army or the Marines?

CORY. Marines.

RAYNELL. Papa said it was the Army. Did you know Blue?

CORY. Blue? Who's Blue?

RAYNELL. Papa's dog what he sing about all the time.

CORY (singing).

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

I had a dog his name was Blue

You know Blue was mighty true

You know Blue was a good old dog

Blue treed a possum in a hollow log

You know from that he was a good old dog.

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

RAYNELL joins in singing.

CORY AND RAYNELL.

Blue treed a possum out on a limb

Blue looked at me and I looked at him

Grabbed that possum and put him in a sack

Blue stayed there till I came back

Old Blue's feets was big and round

Never allowed a possum to touch the ground.

Old Blue died and I dug his grave

I dug his grave with a silver spade

Let him down with a golden chain

And every night I call his name

Go on Blue, you good dog you

Go on Blue, you good dog you.

RAYNELL.

Blue laid down and died like a man

Blue laid down and died . . .

BOTH.

Blue laid down and died like a man

Now he's treeing possums in the Promised Land

I'm gonna tell you this to let you know

Blue's gone where the good dogs go

When I hear old Blue bark

When I hear old Blue bark

Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark

Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.

ROSE comes to the screen door.

ROSE. Cory, we gonna be ready to go in a minute.

CORY (to RAYNELL). You go on in the house and change them shoes like Mama told you so we can go to Papa's funeral.

RAYNELL. Okay, I'll be back.

RAYNELL exits into the house. CORY gets up and crosses over to the tree. ROSE stands in the screen door watching him. GABRIEL enters from the alley.

GABRIEL (calling). Hey, Rose!

ROSE. Gabe?

GABRIEL. I'm here, Rose. Hey, Rose, I'm here!

ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. Lord . . . Look here, Lyons!

LYONS. See, I told you, Rose . . . I told you they'd let him come.

CORY. How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

LYONS. How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL. Hey, Rose. It's time. It's time to tell St. Peter to open the gates. Troy, you ready? You ready, Troy. I'm gonna tell St. Peter to open the gates. You get ready now.

GABRIEL, with great fanfare, braces himself to blow. The trumpet is without a mouthpiece. He puts the end of it into his mouth and blows with great force, like a man who has been waiting some twenty-odd years for this single moment. No sound comes out of the trumpet. He braces himself and blows again with the same result. A third time he blows. There is a weight of impossible description that falls away and leaves him bare and exposed to a frightful realization. It is a trauma that a sane and normal mind would be unable to withstand. He begins to dance. A slow, strange dance, eerie and life-giving. A dance of atavistic signature and ritual. LYONS attempts to embrace him. GABRIEL pushes LYONS away. He begins to howl in what is an attempt at song, or perhaps a song turning back into itself in an attempt at speech. He finishes his dance and the gates of heaven stand open as wide as God's closet.

That's the way that go!

BLACKOUT

U Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

The Play on the Page

1. -What do you think that Bono means when he says, early in Act 2, "Some people build fences to keep people out . . . and some people build fences to keep people in"? Why is the play called Fences? What has fenced Troy in? What is Troy fencing in? (Take account of Troy's last speech in Act 2, Scene 2, but do not limit your discussion to this speech.)
2. -What do you think Troy's reasons are—conscious and unconscious—for not wanting Cory to play football at college?
3. -Compare and contrast Cory and Lyons. Consider, too, in what ways they resemble Troy and in what ways they differ from him.
4. In what ways is Troy like his father, and in what ways unlike him?
5. -What do you make out of the prominence given to the song about Blue?
6. -There is a good deal of anger in the play, but there is also humor. Which passages do you find humorous, and why?
7. -Characterize Rose Maxson.

The Play on the Stage

8. -How would Wilson's remarks in the 1987 interview (see page 000) help a director in staging Fences? For example, his assertion that every person (except Raynell) is institutionalized at the end of the play might suggest a certain tone or mood for a production.

9. -In what ways is the role of Gabriel a challenge for an actor? What advice might you give to the other actors on stage during Gabriel's appearances?

10. -Some scenes begin by specifying that "the lights come up." Others do not, presumably beginning with an illuminated stage. All scenes except the last one end with the lights going down to blackness. Explain Wilson's use of lighting.

A CONTEXT FOR FENCES

AUGUST WILSON

Talking about Fences

(Part of an interview conducted with David Savran on 13 March 1987.)

In reading* Fences*, I came to view Troy more and more critically as the play progressed, sharing Rose's point of view. We see that Troy has been crippled by his father. That's being replayed in Troy's relationship with Cory. Do you think there's a way out of that cycle?

Surely. First of all, we're all like our parents. The things we are taught early in life, how to respond to the world, our sense of morality—everything, we get from them. Now you can take that legacy and do with it anything you want to do. It's in your hands. Cory is Troy's son. How can he be Troy's son without sharing Troy's values? I was trying to get at why Troy made the choices he made, how they have influenced his values and how he attempts to pass those along to his son. Each generation gives the succeeding generation what they think they need. One question in the play is, "Are the tools we are given sufficient to compete in a world that is different from the one our parents knew?" I think they are—it's just that we have to do different things with the tools. That's all Troy has to give. Troy's flaw is that he does not recognize that the world was changing. That's because he spent fifteen years in a penitentiary.

As African-Americans, we should demand to participate in society as Africans. That's the way out of the vicious cycle of poverty and neglect that exists in 1987 in America, where you have a huge percentage of blacks living in the equivalent of South African townships, in housing projects. No one is inviting these people to participate in society. Look at the poverty levels—$8,500 for a family of four, if you have $8,501 you're not counted. Those statistics would go up enormously if we had an honest assessment of the cost of living in America. I don't know how anybody can support a family of four on $8,500. What I'm saying is that 85 or 90 percent of blacks in America are living in abject poverty and, for the most part, are crowded into what amount to concentration camps. The situation for blacks in America is worse than it was forty years ago. Some sociologists will tell you about the tremendous progress we've made. They didn't put me out when I walked in the door. And you can always point to someone who works on Wall Street, or is a doctor. But they don't count in the larger scheme of things.

Do you have any idea how these political changes could take place?

I'm not sure. I know that blacks must be allowed their cultural differences. I think the process of assimilation to white American society was a big mistake. We don't want to be like you. Blacks living in housing projects are isolated from the society, for the most part—living as they choose, as Africans. Only they don't realize the value in what they're doing because they have accepted their victimization. They've marked themselves as victims. Once they recognize that, they can begin to move through society in a different manner, from a stronger position, and claim what is theirs.

A project of yours is to point up what happens when oppression is internalized.

Yes, transfer of aggression to the wrong target. I think it's interesting that the two roads open to blacks for "full participation" are entertainment and sports, Ma Rainey and Fences, and I didn't plan it that way. I don't think that they're the correct roads. I think Troy's right. Now with the benefit of historical perspective, I can say that the athletic scholarship was actually a way of exploiting. Now you've got two million kids who think they're going to play in the NBA. In the sixties the universities made a lot of money off of athletics. You had kids playing for free who, by and large, were not getting educated, were taking courses in basketweaving. Some of them could barely read.

Troy may be right about that issue, but it seems that he has passed on certain destructive traits in spite of himself. Take the hostility between father and son.

I think every generation says to the previous generation: you're in my way. I've got to get by. The father–son conflict is actually a normal generational conflict that happens all the time.

So it's a healthy and a good thing?

Oh, sure. Troy is seeing this boy walk around, smelling his piss. Two men cannot live in the same household. Troy would have been tremendously disappointed if Cory had not challenged him. Troy knows that this boy has to go out and do battle with that world: "So I had best prepare him because I know that's a harsh, cruel place out there. But that's going to be easy compared to what he's getting here. Ain't nobody gonna whip your ass like I'm gonna whip it." He has a tremendous love for the kid. But he's not going to say, "I love you," he's going to demonstrate it. He's carrying garbage for seventeen years just for the kid. The only world Troy knows is the one that he made. Cory's going to go on to find another one, he's going to arrive at the same place as Troy. I think one of the most important lines in the play is when Troy is talking about his father: "I got to the place where I could feel him kicking in my blood and knew that the only thing that separated us was the matter of a few years."

Hopefully, Cory will do things a bit differently with his son. For Troy, sports was not the way to go, the white man wouldn't let him get away with that. "Get you a job, with your hands, something that nobody can take away from you." The idea of school—he doesn't know what that is. That's for white folks. Very few blacks had paperwork jobs. But if you knew how to fix cars, you could always make some money. That's what Troy wants for Cory. There aren't many people who ever jumped up in Troy's face. So he's proud of the kid at the same time that he expresses a hurt that all men feel. You got to cut your kid loose at some point. There's that sense of loss and separation. You find out how Troy left his father's house and you see how Cory leaves his house. I suspect with Cory it will repeat with some differences and maybe, after five or six generations, they'll find a different way to do it.

Where Cory ends up is very ambiguous, as a marine in 1965.

Yes. For the average black kid on the street, that was an alternative. You went into the army because you could learn how to do something. I can remember my parents talking about the son of some friends: "He's in the navy. He did something"—as opposed to standing on the street corner, shooting drugs, drinking wine, and robbing stores. Lyons says to Cory, "I always knew you were going to make something out of yourself." It really wounds me. He's a corporal in the marines. For blacks, that is a sense of accomplishment. Therein lies one of the tragedies of blacks in America. Cory says, "I don't know. I put in six years. That's enough." Anyone who goes into the army and makes a career out of it is a loser. They sit there and are nurtured by the army and they don't have to confront life. Then they get out of the army and find there's nothing to do. They didn't learn any skills. And if they did, they can't find a job. Four months later, they're shooting dope. In the sixties a whole bunch of blacks went over, fought and died in the Vietnam War. The survivors came back to the same street corners and found out nothing had changed. They still couldn't get a job.

At the end of Fences every person, with the exception of Raynell, is institutionalized. Rose is in a church. Lyons is in a penitentiary. Gabriel's in a mental hospital and Cory's in the marines. The only free person is the girl, Troy's daughter, the hope for the future. That was conscious on my part because in '57 that's what I saw. Blacks have relied on institutions which are really foreign—except for the black church, which has been our saving grace. I have some problems with it but I recognize it as a central social organization and sometimes an economic organization for the black community. I would like to see blacks develop their own institutions that respond to their needs.

Critical Perspectives

CHAPTER

Critical Approaches: The Nature of Criticism

In everyday talk the most common meaning of criticism is something like “finding fault.” And to be critical is to be censorious. But a critic can see excellences as well as faults. Because we turn to criticism with the hope that the critic has seen something we have missed, the most valuable criticism is not that which shakes its finger at faults, but that which calls our attention to interesting things going on in the work of art. Here is a statement by W. H. Auden (1907–1973), suggesting that criticism is most useful when it calls our attention to things worth attending to:

> What is the function of a critic? So far as I am concerned, he can do me one or more of the following services:
>
> 1. -Introduce me to authors or works of which I was hitherto unaware.
> 2. -Convince me that I have undervalued an author or a work because I had not read them carefully enough.

3. -Show me relations between works of different ages and cultures which I could never have seen for myself because I do not know enough and never shall.

4. -Give a “reading” of a work which increases my understanding of it.

5. -Throw light upon the process of artistic “Making.”

6. -Throw light upon the relation of art to life, science, economics, ethics, religion, etc.

—The Dyer’s Hand (New York, 1963), pages 8–9

Auden does not neglect the delight we get from literature, but he extends (especially in his sixth point) the range of criticism to include topics beyond the literary work itself. Notice too the emphasis on observing, showing, and illuminating, which suggests that the function of critical writing is not very different from the most common view of the function of imaginative writing.

Whenever we talk about a work of literature or of art, or, for that matter, even about a so-so movie or television show, what we say depends in large measure on certain conscious or unconscious assumptions that we make: “I liked it; the characters were very believable” (here the assumption is that characters ought to be believable); “I didn’t like it; there was too much violence” (here the assumption is that violence ought not to be shown, or if it is shown it should be made abhorrent); “I didn’t like it; it was awfully slow” (here the assumption probably is that there ought to be a fair amount of physical action, perhaps even changes of scene, rather than characters just talking); “I didn’t like it; I don’t think topics of this sort ought to be discussed publicly” (here the assumption is a moral one, that it is indecent to present certain topics); “I liked it partly because it was refreshing to hear such frankness” (here again the assumption is moral, and more or less the reverse of the previous one).

In short, whether we realize it or not, we judge the work from a particular viewpoint—its realism, its morality, or whatever.

Professional critics, too, work from assumptions, but their assumptions are usually highly conscious, and the critics may define their assumptions at length. They regard themselves as, for instance, Freudians or Marxists or Queer Theorists. They read all texts through the lens of a particular theory, and their focus enables them to see things that otherwise might go unnoticed. It should be added, however, that if a lens or critical perspective or interpretive strategy helps us to see certain things, it also limits our vision. Many critics therefore regard their method not as an exclusive way of thinking but only as a useful tool.

What follows is a brief survey of the chief current approaches to literature. You may find, as you read these pages, that one or another approach sounds especially congenial, and therefore you may want to make use of it in your reading and writing. On the other hand, it's important to remember, first, that works of literature are highly varied, and, second, that we read them for various purposes—to kill time, to enjoy fanciful visions, to be amused, to explore alien ways of feeling, and to learn about ourselves. It may be best to try to respond to each text in the way that the text seems to require rather than to read all texts according to a single formula. You'll find that some works will lead you to want to think about them from several angles. A play by Shakespeare may stimulate you to read a book about the Elizabethan playhouse, and another that offers a Marxist interpretation of the English Renaissance, and still another that offers a feminist analysis of Shakespeare's plays. All of these approaches, and others, will help you to deepen your understanding of the literary works that you read.

FORMALIST (OR NEW) CRITICISM

Formalist criticism emphasizes the work as an independent creation, a self-contained unit, something to be studied in itself, not as part of some larger context, such as the author's life or a historical period. This kind of study is called formalist criticism because the emphasis is on the form of the work, the relationships between the parts—the construction of the plot, the contrasts between characters, the functions of rhymes, the point of view, and so on.

Cleanth Brooks, perhaps America's most distinguished formalist critic, in an essay in the Kenyon Review (Winter 1951), reprinted in The Modern Critical Spectrum, eds. Gerald Jay Goldberg and Nancy Marmer Goldberg (1962), set forth what he called his "articles of faith":

> That literary criticism is a description and an evaluation of its object.
>
> That the primary concern of criticism is with the problem of unity—the kind of whole which the literary work forms or fails to form, and the relation of the various parts to each other in building up this whole.
>
> That the formal relations in a work of literature may include, but certainly exceed, those of logic.
>
> That in a successful work, form and content cannot be separated.
>
> That form is meaning.

If you have read the earlier pages of this book you are already familiar with most of these ideas, but in the next few pages we will look into some of them in detail.

Formalist criticism is, in essence, intrinsic criticism, rather than extrinsic, for (at least in theory) it concentrates on the work itself, independent of its writer and the writer's background—that is, independent of biography, psychology, sociology, and history. The discussions of Langston Hughes's "Harlem" (pages 664–669) and of Yeats's "The Balloon of the Mind" (pages 43–46) are examples. The gist is that a work of literature is complex, unified, and freestanding. In fact, of course, we usually bring outside knowledge to the work. For instance, a reader who is familiar with, say, Hamlet can hardly study another tragedy by Shakespeare, let's say Romeo and Juliet, without bringing to the second play some conception of what Shakespearean tragedy is or can be. A reader of Alice Walker's The Color Purple inevitably brings unforgettable outside material (perhaps the experience of being an African-American, or at least some knowledge of the history of African-Americans) to the literary work. It is very hard to talk only about Hamlet or The Color Purple and not at the same time talk about, or at least have in mind, aspects of human experience.

Formalist criticism begins with a personal response to the literary work, but it goes on to try to account for the response by closely examining the work. It assumes that the author shaped the poem, play, or story so fully that the work guides the reader's responses. The assumption that "meaning" is fully and completely presented within the text is not much in favor today, when many literary critics argue that the active or subjective reader (or even what Judith Fetterley, a feminist critic, has called "the resisting reader") and not the author of the text makes the "meaning." Still, even if one grants that the reader is active, not passive or coolly objective, one can hold with the formalists that the author is active too, constructing a text that in some measure controls the reader's responses. During the process of writing about our responses we may find that our responses change. A formalist critic would say that we see with increasing clarity what the work is really like, and what it really means. (Similarly, when authors write and revise a text they may change their understanding of what they are doing. A story that began as a lighthearted joke may turn into something far more serious than the writer imagined at the start, but, at least for the formalist critic, the final work contains a stable meaning that all competent readers can perceive.)

In practice, formalist criticism usually takes one of two forms, explication (the unfolding of meaning, line by line or even word by word) or analysis (the examination of the relations of parts). The essay on Yeats's "The Balloon of the Mind" (pages 43–46) is an explication, a setting forth of the implicit meanings of the words. The essay on Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour" (pages 40–41) is an analysis.

To repeat: Formalist criticism assumes that a work of art is stable. An artist constructs a coherent, comprehensible work, thus conveying to a reader an emotion or an idea. T. S. Eliot said that the writer can't just pour out emotions onto the page. Rather, Eliot said in an essay entitled "Hamlet and His Problems" (1919), "The only way of expressing emotion in the form of art is by finding an 'objective correlative'; in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of the particular emotion."

With this in mind, consider Robert Frost's "The Span of Life":

The old dog barks backward without getting up.

I can remember when he was a pup.

The image of an old dog barking backward, and the speaker's memory—apparently triggered by the old dog's bark—of the dog as a pup, presumably is the "objective correlative" of Frost's emotion or idea; Frost is "expressing emotion" through this "formula." And all of us, as competent readers, can grasp pretty accurately what Frost expressed. Frost's emotion, idea, meaning, or whatever is "objectively" embodied in the text. Formalist critics try to explain how and why literary works—these words, in this order—constitute unique, complex structures that embody or set forth meanings.

Formalist criticism, also called the New Criticism (to distinguish it from the historical and biographical writing that in earlier decades had dominated literary study), began to achieve prominence in the late 1920s and was the dominant form from the late 1930s until about 1970, and even today it is widely considered the best way for a student to begin to study a work of literature. For one thing, formalist criticism empowers the student; that is, the student confronts the work immediately, and is not told first to spend days or weeks or months, for instance, reading Freud and his followers in order to write a psychoanalytic essay or reading Marx and Marxists in order to write a Marxist essay, or doing research on "necessary historical background" in order to write a historical essay.

DECONSTRUCTION

Deconstruction, or deconstructive or poststructuralist criticism, can almost be characterized as the opposite of everything formalist criticism stands for. Deconstruction begins with the assumptions that the world is unknowable and that language is unstable, elusive, unfaithful. (Language is all of these things because meaning is largely generated by opposition: "Hot" means something in opposition to "cold," but a hot day may be 90 degrees whereas a hot oven is at least 400 degrees; and a "hot item" may be of any temperature.) Deconstructionists seek to show that a literary work (usually called "a text" or "a discourse") inevitably is self-contradictory. Unlike formalist critics—who hold that a competent author constructs a coherent work with a stable meaning, and that competent readers can perceive this meaning—deconstructionists (e.g., Barbara Johnson, in The Critical Difference [1980]) hold that a work has no coherent meaning at the center. Jonathan Culler, in On Deconstruction (1982), says that "to deconstruct a discourse is to show how it undermines the philosophy it asserts" (86). (Johnson and Culler provide accessible introductions, but the major document is Jacques Derrida's seminal, difficult work, Of Grammatology [1967, trans. 1976].) The text is only marks on paper, and therefore so far as a reader goes the author of a text is not the writer but the reader; texts are "indeterminate," "open," and "unstable."

Despite the emphasis on indeterminacy, one sometimes detects in deconstructionist interpretations a view associated with Marxism. This is the idea that authors are "socially constructed" from the "discourses of power" or "signifying practices" that surround them. Thus, although authors may think they are individuals with independent minds, their works usually reveal—unknown to the authors—the society's economic base. Deconstructionists "interrogate" a text, and they reveal what the authors were unaware of or had thought they had kept safely out of sight. That is, deconstructionists often find a rather specific meaning—though this meaning is one that might surprise the author.

Deconstruction is valuable insofar as—like the New Criticism—it encourages close, rigorous attention to the text. Furthermore, in its rejection of the claim that a work has a single stable meaning, deconstruction has had a positive influence on the study of literature. The problem with deconstruction, however, is that too often it is reductive, telling the same story about every text—that here, yet again, and again, we see how a text is incoherent and heterogeneous. There is, too, an irritating arrogance in some deconstructive criticism: "The author could not see how his/her text is fundamentally unstable and self-contradictory, but I can and now will interrogate the text and will issue my report." Readers, of course, should not prostrate themselves before texts, but there is something askew about an approach—however intense and detailed—that often leads readers to conclude that they know a good deal more than the benighted author.

Aware that their emphasis on the instability of language implies that their own texts are unstable or even incoherent, some deconstructionists seem to aim at entertaining rather than at edifying. They probably would claim that they do not deconstruct meaning in the sense of destroying it; rather, they might say, they exuberantly multiply meanings, and to this end they may use such devices as puns, irony, and allusions, somewhat as a poet might, and just as though (one often feels) they think they are as creative as the writers they are commenting on. Indeed, for many deconstructionists, the traditional conception of "literature" is merely an elitist "construct." All "texts" or "discourses" (novels, scientific papers, a Kewpie doll on the mantel, watching TV, suing in court, walking the dog, and all other signs that human beings make) are of a piece; all are unstable systems of signifying, all are fictions, all are "literature." If literature (in the usual sense) occupies a special place in deconstruction it is because literature delights in its playfulness, its fictiveness, whereas other discourses nominally reject playfulness and fictiveness.

READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM

Probably all reading includes some sort of response—"This is terrific," "This is a bore," "I don't know what's going on here"—and probably almost all writing about literature begins with some such response, but specialists in literature disagree greatly about the role that response plays, or should play, in experiencing literature and in writing about it.

At one extreme are those who say that our response to a work of literature should be a purely aesthetic response—a response to a work of art—and not the response we would have to something comparable in real life. To take an obvious point: If in real life we heard someone plotting a murder, we would intervene, perhaps by calling the police or by attempting to warn the victim. But when we hear Macbeth and Lady Macbeth plot to kill King Duncan, we watch with deep interest; we hear their words with pleasure, and maybe we even look forward to seeing the murder and to seeing what the characters then will say and what will happen to the murderers.

When you think about it, the vast majority of the works of literature do not have a close, obvious resemblance to the reader's life. Most readers of Macbeth are not Scots, and no readers are Scottish kings or queens. (It's not just a matter of older literature; no readers of Toni Morrison's Beloved are nineteenth-century African-Americans.) The connections readers make between themselves and the lives in most of the books they read are not, on the whole, connections based on ethnic or professional identities, but, rather, connections with states of consciousness, for instance a young person's sense of isolation from the family, or a young person's sense of guilt for initial sexual experiences. Before we reject a work either because it seems too close to us ("I'm a man and I don't like the depiction of this man"), or on the other hand too far from our experience ("I'm not a woman, so how can I enjoy reading about these women?"), we probably should try to follow the advice of Virginia Woolf, who said, "Do not dictate to your author; try to become him." Nevertheless, some literary works of the past may today seem intolerable, at least in part. There are passages in Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn that deeply upset us today. We should, however, try to reconstruct the cultural assumptions of the age in which the work was written. If we do so, we may find that if in some ways it reflected its age, in other ways it challenged that culture.

Still, some of our experiences, some of what we are, may make it virtually impossible for us to read a work sympathetically or "objectively," experiencing it only as a work of art and not as a part of life. Take so humble a form of literature as the joke. A few decades ago jokes about nagging wives and mothers-in-law were widely thought to be funny. Our fairly recent heightened awareness of sexism today makes those jokes unfunny. Twenty years ago the "meaning" of a joke about a nagging wife or about a mother-in-law was, in effect, "Here's a funny episode that shows what women typically are." Today the "meaning"—at least as the hearer conceives it—is "The unfunny story you have just told shows that you have stupid, stereotypical views of women." In short, the joke may "mean" one thing to the teller, and a very different thing to the hearer.

Reader-response criticism, then, says that the "meaning" of a work is not merely something put into the work by the writer; rather, the "meaning" is an interpretation created or constructed or produced by the reader as well as the writer. Stanley Fish, an exponent of reader-response theory, in Is There a Text in This Class? (1980), puts it this way: "Interpretation is not the art of construing but of constructing. Interpreters do not decode poems; they make them" (327).

Let's now try to relate these ideas more specifically to comments about literature. If "meaning" is the production or creation not simply of the writer but also of the perceiver, does it follow that there is no such thing as a "correct" interpretation of the meaning of a work of literature? Answers to this question differ. At one extreme, the reader is said to construct or reconstruct the text under the firm guidance of the author. That is, the author so powerfully shapes or constructs the text—encodes an idea—that the reader is virtually compelled to perceive or reconstruct or decode it the way the author wants it to be perceived. (We can call this view the objective view, since it essentially holds that readers look objectively at the work and see what the author put into it.) At the other extreme, the reader constructs the meaning according to his or her own personality—that is, according to the reader's psychological identity. (We can call this view the subjective view, since it essentially holds that readers inevitably project their feelings into what they perceive.) An extreme version of the subjective view holds that there is no such thing as literature; there are only texts, some of which some readers regard in a particularly elitist way.

Against the objective view one can argue thus: No author can fully control a reader's response to every detail of the text. No matter how carefully constructed the text is, it leaves something—indeed, a great deal—to the reader's imagination. For instance, when Macbeth says that life "is a tale/Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury/Signifying nothing," are we getting a profound thought from Shakespeare or, on the contrary, are we getting a shallow thought from Macbeth, a man who does not see that his criminal deeds have been played out against a heaven that justly punishes his crimes? In short, the objective view neglects to take account of the fact that the author is not continually at our shoulder making sure that we interpret the work in a particular way.

It is probably true, as Flannery O'Connor says in Mystery and Manners (1957), that good writers select "every word, every detail, for a reason, every incident for a reason" (75), but there are always gaps or indeterminacies, to use the words of Wolfgang Iser, a reader-response critic. Readers always go beyond the text, drawing inferences, and evaluating the text in terms of their own experience. In the Old Testament, for instance, in Genesis, the author tells us (Chapter 22) that God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, and then says that "Abraham rose up early in the morning" and prepared to fulfill the command. We are not explicitly told why Abraham "rose up early in the morning," or how he spent the intervening night, but some readers take "early in the morning" to signify (reasonably?) that Abraham has had a sleepless night. Others take it to signify (reasonably?) that Abraham is prompt in obeying God's command. Some readers fill the gap with both explanations, or with neither. Doubtless much depends on the reader, but there is no doubt that readers "naturalize"—make natural, according to their own ideas—what they read.

In an extreme form the subjective view denies that authors can make us perceive the meanings that they try to put into their works. This position suggests that every reader has a different idea of what a work means, an idea that reflects the reader's own ideas. Every reader, then, is Narcissus, who looked into a pool of water and thought he saw a beautiful youth but really saw only a reflection of himself. But does every reader see his or her individual image in each literary work? Of course not. Even Hamlet, a play that has generated an enormous range of interpretation, is universally seen as a tragedy, a play that deals with painful realities. If someone were to tell us that Hamlet is a comedy, and that the end, with a pile of corpses, is especially funny, we would not say, "Oh, well, we all see things in our own way." Rather, we would make our exit as quickly as possible.

Many people who subscribe to one version or another of a reader-response theory would agree that they are concerned not with all readers but with what they call informed readers or competent readers. Thus, informed or competent readers are familiar with the conventions of literature. They understand, for instance, that in a play such as Hamlet the characters usually speak in verse. Such readers, then, do not express amazement that Hamlet often speaks metrically, and that he sometimes uses rhyme. These readers understand that verse is the normal language for most of the characters in the play, and therefore such readers do not characterize Hamlet as a poet. Informed, competent readers, in short, know the rules of the game. There will still, of course, be plenty of room for differences of interpretation. Some people will find Hamlet not at all blameworthy; others will find him somewhat blameworthy; and still others may find him highly blameworthy. In short, we can say that a writer works against a background that is shared by readers. As readers, we are familiar with various kinds of literature, and we read or see Hamlet as a particular kind of literary work, a tragedy, a play that evokes (in Shakespeare's words) "woe or wonder," sadness and astonishment. Knowing (to a large degree) how we ought to respond, our responses thus are not merely private.

Consider taking, as a guide to reading, a remark made by Mencius (372–289 BCE), the Chinese Confucian philosopher. Speaking of reading The Book of Odes, the oldest Chinese anthology, Mencius said that "a reader must let his thought go to meet the intention as he would a guest." We often cannot be sure about the author's intention (we do not know what Shakespeare intended to say in Hamlet; we have only the play itself), and even those relatively few authors who have explicitly stated their intentions may be untrustworthy for one reason or another. Yet there is something highly attractive in Mencius's suggestion that when we read we should—at least for a start—treat our author not with suspicion or hostility but with goodwill and with the expectation of pleasure.

What are the implications of reader-response theory for writing an essay on a work of literature? Even if we agree that we are talking only about competent readers, does this mean that almost anything goes in setting forth one's responses in an essay? Almost all advocates of any form of reader-response criticism agree on one thing: There are agreed-upon rules of writing if not of reading. This one point of agreement can be amplified to contain at least two aspects: (1) we all agree (more or less) as to what constitutes evidence, and (2) we all agree that a written response should be coherent. If you say that you find Hamlet to be less noble than his adversary, Claudius, you will be expected to provide evidence by pointing to specific passages, to specific things that Hamlet and Claudius say and do. And you will be expected to order the material into an effective, coherent sequence, so that the reader can move easily through your essay and will understand what you are getting at.

ARCHETYPAL (OR MYTH) CRITICISM

Carl G. Jung, the Swiss psychiatrist, in Contributions to Analytical Psychology (1928), postulates the existence of a "collective unconscious," an inheritance in our brains consisting of "countless typical experiences [such as birth, escape from danger, selection of a mate] of our ancestors." Few people today believe in an inherited "collective unconscious," but many people agree that certain repeated experiences, such as going to sleep and hours later awakening, or the perception of the setting and of the rising sun, or of the annual death and rebirth of vegetation, manifest themselves in dreams, myths, and literature—in these instances, as stories of apparent death and rebirth. This archetypal plot of death and rebirth is said to be evident in Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, for example. The ship suffers a deathlike calm and then is miraculously restored to motion, and, in a sort of parallel rebirth, the mariner moves from spiritual death to renewed perception of the holiness of life. Another archetypal plot is the quest, which usually involves the testing and initiation of a hero, and thus essentially represents the movement from innocence to experience. In addition to archetypal plots there are archetypal characters, since an archetype is any recurring unit. Among archetypal characters are the Scapegoat, the Hero (savior, deliverer), the Terrible Mother (witch, stepmother—even the wolf "grandmother" in the tale of Little Red Riding Hood), and the Wise Old Man (father figure, magician).

Because, the theory holds, both writer and reader share unconscious memories, the tale an author tells (derived from the collective unconscious) may strangely move the reader, speaking to his or her collective unconscious. As Maud Bodkin puts it, in Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934), something within us "leaps in response to the effective presentation in poetry of an ancient theme" (4). But this emphasis on ancient (or repeated) themes has made archetypal criticism vulnerable to the charge that it is reductive. The critic looks for certain characters or patterns of action and values the work if the motifs are there, meanwhile overlooking what is unique, subtle, distinctive, and truly interesting about the work. That is, to put the matter crudely, a work is regarded as good if it is pretty much like other works, with the usual motifs and characters. A second weakness in some archetypal criticism is that in the search for the deepest meaning of a work the critic may crudely impose a pattern, seeing (for instance) The Quest in every walk down the street. But perhaps to say this is to beg the question; it is the critic's job to write so persuasively that the reader at least tentatively accepts the critic's view. For a wide-ranging study of one particular motif, see Barbara Fass Leavy's In Search of the Swan Maiden (1994), a discussion of the legend of a swan maiden who is forced to marry a mortal because he possesses something of hers, usually a garment or an animal skin. Leavy analyzes several versions of the story, which she takes to be a representation not only of female rage against male repression but also a representation of male fear of female betrayal. Leavy ends her book by examining this motif in Ibsen's A Doll's House. Her claim is that when Nora finds a lost object, the dance costume, she can flee from the tyrannical domestic world and thus she regains her freedom.

If archetypal criticism sometimes seems farfetched, it is nevertheless true that one of its strengths is that it invites us to use comparisons, and comparing is often an excellent way to see not only what a work shares with other works but what is distinctive in the work. The most successful practitioner of archetypal criticism was the late Northrop Frye (1912–1991), whose numerous books help readers to see fascinating connections between works. For Frye's explicit comments about archetypal criticism, as well as for examples of such criticism in action, see especially his Anatomy of Criticism (1957) and The Educated Imagination (1964). On archetypes see also Chapter 16, "Archetypal Patterns," in Norman Friedman, Form and Meaning in Fiction (1975).

HISTORICAL SCHOLARSHIP

Historical criticism studies a work within its historical context. Thus, a student of Julius Caesar, Hamlet, or Macbeth—plays in which ghosts appear—may try to find out about Elizabethan attitudes toward ghosts. We may find that the Elizabethans took ghosts more seriously than we do; on the other hand, we may find that ghosts were explained in various ways, for instance sometimes as figments of the imagination and sometimes as shapes taken by the devil in order to mislead the virtuous. Similarly, a historical essay concerned with Othello may be devoted to Elizabethan attitudes toward Moors, or to Elizabethan ideas of love, or, for that matter, to Elizabethan ideas of a daughter's obligations toward her father's wishes concerning her suitor. The historical critic assumes (and one can hardly dispute the assumption) that writers, however individualistic, are shaped by the particular social contexts in which they live. One can put it this way: The goal of historical criticism is to understand how people in the past thought and felt. It assumes that such understanding can enrich our understanding of a particular work. The assumption is, however, disputable, since one may argue that the artist—let's say Shakespeare—may not have shared the age's view on this or that. All of the half-dozen or so Moors in Elizabethan plays other than Othello are villainous or foolish, but this evidence, one can argue, does not prove that therefore Othello is villainous or foolish.

Marxist Criticism

One form of historical criticism is Marxist criticism, named for Karl Marx (1818–1883). Actually, to say "one form" is misleading, since Marxist criticism today is varied, but essentially it sees history primarily as a struggle between socioeconomic classes, and it sees literature (and everything else) as the product of economic forces of the period.

For Marxists, economics is the "base" or "infrastructure"; on this base rests a "superstructure" of ideology (law, politics, philosophy, religion, and the arts, including literature), reflecting the interests of the dominant class. Thus, literature is a material product, produced—like bread or battleships—in order to be consumed in a given society. Like every other product, literature is the product of work, and it does work. A bourgeois society, for example, will produce literature that in one way or another celebrates bourgeois values, such as individualism. These works serve to assure the society that produces them that its values are solid, even universal. The enlightened Marxist writer or critic, on the other hand, exposes the fallacy of traditional values and replaces them with the truths found in Marxism. In the heyday of Marxism in the United States, during the depression of the 1930s, it was common for such Marxist critics as Granville Hicks to assert that the novel must show the class struggle.

Few critics of any sort would disagree that works of art in some measure reflect the age that produced them, but most contemporary Marxist critics go further. First, they assert—in a repudiation of what has been called "'vulgar' Marxist theory"—that the deepest historical meaning of a literary work is to be found in what it does not say, what its ideology does not permit it to express. Second, Marxists take seriously Marx's famous comment that "the philosophers have only interpreted the world in various ways; the point is to change it." The critic's job is to change the world, by revealing the economic basis of the arts. Not surprisingly, most Marxists are skeptical of such concepts as "genius" and "masterpiece." These concepts, they say, are part of the bourgeois myth that idealizes the individual and detaches it from its economic context. For an introduction to Marxist criticism, see Terry Eagleton, Marxism and Literary Criticism (1976).

The New Historicism

A recent school of scholarship, called the New Historicism, insists that there is no "history" in the sense of a narrative of indisputable past events. Rather, the New Historicism holds that there is only our version—our narrative, our representation—of the past. In this view, each age projects its own preconceptions on the past; historians may think they are revealing the past, but they are revealing only their own historical situation and their personal preferences. Thus, in the nineteenth century and in the twentieth almost up to 1992, Columbus was represented as the heroic benefactor of humankind who discovered the New World. But even while plans were being made to celebrate the five-hundredth anniversary of his first voyage across the Atlantic, voices were raised in protest: Columbus did not "discover" a New World; after all, the indigenous people knew where they were, and it was Columbus who was lost, since he thought he was in India. People who wrote history in, say, 1900, projected onto the past their current views (colonialism was a Good Thing), and people who in 1992 wrote history projected onto that same period a very different set of views (colonialism was a Bad Thing). Similarly, ancient Greece, once celebrated by historians as the source of democracy and rational thinking, is now more often regarded as a society that was built on slavery and on the oppression of women. And the Renaissance, once glorified as an age of enlightened thought, is now often seen as an age that tyrannized women, enslaved colonial people, and enslaved itself with its belief in witchcraft and astrology. Thinking about these changing views, one feels the truth of the witticism that the only thing more uncertain than the future is the past.

The New Historicism is especially associated with Stephen Greenblatt, who popularized the term in 1982 in the preface to a collection of essays published in the journal Genre. Greenblatt himself has said of the New Historicism that "it's no doctrine at all" (Learning to Curse, [1990]) but the term is nevertheless much used, and, as the preceding remarks have suggested, it is especially associated with power, most especially with revealing the tyrannical practices of a society that others have glorified. The New Historicism was in large measure shaped by the 1960s; the students who in the 1960s protested against the war in Vietnam by holding demonstrations, in the 1980s—they were now full professors—protested against Ronald Reagan by writing articles exposing Renaissance colonialism. Works of literature were used as a basis for a criticism of society. Academic writing of this sort was not dry, impartial, unimpassioned scholarship; rather, it connected the past with the present, and it offered value judgments. In Greenblatt's words, > Writing that was not engaged, that withheld judgments, that failed to connect the present with the past seemed worthless. Such connection could be made either by analogy or causality; that is, a particular set of historical circumstances could be represented in such a way as to bring out homologies with aspects of the present or, alternatively, those circumstances could be analyzed as the generative forces that led to the modern condition. (Learning to Curse, page 167)

For a collection of 15 essays exemplifying the New Historicism, see H. Aram Veeser, ed., The New Historicism (1994).

Biographical Criticism

One kind of historical scholarship is the study of biography, which for our purposes includes not only biographies but also autobiographies, diaries, journals, letters, and so on. What experiences did (for example) Mark Twain undergo? Are some of the apparently sensational aspects of Huckleberry Finn in fact close to events that Twain experienced? If so, is he a "realist"? If not, is he writing in the tradition of the "tall tale"?

The really good biographies not only tell us about the life of the author, but they enable us to return to the literary texts with a deeper understanding of how they came to be what they are. If you read Richard B. Sewall's biography of Emily Dickinson, you will find a wealth of material concerning her family and the world she moved in—for instance, the religious ideas that were part of her upbringing.

Biographical study may illuminate even the work of a living author. If you are writing about the poetry of Adrienne Rich, for example, you may want to consider what she has told us in many essays about her life, especially about her relations with her father and her husband.

PSYCHOLOGICAL (OR PSYCHOANALYTIC) CRITICISM

One form that biographical study may take is psychological or psychoanalytic criticism, which usually examines the author and the author's writings in the framework of Freudian psychology. A central doctrine of Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) is the Oedipus complex, the view that all males (Freud seems not to have made his mind up about females) unconsciously wish to displace their fathers and to sleep with their mothers. According to Freud, hatred for the father and love of the mother, normally repressed, may appear disguised in dreams. Works of art, like dreams, are disguised versions of repressed wishes.

Consider the case of Edgar Allan Poe. An orphan before he was three years old, he was brought up in the family of John Allan, but he was never formally adopted. His relations with Allan were stormy, though he seems to have had better relations with Allan's wife and still better relations with an aunt, whose daughter he married. In the Freudian view, Poe's marriage to his cousin (the daughter of a mother figure) was a way of sleeping with his mother. According to psychoanalytic critics, if we move from Poe's life to his work, we see, it is alleged, this hatred for his father and love for his mother. Thus, the murderer in "The Cask of Amontillado" is said to voice Poe's hostility toward his father, and the wine vault in which much of the story is set (an encompassing structure associated with fluids) is interpreted as symbolizing Poe's desire to return to his mother's womb. In Poe's other works, the longing for death is similarly taken to embody his desire to return to the womb.

Other psychoanalytic interpretations of Poe have been offered. Kenneth Silverman, author of a biography titled Edgar Allan Poe (1991) and the editor of a collection titled New Essays on Poe's Major Tales (1993), emphasizes the fact that Poe was orphaned before he was three, and was separated from his brother and his infant sister. In New Essays Silverman relates this circumstance to the "many instances of engulfment" that he finds in Poe's work. Images of engulfment, he points out, "are part of a still larger network of images having to do with biting, devouring, and similar oral mutilation." Why are they common in Poe? Here is Silverman's answer:

> Current psychoanalytic thinking about childhood bereavement explains the fantasy of being swallowed up as representing a desire, mixed with dread, to merge with the dead; the wish to devour represents a primitive attempt at preserving loved ones, incorporating them so as not to lose them. (20)

Notice that psychoanalytic interpretations usually take us away from what the author consciously intended; they purport to tell us what the work reveals, whether or not the author was aware of this meaning. The "meaning" of the work is found not in the surface content of the work but in the author's psyche.

One additional example—and it is the most famous—of a psychoanalytic study of a work of literature may be useful. In Hamlet and Oedipus (1949) Ernest Jones, amplifying some comments by Freud, argued that Hamlet delays killing Claudius because Claudius (who has killed Hamlet's father and married Hamlet's mother) has done exactly what Hamlet himself wanted to do. For Hamlet to kill Claudius, then, would be to kill himself.

If this approach interests you, take a look at Norman N. Holland's Psychoanalysis and Shakespeare (1966), or Frederick Crews's study of Hawthorne, The Sins of the Fathers (1966). Crews finds in Hawthorne's work evidence of unresolved Oedipal conflicts, and he accounts for the appeal of the fictions thus: The stories "rest on fantasy, but on the shared fantasy of mankind, and this makes for a more penetrating fiction than would any illusionistic slice of life" (263). For applications to other authors, look at Simon O. Lesser's Fiction and the Unconscious (1957), or at an anthology of criticism, Literature and Psychoanalysis, edited by Edith Kurzweil and William Phillips (1983).

Psychological criticism can also turn from the author and the work to the reader, seeking to explain why we, as readers, respond in certain ways. Why, for example, is Hamlet so widely popular? A Freudian answer is that it is universal because it deals with a universal (Oedipal) impulse. One can, however, ask whether it appeals as strongly to women as to men (again, Freud was unsure about the Oedipus complex in women) and, if so, why it appeals to them. Or, more generally, one can ask if males and females read in the same way.

Gender (Feminist, and Lesbian and Gay) Criticism

This last question brings us to gender criticism. As we have seen, writing about literature usually seeks to answer questions. Historical scholarship, for instance, tries to answer such questions as, What did Shakespeare and his contemporaries believe about ghosts? or How did Victorian novelists and poets respond to Darwin's theory of evolution? Gender criticism, too, asks questions. It is especially concerned with two issues, one about reading and one about writing: Do men and women read in different ways, and Do they write in different ways?

Feminist criticism can be traced back to the work of Virginia Woolf (1882–1941), but chiefly it grew out of the women's movement of the 1960s. The women's movement at first tended to hold that women are pretty much the same as men and therefore should be treated equally, but much recent feminist criticism has emphasized and explored the differences between women and men. Because the experiences of the sexes are different, the argument goes, the values and sensibilities are different, and their responses to literature are different. Further, literature written by women is different from literature written by men. Works written by women are seen by some feminist critics as embodying the experiences of a minority culture—a group marginalized by the dominant male culture. (If you have read Charlotte Perkins Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" or Susan Glaspell's Trifles, you'll recall that these literary works themselves are largely concerned about the differing ways in which men and women perceive the world.) Not all women are feminist critics, and not all feminist critics are women. Further, there are varieties of feminist criticism. For a good introduction see The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory (1985), edited by Elaine Showalter. For the role of men in feminist criticism, see Engendering Men (1990), edited by Joseph A. Boone and Michael Cadden (1990). At this point it should also be said that some theorists, who hold that identity is socially constructed, strongly dispute the value of establishing "essentialist" categories such as heterosexual, gay, and lesbian—a point that we will consider in a moment.

Feminist critics rightly point out that men have established the conventions of literature and that men have established the canon—that is, the body of literature that is said to be worth reading. Speaking a bit broadly, in this patriarchal or male-dominated body of literature, men are valued for being strong and active, whereas women are expected to be weak and passive. Thus, in the world of fairy tales, the admirable male is the energetic hero (Jack, the Giant-Killer) but the admirable female is the passive Sleeping Beauty. Active women such as the wicked stepmother or—a disguised form of the same thing—the witch are generally villainous. (There are of course exceptions, such as Gretel, in "Hansel and Gretel.") A woman hearing or reading the story of Sleeping Beauty or of Little Red Riding Hood (rescued by the powerful woodcutter) or any other work in which women seem to be trivialized will respond differently from a man. For instance, a woman may be socially conditioned into admiring Sleeping Beauty, but only at great cost to her mental well-being. A more resistant female reader may recognize in herself no kinship with the beautiful, passive Sleeping Beauty and may respond to the story indignantly. Another way to put it is this: The male reader perceives a romantic story, but the resistant female reader perceives a story of oppression.

For discussions of the ways in which, it is argued, women ought to read, you may want to look at Gender and Reading (1986), edited by Elizabeth A. Flynn and Patrocinio Schweickart, and especially at Judith Fetterley's book The Resisting Reader (1978). Fetterley's point, briefly, is that women should resist the meanings (that is, the visions of how women ought to behave) that male authors—or female authors who have inherited patriarchal values—bury in their books. "To read the canon of what is currently considered classic American literature is perforce to identify as male," Fetterley says. "It insists on its universality in specifically male terms." Fetterley argues that a woman must read as a woman, "exorcising the male mind that has been implanted in women." In resisting the obvious meanings—for instance, the false claim that male values are universal values—women may discover more significant meanings. Fetterley argues that Faulkner's "A Rose for Emily" > is a story not of a conflict between the South and the North or between the old order and the new; it is a story of the patriarchy North and South, new and old, and of the sexual conflict within it. As Faulkner himself has implied, it is a story of a woman victimized and betrayed by the system of > sexual politics, who nevertheless has discovered, within the structures that victimize her, sources of power for herself. . . . "A Rose for Emily" is the story of how to murder your gentleman caller and get away with it. (34–35)

Fetterley goes on to state that society made Emily a "lady"—society dehumanized her by elevating her. Emily's father, seeking to shape her life, stood in the doorway of their house and drove away her suitors. So far as he was concerned, Emily was a nonperson, a creature whose own wishes were not to be regarded; he alone would shape her future. Because society (beginning with her father) made her a "lady"—a creature so elevated that she is not taken seriously as a passionate human being—she is able to kill Homer Barron and not be suspected. Here is Fetterley speaking of the passage in which the townspeople crowd into her house when her death becomes known:

> When the would-be "suitors" finally get into her father's house, they discover the consequences of his oppression of her, for the violence contained in the rotted corpse of Homer Barron is the mirror image of the violence represented in the tableau, the back-flung front door flung back with a vengeance. (42)

Feminist criticism has been concerned not only with the depiction of women and men in a male-determined literary canon and with female responses to these images but also with yet another topic: women's writing. Women have had fewer opportunities than men to become writers of fiction, poetry, and drama—for one thing, they have been less well educated in the things that the male patriarchy valued—but even when they have managed to write, men sometimes have neglected their work simply because it had been written by a woman. Feminists have further argued that certain forms of writing have been especially the province of women—for instance, journals, diaries, and letters; and predictably, these forms have not been given adequate space in the traditional, male-oriented canon.

In 1972, in an essay titled "When We Dead Awaken: Writing as ReVision," the poet and essayist Adrienne Rich effectively summed up the matter:

> A radical critique of literature, feminist in its impulse, would take the work first of all as a clue to how we live, how we have been living, how we have been led to imagine ourselves, how our language has trapped as well as liberated us; and how we can begin to see—and therefore live—afresh. . . . We need to know the writing of the past and know it differently than we have ever known it; not to pass on a tradition but to break its hold over us.

Much feminist criticism concerned with women writers has emphasized connections between the writer's biography and her art. Suzanne Juhasz, in her introduction to Feminist Critics Read Emily Dickinson (1983), puts it this way:

> The central assumption of feminist criticism is that gender informs the nature of art, the nature of biography, and the relation between them. Dickinson is a woman poet, and this fact is integral to her identity. Feminist criticism's sensitivity to the components of female experience in general and to Dickinson's identity as a woman generates essential insights about her. . . . Attention to the relationship between biography and art is a requisite of feminist criticism. To disregard it further strengthens those divisions continually created by traditional criticism, so that nothing about the woman writer can be seen whole. (1–5)

Lesbian and gay criticism have their roots in feminist criticism; feminist criticism introduced many of the questions that these other, newer developments are now exploring.

In 1979, in a book called On Lies, Secrets, and Silence, Adrienne Rich reprinted a 1975 essay on Emily Dickinson, "Vesuvius at Home." In her new preface to the reprinted essay she said that a lesbian-feminist reading of Dickinson would not have to prove that Dickinson slept with another woman. Rather, lesbian-feminist criticism "will ask questions hitherto passed over; it will not search obsessively for heterosexual romance as the key to a woman artist's life and work" (157–158). Obviously such a statement is also relevant to a male artist's life and work. It should be mentioned, too, that Rich's comments on lesbian reading and lesbianism as an image of creativity have been much discussed. For a brief survey, see Marilyn R. Farwell, "Toward a Definition of the Lesbian Literary Imagination," Signs 14 (1988): 100–118.

Before turning to some of the questions that lesbian and gay critics address, it is necessary first to say that lesbian criticism and gay criticism are not—to use a word now current in much criticism—symmetrical, chiefly because lesbian and gay relationships themselves are not symmetrical. Straight society has traditionally been more tolerant of—or blinder to—lesbianism than to male homosexuality. Further, lesbian literary theory has tended to see its affinities more with feminist theory than with gay theory; the emphasis has been on gender (male/female) rather than on sexuality (homosexuality/bisexuality/heterosexuality). On the other hand, some gays and lesbians have been writing what is now being called Queer Theory.

Now for some of the questions that this criticism addresses: (1) Do lesbians and gays read in ways that differ from the ways straight people read? (2) Do they write in ways that differ from those of straight people? (Gregory Woods argues in Lesbian and Gay Writing: An Anthology of Critical Essays [1990], edited by Mark Lilly, that "modern gay poets . . . use . . . paradox, as weapon and shield, against a world in which heterosexuality is taken for granted as being exclusively natural and healthy" [176]. Another critic, Jeffrey Meyers, writing in Journal of English and Germanic Philology 88 [1989]: 126–29, in an unsympathetic review of a book on gay writers contrasts gay writers of the past with those of the present. According to Meyers, closeted homosexuals in the past, writing out of guilt and pain, produced a distinctive literature that is more interesting than the productions of today's uncloseted writers.) (3) How have straight writers portrayed lesbians and gays, and how have lesbian and gay writers portrayed straight women and men? (4) What strategies did lesbian and gay writers use to make their work acceptable to a general public in an age when lesbian and gay behavior was unmentionable?

Questions such as these have stimulated critical writing especially about bisexual and lesbian and gay authors (for instance, Virginia Woolf, Gertrude Stein, Elizabeth Bishop, Walt Whitman, Oscar Wilde, E. M. Forster, Hart Crane, Tennessee Williams), but they have also led to interesting writing on such a topic as Nathaniel Hawthorne's attitudes toward women. "An account of Hawthorne's misogyny that takes no account of his own and his culture's gender anxieties," Robert K. Martin says in Boone and Cadden's Engendering Men, "is necessarily inadequate" (122).

Shakespeare's work—and not only the sonnets, which praise a beautiful male friend—has stimulated a fair amount of gay criticism. Much of this criticism consists of "decoding" aspects of the plays. Seymour Kleinberg argues, in Essays on Gay Literature (1985), ed. Stuart Kellogg, that Antonio in The Merchant of Venice, whose melancholy is not made clear by Shakespeare, is melancholy because (again, this is according to Kleinberg) Antonio's lover, Bassanio, is deserting him, and because Antonio is ashamed of his own sexuality:

> Antonio is a virulently anti-Semitic homosexual and is melancholic to the point of despair because his lover, Bassanio, wishes to marry an immensely rich aristocratic beauty, to leave the diversions of the Rialto to return to his own class and to sexual conventionality. Antonio is also in despair > because he despises himself for his homosexuality, which is romantic, obsessive, and exclusive, and fills him with sexual shame. (113)

Several earlier critics had suggested that Antonio is a homosexual, hopelessly pining for Bassanio, but Kleinberg goes further, and argues that Antonio and Bassanio are lovers, not just good friends, and that Antonio's hopeless and shameful (because socially unacceptable) passion for Bassanio becomes transformed into hatred for the Jew, Shylock. The play, according to Kleinberg, is partly about "a world where . . . sexual guilt is translated into ethnic hatred" (124).

Examination of matters of gender can help to illuminate literary works, but it should be added, too, that some—perhaps most—critics write also as activists, reporting their findings not only to help us to understand and to enjoy the works of (say) Whitman, but also to change society's view of sexuality. Thus, in Disseminating Whitman (1991), Michael Moon is impatient with earlier critical rhapsodies about Whitman's universalism. It used to be said that Whitman's celebration of the male body was a sexless celebration of brotherly love in a democracy, but the gist of Moon's view is that we must neither whitewash Whitman's poems with such high-minded talk, nor reject them as indecent; rather, we must see exactly what Whitman is saying about a kind of experience that society had shut its eyes to, and we must take Whitman's view seriously. Somewhat similarly, Gregory Woods in Articulate Flesh (1987) points out that until a few years ago discussions of Hart Crane regularly condemned his homosexuality, as is evident in L. S. Dembo's characterization of Crane (quoted by Woods) as "uneducated, alcoholic, homosexual, paranoic, suicidal" (140). Gay and lesbian writers do not adopt this sort of manner. But it should also be pointed out that today there are straight critics who study lesbian or gay authors and write about them insightfully and without hostility.

One assumption in much lesbian and gay critical writing is that although gender greatly influences the ways in which we read, reading is a skill that can be learned, and therefore straight people—aided by lesbian and gay critics—can learn to read, with pleasure and profit, lesbian and gay writers. This assumption of course also underlies much feminist criticism, which often assumes that men must stop ignoring books by women and must learn (with the help of feminist critics) how to read them, and, in fact, how to read—with newly opened eyes—the sexist writings of men of the past and present.

In addition to the titles mentioned earlier concerning gay and lesbian criticism, consult Eve Kosofsky

Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985) and an essay by Sedgwick, "Gender Criticism," in Redrawing the Boundaries, ed. Stephen Greenblatt and Giles Gunn (1992).

While many in the field of lesbian and gay criticism have turned their energies toward examining the effects that an author's—or a character's—sexual identity may have upon the text, others have begun to question, instead, the concept of sexual identity itself.* Drawing upon the work of the French social historian Michel Foucault, critics such as David Halperin (One Hundred Years of Homosexuality and Other Essays on Greek Love, [1990]) and Judith Butler (Gender Trouble, [1989]) explore how various categories of identity, such as "heterosexual" and "homosexual," represent ways of defining human beings that are distinct to particular cultures and historical periods. These critics, affiliated with what is known as the "social constructionist" school of thought, argue that the way a given society (modern American or ancient Greek) interprets sexuality will determine the particular categories within which individuals come to understand and to name their own desires. For such critics the goal of a lesbian or gay criticism is not to define the specificity of a lesbian or gay literature or mode of interpretation, but to show how the ideology (the normative understanding of a given culture) makes it seem natural to think about sexuality in terms of such identities as lesbian, gay, bisexual, or straight. By challenging the authority of those terms, or "denaturalizing" them, and by calling attention to moments in which literary (and nonliterary) representations make assumptions that reinforce the supposed inevitability of those distinctions, such critics attempt to redefine our understandings of the relations between sexuality and literature. They hope to make clear that sexuality is always, in a certain sense, "literary"; it is a representation of a fiction that society has constructed in order to make sense out of experience.

Because such critics have challenged the authority of the opposition between heterosexuality and homosexuality, and have read it as a historical construct rather than as a biological or psychological absolute, they have sometimes resisted the very terms lesbian and gay. Many now embrace what is called Queer Theory as an attempt to mark their resistance to the categories of identity they see our culture as imposing upon us.

Works written within this mode of criticism are often influenced by deconstructionist or psychoanalytic thought. They examine works by straight authors as frequently as they do works by writers who might be defined as lesbian or gay. Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick's reading of Billy Budd in her book Epistemology of the Closet (1990) provides a good example of this sort of criticism. Reading Claggart as "the homosexual" in the text of Melville's novella, Sedgwick is not interested in defining his difference from other characters. Instead, she shows how the novella sets up a large number of oppositions—such as public and private, sincerity and sentimentality, health and illness—all of which have a relationship to the way in which a distinct "gay" identity was being produced by American society at the end of the nineteenth century. Other critics whose work in this field may be useful for students of literature are D. A. Miller, The Novel and the Police (1988); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking (1989) and Iden-tification Papers (1995); Judith Butler, Bodies That Matter (1993); and Lee Edelman, Homographesis: Essays in Gay Literary and Cultural Theory (1993).

This chapter began by making the obvious point that all readers, whether or not they consciously adopt a particular approach to literature, necessarily read through particular lenses. More precisely, a reader begins with a frame of interpretation—historical, psychological, sociological, or whatever—and from within the frame a reader selects one of the several competing methodologies. Critics often make great—even grandiose—claims for their approaches. For example, Frederic Jameson, a Marxist, begins The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981) thus:

> This book will argue the priority of the political interpretation of literary texts. It conceives of the political perspective not as some supplemental method, not as an optional auxiliary to other interpretive methods current today—the psychoanalytic or the myth-critical, the stylistic, the ethical, the structural—but rather as the absolute horizon of all reading and all interpretation. (7)

Readers who are chiefly interested in politics may be willing to assume "the priority of the political interpretation . . . as the absolute horizon of all reading and all interpretation," but other readers may respectfully decline to accept this assumption.

In talking about a critical approach, it is sometimes said that readers decode a text by applying a grid to it; the grid enables them to see certain things clearly. Good; but what is sometimes forgotten is that (since there is no such thing as a free lunch) a lens or a grid—an angle of vision or interpretive frame and a methodology—also prevents a reader from seeing certain other things. This is to be expected. What is important, then, is to remember this fact, and thus not to deceive ourselves by thinking that our keen tools enable us to see the whole. A psychoanalytic reading of, say, Hamlet, may be helpful, but it does not reveal all that is in Hamlet, and it does not refute the perceptions of another approach, let's say a historical study. Each approach may illuminate aspects neglected by others.

It is too much to expect a reader to apply all useful methods (or even several) at once—that would be rather like looking through a telescope with one eye and through a microscope with the other—but it is not too much to expect readers to be aware of the limitations of their methods. If one reads much criticism, one finds two kinds of critics. There are, on the one hand, critics who methodically and mechanically peer through a lens or grid, and they find what one can easily predict they will find. On the other hand, there are critics who (despite what may be inevitable class and gender biases) are at least relatively open-minded in their approach—critics who, one might say, do not at the outset of their reading believe that their method assures them that (so to speak) they have got the text's number and that by means of this method they will expose the text for what it is. The philosopher Richard Rorty engagingly makes a distinction somewhat along these lines, in an essay he contributed to Umberto Eco's Interpretation and Overinterpretation (1992). There is a great difference, Rorty suggests, > between knowing what you want to get out of a person or thing or text in advance and [on the other hand] hoping that the person or thing or text will help you want something different—that he or she or it will help you to change your purposes, and thus to change your life. This distinction, I think, helps us highlight the difference between methodical and inspired readings of texts. (106)

Rorty goes on to say he has seen an anthology of readings on Conrad's Heart of Darkness, containing a psychoanalytic reading, a reader-response reading, and so on. "None of the readers had, as far as I could see," Rorty says, > been enraptured or destabilized by Heart of Darkness. I got no sense that the book had made a big difference to them, that they cared much about Kurtz or Marlow or the woman "with helmeted head and tawny cheeks" whom Marlow sees on the bank of the river. These people, and that book, had no more changed these readers' purposes than the specimen under the microscope changes the purpose of the histologist. (107)

The kind of criticism that Rorty prefers he calls “unmethodical” criticism and “inspired” criticism. It is, for Rorty, the result of an “encounter” with some aspect of a work of art “which has made a difference to the critic’s conception of who she is, what she is good for, what she wants to do with herself . . .” (107). This is not a matter of “respect” for the text, Rorty insists. Rather, he says, “love” and “hate” are better words, “For a great love or a great loathing is the sort of thing that changes us by changing our purposes, changing the uses to which we shall put people and things and texts we encounter later” (107).

SUGGESTIONS FOR FURTHER READING

Because a massive list of titles may prove discouraging rather than helpful, it seems advisable here to give a short list of basic titles. (Titles already mentioned in this chapter—which are good places to begin—are not repeated in the following list.)

A good sampling of contemporary criticism (60 or so essays or chapters from books), representing all of the types discussed in this commentary except lesbian and gay criticism, can be found in The Critical Tradition: Classic Texts and Contemporary Trends, 2nd ed., David H. Richter (1998).

For a readable introduction to various approaches, written for students who are beginning the study of literary theory, see Steven Lynn, Texts and Contexts (1994). For a more advanced survey, that is, a work that assumes some familiarity with the material, see a short book by K. M. Newton, Interpreting the Text: A Critical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Literary Interpretation (1990). A third survey, though considerably longer than the books by Lynn and Newton, is narrower because it confines itself to a study of critical writings about Shakespeare: Brian Vickers, Appropriating Shakespeare: Contemporary Critical Quarrels (1993), offers an astringent appraisal of deconstruction, New Historicism, psychoanalytic criticism, feminist criticism, and Marxist criticism. For a collection of essays on Shakespeare written from some of the viewpoints that Vickers deplores, see John Drakakis, ed., Shakespearean Tragedy (1992).

Sympathetic discussions (usually two or three pages long) of each approach, with fairly extensive bibliographic suggestions, are given in the appropriate articles in three encyclopedic works. Wendell V. Harris, Dictionary of Concepts in Literary Criticism and Theory (1992), devotes several pages to each concept (for instance, author, context, evaluation, feminist literary criticism, narrative) and gives a useful reading list for each entry. Fairly similar to Harris’s book are Irene Makaryk, ed., Encyclopedia of Contemporary Literary Theory: Approaches, Scholars, Terms (1993), and Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (eds.), The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, 2nd ed. (2005). The Johns Hopkins Guide, though it includes substantial entries on individual critics as well as on critical schools, is occasionally disappointing in the readability of some of its essays and especially in its coverage, since it does not include critical terms other than names of schools of criticism. Despite its title, then, it does not have entries for theory or for criticism, nor does it have entries for such words as canon and evaluation. In coverage (and also in the quality of many entries) it is inferior to an extremely valuable work with a misleading narrow title, The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, edited by Alex Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (1993). Although The New Princeton Encyclopedia does not include terms that are unique to, say, drama or fiction, it does include generous, lucid entries (with suggestions for further reading) on such terms as allegory, criticism, canon, irony, sincerity, theory, and unity, and the long entries on poetrics, poetry, and poetry, theories of, are in many respects entries on literature.

For a collection of essays on the canon, see Canons, edited by Robert von Hallberg (1984); see also an essay by Robert Scholes, "Canonicity and Textuality," in Introduction to Scholarship in Modern Languages and Literatures, edited by Joseph Gibaldi (2nd ed., 1992), 138–58. Gibaldi's collection includes essays on related topics, for instance, literary theory (by Jonathan Culler) and cultural studies (by David Bathrick).

Formalist Criticism (The New Criticism)

Cleanth Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn: Studies in the Structure of Poetry (1947), especially Chapters 1 and 11 ("The Language of Paradox" and "The Heresy of Paraphrase"); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954), especially "The Intentional Fallacy" and "The Affective Fallacy"; Murray Krieger, The New Apologists for Poetry (1956); and, for an accurate overview of a kind of criticism often misrepresented today, Chapters 9–12 in Volume 6 of René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (1986).

Deconstruction

Christopher Norris, Deconstruction: Theory and Practice, rev. ed. (1991); Vincent B. Leitch, Deconstructive Criticism: An Advanced Introduction and Survey (1983); Christopher Norris, ed., What Is Deconstruction? (1988); Christopher Norris and Andrew Benjamin, Deconstruction and the Interests of Theory (1989). For a negative assessment, consult John M. Ellis, Against Deconstruction (1989). More generally, see Deconstruction: A Reader, ed. Martin McQuillan (2001) and Critical Concepts in Literary and Cultural Studies, ed. Jonathan Culler, 4 vols. (2003).

Reader-Response Criticism

Wolfgang Iser, The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response (1978); Wolfgang Iser, Prospecting: From Reader Response to Literary Anthropology (1993); Susan Suleiman and Inge Crossman, eds., The Reader in the Text (1980); Jane P. Tompkins, ed., Reader-Response Criticism (1980); Norman N. Holland, The Dynamics of Literary Response (1973, 1989); Steven Mailloux, Interpretive Conventions: The Reader in the Study of American Fiction (1982); Gerry Brenner, Performative Criticism: Experiments in Reader Response (2004).

Archetypal (or Myth) Criticism

G. Wilson Knight, The Starlit Dome (1941); Richard Chase, Quest for Myth (1949); Murray Krieger, ed., Northrop Frye in Modern Criticism (1966); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980). For a good survey of Frye's approach, see Robert D. Denham, Northrop Frye and Critical Method (1978). Also, Rereading Frye: The Published and Unpublished Works, ed. David Boyd and Imre Salusinszky (1999).

Historical Criticism

For a brief survey of some historical criticism of the first half of the twentieth century, see René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950, Volume 6 (1986), Chapter 4 ("Academic Criticism"). See also E. M. W. Tillyard, The Elizabethan World Picture (1943), and Tillyard's Shakespeare's History Plays (1944), both of which relate Elizabethan literature to the beliefs of the age and are good examples of the historical approach. Also of interest is David Levin, Forms of Uncertainty: Essays in Historical Criticism (1992).

Marxist Criticism

Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977); Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979); Lydia Sargent, ed., Women and Revolution: A Discussion of the Unhappy Marriage of Marxism and Feminism (1981); and for a brief survey of American Marxist writers of the 1930s and 1940s, see Chapter 5 of Volume 6 of René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism (1986). Also helpful are Daniel Aaron, Writers on the Left: Episodes in American Literary Communism (1961; new ed., 1992); and Barbara Foley, Radical Representations: Politics and Form in U.S. Proletarian Fiction, 1929–1941 (1993). Also stimulating are Terry Eagleton, The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990) and Marxist Shakespeares, ed. Jean E. Howard and Scott Cutler Shershow (2001).

New Historicism

Historicizing Theory, ed. Peter C. Herman (2004); Stephen Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning from More to Shakespeare (1980), especially the first chapter; Brook Thomas, The New Historicism and Other Old-Fashioned Topics (1991). Greenblatt's other influential books include Shakespearean Negotiations: The Circulation of Social Energy in Renaissance England (1988), and, with Catherine Gallagher, Practicing New Historicism (2000).

Biographical Criticism

Leon Edel, Literary Biography (1957); Estelle C. Jellinek, ed., Women's Autobiography: Essays in Criticism (1980); James Olney, Metaphors of Self: The Meaning of Autobiography (1981); and Women, Autobiography, Theory: A Reader, ed. Sidonie Smith and Julia Watson. Important twentieth-century literary biographers are Richard Ellmann, James Joyce (1959, rev. ed., 1982); Juliet Barker, The Brontës (1994); Hermione Lee, Virginia Woolf (1997); Lyndall Gordon, T. S. Eliot: An Imperfect Life (1999); and Fred Kaplan, The Singular Mark Twain: A Biography (2003).

Psychological (or Psychoanalytic) Criticism

Edith Kurzweil and William Phillips, eds., Literature and Psychoanalysis (1983); Maurice Charney and Joseph Reppen, eds., Psychoanalytic Approaches to Literature and Film (1987); Madelon Sprengnether, The Spectral Mother: Freud, Feminism, and Psychoanalysis (1990); Frederick Crews, Out of My System (1975); and Graham Frankland, Freud's Literary Culture (2000).

Gender (Feminist, and Lesbian and Gay) Criticism

Gayle Greene and Coppèlia Kahn, eds., Making a Difference: Feminist Literary Criticism (1985), including an essay by Bonnie Zimmerman on lesbian criticism; Catherine Belsey and Jane Moore, eds., The Feminist Reader: Essays in Gender and the Politics of Literary Criticism (1989); Toril Moi, ed., French Feminist Thought (1987); Elizabeth A. Flynn and Patrocinio P. Schweikart, eds., Gender and Reading: Essays on Readers, Texts, and Contexts (1986); Barbara Christian, Black Feminist Criticism: Perspectives on Black Women Writers (1985); Shoshana Felman, What Does a Woman Want? Reading and Sexual Difference (1993); Robert Martin, The Homosexual Tradition in American Poetry (1979); Kathryn R. Kent, Making Girls into Women: American Women's Writing and the Rise of Lesbian Identity (2003); and Rita Felski, Literature After Feminism (2003). Henry Abelove et al., eds., The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader (1993), has only a few essays concerning literature, but it has an extensive bibliography on the topic.

Valuable reference works include Encyclopedia of Feminist Literary Theory (1997), ed. Beth Kowaleski-Wallace; The Gay & Lesbian Literary Companion, ed. Sharon Malinowski and Christa Brelin (1995); and The Gay and Lesbian Literary Heritage: A Reader's Companion to the Writers and Their Works, from Antiquity to the Present, ed. Claude J. Summers (1995). See also Summers, Gay Fictions: Wilde to Stonewall: Studies in a Male Homosexual Literary Tradition (1990); Novel Gazing: Queer Readings in Fiction, ed. Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick (1997); and Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998). For further discussion of Queer Theory, see Annamarie Jagose, Queer Theory: An Introduction (1996); Alan Sinfield, Cultural Politics—Queer Reading (1994); and Feminism Meets Queer Theory (1997), ed. Remarks about Manuscript Form

BASIC MANUSCRIPT FORM

Much of what follows is nothing more than common sense.

- Use good-quality 8 1/2δ 3 11δ paper. Make a photocopy, or if you have written on a word processor, print out a second copy, in case the instructor's copy goes astray.
- If you write on a word processor, double-space, and print on one side of the page only; set the printer for professional or best quality. If you submit handwritten copy, use lined paper and write on one side of the page only in black or dark blue ink, on every other line.
- Use one-inch margins on all sides.
- Within the top margin, put your last name and then (after hitting the space bar twice) the page number (in arabic numerals), so that the number is flush with the right-hand margin.
- On the first page, below the top margin and flush with the left-hand margin, put your full name, your instructor's name, the course number (including the section), and the date, one item per line, double-spaced.
- Center the title of your essay. Remember that the title is important—it gives the readers their first glimpse of your essay. Create your own title—one that reflects your topic or thesis. For example, a paper on Charlotte Perkins Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" should not be called "The Yellow Wallpaper" but might be called

  Disguised Tyranny in Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper"

or

How to Drive a Woman Mad

These titles do at least a little in the way of rousing a reader's interest.

• Capitalize the title thus: Begin the first word of the title with a capital letter, and capitalize each subsequent word except articles (a, an, the), conjunctions (and, but, if, when, etc.), and prepositions (in, on, with, etc.):

A Word on Behalf of Love

Notice that you do not enclose your title within quotation marks, and you do not underline it—though if it includes the title of a poem or a story, that is enclosed within quotation marks, or if it includes the title of a novel or play, that is underlined (to indicate italics), thus:

Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" and Medical Practice

and

Gender Stereotypes in Hamlet

• After writing your title, double-space, indent five spaces, and begin your first sentence.

• Unless your instructor tells you otherwise, use a staple to hold the pages together. (Do not use a stiff binder; it will only add to the bulk of the instructor's stack of papers.)

• Extensive revisions should have been made in your drafts, but minor last-minute revisions may be made—neatly—on the finished copy. Proofreading may catch some typographical errors, and you may notice some small weaknesses. You can make corrections using the following proofreader's symbols.

Corrections in the Final Copy

Changes in wording may be made by crossing through words and rewriting them:

has

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne ~~have~~ greatly diminished.

Additions should be made above the line, with a caret below the line at the appropriate place:

greatly

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has diminished.

Transpositions of letters may be made thus:

The inlfuence of Poe and Hawthorne has diminished.

Deletions are indicated by a horizontal line through the word or words to be deleted. Delete a single letter by drawing a vertical or diagonal line through it; then indicate whether the letters on either side are to be closed up by drawing a connecting arc:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatl/ly diminished.

Separation of words accidentally run together is indicated by a vertical line, closure by a curved line connecting the letters to be closed up:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has g reatly diminished.

Paragraphing may be indicated by the symbol ¶ before the word that is to begin the new paragraph:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished. v The influence of Borges has very largely replaced that of earlier writers of fantasy.

Quotations and Quotation Marks

First, a word about the point of using quotations. Don't use quotations to pad the length of a paper. Rather, give quotations from the work you are discussing so that your readers will see the material being considered and (especially in a research paper) so that your readers will know what some of the chief interpretations are and what your responses to them are.

Note: The next few paragraphs do not discuss how to include citations of pages, a topic taken up in the next appendix under the heading "How to Document: Footnotes, Internal Parenthetical Citations, and a List of Works Cited."

The Golden Rule: If you quote, comment on the quotation. Let the reader know what you make of it and why you quote it.

Additional principles:

1. Identify the speaker or writer of the quotation so that the reader is not left with a sense of uncertainty. Usually, in accordance with the principle of letting readers know where they are going, this identification precedes the quoted material, but occasionally it may follow the quotation, especially if it will provide something of a pleasant surprise. For instance, in a discussion of Flannery O'Connor's stories, you might quote a disparaging comment on one of the stories and then reveal that O'Connor herself was the speaker.

2. If the quotation is part of your own sentence, be sure to fit the quotation grammatically and logically into your sentence.

Incorrect: Holden Caulfield tells us very little about "what my lousy childhood was like."

Correct: Holden Caulfield tells us very little about what his "lousy childhood was like."

3. Indicate any omissions or additions. The quotation must be exact. Any material that you add—even one or two words—must be enclosed within square brackets, thus:

> Hawthorne tells us that "owing doubtless to the depth of the gloom at that particular spot [in the forest], neither the travellers nor their steeds were visible."

If you wish to omit material from within a quotation, indicate the ellipsis by three spaced periods enclosed within a pair of square brackets. That is, at the point where you are omitting material, type a space, an opening square bracket, a period, a space, a period, a space, a third period, and a closing square bracket (no space between the last of these three periods and the closing bracket). If you are omitting material from the end of a sentence, type a space after the last word that you quote, then an opening square bracket, a period, a space, a period, a space, a third period, the closing square bracket, and a period to indicate the end of the sentence. The following example is based on a quotation from the sentences immediately above this one:

> The instructions say, "If you [. . .] omit material from within a quotation, [you must] indicate the ellipsis [. . .]. If you are omitting material from the end of a sentence, type [. . .] and a period to indicate the end [. . .]."

Notice that although material preceded "If you," periods are not needed to indicate the omission because "If you" began a sentence in the original. Customarily, initial and terminal omissions are indicated only when they are part of the sentence you are quoting. Even such omissions need not be indicated when the quoted material is obviously incomplete—when, for instance, it is a word or phrase.

4. Distinguish between short and long quotations, and treat each appropriately. Short quotations (usually defined as fewer than five lines of typed prose or three lines of poetry) are enclosed within quotation marks and run into the text (rather than being set off, without quotation marks), as in the following example:

Hawthorne begins the story by telling us that "Young Goodman Brown came forth at sunset into the street at Salem village," thus at the outset connecting the village with daylight. A few paragraphs later, when Hawthorne tells us that the road Brown takes was "darkened by all of the gloomiest trees of the forest," he begins to associate the forest with darkness--and a very little later with evil.

If your short quotation is from a poem, be sure to follow the capitalization of the original, and use a slash mark (with a space before and after it) to indicate separate lines. Give the line numbers, if your source gives them, in parentheses, immediately after the closing quotation marks and before the closing punctuation, thus:

In "Diving into the Wreck," Adrienne Rich's speaker says that she puts on "body-armor" (5). Obviously the journey is dangerous.

To set off a long quotation (more than four typed lines of prose or more than two lines of poetry), indent the entire quotation ten spaces from the left margin. Usually, a long quotation is introduced by a clause ending with a colon—for instance, "The following passage will make this point clear:" or "The closest we come to hearing an editorial voice is a long passage in the middle of the story:" or some such lead-in. After typing your lead-in, double-space, and then type the quotation, indented and double-spaced.

5. Commas and periods go inside the quotation marks.

Chopin tells us in the first sentence that "Mrs. Mallard was afflicted with heart trouble," and in the last sentence the doctors say that Mrs. Mallard "died of heart disease."

Exception: If the quotation is immediately followed by material in parentheses or in square brackets, close the quotation, then give the parenthetic or bracketed material, and then—after closing the parenthesis or bracket—insert the comma or period.

Chopin tells us in the first sentence that "Mrs. Mallard was afflicted with heart trouble" (28), and in the last sentence the doctors say that Mrs. Mallard "died of heart disease" (29).

Semicolons, colons, and dashes go outside the closing quotation marks.

Question marks and exclamation points go inside if they are part of the quotation, outside if they are your own.

In the following passage from a student's essay, notice the difference in the position of the question marks. The first question mark is part of the quotation, so it is enclosed within the quotation marks. The second question mark, however, is the student’s, so it comes after the closing quotation marks.

> The older man says to Goodman Brown, "Sayest thou so?" Doesn’t a reader become uneasy when the man immediately adds, "We are but a little way in the forest yet"?

Quotation Marks or Underlining?

Use quotation marks around titles of short stories and other short works—that is, titles of chapters in books, essays, and poems that might not be published by themselves. Underline (to indicate italics) titles of books, periodicals, collections of essays, plays, and long poems such as The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Word processing software will let you use italic type (instead of underlining) if you wish.

A Note on the Possessive

It is awkward to use the possessive case for titles of literary works and secondary sources. Rather than “The Great Gatsby’s final chapter,” write instead “the final chapter of The Great Gatsby.” Not “The Oxford Companion to American Literature’s entry on Emerson,” but, instead, “the entry on Emerson in The Oxford Companion to American Literature.”

Writing a Research Paper

WHAT RESEARCH IS NOT, AND WHAT RESEARCH IS

Because a research paper requires its writer to collect and interpret evidence—usually including the opinions of earlier investigators—it is sometimes said that a research paper, unlike a critical essay, is not the expression of personal opinion. But such a view is unjust both to criticism and to research. A critical essay is not a mere expression of personal opinions; if it is any good, it is an argument, offering evidence that supports the opinions and thus persuades the reader of their objective rightness. And a research paper is in the final analysis largely personal, because the author continuously uses his or her own judgment to evaluate the evidence, deciding what is relevant and convincing. A research paper is not the mere presentation of what a dozen scholars have already said about a topic; it is a thoughtful evaluation of the available evidence, and so it is, finally, an expression of what the author thinks the evidence adds up to.

PRIMARY AND SECONDARY MATERIALS

The materials of literary research can be conveniently divided into two sorts, primary and secondary. The primary materials, or sources, are the real subject of study; the secondary materials are critical and historical accounts already written about these primary materials. For example, Langston Hughes wrote poems, stories, plays, and essays. For a student of Hughes, these works are the primary materials. (We include several of his works in this book.) If you want to study his ways of representing African-American speech, or his representations of whites, or his collaboration with Zora Neale Hurston, you will read the primary material— his own writings (and Hurston's, in the case of the collaborative work). But in an effort to reach a thoughtful understanding of some aspect of his work, you will also want to look at later biographical and critical studies of his works and perhaps also at scholarly writing on such topics as Black English. You may even find yourself looking at essays on Black English that do not specifically mention Hughes but that nevertheless may prove helpful.

Similarly, if you are writing about Charlotte Perkins Gilman (we include one of her stories), the primary material includes not only other stories but also her social and political writing. If you are writing about her views of medical treatment of women, you will want to look not only at the story we reprint ("The Yellow Wallpaper") but also at her autobiography. Further, you will also want to look at some secondary material, such as recent scholarly books and articles on medical treatment of women in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Locating Material: First Steps

This appendix is devoted to traditional resources. Consult the next two appendices for a detailed introduction to electronic resources.

The easiest way to locate articles and books on literature written in a modern language—that is, on a topic other than literature of the ancient world—is to consult the

MLA International Bibliography of Books and Articles in the Modern Languages and Literatures (1922–), which until 1969 was published as part of PMLA (Publications of the Modern Language Association) and since 1969 has been published separately. It is also available on CD-ROM through WilsonDisc, and in fact the disc is preferable since it is updated quarterly, whereas the print version is more than a year behind the times. Many college and university libraries also now offer the MLA International Bibliography as part of their package of online resources for research, and it is even more up-to-date.

MLA International Bibliography lists scholarly studies—books as well as articles in academic journals—published in a given year. Because of the great number of items listed, the print version of the bibliography runs to more than one volume, but material on writing in English (including, for instance, South African authors who write in English) is in one volume. To see what has been published on Langston Hughes in a given year, then, in this volume you turn to the section on American literature (as opposed to British, Canadian, Irish, and so forth), and then to the subsection labeled 1900–99, to see if anything that sounds relevant is listed.

Because your time is limited, you probably cannot read everything published on your topic. At least for the moment, therefore, you will use only the last five or ten years of this bibliography. Presumably, any important earlier material will have been incorporated into some of the recent studies listed. When you come to read these recent studies, if you find references to an article from, say, 1975 that sounds essential, of course you will read that article too.

Although MLA International Bibliography includes works on American literature, if you are doing research on an aspect of American literature you may want to begin with American Literary Scholarship (1965–).

This annual publication is noted for its broad coverage of articles and books on major and minor American writers, and is especially valuable for its frank comments on the material that it lists.

On some recent topics—for instance, the arguments for and against dropping Huckleberry Finn from high school curricula—there may be few or no books, and there may not even be material in the scholarly journals indexed in MLA International Bibliography. Popular magazines, however, such as the Atlantic Monthly, Ebony, and Newsweek—unlisted in MLA—may include some useful material. These magazines, and about 200 others, are indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature (1900–).

If you want to write a research paper on the controversy over Huckleberry Finn, or on the popular reception given to Kenneth Branagh's films of Shakespeare's Henry V, Much Ado about Nothing, and Hamlet, you can locate mate-rial (for instance, reviews of Branagh's films) through Readers' Guide. For that matter, you can also locate reviews of older films, let's say Olivier's films of Shakespeare's plays, by consulting the volumes for the years in which the films were released.

On many campuses Readers' Guide has been supplanted by

InfoTrac (1985–),

on CD-ROM. The disc is preinstalled in a microcomputer that can be accessed from a computer terminal. This index to authors and subjects in popular and scholarly magazines and in newspapers provides access to several database indexes, including

• The General Periodicals Index, available in the Academic Library Edition (about 1,100 general and scholarly periodicals) and in the Public Library Edition (about 1,100 popular magazines)

• The Academic Index (400 general-interest publications, all of which are also available in the Academic Library Edition of the General Periodicals Index)

• The Magazine Index Plus (the four most recent years of the New York Times, the two most recent months of the Wall Street Journal, and 400 popular magazines, all of which are included in the Public Library Edition of the General Periodicals Index)

• The National Newspaper Index (the four most recent years of the New York Times, the Christian Science Monitor, the Washington Post, and the Los Angeles Times)

Once again, many college and university libraries are now making available online versions of these and similar resources for research. Some students (and faculty) prefer to use the books on the shelf, but the electronic editions have significant advantages. Often, it is easier to perform "searches" using them; and in many cases they are updated well before the next print editions are published.

Other Bibliographic Aids

There are hundreds of guides to authors, publications, and reference works. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature (1997), edited by William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, provides detailed entries on authors, literary works, and many literary, historical, and cultural topics and terms, as well as suggestions for further reading. Reader's Guide to Literature in English (1996), edited by Mark Hawkins-Dady, is a massive work (nearly 1,000 pages) that gives thorough summaries of recent critical and scholarly writing on English and American authors.

How do you find such books? Two invaluable guides to reference works (that is, to bibliographies and to such helpful compilations as handbooks of mythology, place names, and critical terms) are

James L. Harner, Literary Research Guide: A Guide to Reference Sources for the Study of Literatures in English and Related Topics, 4th ed. (2002)

and

Michael J. Marcuse, A Reference Guide for English Studies (1990).

And there are guides to these guides: reference librarians. If you don't know where to turn to find something, turn to the librarian.

TAKING NOTES

Let's assume now that you have checked some bibliographies and that you have a fair number of references you must read to have a substantial knowledge of the evidence and the common interpretations of the evidence. Most researchers find it convenient, when examining bibliographies and the library catalog, to write down each reference on a 3δ ∞ 5δ index card—one title per card. On the card, put the author's full name (last name first), the exact title of the book or article, and the name of the journal (with dates and pages). Titles of books and periodicals (publications issued periodically—for example, monthly or four times a year) are underlined; titles of articles and of essays in books are enclosed in quotation marks. It's also a good idea to put the library catalog number on the card to save time if you need to get the item for a second look.

Next, start reading or scanning the materials whose titles you have collected. Some of these items will prove irrelevant or silly; others will prove valuable in themselves and also in the leads they give you to further references, which you should duly record on index cards. Notes—aside from these bibliographic notes—are best taken on larger index cards. The 3δ ∞ 5δ cards are too small for summaries of useful materials; we use 4δ ∞ 6δ cards, which allow you to record a moderate amount of information. Using these medium-sized cards rather than larger ones serves as a reminder that you need not take notes on everything. Be selective in taking notes.

Two Mechanical Aids: The Photocopier and the Word Processor

Use the photocopier to make copies of material from the library (including material that does not circulate) that you know you need, or that you might want to refer to later. But remember that sometimes it is even more efficient to

- Read the material in the library,
- Select carefully what pertains to the purpose of your research, and
- Take your notes on it.

The word processor or computer is useful not only in the final stage, to produce a neat copy, but also in the early stages of research, when you are getting ideas and taking notes. With the help of the computer, you can brainstorm ideas, make connections, organize and reorganize material, and develop (and change) outlines. This file can be a kind of creative “work space” for your research paper.

A Guide to Note-Taking

Some students use note cards—we have already mentioned that we use 4δ ∞ 6δ cards—for taking notes during the process of research. Others write on separate sheets of a notebook, or on the sheets of a yellow legal pad. Still others take their notes using a computer or word processor, and then organize and rearrange this body of material by copying and pasting, moving the notes into a coherent order. (We advise you not to delete material that, when you reread your notes, strikes you as irrelevant. It probably is irrelevant; but on the other hand, it may turn out to be valuable after all. Just put unwanted material into a file called “rejects,” or some such thing, until you have completed the paper.)

Whichever method you prefer, keep in mind the following:

• For everything you consult or read in detail, always specify the source, so that you know exactly from where you have taken a key point or a quotation.

• Write summaries (abridgments), not paraphrases (restatements).

• Quote sparingly. Remember that this is your paper—it will present your thesis, not the thesis and arguments and analyses of someone else. Quote directly only those passages that are particularly effective, or crucial, or memorable. In your finished paper these quotations will provide authority and emphasis.

• Quote accurately. After copying a quotation, check your note against the original, correct any misquotation, and then put a checkmark after your quotation to indicate that it is accurate. Verify the page number also, and then put a checkmark on your note after the page number. If a quotation runs from the bottom of, say, page 306 to the top of 307, on your note put a distinguishing mark (for instance, two parallel vertical lines after the last word of the first page) so that if you later use only part of the quotation, you will know the page on which it appeared.

Use ellipses (three spaced periods) to indicate the omission of any words within a sentence. If the omitted words are at the end of the quoted sentence, put a period where you end the sentence, and then add three spaced periods to indicate the omission:

If the . . . words are at the end of the quoted sentence, put a period where you end. . . .

Use square brackets to indicate your additions to the quotation. Here is an example:

> Here is an [uninteresting] example.

• Never copy a passage by changing an occasional word, under the impression that you are thereby putting it into your own words. Notes of this sort may find their way into your paper, your reader will sense a style other than yours, and suspicions of plagiarism may follow. (For a detailed discussion of plagiarism, see pages 1776–1777.)

• Comment on your notes as you do your work, and later as you reflect on what you have jotted down from the sources. Make a special mark—we recommend using double parentheses ((. . .)) or a different-colored pen to write, for example, "Jones seriously misreads the passage," or "Smith makes a good point but fails to see its implications." As you work, consider it your obligation to think about the material, evaluating it and using it as a stimulus to further thought.

• In the upper corner of each note card, write a brief key—for example, "Swordplay in Hamlet"—so that later you can tell at a glance what is on the note.

DRAFTING THE PAPER

The job of writing up your argument remains, but if you have taken good notes and have put useful headings on each note, you are well on your way.

• Read through the notes and sort them into packets of related material. Remove all notes that you now see are irrelevant to your paper. (Do not destroy them, however; you may want them later.) Go through the notes again and again, sorting and resorting, putting together what belongs together.

• Probably you will find that you have to do a little additional research—somehow you aren't quite clear about this or that—but after you have done this additional research, you should be able to arrange the packets into a reasonable and consistent sequence. You now have a kind of first draft, or at least a tentative organization for your paper.

• Beware of the compulsion to include every note in your essay; that is, beware of telling the reader, "A says . . .; B says . . .; C says . . ."

• You must have a point, a thesis. Make sure that you state it early, and that you keep it evident to your readers.

• Make sure that the organization is evident to the reader. When you were doing your research, and even perhaps when you were arranging your notes, you were not entirely sure where you were going; but by now, with your notes arranged into what seems to you to be the right sequence, you think you know what everything adds up to. Doubtless in the process of drafting you will make important changes in your focus, but do not abandon a draft until you think it not only says what you want to say, but says it in what seems to you to be a reasonable order. The final version of the paper should be a finished piece of work, without the inconsistencies, detours, and occasional dead ends of an early draft. Your readers should feel that they are moving toward a conclusion (by means of your thoughtful evaluation of the evidence) rather than merely reading an anthology of commentary on the topic. And so we should get some such structure as "There are three common views on. . . . The first two are represented by A and B; the third, and by far the most reasonable, is C's view that. . . . A argues . . . but. . . . The second view, B's, is based on . . . but. . . . Although the third view, C's, is not conclusive, still. . . . Moreover, C's point can be strengthened when we consider a piece of evidence that she does not make use of. . . ."

• Preface all or almost all quotations with a lead-in, such as "X concisely states the common view" or "Z, without offering any proof, asserts that . . ." Let the reader know where you are going, or, to put it a little differently, let the reader know how the quotation fits into your argument.

Quotations and summaries, in short, are accompanied by judicious analyses of your own. By the end of the paper, your readers have not only read a neatly typed paper (see pages 1764–1768) and gained an idea of what previous writers have said but also are persuaded that under your guidance they have seen the evidence, heard the arguments justly summarized, and reached a sound conclusion.

A bibliography or list of works consulted (see pages 1782–1788) is usually appended to a research paper so that readers may easily look further into the primary and secondary material if they wish; but if you have done your job well, readers will be content to leave the subject where you left it, grateful that you have set matters straight.

KEEPING A SENSE OF PROPORTION

Keep in mind the boundaries of the assignment.

• What is the length of the essay? How much time did the instructor give you in which to do it?

• How many sources did the instructor suggest that you should use? Did the instructor refer to specific kinds of sources that the paper should include—scholarly books and/or articles, other primary texts (published statements by artists, interviews with museum personnel)?

• What are the proportions of the essay? How much should consist of formal analysis, and how much of historical research and context?

For a short paper—say, two to five pages—in which you treat one or two works in a historical context, it may be sufficient if you look at two or three standard reference works. In them you will find some basic ideas—overviews of the period—and you can think about your selected works within these contexts.

For a paper of medium length, say five to ten or twelve pages, you almost surely will want to go beyond basic references. You probably will want to look into some of the works that these references cite, and your instructor presumably has given you enough time to look at them.

• Pay attention to when the books or articles were published; the most recent publications may not be the best, but they probably will give you a good sense of current thinking, and they will guide you to other recent writings.

For a long paper—say, fifteen to twenty-five pages—you will have to go beyond basic references and also beyond a few additional specialized sources. Your instructor almost surely will expect you to have read widely, so at the outset you may want to do a "subject" search in the online catalogs of your own library. But your library, unless it is a major research library, may not contain some work that, according to reference books, is especially important. Or even if your library does contain this title, it may appear as merely one more title in a long list, and you may not be aware of its importance. Before doing a search, then, consider the possibility of first checking reference books and compiling a short bibliography of titles that they cite. Then begin by looking at the titles especially recommended in reference books. If your library does not have some of these titles, request them by interlibrary loan.

How do you know when to stop? There is no simple answer. And almost everyone who has written a research paper has thought, "There still is one more source that I need to consult before I start drafting my paper." (In this respect the writer of a research paper is like a painter; it has been said painters never finish paintings, they just abandon them.) In the midst of a busy semester you need to make choices and to budget your time.

- Stop when you have acquired the historical knowledge that strengthens your analyses of works of literature—the knowledge that deepens your understanding of the works, and the knowledge that is sufficient for you to meet the specifications of the assignment.
- The paper should be your paper, a paper in which you present a thesis that you have developed, focusing on certain works. By using secondary resources you can enrich your analysis, as you place yourself in the midst of the scholarly community interested in this work or group of works. But keep a proper proportion between your thinking—again, the paper is your paper—and the thinking set forth in your sources.

Focus on Primary Sources

Remember that your paper should highlight primary sources, the materials that are your real subject (as opposed to the secondary sources, the critical and historical discussion of these primary materials). It should be, above all, your paper, a paper in which you present a thesis that you have developed about the literary work or works that you have chosen to examine. In short, you are arguing a case. By using secondary sources, you can enrich your analysis, as you place yourself in the midst of the scholarly community interested in this author or authors. But keep a judicious proportion between primary sources, which should receive the greater emphasis, and secondary sources, which should be used selectively.

To help you succeed in this balancing act, when you review your draft, mark with a red pen the quotations from and references to primary sources, and then with a blue pen do the same marking for secondary sources. If, when you scan the pages of your paper-in-progress, you see a lot more blue than red, you should change the emphasis, the proportion, to what it should be. Guard against the tendency to rely heavily on the secondary sources you have compiled. The point of view that really counts is your own.

DOCUMENTATION

What to Document: Avoiding Plagiarism

Honesty requires that you acknowledge your indebtedness for material, not only when you quote directly from a work but also when you appropriate an idea that is not common knowledge. Not to acknowledge such borrowing is plagiarism. If in doubt whether to give credit, give credit.

You ought, however, to develop a sense of what is considered common knowledge. Definitions in a dictionary can be considered common knowledge, so there is no need to say, "According to Webster, a novel is . . ." (This is weak in three ways: It's unnecessary, it's uninteresting, and it's unclear, since "Webster" appears in the titles of several dictionaries, some good and some bad.) Similarly, the date of first publication of The Scarlet Letter (1850) can be considered common knowledge. Few can give it when asked, but it can be found out from innumerable sources, and no one need get the credit for providing you with the date. The idea that Hamlet delays is also a matter of common knowledge. But if you are impressed by so-and-so's argument that Claudius has been much maligned, you should give credit to so-and-so.

Suppose that in the course of your research for a paper on Langston Hughes you happen to come across Arnold Rampersad's statement, in an essay in Voices and Visions (ed. Helen Vendler):

> Books alone could not save Hughes from loneliness, let alone give him the strength to be a writer. At least one other factor was essential in priming him for creative obsession. In the place in his heart, or psychology, vacated by his parents entered the black masses. (355)

This is an interesting idea, and in the last sentence the shift from heart to psychology is perhaps especially interesting. You certainly cannot say—with the implication that the idea and the words are your own—something like

Hughes let enter into his heart, or his psychology--a place vacated by his parents--the black masses.

The writer is simply lifting Rampersad's ideas and making only tiny changes in the wording. But even a larger change in the wording is unacceptable unless Rampersad is given credit. Here is a restatement that is an example of plagiarism even though the words differ from Rampersad's:

Hughes took into himself ordinary black people, thus filling the gap created by his mother and father.

In this version, the writer presents Rampersad's idea as if it were the writer's own—and presents it less effectively than Rampersad.

What to do? Give Rampersad credit, perhaps along these lines:

As Arnold Rampersad has said, "in the place in his heart, or his psychology" where his parents had once been, Hughes now substituted ordinary black people (355).

You can use another writer's ideas, and even some of the very words, but you must give credit, and you must use quotation marks when you quote.

You can

• Give credit and quote directly, or

• Give credit and summarize the writer's point, or

• Give credit and summarize the point but include—within quotation marks—some phrase you think is especially interesting.

How to Document: Footnotes, Internal Parenthetical Citations, and a List of Works Cited (MLA Format)

Documentation tells your reader exactly what your sources are. Until fairly recently, the standard form was the footnote, which, for example, told the reader that the source of such and such a quotation was a book by so-and-so. But in 1984 the Modern Language Association, which had established the footnote form used in hundreds of journals, university presses, and classrooms, substituted a new form. It is this newer form—parenthetical citation within the text (rather than at the foot of the page or the end of the essay)—that we will discuss at length. Keep in mind, though, that footnotes still have their uses.

Footnotes

If you are using only one source, your instructor may advise you to give the source in a footnote. (Check with your instructors to find out their preferred forms of documentation.)

Let's say that your only source is this textbook. Let's say, too, that all of your quotations will be from a single story—Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour"—printed in this book on pages 28–29. If you use a word processor, the software program can probably format the note for you. If, however, you are using a typewriter, type the digit 1 (elevated, and without a period after it) after your first reference to (or quotation from) the story, and then put a footnote at the bottom of the page, explaining where the story can be found. After your last line of text on the page, triple-space, indent five spaces from the left-hand margin, and type the arabic number 1, elevated. Do not put a period after it. Then type a statement (double-spaced) to the effect that all references are to this book.

Notice that although the footnote begins by being indented five spaces, if the note runs to more than one line the subsequent lines are given flush left.

[1]Chopin's story appears in Sylvan Barnet et al., eds. An Introduction to Literature, 14th ed. (New York: Longman, 2006), 28–29.

(If a book has more than three authors or editors, give the name of only the first author or editor, and follow it with et al., the Latin abbreviation for "and others.")

Even if you are writing a comparison of, say, two stories in this book, you can use a note of this sort. It might run thus:

[1]All page references given parenthetically within the essay refer to stories in Sylvan Barnet et al., eds. An Introduction to Literature, 14th ed. (New York: Longman, 2006).

If you use such a note, you do not need to use a footnote after each quotation that follows. You can give the citations right in the body of the paper, by putting the page references in parentheses after the quotations.

Internal Parenthetical Citations

Here we distinguish between embedded quotations (which are short, are run right into your own sentence, and are enclosed in quotation marks) and quotations that are set off on the page and are not enclosed in quotation marks (for example, three or more lines of poetry, five or more lines of typed prose).

For an embedded quotation, put the page reference in parentheses immediately after the closing quotation mark without any intervening punctuation. Then, after the parenthesis that follows the number, insert the necessary punctuation (for instance, a comma or a period):

> O'Connor begins "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" with a simple declarative sentence, "The grandmother didn't want to go to Florida" (192). O'Connor then goes on to give the grandmother's reason.

The period comes after the parenthetical citation. In the next example no punctuation comes after the first citation—because none is needed—and a comma comes after (not before or within) the second citation, because a comma is needed in the sentence:

> This is ironic because almost at the start of the story, in the second paragraph, Richards with the best of motives "hastened" (28) to bring his sad message; if he had at the start been "too late" (28), Mallard would have arrived at home first.

For a quotation that is not embedded within the text but is set off (by being indented ten spaces), put the parenthetical citation on the last line of the quotation, one space after the period that ends the quoted sentence.

Four additional points:

• The abbreviations p., pg., and pp. are not used in citing pages.

• If a story is very short, perhaps running for only a page or two, your instructor may tell you there is no need to keep citing the page reference for each quotation. Simply mention in the footnote that the story appears on, say, pages 205–206.

• If you are referring to a poem, your instructor may tell you to use parenthetical citations of line numbers rather than of page numbers. But, again, your footnote will tell the reader that the poem can be found in this book, and on what page.

• If you are referring to a play with numbered lines, your instructor may prefer that in your parenthetical citations you give act, scene, and line, rather than page numbers. Use arabic (not roman) numerals, separating the act from the scene, and the scene from the line, by periods. Here, then, is how a reference to Act 3, Scene 2, line 118 would be given:

(3.2.118)

Parenthetical Citations and List of Works Cited

Footnotes have fallen into disfavor. Parenthetical citations are now usually clarified not by means of a footnote but by means of a list, headed “Works Cited,” given at the end of the essay. In this list you give alphabetically (last name first) the authors and titles that you have quoted or referred to in the essay.

Briefly, the idea is that the reader of your paper encounters an author’s name and a parenthetical citation of pages. By checking the author’s name in Works Cited, the reader can find the passage in the book. Suppose you are writing about Kate Chopin’s “The Story of an Hour.” Let’s assume that you have already mentioned the author and the title of the story—that is, you have let the reader know the subject of the essay—and now you introduce a quotation from the story in a sentence such as this. (Notice the parenthetical citation of page numbers immediately after the quotation.)

True, Mrs. Mallard at first expresses grief when she hears the news, but soon (unknown to her friends) she finds joy in it. So, Richards’s "sad message" (28), though sad in Richards’s eyes, is in fact a happy message.

Turning to Works Cited, the reader, knowing the quoted words are by Chopin, looks for Chopin and finds the following:

> Chopin, Kate. "The Story of an Hour." An Introduction to Literature, 14th ed. Ed. Sylvan Barnet et al. New York: Longman, 2006.

Thus the essayist is informing the reader that the quoted words (“sad message”) are to be found on page 29 of this anthology.

If you have not mentioned Chopin’s name in some sort of lead-in, you will have to give her name within the parentheses so that the reader will know the author of the quoted words:

> What are we to make out of a story that ends by telling us that the leading character has died "of joy that kills" (Chopin 29)?

The closing quotation marks come immediately after the last word of the quotation; the citation and the final punctuation—in this case, the essayist’s question mark—come after the closing quotation marks.

If you are comparing Chopin’s story with Gilman’s “The Yellow Wallpaper,” in Works Cited you will give a similar entry for Gilman—her name, the title of the story, the book in which it is reprinted, and the page numbers that the story occupies.

If you are referring to several works reprinted within one volume, instead of listing each item fully, it is acceptable in Works Cited to list each item simply by giving the author’s name, the title of the work, then a period, a space, and the name of the anthologist, followed by the page numbers that the selection spans. Thus a reference to Chopin’s “The Story of an Hour” would be followed only by: Barnet 28–29. This form requires that the anthology itself be cited under the name of the first-listed editor, thus:

> Barnet, Sylvan, et al., eds. An Introduction to Literature, 14th ed. New York: Longman, 2006.

If you are writing a research paper, you will use many sources. In the essay itself you will mention an author’s name, quote or summarize from this author, and follow the quotation or summary with a parenthetical citation of the pages. In Works Cited you will give the full title, place of publication, and other bibliographic material.

Here are a few examples, all referring to an article by Joan Templeton. “The Doll House Backlash: Criticism, Feminism, and Ibsen.” The article appeared in PMLA 104 (1989): 28–40, but this information is given only in Works Cited, not within the text of the student’s essay.

If in the text of your essay you mention the author's name, the citation following a quotation (or a summary of a passage) is merely a page number in parentheses, followed by a period, thus:

> In 1989 Joan Templeton argued that many critics, unhappy with recognizing Ibsen as a feminist, sought "to render Nora inconsequential" (29).

Or:

> In 1989 Joan Templeton noted that many critics, unhappy with recognizing Ibsen as a feminist, have sought to make Nora trivial (29).

If you don't mention the name of the author in a lead-in, you will have to give the name within the parenthetical citation:

> Many critics, attempting to argue that Ibsen was not a feminist, have tried to make Nora trivial (Templeton 29).

Notice in all of these examples that the final period comes after the parenthetical citation. Exception: If the quotation is longer than four lines and is therefore set off by being indented ten spaces from the left margin, end the quotation with the appropriate punctuation (period, question mark, or exclamation mark), hit the space bar twice, and type (in parentheses) the page number. In this case, do not put a period after the citation.

Another point: If your list of Works Cited includes more than one work by an author, in your essay when you quote or refer to one or the other you'll have to identify which work you are drawing on. You can provide the title in a lead-in, thus:

> In "The Doll House Backlash: Criticism, Feminism, and Ibsen," Templeton says, "Nora's detractors have often been, from the first, her husband's defenders" (30).

Or you can provide the information in the parenthetic citation, giving a shortened version of the title. This usually consists of the first word, unless it is A, An, or The, in which case including the second word is usually enough. Certain titles may require still another word or two, as in this example:

> According to Templeton, "Nora's detractors have often been, from the first, her husband's defenders" ("Doll House Backlash" 30).

Forms of Citation in Works Cited

In looking over the following samples of entries in Works Cited, remember:

• The list of Works Cited appears at the end of the paper. It begins on a new page, and the page continues the numbering of the text.

• The list of Works Cited is arranged alphabetically by author (last name first).

• If a work is anonymous, list it under the first word of the title unless the first word is A, An, or The, in which case list it under the second word.

• If a work is by two authors, although the book is listed alphabetically under the first author's last name, the second author's name is given in the normal order, first name first.

• If you list two or more works by the same author, the author's name is not repeated but is represented by three hyphens followed by a period and a space.

• Each item begins flush left, but if an entry is longer than one line, subsequent lines in the entry are indented five spaces.

For details about almost every imaginable kind of citation, consult Joseph Gibaldi, MLA Handbook for Writers of Research Papers, 5th ed. (New York: Modern Language Association, 1999). We give here, however, information concerning the most common kinds of citations.

For citations to electronic sources, see page 1800.

Here are samples of the kinds of citations you are most likely to include in your list of Works Cited.

A book by one author:

Douglas, Ann. The Feminization of American Culture. New York: Knopf, 1977.

Notice that the author's last name is given first, but otherwise the name is given as on the title page. Do not substitute initials for names written out on the title page, but you may shorten the publisher's name—for example, from Little, Brown and Company to Little.

Take the title from the title page, not from the cover or the spine, but disregard unusual typography—for instance, the use of only capital letters or the use of & for and. Underline the title and subtitle with one continuous underline, but do not underline the period. The place of publication is indicated by the name of the city. If the city is not well known or if several cities have the same name (for instance, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Cambridge, England) the name of the state or country is added. If the title page lists several cities, give only the first.

A book by more than one author:

Gilbert, Sandra, and Susan Gubar. The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination. New Haven: Yale UP, 1979.

Notice that the book is listed under the last name of the first author (Gilbert) and that the second author's name is then given with first name (Susan) first. If the book has more than three authors, give the name of the first author only (last name first) and follow it with et al. (Latin for "and others.")

A book in several volumes:

McQuade, Donald, et al., eds. The Harper American Literature. 2nd ed. 2 vols. New York: Longman, 1994.

Pope, Alexander. The Correspondence of Alexander Pope. 5 vols. Ed. George Sherburn. Oxford: Clarendon, 1955.

The total number of volumes is given after the title, regardless of the number that you have used.

If you have used more than one volume, within your essay you will parenthetically indicate a reference to, for instance, page 30 of volume 3 thus: (3: 30). If you have used only one volume of a multivolume work—let's say you used only volume 2 of McQuade's anthology—in your entry in Works Cited write, after the period following the date, Vol. 2. In your parenthetical citation within the essay you will therefore cite only the page reference (without the volume number), since the reader will (on consulting Works Cited) understand that in this example the reference is in volume 2.

If, instead of using the volumes as a whole, you used only an independent work within one volume—say, an essay in volume 2—in Works Cited omit the abbreviation Vol. Instead, give an arabic 2 (indicating volume 2) followed by a colon, a space, and the page numbers that encompass the selection you used:

McPherson, James Alan. "Why I Like Country Music." The Harper American Literature. 2nd ed. 2 vols. New York: Longman, 1994. 2: 2304–15.

Notice that this entry for McPherson specifies not only that the book consists of two volumes, but also that only one selection ("Why I Like Country Music," occupying pages 2304–2315 in volume 2) was used. If you use this sort of citation in Works Cited, in the body of your essay a documentary reference to this work will be only to the page; the volume number will not be added.

A book with a separate title in a set of volumes:

Churchill, Winston. The Age of Revolution. Vol. 3 of A History of the English-Speaking Peoples.

New York: Dodd, 1957.

Jonson, Ben. The Complete Masques. Ed. Stephen Orgel. Vol. 4 of The Yale Ben Jonson. New Haven: Yale UP, 1969.

A revised edition of a book:

Chaucer, Geoffrey. The Riverside Chaucer. Ed. Larry Benson. 3rd ed. Boston: Houghton, 1987.

Ellmann, Richard. James Joyce. Rev. ed. New York: Oxford UP, 1982.

A reprint, such as a paperback version of an older hardcover book:

Rourke, Constance. American Humor. 1931. Garden City, New York: New York Review of Books, 2004.

Notice that the entry cites the original date (1931) but indicates that the writer is using the New York Review of Books reprint of 2004.

An edited book other than an anthology:

Keats, John. The Letters of John Keats. Ed. Hyder Edward Rollins. 2 vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard UP, 1958.

An anthology: You can list an anthology either under the editor's name or under the title.

A work in a volume of works by one author:

Sontag, Susan. "The Aesthetics of Silence." In Styles of Radical Will. New York: Farrar, 1969, 3–34.

This entry indicates that Sontag's essay, called "The Aesthetics of Silence," appears in a book of hers entitled Styles of Radical Will. Notice that the page numbers of the short work are cited (not page numbers that you may happen to refer to, but the page numbers of the entire piece).

A work in an anthology, that is, in a collection of works by several authors: Begin with the author and the title of the work you are citing, not with the name of the anthologist or the title of the anthology. The entry ends with the pages occupied by the selection you are citing:

Ng, Fae Myenne. "A Red Sweater." Charlie Chan Is Dead: An Anthology of Contemporary Asian American Fiction. Ed. Jessica Hagedorn. New York: Penguin, 1993. 358–68.

Normally, you will give the title of the work you are citing (probably an essay, short story, or poem) in quotation marks. If you are referring to a book-length work (for instance, a novel or a full-length play), underline it to indicate italics. If the work is translated, after the period that follows the title, write Trans.

and give the name of the translator, followed by a period and the name of the anthology.

If the collection is a multivolume work and you are using only one volume, in Works Cited you will specify the volume, as in the example (page 1783) of McPherson's essay. Because the list of Works Cited specifies the volume, your parenthetical documentary reference within your essay will specify (as mentioned earlier) only the page numbers, not the volume. Thus, although McPherson's essay appears on pages 2304–2315 in the second volume of a two-volume work, a parenthetical citation will refer only to the page numbers because the citation in Works Cited specifies the volume.

Remember that the pages specified in the entry in your list of Works Cited are to the entire selection, not simply to pages you may happen to refer to within your paper.

If you are referring to a reprint of a scholarly article, give details of the original publication, as in the following example:

Mack, Maynard. "The World of Hamlet." Yale Review 41 (1952): 502–23. Rpt. in Hamlet. By William Shakespeare. Ed. Sylvan Barnet. New York: Penguin Putnam, 1998. 265–87.

Two or more works in an anthology: If you are referring to more than one work in an anthology, in order to avoid repeating all the information about the anthology in each entry in Works Cited, under each author's name (in the appropriate alphabetical place) give the author and title of the work, then a period, a space, and the name of the anthologist, followed by the page numbers that the selection spans. Thus, a reference to Shakespeare's Hamlet would be followed only by rather than by a full citation of Barnet's anthology. This form requires that the anthology itself also be listed, under Barnet.

Two or more works by the same author: Notice that the works are given in alphabetical order (Fables precedes Fools) and that the author's name is not repeated but is represented by three hyphens followed by a period and a space. If the author is the translator or editor of a volume, the three hyphens are followed not by a period but by a comma, then a space, then the appropriate abbreviation (Trans. or Ed.), then the title:

Frye, Northrop. Fables of Identity: Studies in Poetic Mythology. New York: Harcourt, 1963.

---. Fools of Time: Studies in Shakespearean Tragedy. Toronto: U of Toronto P, 1967.

A translated book:

Gogol, Nikolai. Dead Souls. Trans. Andrew McAndrew. New York: New American Library, 1961.

If you are discussing the translation itself, as opposed to the book, list the work under the translator's name. Then put a comma, a space, and "trans." After the period following "trans." skip a space, then give the title of the book, a period, a space, and then "By" and the author's name, first name first. Continue with information about the place of publication, publisher, and date, as in any entry to a book.

An introduction, foreword, or afterword, or other editorial apparatus:

Fromm, Erich. Afterword. 1984. By George Orwell. New American Library, 1961.

Usually a book with an introduction or some such comparable material is listed under the name of the author of the book rather than the name of the author of the editorial material (see the citation to Pope on page 1783). But if you are referring to the editor's apparatus rather than to the work itself, use the form just given.

Words such as preface, introduction, afterword, and conclusion are capitalized in the entry but are neither enclosed within quotation marks nor underlined.

A book review: First, here is an example of a review that does not have a title.

Vendler, Helen. Rev. of Essays on Style. Ed. Roger Fowler. Essays in Criticism 16 (1966): 457–63.

If the review has a title, give the title after the period following the reviewer's name, before "Rev." If the review is unsigned, list it under the first word of the title, or the second word if the first word is A, An, or The. If an unsigned review has no title, begin the entry with "Rev. of" and alphabetize it under the title of the work being reviewed.

An encyclopedia: The first example is for a signed article, the second for an unsigned article.

Lang, Andrew. "Ballads." Encyclopaedia Britannica. 1910 ed.

"Metaphor." The New Encyclopaedia Britannica: Micropaedia. 1974 ed.

An article in a scholarly journal: Some journals are paginated consecutively; that is, the pagination of the second issue picks up where the first issue left off. Other journals begin each issue with a new page 1. The forms of the citations in Works Cited differ slightly.

First, the citation of a journal that uses continuous pagination:

Burbick, Joan. "Emily Dickinson and the Economics of Desire." American Literature 58 (1986): 361–78.

This article appeared in volume 58, which was published in 1986. (Notice that the volume number is followed by a space, then by the year in parentheses, and then by a colon, a space, and the page numbers of the entire article.) Although each volume consists of four issues, you do not specify the issue number when the journal is paginated continuously.

For a journal that paginates each issue separately (a quarterly journal will have four page 1's each year), give the issue number directly after the volume number and a period, with no spaces before or after the period:

Spillers, Hortense J. "Martin Luther King and the Style of the Black Sermon." The Black Scholar 3.1 (1971): 14–27.

An article in a weekly, biweekly, or monthly publication:

McCabe, Bernard. "Taking Dickens Seriously." Commonweal 14 May 1965: 24.

Notice that the volume number and the issue number are omitted for popular weeklies or monthlies such as Time and Atlantic.

An article in a newspaper: Because newspapers usually consist of several sections, a section number may precede the page number. The example indicates that an article begins on page 3 of section 2 and is continued on a later page:

Wu, Jim. "Authors Praise New Forms." New York Times 8 Mar. 1996, sec. 2: 3+.

You may also have occasion to cite something other than a printed source, for instance, a lecture. Here are the forms for the chief nonprint sources.

An interview:

Saretta, Howard. Personal interview. 3 Nov. 1998.

A lecture:

Heaney, Seamus. Lecture. Tufts University. 15 Oct. 1998.

A television or radio program:

60 Minutes. CBS. 25 Jan. 2004.

A film or videotape:

Modern Times. Dir. Charles Chaplin. United Artists, 1936.

A recording:

Frost, Robert. "The Road Not Taken." Robert Frost Reads His Poetry. Caedmon, TC 1060, 1956.

A performance:

The Cherry Orchard. By Anton Chekhov. Dir. Ron Daniels. American Repertory Theatre, Cambridge, Mass. 3 Feb. 1994.

New Approaches to the Research Paper: Literature, History, and the World Wide Web

> To err is human but to really foul things up requires a computer.

The previous appendix describes the traditional model and methods for writing a literary research paper. But literary research has become more wide-ranging and complicated, and a book like this one needs to devote another section to it to take into account important changes in the field of literary study and developments in technology.

Students in both literature and composition courses are now often asked to work with historical and literary materials and to demonstrate skills in interdisciplinary learning—and this educational change has taken place on the introductory as well as the intermediate and advanced levels. Like other fields, literary study is supplementing printed texts with electronic search tools, databases, and resources; literary analysis, writing, and research increasingly take place as much on the World Wide Web as in the library, and, in some cases, through e-mail and e-mail lists devoted to specific subject areas.

Historical research, enriched by resources on the Internet, can be very rewarding; it opens up new lines of inquiry as it teaches us about the contexts for literary works and enables us to respond to them in more complex ways. But we need the right strategies to perform this research effectively. Students in literature and composition must now possess the insight and understanding to explore, and to make good choices when consulting the ever-multiplying amounts of information available.

CASE STUDY ON LITERATURE AND HISTORY: THE INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE-AMERICANS

The best means of illustrating the new approach to literature and history, and outlining the process for identifying new kinds of resources, is through a case study. For this purpose we have chosen the literature and history of the internment of Japanese-Americans during World War II. This is a subject for research that a student might select or be assigned in a variety of courses—an introduction to literature in which a group of contemporary poems are studied, with some of them related in subject; a first-year writing course in which the subject is the literature of American immigration; a course in American or Asian-American literature; a course in multicultural literature or in American literature since World War II; or a senior seminar that examines twentieth-century literature and history, types of ethnic and minority literatures, or poetry and politics.

Many books, articles, and conferences have been devoted to the internment, and we can hardly do it justice here. This discussion describes the type of inquiry into the subject that you can undertake, beginning with the analysis of literary texts and moving outward from it into history as well as print and electronic sources.

LITERARY TEXTS

Reprinted here are two poems. The first is Mitsuye Yamada's "The Question of Loyalty," from Camp Notes and Other Poems (1992); the second is David Mura's "An Argument: On 1942," from After We Lost Our Way (1989).

MITSUYE YAMADA

Mitsuye Yamada, the daughter of Japanese immigrants to the United States, was born in Japan in 1923, during her mother's return visit to her native land. She was raised in Seattle, but in 1942 she and her family were incarcerated and then relocated to an internment camp in Idaho. This was the result of Executive Order 9066, signed by President Franklin Roosevelt in February 1942. This order, in the aftermath of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, gave military authorities the right to remove any and all persons from "military areas." In 1954 Yamada became an American citizen. In addition to Camp Notes and Other Poems, she has written Desert Run: Poems and Stories (1988) and edited Sowing TI Leaves: Writings by Multicultural Women (1991).

The Question of Loyalty [1976]

I met the deadline for alien registration
once before was numbered fingerprinted and ordered not to travel without permit.
But alien still they said I must forswear allegiance to the emperor.
for me that was easy
I didn't even know him
but my mother who did cried out
If I sign this
What will I be?
I am doubly loyal

to my American children

also to my own people.

How can double mean nothing?

I wish no one to lose this war.

Everyone does.

I was poor

at math.

I signed

my only ticket out.

David Mura

David Mura is a sansei, a third-generation Japanese-American. He was born in 1952, seven years after the end of the war. In both poetry and prose, he has examined race, ethnicity, and sexuality, and has described his quest for self-knowledge and personal and familial identity. A Male Grief: Notes on Pornography and Addiction (1987) was his first book. Two years later he published After We Lost Our Way in the National Poetry Series, and followed it with a second book of verse, The Colors of Desire: Poems (1995). He has also written Turning Japanese: Memoirs of a Sansei (1992) and Where the Body Meets Memory: An Odyssey of Race, Sexuality, and Identity (1996), which tells of his childhood in Chicago, his parents' recollections of the internment camps, and the impact of internment on several generations of Japanese-Americans.

An Argument: On 1942 [1989]

For my mother

Near Rose's Chop Suey and Jinosuke's grocery, the temple where incense hovered and inspired dense evening chants (prayers for Buddha's mercy, colorless and deep), that day he was fired . . .

—No, no, no, she tells me. Why bring it back?

The camps are over. (Also overly dramatic.)

Forget shoyu-stained furoshiki,° mochi° on a stick:

You're like a terrier, David, gnawing a bone, an old, old trick . . .

Mostly we were bored. Women cooked and sewed, men played blackjack, dug gardens, a benjo° . . .
Who noticed barbed wire, guards in the towers?
We were children, hunting stones, birds, wild flowers.
Yes, Mother hid tins of tsukemono° and eel beneath the bed. And when the last was peeled, clamped tight her lips, growing thinner and thinner.
But cancer not the camps made her throat blacker
. . .And she didn't die then . . . after the war, in St. Paul, you weren't even born. Oh, I know, I know, it's all part of your job, your way, but why can't you glean how far we've come, how much I can't recall—David, it was so long ago—how useless it seems . . .

Your goal is eventually to move to historical research, but first you must know the poems well. Reflect on the movement of each: how it begins, what occupies its middle sections, and how it ends. Consider the relationship of the structure—the length of the lines, the organization of the stanzas, the diction and imagery—to the dramatic situation and themes.

• For this analysis, reread the discussions of speaker, structure, figurative language, and other key terms presented in Chapter 16 of this book.

Yamada focuses on the conflict her mother experiences. The mother expresses her loyalty to her children, to her American children, even as she cherishes her loyalty to her own people, the Japanese (though this word, revealingly, is not used). She wants there to be no loser in the war; she hopes for an impossible stalemate, in which neither side loses.

The war thus manifests itself in the mother's own identity, in the tension between the person she has been and the person, it seems, she must become. If the mother signs the form forswearing allegiance to the Japanese emperor, she will be denying her ancestry, forced to disclaim one-half of herself. She cannot be who she is.

Mura describes the conflict between his mother and himself and delves into the struggle that his mother wages with her memories. Unlike Yamada, Mura was not in the camps himself; he is seeking knowledge about an experience that took place before he was born.

The mother objects to her son's efforts to make her remember: "You're like a terrier, David, gnawing a bone, an old, old trick." But as her own listing of details shows, the mother, if only to herself, has continued to linger over the internment—the men playing blackjack, the barbed wire. She says there is much she cannot recall, but one feels that there is much that remains keenly present for her, much that she could recall and has recalled.

The mother portrayed in this poem cannot practice the lesson she gives to her son. Nor will he allow her to. He is curious to know what happened; he wants his mother to tell about her experiences and, one suspects, to explain why she and the others did not resist then and have not spoken out since.

These are powerful poems even for a reader who knows only a little about the historical facts to which Yamada and Mura bear witness—a reader who knows only in a general way that many Japanese-Americans were forced during World War II to leave their West Coast homes and live in internment camps in the California desert, in other western states, and as far east as Arkansas. But the poems become still more effective for a reader who knows in depth and detail about this episode in American history, and who can bring this knowledge to a reading of the texts and present it in an analytical research paper.

One form of historical research is to follow a traditional route for literary research. The literary resources and methods described in Appendix B can lead to secondary sources on the authors and their writings and to information about their careers, the work they have done, and its major themes. There will be historical information in many of these sources, particularly those of a recent date.

By checking in the MLA International Bibliography (see page 1770), you can locate items such as the following:

Through electronic access and interlibrary loan, a student can obtain almost any source, even if it is not carried by a library on campus. But sometimes interlibrary loan can take a few days, a week, or more. Remember the importance of starting early on research projects. Request copies of everything while there is still time before the deadline to examine them.

HISTORICAL SOURCES

The sources in the MLA International Bibliography, while promising, may take for granted more than you know at this stage; the discussion and analysis presented in them assumes that readers already have the background that you are seeking to acquire. How can you begin to acquire a base of historical knowledge?

Start small. Don’t overwhelm yourself with more information than you can handle. Keep in mind as well that you are not aiming to become a historian, but, instead, to enrich your literary explorations with knowledge drawn from another field and set of sources.

Basic Reference Books (Short Paper)

It is best to begin with basic reference books, and you can get to them by consulting the following:

Balay, Robert. Guide to Reference Books, 11th ed. Chicago: American Library Association, 1996.

Blazek, Ron, and Elizabeth Aversa. The Humanities: A Selective Guide to Information Sources, 5th ed. Englewood, Colo.: Libraries Unlimited, 2000.

This is an annotated guide to research sources in literature, art, and other fields in the humanities.

Or, consult ARBA Guide to Subject Encyclopedias and Dictionaries (1986); and First Stop: The Master Index to Subject Encyclopedias (1989).

Or, in the online library catalog, check under the subject heading, "history—dictionaries." (You can do the same thing for literature, for titles of reference works in that field.)

You can also refer to Jules R. Benjamin, A Student's Guide to History, 9th ed. (2002); and James R. Bracken, Reference Works in British and American Literature, 2nd ed. (1998). See also James L. Harner, Literary Research Guide, 4th ed. (2002).

Browse in the reference section of your school's library, or, better still, talk to a reference librarian—he or she can be a valuable resource and often can direct you quickly to helpful books.

In reply to the question, "Where can I find out about the internment of Japanese-Americans during World War II?" the reference librarian recommended to us The Reader's Companion to American History, ed. Eric Foner and John A. Garraty (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1991), which includes an entry (pages 558–589) on this subject, three paragraphs in length, titled "Japanese American Relocation."

For a short paper of three pages that treats one or both of the poems and provides some historical context, this entry may be all that you need. It reports what happened, where, and why; emphasizes the outrage done to civil liberties; and highlights an aspect of camp experience that bears on Yamada's and Mura's poems: "Generational conflict beset the internees . . ." (589). You can relate this comment to the differences and struggles between the generations that Yamada and Mura evoke. Here, you have an historical detail that you can develop in your examination of the poems and, if the assignment were a longer one calling for extensive research, that you could make the organizing principle for gathering and then sifting through sources.

Remind yourself of the boundaries of the assignment.

• What is the length of the essay? Its due date?

• How many sources did the instructor state that you should use? Did he or she refer to specific kinds of sources that the paper should include—scholarly books and/or articles, other primary sources (literary texts, letters, autobiographies, journals), photographs, and so on?

• The proportions of the essay? How much of it should consist of literary analysis, and how much of historical research and context?

• It is important to gain basic knowledge of the subject, so that you have a clear, accurate answer to your core question—in this case, What was the internment? But, at the same time, seek to locate in the overview of the subject an idea or issue that is connected to the themes of the specific literary works. Connect the literature and the history.

Getting Deeper (Medium Paper)

The entry in The Reader's Companion to American History has limitations. It is brief, lacks a bibliography, and a cross-reference leads to an entry on World War II that supplies no further information about the internment. The brief account (under the entry "Asian Americans") in The Oxford Companion to United States History, ed. Paul S. Boyer (New York: Oxford University Press, 2001) also may fall short of giving you the range and depth of information that you need.

For a medium-length paper, you will need to search elsewhere for more information and, if you require it, for a bibliography. Here are several good sources we located; we found the first two by browsing in the reference section of the library, and the third resulted from a suggestion by the reference librarian there.

Encyclopedia of the United States in the Twentieth Century. Stanley I. Kutler, general editor. 5 vols. New York: Scribner's, 1996.

Harvard Encyclopedia of American Ethnic Groups. Ed. Stephan Thernstrom. Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1980.

Oxford Companion to World War II, general editor, I. C. B. Dear, consultant editor, M. R. D. Foot. New York: Oxford UP, 1995.

Like The Reader's Companion to American History, the Oxford Companion to World War II is recent, prepared by eminent scholars, and published by a reputable press. It is a trustworthy source, and its signed entry on "Japanese-Americans" (632–634) is longer and more detailed than the entry in The Reader's

Companion; it is cross-referenced to a general entry on "internment" and identifies three books for further reading:

Daniels, Roger. Asian America: Chinese and Japanese in the United States since 1850 (Seattle, Wash., 1988).

———. Concentration Camps USA (New York, 1971).

Takaki, Ronald. Strangers from a Different Shore: A History of Asian Americans (Boston, 1989).

Now you can start to compile a bibliography of your own, with these three books as its foundation. But—here is a key point—note their dates of publication. No doubt these are good sources, but you should be seeking more recent sources as well to make certain that your knowledge is as up-to-date as possible.

The section on the wartime internment of Japanese Americans in Harvard Encyclopedia is part of a long essay devoted to the history of the Japanese in America (561–571). The author, Harry H. L. Kitano, notes at one point:

> In the camps all Japanese, whether highly educated, wealthy, illiterate, or poor, were housed in barracks, ate mess-hall food, and received the same rates of pay for work—$16 a month for manual labor and $19 for professional work. They used communal toilets, took communal showers, waited patiently in line for everything; they wore identical clothes, and the sun, wind, and dust soon endowed them with the same concentration-camp complexion. (566)

Kitano helps you grasp the historical setting for Mura's poem, and the next part of his discussion pertains to it and to Yamada's poem even more directly:

> The most difficult problem proved to be the boredom and monotony of camp life; it exacerbated tensions and magnified irritations, resulting in fights, riots, strikes, and even homicides. Inmates complained constantly about the food, their neighbors, living conditions, and camp administrators. Conflicts between the Issei [Japanese-born Americans—the first or immigrant generation] and Nisei [American-born Japanese—the second generation] added to the strain. Ideological arguments between those loyal to Japan and those who stood with the United States grew heated. The derogatory term inu [dog] was applied to those suspect of being spies or government collaborators, and some of the inu were the victims of severe beatings. (566)

"Mostly we were bored," recalls Mura's mother, touching on an aspect of life in the camps that Kitano stresses in his historical survey. Kitano makes clear how real and pervasive were the differences between generations, between parents and children. He concludes:

> Family life was disrupted: the authority of the provider-father and the housekeeper-mother was undercut by government supervision; children ate in mess halls rather than in the family circle. They were stifled in an atmosphere of boredom and stagnation. Gambling became a problem, and petty family quarrels often escalated into violence. (567)

Now you can really begin to see the analytical value of historical sources. Details like these make one wonder if part of the effect of Mura's poem lies in what we sense the mother is trying not to remember—the fact, for example, that the men playing blackjack were doing something that not only distracted them but that caused a serious problem in the camps. She acknowledges that life was boring, but possibly the boredom was even graver than she reveals to her son—a boredom that led to arguments among family members and to violence.

Our historical research teaches us about the contexts for the Yamada and Mura poems and alerts us to the power and precision of details that the poets include. Sometimes, too, it helps us sense the pressure of feelings and thoughts that a writer or speaker is excluding, is holding back or reacting against. The more we learn about the camps, the more we can perceive what Mura's mother is referring to and what, on some level, she might be struggling to keep from speaking about.

Kitano's chapter ends with a bibliographic essay that will give you additional items for your bibliography:

A Review of Researching a Literary-History Paper

- Consult a range of reference books as you are getting launched on a literary-historical paper—it will take less time than you think, and it will be time invested wisely.
- Pay attention to when the books were published and how up-to-date they are in their suggestions for additional reading.
- Even as you acquire familiarity with the subject in general, take special note of where the historical record makes connections to the literature that you are studying. The reward comes when you can perceive the relationship between history and the structure and themes of the literary works.

U TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

In Prisoners Without Trial, Roger Daniels states:

> There were no individual cooking facilities. Everyone ate in the mess hall. Three times a day, prisoners lined up with trays to receive wholesome, starchy, cheap food, not usually prepared in the most appetizing manner. . . . Almost everyone complained about the food, but what the mess halls did to family relationships was worse. Youngsters tended to eat in groups and move around from mess hall to mess hall. The dislocation of the family meal was but another way in which the detention process eroded the dignity and authority of parents. (67)

Write a page or so in which you connect Daniels's description to details that Mura includes in "An Argument: On 1942." Through your commentary show how the historical context enhances the reader's response to and understanding of the poem.

Other Reference Sources (Long Paper)

If your literary-historical research needs to be extended further—say, for a term paper of fifteen or twenty pages—then you will have to make use of other tools for locating historical sources. The items in the MLA International Bibliography and the suggestions for further reading given in reference books will lead you to other literary and historical materials.

If the paper requires sustained research, a good next step might be to perform a "subject" search in the online card catalogs of your own and other research libraries. It is always tempting to do a search by subject first, before anything else and without bothering to check reference books. Although convenient, this method has disadvantages. Your subject search for Japanese-American internment might not turn up Daniels's 1993 book at all—maybe your library does not own it. Or, if it does, this book might be in the middle of a long subject list: You would not know that it has been praised as an "essential" source and that, given that you must make choices, you would be better off zeroing in on this source than others on the list.

- When you check the online catalog for one of the books already on your bibliography, you will see on the entry the subject category for it. You can then use this category for your more complete subject search. The librarian can also assist you in identifying the phrases for the subject you are researching;

the Library of Congress Subject Headings (LCSH) is another resource.

Too Much Information?

At this point, you may be wondering, "How do I know when to stop?" A good question, but not one with a simple answer. We have known students who have become gripped by a subject and have read everything they can about it. But however excited about a subject you become, in the midst of a busy semester you will need to make choices and budget your time.

• How do I know when to stop? Stop when you have acquired the historical knowledge that strengthens your analysis of the literary texts, the knowledge that deepens your understanding of the issues that the authors have treated, and the knowledge that is sufficient for you to meet the terms (that is, the boundaries) of the assignment.

ELECTRONIC SOURCES

Encyclopedias: Print and Electronic Versions

Encyclopedias can give you the basics about a subject, but like all resources, they have limitations. An encyclopedia may not cover the subject that you are researching or not cover it in adequate depth. Knowledge expands rapidly, and because it does, even a good encyclopedia lags somewhat behind current scholarship. A number of encyclopedias are now in CD-ROM form, and the CD makes searches for information easier. Many such encyclopedias are linked to the World Wide Web, where updated information and links to reference and research resources are listed. Be sure to check with the librarians at your school; they can tell you about the kinds of resources that are available. If your library offers a tutorial on the use of electronic and Internet resources, we recommend that you sign up for it. We take such tutorials ourselves with our students every year and are always surprised by the new resources we learn about.

It is helpful to have updated information and links, but only when they are reliable. Remember to be a critical user of reference materials. Not everything is of equal value, and we must make good judgments about the sources we consult—and whether or not we can depend on them for reliable, accurate information. More on this point in a moment.

The Internet/World Wide Web

Because of the ease of using the Internet, with its access to electronic mail (e-mail), newsgroups, mailing lists, and, especially, sites and links on the World Wide Web, many students now make it their first—and, unfortunately, too often their only—resource for research.

As we noted a moment ago, all of us must be critical users of the materials we find on the WWW. The WWW is up-to-date and out-of-date, helpful and disappointing. It can be a researcher's dream come true, but also a source of errors and a time-waster.

Keeping this point in mind, we recommend to students that for each WWW site they consult, they should consult at least two print sources.

EVALUATING SOURCES ON THE WORLD WIDE WEB

For sources on the World Wide Web, as with print sources, you must evaluate what you have located and gauge how much or how little it will contribute to your literary analysis and argument. In the words of one reference librarian, Joan Stockard (formerly of Wellesley College), "The most serious mistake students make when they use the Internet for research is to assume everything is of equal (and acceptable) quality. They need to establish who wrote the material, the qualifications of the author to write on the topic, whether any bias is likely, how current the information is, and how other resources compare."

A Review for Using the World Wide Web

Focus the topic of your research as precisely as you can before you embark on a WWW search. Lots of surfing and browsing can sometimes turn up good material, but using the WWW without a focus can prove distracting and unproductive. It takes you away from library research (where the results might be better) and from the actual planning and writing of the paper.

Ask the following questions:

- Does this site or page look like it can help me in my assignment?
- Whose site or page is this?
- Who is the intended audience?
- What is the point of view? Are there signs of a specific slant or bias?
- How good is the detail, depth, and quality of the material presented?
- Is the site well constructed and well organized?

- Is the text well written?
- Can the information be corroborated or supported by print sources?
- When was the site or page made available? Has it been recently revised or updated?
- Can the person or institution, company, or agency responsible for this site or page receive e-mail comments, questions, and criticisms?

DOCUMENTATION: CITING A WWW SOURCE

Scholars and reference librarians have not reached a consensus about the correct form—what should be included, and in what order—for the citation of WWW sources. But all agree on two principles: (1) Give as much information as you can; (2) make certain that your readers can retrieve the source themselves, which means that you should check the URL (that is, the WWW address) carefully. For accuracy's sake, it is a good idea to copy the URL from the location line of your browser and paste it into your list of works cited.

Citing World Wide Web Sources

Provide the following information:

- Author
- Title
- Publication information
- Title of archive or database
- Date (if given) when the site was posted; sometimes termed the "revision" or "modification" date
- Name of institution/organization that supports or is associated with this site
- Date that you accessed this source
- URL

Many Web sites and pages, however, are not prepared according to the style and form in which you want to cite them. Sometimes the name of the author is unknown, and other information may be missing or hard to find as well. Nor can you be certain that the site will exist at this URL (or at all) when your readers attempt to access it. These difficulties aside, perhaps the main point to remember is that a source on the WWW is as much a source as is a book or article that you can track down and read in the library. If you have made use of it, you must acknowledge that you have done so and include the bibliographical information, as fully as you can, in your list of Works Cited for the paper.

The Wellesley College Library offers a valuable site for searching the WWW, evaluating what you find there, and citing WWW sources correctly:

<http://www.wellesley.edu/Library/Research/search.html>

The Modern Language Association recommends the following conventions:

Publication Dates For sources taken from the Internet, include the date the source was posted to the Internet or last updated or revised; give also the date the source was accessed.

Uniform Resource Locators Include a full and accurate URL for any source taken from the Internet (with access-mode identifier—http, ftp, gopher, or telnet). Enclose URLs in angle brackets (<>). When a URL continues from one line to the next, break it only after a slash or before a period. Do not add a hyphen.

When citing electronic sources, follow the formatting conventions illustrated by the following models.

Literary Research: Print and Electronic Resources

THE BASICS

It's a good idea to have on your desk a reliable, one-volume dictionary, such as Encarta: World English Dictionary (1999) or The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language, 4th ed. (2000). Such a dictionary will give you word histories as well as definitions, and will provide information about classical myths and many historical events and figures.

Still other students log in to the online resources of their library's reference collection, with its range of dictionaries and encyclopedias, all of which can be accessed quickly during the paper writing and research process.

MOVING AHEAD: FINDING SOURCES FOR RESEARCH WORK

The more you gain experience as a student and writer in literature courses, the more you will want to know in-depth about reference and bibliographical works for your field. We described a number of print and electronic sources in Appendixes B and C. Here is a supplementary list and guide that will direct you to yet more resources in both print and electronic forms.

Not all of these, to be sure, will be relevant for your paper writing and research in a first-year course on literature and composition. But we hope you will see this material as a guide you can turn to when needed, whether for an assignment in a first-year course or in an intermediate or advanced course later on.

Feel free to jot down on the top or bottom of the page or in the margins the titles of other resources, in print or online, that you have found helpful when you worked on a project and that you want to remember.

And speak with a member of your library's reference staff, who can tell you more about the print and online sources that are available to you.

LITERATURE— PRINT REFERENCE SOURCES

Oxford University Press has published many volumes in its Companion reference series, quite a few of them keyed to literary subjects. Each title begins with the words The Oxford Companion to ....

The series includes: African American Literature (1997), American Literature (6th ed., 1995), American Theater (2nd ed., 1992), English Language (1992), English Literature (6th ed., rev., 2000), Theater (4th ed., 1983), Twentieth-Century Literature in English (1996), Twentieth-Century Poetry in English (1994), and Women's Writing in the United States (1995).

There are also Oxford Companion volumes for Australian Literature (2nd ed., 1994), the Bible (1993), Canadian Literature (1983), Children's Literature (1984), Classical Literature (1989), Film (1976), German Literature (3rd ed., 1997), Irish Literature (1996), Literature in French (1995), and Spanish Literature (1978).

Cambridge University Press publishes many reference books, including its Cambridge Guide series; each title begins with the words *The Cambridge Guide to....*The series includes African and Caribbean Theatre (1994), American Theatre (1993), Asian Theatre (1993), Literature in English (1988), and Theatre (1992).

WHAT DOES YOUR OWN INSTITUTION OFFER?

We'll mention again that many colleges and universities now offer as part of their resources for research a wide range of electronic materials and databases. At Wellesley College, for example, the library offers a detailed list of research resources, and there is another listing arranged according to department and interdisciplinary program. Some of these are open or free sites, available to anyone with a connection to the WWW. But others are by "subscription only," which means that only members of this academic community can access them.

Sign up for a library tutorial at your own school, and browse in and examine both the library's home page and the online catalog's options and directories.

One of the best research sites, to which many libraries subscribe, is the FirstSearch commercial database service.

FirstSearch enables you to find books, articles, theses, films, computer software, and other types of material for just about any field, subject, or topic. Its categories include:

Arts & Humanities

Business & Economics

Conferences & Proceedings

Consumer Affairs & People

Education

Engineering & Technology

General & Reference

General Science

Life Sciences

Medicine & Health

News & Current Events

Public Affairs & Law

Social Sciences

Within these categories, you will find a number of useful databases and resources. Make your "search" as focused as possible: Look for materials that bear on the topic that you are writing about, and, even more, that show a connection to the thesis that you are working to develop and demonstrate. Learn from what you find, but approach it critically: Is this source a good one? What are its strengths, and what are (or might be) its limitations? Keep in mind too that you engage in the process of selecting good sources in order to strengthen your topic and thesis. The quotations you give from the sources are there to support your ideas and insights. Above all your reader is interested in what you have to say.

Writing Essay Examinations

WHY DO INSTRUCTORS GIVE EXAMINATIONS?

Perhaps an understanding of the nature of essay examinations will help you to write better essays.

Examinations not only measure learning and thinking, but also stimulate them. Even so humble an examination as a short-answer quiz—chiefly a device to oblige students to do the assigned reading—is a sort of push designed to move students forward. Of course, internal motivation is far superior to external, but even such crude external motivation as a quiz can have a beneficial effect. Students know this; indeed, they often will say that they have chosen to take a particular course "because I want to know something about . . . and I know that I won't do the reading on my own." (Teachers often teach a new course for the same reason; we want to become knowledgeable about, say, Asian-American literature, and we know that despite our lofty intentions we may not seriously confront the subject unless we are under the pressure of facing a class.)

In short, examinations help students to acquire learning and then to convert learning into thinking. Sometimes it is not until preparing for the final examination that students—rereading the chief texts and classroom notes—perceive what the course was really about; until this late stage, the trees obscure the forest, but now, in the process of the reviewing and sorting things out, a pattern emerges. The experience of reviewing and then of writing an examination, though fretful, can be highly exciting as connections are made and ideas take on life.

GETTING READY

The night before the examination you will almost certainly feel that you don't know this, that, and the other thing, and you may feel that nothing short of reading all of the assignments—an impossibility, of course—can get you through the test. If indeed you have not done the reading, this feeling is warranted. The best preparation for an examination is not a panicky turning of hundreds of pages the night before the test; rather, the best preparation is to

- keep up with the reading throughout the term, and to annotate the text while reading,
- make connections among the works you study from one week to the next,
- participate in class discussion, and
- annotate the text during the class discussions.

If you engage in these practices, you will not only be preparing for the examination, but you will also be getting more out of the course—more knowledge and more pleasure—than if you come to class unprepared.

Nevertheless, however well prepared you are, you will want to do some intensive preparation shortly before the final examination. We suggest that you may want to reread Chapters 2, 3, 7 (all on fiction), 13, 21 (both on poetry), 29 and 33 (both on drama), because these chapters discuss not only the genres but also the job of writing essays about them.

WRITING ESSAY ANSWERS

Let's assume that before the examination you have read the assigned material, marked the margins of your books, made summaries of the longer readings and of the classroom comments, reviewed everything carefully, and had a decent night's sleep. Now you are facing the examination sheet.

Here are some suggestions:

1. Before you write anything on the examination booklet beyond your name, read the entire examination. Something in the last question—maybe even a passage that is quoted—may give you an idea that will help you when you write your answer to the first question.
2. Budget your time. If the first question is worth 25%, give it about one-fourth of your time, not half the allotted time. On the other hand, do not provide perfunctory answers: If the question is worth 25%, your instructor expects a fairly detailed response.
3. Rank for yourself the degree of difficulty of the questions, from easiest to hardest. Start with the questions that you immediately know you can handle effectively, and save harder questions for later. Often those harder questions will become easier once you have gotten into the activity of writing the examination.

4. After you have thought a little about the question, before writing furiously, take a moment to jot down few ideas that strike you, as a sort of outline or source of further inspiration. You may at the outset realize that, say, you want to make three points, and unless you jot these down—three key words will do—you may spend all the allotted time on one point.

5. Answer the question. If you are asked to compare two characters, compare them; don't just write two character sketches. Take seriously such words as compare, define, summarize, and, especially, evaluate.

6. You often can get a good start merely by turning the question into an affirmation—for example, by turning "In what ways does the poetry of Louise Erdrich resemble her fiction" into "Louise Erdrich's poetry resembles her fiction in at least . . . ways."

7. Don't waste time summarizing at length what you have read unless asked to do so—but, of course, you may have to give a brief summary in order to support a point. The instructor wants to see that you can use your reading, not merely that you have done the reading.

8. Be concrete. Illustrate your arguments with facts—the names of authors, titles, dates, characters, details of plot, and quotations if possible.

9. Leave space for last-minute additions. If you are writing in an examination booklet, either skip a page between essays or write only on the right-hand pages so that on rereading you can add material at the appropriate place on the left-hand pages.

10. Reread what you have written, and make last-minute revisions. By the time you have finished writing the last essay you have probably thought of some things—for instance, some quotations may have come to mind—that might well add strength to some of the earlier essays.

Beyond these general suggestions we can best talk about essay examinations by looking at five common types of questions:

1. A passage to explicate

2. A historical question (for example, "Trace the influence of Guy de Maupassant on Kate Chopin")

3. A critical quotation to be evaluated

4. A wild question (such as “What would Flannery O’Connor think of Katherine Min’s ‘Courting a Monk’?”; “What would Othello do if he were in Hamlet’s place?”)

5. A comparison (for example, “Compare Eliot’s ‘The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock’ with Browning’s ‘My Last Duchess’ as dramatic monologues”)

A few remarks on each of these types may be helpful.

1. On explication, see pages 42–46 and page 824. As a short rule, look carefully at the tone (speaker’s attitude toward self, subject, and audience) and at the implications of the words (their connotations and associations), and see whether a pattern of imagery is evident. For example, religious language (adore, saint) in a secular love poem may precisely define the nature of the lover and of the beloved. Remember, an explication is not a paraphrase (a putting into other words) but an attempt to show the relations of the parts by calling attention to implications. Organization of such an essay is rarely a problem, since most explications begin with the first line and go on to the last. Indeed, if you glance at the poem or passage and feel worried that it is too difficult or obscure, don’t panic. Take a breath, and begin with the first line or the first sentence. Explicate that, and then focus on how the next line or sentence is related to what has come just before. Proceed step by step, piece by piece, and as you do so you will develop a sense of the whole—which is where your explication can conclude.

2. A good essay on a historical question will offer a nice combination of argument and evidence; that is, the thesis will be supported by concrete details (names, dates, perhaps, even brief quotations). A discussion of Chopin’s debt to Maupassant cannot be convincing if it does not specify certain works and certain characteristics. If you are asked to relate a writer or a body of work to an earlier writer or period, list the chief characteristics of the earlier writer or period, and then show specifically how the material you are discussing is related to these characteristics. If you remember and can quote some relevant terms, phrases, or lines from the works, your reader will feel that you really know the works themselves.

3. If you are asked to evaluate a critical quotation, read it carefully, and in your answer take account of all the quotation. If, for example, the quoted critic has said, “Louise Erdrich in her fiction always . . . but in her poetry rarely . . .” you will have to write about poetry and fiction; it will not be enough to talk only about one form or the other, unless, of course, the instructions on the examination ask you to take only as much of the quotation as you wish. Watch especially for words like always, for the most part, never; that is, although the passage may on the whole approach the truth, you may feel that some important qualifications are needed. This is not being picky; true thinking involves making subtle distinctions, yielding assent only so far and no further. And (again) be sure to give concrete details, supporting your argument with evidence.

4. Curiously, a wild question, such as "What would Shakespeare think of Death of a Salesman?" or "What would Desdemona do in Antigone's place?" usually produces rather tame answers: A couple of standard ideas about Shakespeare (for instance, Shakespeare chiefly wrote poetry, and he usually included some comedy in his tragedies) are mechanically applied to Arthur Miller, or a simple characterization of Desdemona is applied to the situation set forth in Antigone, and some gross incompatibilities are revealed. But as the previous paragraph suggests, it may be necessary to do more than set up bold oppositions. The interest in such a question and in the answer to it may be largely in the degree to which superficially different figures resemble each other in some important ways. Remember that the wildness of the question does not mean that all answers are equally acceptable; as usual, any good answer will be supported by concrete detail. If time permits, you can often enrich your answer by reflecting a bit on the other way of looking at the issue. First, to be sure, explain how Desdemona would have acted in Antigone's place—this is what the question asks for. But consider too how you could strengthen this answer by taking note as well of how Antigone might have acted in Desdemona's place.

5. On comparisons, see pages 46–47. Because comparisons are especially difficult to write, be sure to take a few moments to jot down a sort of outline so that you know where you will be going. In a comparison of Browning's and Eliot's monologues, you might treat one poem by each, devoting alternate paragraphs to one author, or you might first treat one author's poem and then turn to the other's. But if you adopt this second strategy, your essay may break into two parts. You can guard against this weakness in three ways: Announcing at the outset that you will treat one author first, then the other; reminding your reader during your treatment of the first author that you will pick up certain points when you get to the second author; and briefly reminding your reader during the treatment of the second author of certain points you already made in your treatment of the first. Remember to make your points as clear and specific as you can. If you say that two authors are both "pessimistic about whether love can endure," you'll want to explain the nature of this pessimism, the reasons in each case for this view, and the precise similarities and the differences. A frequent weakness in “comparisons” is that they are too general, lacking the details that indicate subtle differences. When you review your answer, ask yourself if you have been sufficiently precise.

Glossary of Literary Terms

The terms briefly defined here are for the most part more fully defined earlier in the text. Hence many of the entries are followed by page references to the earlier discussions.

accent stress given to a syllable.

act a major division of a play.

action (1) the happenings in a narrative or drama, usually physical events (B marries C, D kills E), but also mental changes (F moves from innocence to experience); in short, the answer to the question, "What happens?" (2) less commonly, the theme or underlying idea of a work. (1031)

allegory a work in which concrete elements (for instance, a pilgrim, a road, a splendid city) stand for abstractions (humanity, life, salvation), usually in an unambiguous, one-to-one relationship. The literal items (the pilgrim, and so on) thus convey a meaning, which is usually moral, religious, or political. To take a nonliterary example: The Statue of Liberty holds a torch (enlightenment, showing the rest of the world the way to freedom), and at her feet are broken chains (tyranny overcome). A caution: Not all of the details in an allegorical work are meant to be interpreted. For example, the hollowness of the Statue of Liberty does not stand for the insubstantiality or emptiness of liberty. (144) alliteration repetition of consonant sounds, especially at the beginnings of words: *f*ree, *f*orm, *ph*antom. (797) allusion an indirect reference; thus when Lincoln spoke of "a nation dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," he was making an allusion to the Declaration of Independence.

ambiguity multiplicity of meaning, often deliberate, that leaves the reader uncertain about the intended significance.

anagnorisis a recognition or discovery, especially in tragedy—for example, when the hero understands the reason for his or her fall. (1096)

analysis an examination, which usually proceeds by separating the object of study into parts. (42, 743) anapest a metrical foot consisting of two unaccented syllables followed by an accented one. Example, showing three anapests: "As I came / to the edge / of the wood." (795) anecdote a short narrative, usually reporting an amusing event in the life of an important person. (74) antagonist a character or force that opposes (literally, "wrestles") the protagonist (the main character). Thus, in Hamlet the antagonist is King Claudius, the protagonist is Hamlet; in Antigone, the antagonist is Creon, the protagonist Antigone.

antecedent action happenings (especially in a play) that occurred before the present action. (1031) apostrophe address to an absent figure or to a thing as if it were present and could listen. Example: "O rose, thou art sick!" (749) approximate rhyme see half-rhyme.

archetype a theme, image, motif, or pattern that occurs so often in literary works it seems to be universal. Examples: a dark forest (for mental confusion), the sun (for illumination).

aside in the theater, words spoken by a character in the presence of other characters, but directed to the spectators (i.e., understood by the audience to be inaudible to the other characters). (1032) assonance repetition of similar vowel sounds in stressed syllables. Example: light/bride. (797) atmosphere the emotional tone (for instance, joy, or horror) in a work, most often established by the setting.

ballad a short narrative poem, especially one that is sung or recited, often in a stanza of four lines, with 8, 6, 8, 6 syllables, with the second and fourth lines rhyming. A folk or popular ballad is a narrative song that has been transmitted orally by what used to be called "the folk"; a literary ballad is a conscious imitation (without music) of such a work, often with complex symbolism. (675)

blank verse unrhymed iambic pentameter, that is, unrhymed lines of ten syllables, with every second syllable stressed. (819) cacophony an unpleasant combination of sounds.

caesura a strong pause within a line of verse. (796)

canon a term originally used to refer to those books accepted as Holy Scripture by the Christian Church. The term has come to be applied to literary works thought to have a special merit by a given culture—for instance, the body of literature traditionally taught in colleges and universities. Such works are sometimes called "classics" and their authors are "major authors." As conceived in the United States until recently, the canon consisted chiefly of works by dead white European and American males—partly, of course, because middle-class and upper-class white males were in fact the people who did most of the writing in the Western Hemisphere, but also because white males (for instance, college professors) were the people who chiefly established the canon. Not surprisingly the canon-makers valued (or valorized or "privileged") writings that revealed, asserted, or reinforced the canon-makers' own values. From about the 1960s feminists and Marxists and others argued that these works had been regarded as central not because they were inherently better than other works but because they reflected the interests of the dominant culture, and that other work, such as slave narratives and the diaries of women, had been "marginalized."

In fact, the literary canon has never been static (in contrast to the biblical canon, which has not changed for more than a thousand years), but it is true that certain authors, such as Homer, Chaucer, and Shakespeare have been permanent fixtures. Why? Partly because they do indeed support the values of those who in large measure control the high cultural purse strings, and perhaps partly because their works are rich enough to invite constant reinterpretation from age to age—that is, to allow each generation to find its needs and its values in them.

catharsis Aristotle's term for the purgation or purification of the pity and terror supposedly experienced while witnessing a tragedy. (1097)

character (1) a person in a literary work (Romeo); (2) the personality of such a figure (sentimental lover, or whatever). Characters (in the first sense) are sometimes classified as either "flat" (one-dimensional) or "round" (fully realized, complex). (74, 78, 79) characterization the presentation of a character, whether by direct description, by showing the character in action, or by the presentation of other characters who help to define each other.

cliché an expression that through overuse has ceased to be effective. Examples: acid test; sigh of relief; the proud possessor.

climax the culmination of a conflict; a turning point, often the point of greatest tension in a plot. (1031)

comedy a literary work, especially a play, characterized by humor and by a happy ending. (1415) comparison and contrast To compare is strictly to note similarities; to contrast is to note differences. But compare is now often used for both activities. (46) complication an entanglement in a narrative or dramatic work that causes a conflict. (74)

conflict a struggle between a character and some obstacle (for example, another character or fate) or between internal forces, such as divided loyalties. (73, 1031) connotation the associations (suggestions, overtones) of a word or expression. Thus seventy and three score and ten both mean "one more than sixty-nine," but because three score and ten is a biblical expression, it has an association of holiness; see also denota-tion. (750) consistency building the process engaged in during the act of reading, of reevaluating the details that one has just read in order to make them consistent with the new information that the text is providing.

consonance repetition of consonant sounds, especially in stressed syllables. Also called half-rhyme or slant rhyme. Example: arouse/doze. (797) convention a pattern (for instance, the 14-line poem, or sonnet) or motif (for instance, the bumbling police officer in detective fiction) or other device occurring so often that it is taken for granted. Thus it is a convention that actors in a performance of Julius Caesar are understood to be speaking Latin, though in fact they are speaking English. Similarly, the soliloquy (a character alone on the stage speaks his or her thoughts aloud) is a convention, for in real life sane people rarely talk aloud to themselves.

couplet a pair of lines of verse, usually rhyming. (801) crisis a high point in the conflict that leads to the turning point. (1031)

criticism the analysis or evaluation of a literary work. (1741) cultural criticism criticism that sets literature in a social context, often of economics or politics or gender. Borrowing some of the methods of anthropology, cultural criticism usually extends the canon to include popular material—for instance, comic books and soap operas.

dactyl a metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed syllables. Example: underwear. (795) deconstruction a critical approach that assumes language is unstable and ambiguous and is therefore inherently contradictory. Because authors cannot control their language, texts reveal more than their authors are aware of. For instance, texts (like such institutions as the law, the churches, and the schools) are likely, when closely scrutinized, to reveal connections to a society's economic system, even though the authors may have believed they were outside of the system. (1744) denotation the dictionary meaning of a word. Thus soap opera and daytime serial have the same denotation, but the connotations (associations, emotional overtones) of soap opera are less favorable. (750)

dénouement the resolution or the outcome (literally, the "unknotting") of a plot. (74, 79, 1031)

deus ex machina literally, "a god out of a machine"; any unexpected and artificial way of resolving the plot—for example, by introducing a rich uncle, thought to be dead, who arrives on the scene and pays the debts that otherwise would overwhelm the young hero.

dialogue exchange of words between characters; speech.

diction the choice of vocabulary and of sentence structure. There is a difference in diction between "One never knows" and "You never can tell." (729) didactic pertaining to teaching; having a moral purpose.

dimeter a line of poetry containing two feet. (795)

discovery see anagnorisis.

drama (1) a play; (2) conflict or tension, as in "The story lacks drama."

dramatic irony see irony.

dramatic monologue a poem spoken entirely by one character but addressed to one or more other characters whose presence is strongly felt. (727) effaced narrator a narrator who reports but who does not editorialize or enter into the minds of any of the characters in the story.

elegy a lyric poem, usually a meditation on a death. (698)

elision omission (usually of a vowel or unstressed syllable), as in o'er (for over) and in "Th' inevitable hour."

end rhyme identical sounds at the ends of lines of poetry. (797) end-stopped line a line of poetry that ends with a pause (usually marked by a comma, semicolon, or period) because the grammatical structure and the sense reach (at least to some degree) completion. It is contrasted with a run-on line. (796)

English (or Shakespearean) sonnet a poem of 14 lines (three quatrains and a couplet), rhyming ababcdcdefefgg. (801)

enjambment a line of poetry in which the grammatical and logical sense run on, without pause, into the next line or lines. (796) epic a long narrative, especially in verse, that usually records heroic material in an elevated style.

epigram a brief, witty poem or saying.

epigraph a quotation at the beginning of the work, just after the title, often giving a clue to the theme.

epiphany a "showing forth," as when an action reveals a character with particular clarity.

episode an incident or scene that has unity in itself but is also a part of a larger action.

epistle a letter, in prose or verse.

essay a work, usually in prose and usually fairly short, that purports to be true and that treats its subject tentatively. In most literary essays the reader's interest is as much in the speaker's personality as in any argument that is offered.

euphony literally, "good sound," a pleasant combination of sounds.

explication a line-by-line unfolding of the meaning of a text. (42, 824, 1743) exposition a setting forth of information. In fiction and drama, introductory material introducing characters and the situation; in an essay, the presentation of information, as opposed to the telling of a story or the setting forth of an argument. (79, 1031) eye rhyme words that look as though they rhyme, but do not rhyme when pronounced. Example: come/home. (797) fable a short story (often involving speaking animals) with an easily grasped moral. (72) farce comedy based not on clever language or on subtleties of characters but on broadly humorous situations (for instance, a man mistakenly enters the women's locker room).

feminine rhyme a rhyme of two or more syllables, with the stress falling on a syllable other than the last. Examples: fatter/batter; tenderly/slenderly. (796, 797) feminist criticism an approach especially concerned with analyzing the depiction of women in literature—what images do male authors present of female characters?—and with the reappraisal of work by female authors. (1753)

fiction an imaginative work, usually a prose narrative (novel, short story), that reports incidents that did not in fact occur. The term may include all works that invent a world such as a lyric poem or a play.

figurative language, figures of speech words intended to be understood in a way that is other than literal. Thus lemon used literally refers to a citrus fruit, but lemon used figuratively refers to a defective machine, especially a defective automobile. Other examples: "He's a beast." "She's a witch." "A sea of troubles." Literally, such expressions are nonsense, but writers use them to express meanings inexpressible in literal speech. Among the most common kinds of figures of speech are apostrophe, metaphor, and simile (see the discussions of these words in this glossary). (743, 750) flashback an interruption in a narrative that presents an earlier episode.

flat character a one-dimensional character (for instance, the figure who is only and always the jealous husband or the flirtatious wife) as opposed to a round or many-sided character. (79)

fly-on-the-wall narrator a narrator who never editorializes and never enters a character's mind, but reports only what is said and done. (100)

foil a character who makes a contrast with another, especially a minor character who helps to set off a major character. (1177) foot a metrical unit, consisting of two or three syllables, with a specified arrangement of the stressed syllable or syllables. Thus the iambic foot consists of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable. (794) foreshadowing suggestions of what is to come. (81)

formalist criticism analysis that assumes a work of art is a constructed object with a stable meaning that can be ascertained by studying the relationships between the elements of the work. Thus a poem is like a chair: a chair can of course be stood on, or used for firewood, but it was created with a specific purpose that was evident and remains evident to all viewers. (1742)

free verse poetry in lines of irregular length, usually unrhymed. (819)

gap a term from reader-response criticism, referring to a reader's perception that something is unstated in the text, requiring the reader to fill in the material—for instance, to draw a conclusion as to why a character behaves as she does. Filling in the gaps is a matter of "consistency building." Different readers of course may fill the gaps differently, and readers may even differ as to whether a gap exists at a particular point in the text. (10) gay criticism see gender criticism.

gender criticism criticism concerned especially with alleged differences in the ways that males and females read and write, and with the representations of gender (straight, bisexual, gay, lesbian) in literature. (1756) genre kind or type, roughly analogous to the biological term species. The four chief literary genres are nonfiction, fiction, poetry, and drama; but these can be subdivided into further genres. Thus fiction obviously can be divided into the short story and the novel, and drama obviously can be divided into tragedy and comedy. But these can be still further divided—for instance, tragedy into heroic tragedy and bourgeois tragedy, comedy into romantic comedy and satirical comedy.

gesture physical movement, especially in a play. (1028)

haiku a Japanese form having three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables. (774) half-rhyme repetition in accented syllables of the final consonant sound but without identity in the preceding vowel sound; words of similar but not identical sound. Also called near rhyme, slant rhyme, approximate rhyme, and off-rhyme. See also consonance. Examples: light/bet; affirm/perform. (797) hamartia a flaw in the tragic hero, or an error made by the tragic hero. (1094)

heptameter a metrical line of seven feet. (795) hero, heroine the main character (not necessarily heroic or even admirable) in a work; cf. protagonist.

heroic couplet an end-stopped pair of rhyming lines of iambic pentameter. (801)

hexameter a metrical line of six feet. (795)

historical criticism the attempt to illuminate a literary work by placing it in its historical context. (1749)

hubris, hybris a Greek word, usually translated as "overweening pride," "arrogance," "excessive ambition," and often said to be characteristic of tragic figures. (1095) humor character a character dominated by a single trait—the miser, the jealous husband, the flirtatious wife.

hymn a lyric on a lofty theme (from the Greek, "a song of praise"). (698) hyperbole figurative language using overstatement, as in "He died a thousand deaths." (778)

iamb, iambic a poetic foot consisting of an unaccented syllable followed by an accented one. Example: alone. (795)

image, imagery Imagery is established by language that appeals to the senses, especially sight ("deep blue sea") but also other senses ("tinkling bells," "perfumes of Arabia"). (756) incremental repetition repetition with slight variations that advance a narrative, such as "She heard,... she rose,... she left." (676) indeterminacy a passage that careful readers agree is open to more than one interpretation. According to some poststructural critics, because language is unstable and because contexts can never be objectively viewed, all texts are indeterminate. (10) innocent eye a naive narrator in whose narration the reader sees more than the narrator sees. (99)

internal rhyme rhyme within a line. (797) interpretation the assignment of meaning to a text.

intertextuality All works show the influence of other works. If an author writes (say) a short story, no matter how original she thinks she is, she inevitably brings to her own story a knowledge of other stories—for example, a conception of what a short story is; and speaking more generally, an idea of what a story (long or short, written or oral) is. In opposition to formalist critics, who see a literary work as an independent whole containing a fixed meaning, some contemporary critics emphasize the work's intertextuality—that is, its connections with a vast context of writings and indeed of all aspects of culture, and in part depending also on what the reader brings to the work. Because different readers bring different things, meaning is thus ever-changing. In this view, then, no text is self-sufficient, and no writer fully controls the meaning of the text. Because we are talking about connections of which the writer is unaware, and because "meaning" is in part the creation of the reader, the author is by no means an authority. Thus the critic should see a novel (for instance) in connection not only with other novels, past and present, but also in connection with other kinds of narratives, such as TV dramas and films, even though the author of the book lived before the age of film and TV. See Jay Clayton and Eric Rothstein, eds., Influences and Intertextuality in Literary History (1991).

invective abusive language, in literature often used for comic purposes. (737) irony a contrast of some sort. For instance, in verbal irony or Socratic irony, the contrast is between what is said and what is meant ("You're a great guy," meant bitterly). In dramatic irony or Sophoclean irony—also called tragic irony—the contrast is between what is intended and what is accomplished (Macbeth usurps the throne, thinking he will then be happy, but the action leads him to misery), or between what the audience knows (a murderer waits in the bedroom) and what a character says (the victim enters the bedroom, innocently saying, "I think I'll have a long sleep"). (777)

Italian (or Petrarchan) sonnet a poem of 14 lines, consisting of an octave (rhyming abbaabba) and a sestet (usually cdecde or cdccdc). (801) lesbian criticism see gender criticism.

litotes a form of understatement in which an affirmation is made by means of a negation; thus "He was not underweight," meaning "He was grossly over-weight."

lyric poem a short poem, often songlike, with the emphasis not on narrative but on the speaker's emotion or reverie. (697)

Marxist criticism the study of literature in the light of Karl Marx's view that economic forces, controlled by the dominant class, shape the literature (as well as the law, philosophy, religion, etc.) of a society. (1750) masculine rhyme rhyme of one-syllable words (lies/cries) or, if more than one syllable, words ending with accented syllables (behold/foretold). (796, 797) mask a term used to designate the speaker of a poem, equivalent to persona or voice. (718) meaning Critics seek to interpret "meaning," variously defined as what the writer intended the work to say about the world and human experience, or as what the work says to the reader irrespective of the writer's intention. Both versions imply that a literary work is a nut to be cracked, with a kernel that is to be extracted. Because few critics today hold that meaning is clear and unchanging, the tendency now is to say that a critic offers "an interpretation" or "a reading" rather than a "statement of the meaning of a work." Many critics today would say that an alleged interpretation is really a creation of meaning.

melodrama a narrative, usually in dramatic form, involving threatening situations but ending happily. The characters are usually stock figures (virtuous heroine, villainous landlord).

metaphor a kind of figurative language equating one thing with another: "This novel is garbage" (a book is equated with discarded and probably inedible food), "a piercing cry" (a cry is equated with a spear or other sharp instrument). (746)

meter a pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables. (794)

metonymy a kind of figurative language in which a word or phrase stands not for itself but for something closely related to it: saber rattling means "militaristic talk or action." (747) monologue a relatively long, uninterrupted speech by a character.

monometer a metrical line consisting of only one foot. (795) montage in film, quick cutting; in fiction, quick shifts.

mood the atmosphere, usually created by descriptions of the settings and characters.

motif a recurrent theme within a work, or a theme common to many works.

motivation grounds for a character's action. (80)

myth (1) a traditional story reflecting primitive beliefs, especially explaining the mysteries of the natural world (why it rains, or the origin of mountains); (2) a body of belief, not necessarily false, especially as set forth by a writer. Thus one may speak of Yeats and Alice Walker as myth-makers, referring to the visions of reality that they set forth in their works.

myth criticism the study of patterns that seem universal or archetypal. (1748) narrative, narrator a narrative is a story (an anecdote, a novel); a narrator is one who tells a story (not the author, but the invented speaker of the story). On kinds of narrators, see point of view. (97)

New Criticism a mid-twentieth-century movement (also called formalist criticism) that regarded a literary work as an independent, carefully constructed object; hence it made little or no use of the author's biography or of historical context, and it relied chiefly on explication. (1744)

New Historicism a school of criticism holding that the past cannot be known objectively. According to this view, because historians project their own "narrative"—their own invention or "construction"—on the happenings of the past, historical writings are not objective but are, at bottom, political statements. (1750) novel a long work of prose fiction, especially one that is relatively realistic.

novella a work of prose fiction longer than a short story but shorter than a novel—say, about 40 to 80 pages.

objective point of view a narrator reports but does not editorialize or enter into the minds of any of the characters in the story. (100)

octameter a metrical line with eight feet. (795)

octave, octet an eight-line stanza, or the first eight lines of a sonnet, especially of an Italian sonnet. (801) octosyllabic couplet a pair of rhyming lines, each line with four iambic feet. (801) ode a lyric exalting someone (for instance, a hero) or something (for instance, a season). (698) off-rhyme see half-rhyme. (797) omniscient narrator a speaker who knows the thoughts of all of the characters in the narrative. (99) onomatopoeia words (or the use of words) that sound like what they mean. Examples: buzz; whirr. (797) open form poetry whose form seems spontaneous rather than highly patterned.

overstatement exaggeration, to emphasize a point. (778) oxymoron a compact paradox, as in a mute cry; a pleasing pain; proud humility.

parable a short narrative that is at least in part allegorical and that illustrates a moral or spiritual lesson. (8)

paradox an apparent contradiction, as in Jesus' words "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it." (778) paraphrase a restatement that sets forth an idea in diction other than that of the original. (4) parody a humorous imitation of a literary work, especially of its style.

pathos pity, sadness.

pentameter a line of verse containing five feet. (795)

peripeteia a reversal in the action. (1096)

persona literally, a mask; the "I" or speaker of a work, sometimes identified with the author but usually better regarded as the voice or mouthpiece created by the author. (718) personification a kind of figurative language in which an inanimate object, animal, or other nonhuman is given human traits. Examples: the creeping tide (the tide is imagined as having feet); the cruel sea (the sea is imagined as having moral qualities). (748)

plot the episodes in a narrative or dramatic work—that is, what happens. (But even a lyric poem can be said to have a plot; for instance, the speaker's mood changes from anger to resignation.) Sometimes plot is defined as the author's particular arrangement (sequence) of these episodes, and story is the episodes in their chronological sequence. Until recently it was widely believed that a good plot had a logical structure: A caused B (B did not simply happen to follow A), but in the last few decades some critics have argued that such a concept merely represents the white male's view of experience. (78, 1030) poem an imaginative work in meter or in free verse, usually employing figurative language.

point of view the perspective from which a story is told—for example, by a major character or a minor character or a fly on the wall; see also narrative, narrator, omniscient narrator. (97)

postmodernism The term came into prominence in the 1960s, to distinguish the contemporary experimental writing of such authors as Samuel Beckett and Jorge Luis Borges from such early twentieth-century classics of modernism as James Joyce's Ulysses (1922) and T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922). Although the classic modernists had been thought to be revolutionary in their day, after World War II they seemed to be conservative, and their works seemed remote from today's society with its new interests in such things as feminism, gay and lesbian rights, and pop culture. Postmodernist literature, though widely varied and not always clearly distinct from modernist literature, usually is more politically concerned, more playful—it is given to parody and pastiche—and more closely related to the art forms of popular culture than is modernist literature.

prologue an introductory statement, especially a monologue at the beginning of a play, summarizing the plot or introducing the characters. (1031, 1099)

prosody the principles of versification. (794) protagonist the chief actor in any literary work. The term is usually preferable to hero and heroine because it can include characters—for example, villainous or weak ones—who are not aptly called heroes or heroines. (1031) psychological criticism a form of analysis especially concerned both with the ways in which authors unconsciously leave traces of their inner lives in their works and with the ways in which readers respond, consciously and unconsciously, to works. (1752)

pyrrhic foot in poetry, a foot consisting of two unstressed syllables. (795)

quatrain a stanza of four lines. (801) reader-response criticism criticism emphasizing the idea that various readers respond in various ways and therefore that readers as well as authors "create" meaning. (1745) realism presentation of plausible characters (usually middle class) in plausible (usually everyday) circumstances, as opposed, for example, to heroic characters engaged in improbable adventures. Realism in literature seeks to give the illusion of reality.

recognition see anagnorisis. (1096)

refrain a repeated phrase, line, or group of lines in a poem, especially in a ballad.

resolution the dénouement or untying of the complication of the plot. (74) reversal a change in fortune, often an ironic twist. (1096)

rhetorical question a question to which no answer is expected or to which only one answer is plausible. Example: "Do you think I am unaware of your goings-on?"

rhyme similarity or identity of accented sounds in corresponding positions, as, for example, at the ends of lines: love/dove; tender/slender. (797) rhythm in poetry, a pattern of stressed and unstressed sounds; in prose, some sort of recurrence (for example, of a motif) at approximately identical intervals. (789, 796) rising action in a story or play, the events that lead up to the climax. (1031) rising meter a foot (for example, iambic or anapestic) ending with a stressed syllable.

romance narrative fiction, usually characterized by improbable adventures and love.

round character a many-sided character, one who does not always act predictably, as opposed to a "flat" or one-dimensional, unchanging character. (79)

run-on line a line of verse whose syntax and meaning require the reader to go on, without a pause, to the next line; an enjambed line. (796)

sarcasm crudely mocking or contemptuous language; heavy verbal irony. (777) satire literature that entertainingly attacks folly or vice; amusingly abusive writing. (735)

scansion description of rhythm in poetry: metrical analysis. (796) scene (1) a unit of a play, in which the setting is unchanged and the time continuous; (2) the setting (locale, and time of the action); (3) in fiction, a dramatic passage, as opposed to a passage of description or of summary.

selective omniscience a point of view in which the author enters the mind of one character and for the most part sees the other characters only from the outside. (99) sentimentality excessive emotion, especially excessive pity, treated as appropriate rather than as disproportionate.

sestet a six-line stanza, or the last six lines of an Italian sonnet. (813) sestina a poem with six stanzas of six lines each and a concluding stanza of three lines. The last word of each line in the first stanza appears as the last word of a line in each of the next five stanzas but in a different order. In the final (three-line) stanza, each line ends with one of these six words, and each line includes in the middle of the line one of the other three words.

setting the time and place of a story, play, or poem (for instance, a Texas town in winter, about 1900). (74, 78, 79, 147) short story a fictional narrative, usually in prose, rarely longer than 30 pages and often much briefer.

simile a kind of figurative language explicitly making a comparison—for example, by using as, like, or a verb such as seems. (745)

soliloquy a speech in a play, in which a character alone on the stage speaks his or her thoughts aloud. (1032)

sonnet a lyric poem of 14 lines; see English sonnet, Italian sonnet. (801)

speaker see persona. (718)

spondee a metrical foot consisting of two stressed syllables. (795)

stage direction a playwright's indication to the actors or readers—for example, offering information about how an actor is to speak a line. (1028) stanza a group of lines forming a unit that is repeated in a poem. (800) stereotype a simplified conception, especially an oversimplification—for example, a stock character such as the heartless landlord, the kindly old teacher, the prostitute with a heart of gold. Such a character usually has only one personality trait, and this is boldly exaggerated.

stock epithet standardized descriptions, common in folk ballads, such as "golden hair," "milk-white steed." (676)

stream of consciousness the presentation of a character's unrestricted flow of thought, often with free associations, and often without punctuation. (99)

stress relative emphasis on one syllable as compared with another. (794) structuralism a critical theory holding that a literary work consists of conventional elements that, taken together by a reader familiar with the conventions, give the work its meaning. Thus just as a spectator must know the rules of a game (e.g., three strikes and you're out) in order to enjoy the game, so a reader must know the rules of, say, a novel (coherent, realistic, adequately motivated characters, a plausible plot—for instance, The Color Purple) or of a satire (caricatures of contemptible figures in amusing situations that need not be at all plausible—for instance, Gulliver's Travels). Structuralists normally have no interest in the origins of a work (i.e., in the historical background, or in the author's biography), and no interest in the degree to which a work of art seems to correspond to reality. The interest normally is in the work as a self-sufficient construction. Consult Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction, and two books by Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics (1976) and (for the critical shift from structuralism to poststructuralism) On Deconstruction (1982).

structure the organization of a work, the relationship between the chief parts, the large-scale pattern—for instance, a rising action or complication followed by a crisis and then a resolution.

style the manner of expression, evident not only in the choice of certain words (for instance, colloquial language) but also in the choice of certain kinds of sentence structure, characters, settings, and themes. (179) subplot a sequence of events often paralleling or in some way resembling the main story.

summary a synopsis or condensation.

symbol a person, object, action, or situation that, charged with meaning, suggests another thing (for example, a dark forest may suggest confusion, or perhaps evil), though usually with less specificity and more ambiguity than an allegory. A symbol usually differs from a metaphor in that a symbol is expanded or repeated and works by accumulating associations. (756, 757) synecdoche a kind of figurative language in which the whole stands for a part (the law, for a police officer), or a part stands for the whole (wheels, for an automobile). (747) tale a short narrative, usually less realistic and more romantic than a short story; a yarn.

tetrameter a verse line of four feet. (795)

theme what the work is about; an underlying idea of a work; a conception of human experience suggested by the concrete details. Thus the theme of Macbeth is often said to be that "vaulting ambition o'erleaps itself." (79, 81) thesis the point or argument that a writer announces and develops. A thesis differs from a topic by making an assertion. "The fall of Oedipus" is a topic, but "Oedipus falls because he is impetuous" is a thesis, as is "Oedipus is impetuous, but his impetuosity has nothing to do with his fall." (34)

thesis sentence a sentence summarizing, as specifically as possible, the writer's chief point (argument and perhaps purpose). (34)

third-person narrator the teller of a story who does not participate in the happenings. (98) tone the prevailing attitude (for instance, ironic, genial, objective) as perceived by the reader. Notice that a reader may feel that the tone of the persona of the work is genial while the tone of the author of the same work is ironic. (822) topic a subject, such as "Hamlet's relation to Horatio." A topic becomes a thesis when a predicate is added to this subject, thus: "Hamlet's relation to Horatio helps to define Hamlet."

tragedy a serious play showing the protagonist moving from good fortune to bad and ending in death or a deathlike state. (1094) tragic flaw a supposed weakness (for example, arrogance) in the tragic protagonist. If the tragedy results from an intellectual error rather than from a moral weakness, it is better to speak of "a tragic error." (1095) tragicomedy a mixture of tragedy and comedy, usually a play with serious happenings that expose the characters to the threat of death but that ends happily.

transition a connection between one passage and the next. (49)

trimeter a verse line with three feet. (795)

triplet a group of three lines of verse, usually rhyming. (801) trochee a metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed syllable. Example: garden. (795) understatement a figure of speech in which the speaker says less than what he or she means; an ironic minimizing, as in "You've done fairly well for yourself" said to the winner of a multimillion-dollar lottery. (777)

unity harmony and coherence of parts, absence of irrelevance. (38) unreliable narrator a narrator whose report a reader cannot accept at face value, perhaps because the narrator is naive or is too deeply implicated in the action to report it objectively. (98) verbal irony see irony.

verse (1) a line of poetry; (2) a stanza of a poem. (819)

verse paragraph a passage of blank verse that presents a unit of thought. (819)

vers libre free verse, unrhymed poetry. (819)

villanelle a poem with five stanzas of three lines rhyming aba, and a concluding stanza of four lines, rhyming abaa. The entire first line is repeated as the third line of the second and fourth stanzas; the entire third line is repeated as the third line of the third and fifth stanzas. These two lines form the final two lines of the last (four-line) stanza. (808) voice see persona, style, and tone. (718)
